PREFACE

... In which it is shown that the heroes of the history we are about to have the honour to relate to our readers have nothing to do with mythology despite having names ending in OS and IS

While doing research for my history of Louis XIV in the Royal Library a while ago, I stumbled across the Memoirs of Sir D'Artagnan, printed by Pierre Rouge in Amsterdam – where most of the works were printed during that period when authors who wished to tell the truth did so at the risk of a prolonged stay in the Bastille. This title fascinated me and with the kind permission of the archivist I took it home where I devoured it. It is not my intention to analyse this curious work here and I will content myself with recommending it to those of my readers who appreciate the vivid depiction of previous times. They will find character portraits in it sketched by the hand of a master and although these outlines may be for the most part, traced on barracks doors or tavern walls, they will not find the depictions of Louis XIII, Anne of Austria, Richelieu, Mazarin, or the courtiers of the period any less authentic than in Sir Anquetil's history. But as everyone knows, what strikes the capricious mind of the poet is not always what impresses the general reader. So while admiring the details of the story as others might, I was most taken with something that almost certainly no one else has noted. D'Artagnan relates that on his 1st visit to Sir Tréville, the Captain of the King's Musketeers, he met 3 young men in the antechamber who served in the illustrious corps he hoped to enter, whose names were Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. I must confess to being struck by these 3 strange names – and it immediately occurred to me that these were probably pseudonyms d'Artagnan had used to disguise their real, perhaps illustrious family names. Or they might perhaps be names the 3 had assumed on the day when they had donned the musketeers' simple tabard from caprice, restlessness, or lack of fortune. From then on I could not rest until I succeeded in finding some reference to these extraordinary names in some work of the period that had so aroused my curiosity. Just listing all the books I read in this pursuit would fill a whole chapter – which might be instructive but would not be very amusing for the reader. It is enough to relate that I was about to give up the quest, discouraged by my fruitless investigations when I came across a manuscript in folio, guided by my knowledgeable friend Paulin Paris. Catalogued either number 4772 or 4773, it bore the title Memoirs of Sir Count of La Fère, Concerning Diverse Events that Occurred in France in the Latter Days of the Reign of King Louis XIII and at the Commencement of the Reign of King Louis XIV. This was my last hope. Imagine my joy when I came across the name of Athos in turning the pages of this manuscript on page 20, the name of Porthos on 27, and the name of Aramis on 31. The discovery of such a completely unknown manuscript in the present day when the science of history is pursued so thoroughly seemed almost miraculous. So I hastened to ask permission to print it in the hope of accepting a membership in the Academy of Inscriptions and Fine Arts one day (in the all-too-probable event of being denied entry into the French Academy). I must say this permission was graciously granted – that gives the lie to those malcontents who claim we live under a government that is less than friendly to men of letters. Now what follows is the 1st part of this precious manuscript that I offer to the reader with the promise that if it is received as well as I expect the 2nd part will follow immediately. In the meantime as a godfather is a 2nd father, I request the readers to hold me responsible for his pleasure or boredom and not the Count of La Fère. That said, on with the tale.

The 3 Presents of Sir d'Artagnan the Elder

On the 1st Monday of April 1625, the town of Meung appeared to be in such a state of revolt it was almost as if the Huguenots had made it into a 2nd La Rochelle. The men of Meung hurriedly donned whatever armour they had, seeing their women running toward the high street, leaving their babies crying in their doorways. Then they headed for the Inn of the Jolly Miller, propping up their shaky courage with muskets or pole-arms in front of which a jostling, noisy, and curious crowd was growing minute by minute. In those times panics were frequent and few days passed without some city in France suffering a similar event. Nobles fought each other, the king contended with the cardinal, and the Spanish warred on the king. Besides these conflicts, overt or covert, there were also robbers, vagrants, wolves, rogues, and Huguenots who were at odds with everyone. The citizens always took up arms against robbers, wolves, or rogues, often against nobles or Huguenots, sometimes against the king but never against the cardinal or Spain. So the citizens of Meung rushed toward the Jolly Miller, hearing an uproar, seeing neither the red and yellow flag of Spain nor the livery of Cardinal Richelieu. When they arrived, the cause of the alarm was obvious. A young man – but his portrait can be sketched with a single stroke of the pen: envision Don Quixote at 18 years old, Don Quixote without armour or helmet in a woollen doublet once blue, now faded to a nameless colour somewhere between that of the sky and the dregs of honey. His face was long and brown with high cheekbones, a sign of cleverness. He had a strong, muscular jaw, by which one can always tell a Gascon even without his beret that this young man wore adorned with some sort of feather. His eyes were open and intelligent, the nose hooked but finely chiselled. Too big for a youth but not quite a grown man, one might take him for a farmer's son on a journey if it were not for the long sword hanging from a leather baldric, knocking against its owner's calves as he walked and slapping the rough side of his mount when he rode. For this young man had a mount, as remarkable as it was remarked upon. It was a Béarnaise pony, about twelve to fourteen years old, with a yellow hide, a hairless tail, and galls on its legs. It walked with its head lower than its knees, making a head-check rein unnecessary but despite appearances it somehow managed to cover eight leagues a day. At that time everyone was a connoisseur of horses but unfortunately the good qualities of this horse were hidden so well beneath its strange colour and eccentric gait, its sad appearance gave a poor first impression that naturally extended to its rider. This poor impression was felt by young d'Artagnan (for that was the name of the Don Quixote on this second Rocinante) all the more painfully as he was well aware that such a horse made even the best horseman look ridiculous. He had sighed a deep sigh when accepting the gift from Sir d'Artagnan the elder. But despite its appearance, he knew that even a beast like this was worth at least 20 livres – and that the words he'd received with it were beyond price. "My son," the Gascon gentleman had said, in that Béarnaise accent Henry IV had never been able to lose, "my son, this horse was born in the house of your father around thirteen years ago, and here it has remained ever since that ought to make you love it. Never sell it: allow it to die peacefully and honourably of old age, and if you take it on campaign, care for it as you would an old servant. At Court, should you have the honour to go there," continued Sir d'Artagnan the elder, "an honour to which your ancient nobility gives you the right, uphold your name as a gentleman, a name borne with dignity by your ancestors for five hundred years. For your own sake, and for the sake of your family and friends, endure nothing from anyone but the cardinal and the king. It's by his courage – mark me! – By his courage alone that a gentleman makes his way these days. He who hesitates for a second may let an opportunity escape that his fortune depends upon. You're young and ought to be brave for two reasons: first because you're a Gascon, and second because you're my son. Never fear trouble – seek out adventures instead. I've taught you how to handle a sword; you've muscles of iron and a wrist of steel. Fight at every opportunity, all the more because duels are forbidden so it's twice as courageous to fight! I have nothing to give you, my son but fifteen crowns, my horse, and the advice you've just heard. Your mother will add a recipe she had from a Bohemian for a certain balm, an ointment with the miraculous virtue of curing any wound that doesn't reach the heart. Make the best of all this, and live happily and long. I have only one more thing to add that is to recommend a living example for you to emulate. I speak not of myself, for I've never appeared at Court, and only took part in the Wars of Religion as a volunteer but of Sir Tréville, my former neighbour, who had the honour to be a child playmate of our king, Louis XIII – whom God preserve! Sometimes their play degenerated into fights that the king didn't always win. The blows he took only increased his esteem and friendship for Sir Tréville. Later, on his first adult journey to Paris, Sir Tréville fought five duels; between the death of the late king and when the current one came of age, he fought seven more times; and from then until today, maybe a hundred times more! Thus, despite all edicts, ordinances, and decrees outlawing duels, he is now Captain of the Musketeers – that is to say, chief of a legion of Caesars. The king holds him in high regard, and the cardinal fears him, a man whom it's said fears nothing. Moreover, Sir Tréville earns ten thousand crowns a year, so he's a great noble, a Grand. And he began just like you! Go see him, with this letter, and model yourself on him, so you may do as he has done."

That said, d'Artagnan the elder belted his own sword on his son, kissed him tenderly on both cheeks, and gave him his blessing. Leaving his father's chamber, the young man found his mother waiting for him with the famous recipe that, given the advice he'd just received, ought to see frequent use. The goodbyes on this side were longer and tenderer. It's not that Sir d'Artagnan didn't love his son but Sir d'Artagnan was a man and would have thought it undignified for a man to give way to his emotions – whereas Madam d'Artagnan was a woman, and what was more, a mother. She wept a great deal, and to the credit of Sir d'Artagnan the younger, despite his efforts to remain firm (as befit a future musketeer), nature prevailed and the tears flowed, though he managed to conceal half of them. That same day the young man set out on his journey, provided with the three paternal gifts: the fifteen crowns, the horse, and the letter for Sir Tréville – with the advice thrown into the bargain. With such endowments d'Artagnan was morally and physically an exact copy of the hero of Cervantes. Don Quixote took windmills for giants and flocks of sheep for armies; d'Artagnan took every smile for an insult and every look for a provocation. So all the way from Tarbes to Meung his hand was constantly doubled into a fist or gripping the hilt of his sword. Yet the fist struck no jaw and the sword was never drawn from its scabbard. It wasn't that the sight of the wretched yellow pony didn't raise smiles on the faces of passers-by, it was that a sword of intimidating length bumped against the side of that pony, while over the sword glared an eye as fierce as it was proud. So the passers-by suppressed their amusement, or if amusement outweighed caution, they laughed out of only one side of their mouths, like the drama masks of the ancients. D'Artagnan therefore kept his dignity and pride intact until he came to the fatal town of Meung. There, as he was dismounting from his horse at the gate of the Jolly Miller, without host, stableman, or groom coming to hold his stirrup, d'Artagnan saw a gentleman at an open window of the ground floor. Handsome and lordly, though rather grim and stern, he was talking with two men who listened with obvious respect. As was his way, d'Artagnan naturally assumed that he was the subject of their conversation and listened. This time d'Artagnan was half right: it wasn't him they spoke of but his horse. The gentleman seemed to be listing its qualities for his audience, who flattered him by laughing at every remark. Given that a half-smile was enough to rile d'Artagnan, one can imagine what effect this outright hilarity had on him. D'Artagnan took a closer look at this arrogant gent who mocked him. Fixing a haughty eye on the stranger, he saw a man of from forty to forty-five years of age, with black, piercing eyes, a pale complexion, a prominent nose, and a perfectly trimmed black moustache. He wore doublet and breeches of violet, with aiguillettes of the same colour, and no other ornaments but the customary slashes in the doublet that displayed the shirt beneath. These breeches and doublet, though new, showed the creases of clothes that had been packed in luggage for a long time. D'Artagnan noted all this quickly but carefully, doubtless from an instinctive feeling that this stranger was to have a great influence over his future life. As d'Artagnan looked over the man in the violet doublet, that gentleman made his funniest remark yet about the Béarnaise pony. The two men laughed louder than ever, and the stranger himself, contrary to his custom, allowed a pale smile to cross his face. This time, beyond all doubt, d'Artagnan was definitely insulted. Convinced of this, he pulled his beret down over his eyes and advanced with one hand on the hilt of his sword and the other affixed to his hip, trying to imitate some of the Court airs he'd seen displayed in Gascony by travelling noblemen. However, as he advanced, he got angrier, so that instead of the lofty and dignified speech he'd planned to deliver as a prelude to his challenge, all he could manage was a gross personal insult and a furious gesture. "Hey! You, Sir!" he cried, "You, hiding behind that shutter! Yes, you! Tell me what you're laughing at and we'll all laugh together!"

The gentleman slowly raised his eyes from the mount to the master as if he needed a moment to be certain that it could really be to him that these strange reproaches were addressed. Then he knit his brows slightly, able to doubt the matter no longer and after a long pause, he replied to d'Artagnan with an irony and insolence impossible to describe, "I didn't speak to you, Sir."

"But me, I'm speaking to you!" the young man cried, infuriated by this mix of insolence, manners, politeness, and disdain.

The stranger regarded him for a moment with a slight smile, then withdrew from the window, strolled slowly out the door of the inn, and placed himself in front of the horse within two paces of d'Artagnan. His serene expression and insolent attitude redoubled the mirth of the pair remaining at the window. As he approached, d'Artagnan drew his sword a foot from its scabbard. "Decidedly, this horse's quite the buttercup – or was in its distant youth," resumed the stranger, addressing the men at the window. He paid no attention whatsoever to d'Artagnan who placed himself in front of him, fed up. "This colour's well known in botany but has heretofore been rare among horses."

"There're those who'd laugh at the horse who'd not dare to laugh at the rider!" cried the furious young emulator of Tréville.

"I rarely laugh, sir, as you can probably tell from my face," replied the stranger, "but nevertheless I retain the privilege of laughing when I please."

"And I'll," cried d'Artagnan, "allow no man to laugh when it displeases me!"

"Indeed, Sir?" continued the stranger, more serene than ever. "Well, that's perfectly correct." And turning on his heel, he moved to enter the inn yard by the gate within which d'Artagnan could see a saddled horse. But d'Artagnan was not the sort to allow someone to escape who had had the insolence to mock him. He drew his sword and pursued the stranger, crying, "Turn! Turn, sir Jester or I'll strike you from behind!"

"Strike me!" said the other, pivoting on his heel and regarding the young man with as much astonishment as contempt. "Come, come, dear fellow, you must be mad!" Then as if to himself: "This is annoying. What a find this fellow would be for His Majesty who's searching everywhere for young heroes to recruit for his musketeers!"

He had scarcely finished when d'Artagnan made such a furious lunge at him that if he had not sprung nimbly backward, he probably never would have joked again. The stranger, seeing this was no laughing matter, drew his sword, saluted his adversary, and gravely placed himself on guard. But at that moment his 2 cronies attacked d'Artagnan from behind with club, shovel, and tongs, accompanied by the innkeeper. Turning to face this shower of blows diverted d'Artagnan so completely from his attack that his adversary sheathed his sword, becoming a spectator of the fight instead of a participant. Still imperturbable, he said, "A plague on these Gascons! Put him back on his orange horse and let him go!"

"Not before I've killed you, you coward!" cried d'Artagnan, putting the best face possible on the situation and refusing to retreat one step before his three assailants who continued to rain blows on him. "Yet another Gasconade," said the gentleman. "Upon my honour, these Gascons are incorrigible! Continue the dance since he insists. He'll let us know when he's had enough."

But the stranger did not know what manner of man he was dealing with. D'Artagnan was never one to cry for quarter. The fight continued a few moments longer and then exhausted, d'Artagnan dropped his sword that had been broken in two by a club. The next moment a blow fell full on his forehead and knocked him to the ground, bloody and nearly senseless. This was when the citizens came rushing to the scene from all sides. The host carried the wounded man with the help of his waiters into the kitchen where he began to attend to him, fearing more trouble. As for the gentleman, he resumed his place at the window and regarded the crowd with a certain impatience, apparently annoyed by their refusal to go away. "So, how fares the madman?" he said, turning to address his host who had come from within to inquire if he was hurt.

"Your Excellency is safe and sound?" asked the innkeeper.

"Yes, perfectly safe and sound, my dear host. What has become of our young man?"

"He's better," said the host, "but he's fainted dead away."

"Indeed?" said the gentleman.

"However, before he fainted, he rallied enough to defy and challenge you."

"Why, this fellow must be the devil himself!" said the stranger.

"Oh, no, Your Excellency, he's far from being the devil," the host sneered. "While he's unconscious we rifled his saddlebags and found nothing but a clean shirt and eleven crowns. Nonetheless he said in his delirium that if this had happened in Paris you'd be sorry pretty quickly – but since it happened here you'll be sorry later."

"Is that so?" said the stranger, coolly. "He must be some Prince of the Blood in disguise."

"I'm telling you this, sir," replied the host, "so you may be on your guard."

"Did he name no one in his fury?"

"He did! He slapped his pocket and said, 'We'll see what Sir Tréville thinks of this insult to his protégé.'"

"Sir Tréville?" said the stranger, all attention. "He struck his pocket while naming Sir Tréville...? Well, my dear host, while your young man's unconscious, I'm sure you didn't fail to take a look in that pocket. What did he have?"

"A letter addressed to Sir Tréville, the Captain of the Musketeers."

"Indeed!"

"It's just as I have the honour to tell Your Excellency."

The host who was not very clever, missed the expression his words brought to the stranger’s face. The latter rose from the windowsill, knitting his brows with concern. “The devil!” he murmured between his teeth. “Can Tréville have set this Gascon on me? He’s very young – but a sword thrust’s a sword thrust, whatever the age of the swordsman and one is less suspicious of a youth. A small obstacle can be enough to overturn a great plan.”

The stranger fell into a brief reverie. “See here, my host,” he said at last, “isn’t there some way you can relieve me of this frantic fellow? In all conscience, I can’t kill him and yet,” he added with a coldly menacing expression, “He annoys me. Where’s he?”

“In my wife’s chamber upstairs, where they’re dressing his wounds.”

“His clothes and saddlebag are with him? He’s not removed his doublet?”

“On the contrary, everything’s in the kitchen. But if he annoys you, this young madman…”

“He does. He causes the kind of commotion in your inn that decent people can’t tolerate. Go upstairs, prepare my bill, and alert my lackey.”

“What? Is Sir leaving so soon?”

“As you well know, since I’ve already ordered my horse saddled. Haven’t I been obeyed?”

“It’s done. Your horse is at the front gate as Your Excellency can see, all ready for your departure.”

“Good. Do as I’ve told you then.”

“Huh!” said the host to himself. “Can he be afraid of this boy?”

But at a glare from the stranger he cut his musing short, bowed deferentially, and left. “It wouldn’t do for Milady to encounter this clown,” murmured the stranger. “She should be here any moment – she’s late already. My best course would be to ride out to meet her … if only I’d find out what’s in this letter addressed to Tréville!”

And the stranger headed for the kitchen, muttering to himself. Meanwhile the host who had no doubt but that the presence of the young man was driving the stranger from his inn, went back up to his wife’s chamber where he found that d’Artagnan had regained his wits. Telling him the police would go pretty hard on him for picking a fight with one of the Grands – for in the host’s opinion, the stranger was nothing less – the innkeeper insisted d’Artagnan should get up and be on his way despite his weakness. D’Artagnan rose, half stunned, without his doublet, and with his head wrapped in linen. Impelled by the host, he headed downstairs. When he arrived in the kitchen, he saw his antagonist calmly conversing at the door of a heavy carriage drawn by two large Norman horses through the window. The person he spoke with, whose face was framed by the carriage window, was a woman of 20 to 22 years of age. As already noted, d’Artagnan could assess a face very quickly. He saw at first glance that this woman was young and beautiful but he was struck by how very different her beauty was from that of the southern climes where d’Artagnan had lived till then. She was pale and fair, with long blond hair falling in curls to her shoulders, large, blue, languishing eyes, rosy lips, and hands of alabaster. Her voice was quite lively as she spoke with the stranger. “Then His Eminence orders me…”

“…To return instantly to England and inform him if the duke leaves London.”

“And my other instructions?” asked the fair traveller.

“They’re contained in this box that you will open when you’re on the other side of the Channel.”

“Very well. And you? What will you do?”

“Me, Milady? I return to Paris.”

“Without punishing this insolent boy?” asked the lady.

Just as the stranger opened his mouth to reply, d’Artagnan who had heard everything, rushed out the door. “This insolent boy does the punishing,” he cried, “and this time I trust my quarry won’t escape like before.”

“Escape?” replied the stranger, knitting his brow.

“That’s right! I presume you won’t dare to run in front of a woman!”

“Think,” said Milady, seeing the gentleman put his hand to his sword. “The least delay and all may be lost.”

“You’re right,” said the gentleman. “Be on your way and I’ll be on mine.”

And saluting the lady with a bow, he sprang onto his horse, while her coachman plied his whip. The two left at a gallop, departing in opposite directions. “Hey! Your bill!” shouted the host whose respect for the stranger was changed to profound disdain when he saw him depart without paying his tab.

“Pay him, rascal,” cried the stranger to his lackey as he galloped away.

The lackey threw 2 or 3 silver coins at the host’s feet and galloped off after his master. “Coward! Wretch! False gentleman!” cried d’Artagnan, dashing after the lackey. But the wounded youth was still too weak for such an effort. He had scarcely gone 10 paces before his ears began to ring, a red cloud fogged his vision, and he was overcome by dizziness. He fell in the middle of the street, still shouting, “Coward! Coward! Coward!”

“He’s indeed a coward,” echoed the innkeeper as he approached d’Artagnan, trying by this little flattery to ingratiate himself with the poor boy as the heron of the fable did with the snail he had snubbed the night before.

“Yes, a coward indeed,” murmured d’Artagnan, “but she – how beautiful!”

“She? Who?” asked the host.

“Milady,” d’Artagnan gasped.

Then he passed out for a second time. “Ah, well,” said the host, “I’ve lost two customers but this one remains and it looks to me as if it’ll be for several days. I’m eleven crowns to the good.”

11 crowns was the exact sum remaining in d’Artagnan’s purse. The host reckoned on 11 days of recovery at a crown a day but he underestimated his guest. At 5 o’clock the next morning d’Artagnan arose, descended by himself to the kitchen, and asked for (among other ingredients the names of which have been lost) some honey, oil, and rosemary. Then he prepared a balm that he applied to his numerous wounds with his mother’s recipe in his hand, replacing his bandages himself and refusing the aid of a doctor. Thanks to the effectiveness of this Bohemian balm, no doubt – and perhaps also to the absence of a doctor – d’Artagnan was back on his feet by that evening. By the next day he was nearly cured. However, when it came time to pay for the rosemary, the oil, and the honey that were his only purchases, as d’Artagnan had eaten nothing at all (in contrast with the yellow horse that had eaten 3 times the usual amount at least according to the stableman), d’Artagnan found nothing in his pockets but his old velvet purse with its 11 crowns. The letter addressed to Sir Tréville had disappeared. The young man began to search for the letter with great diligence, turning all his pockets out 20 times, rummaging through his saddle bags, and examining every fold of his belt pouch. Finally he concluded that the letter was really gone and flew into such a rage that the outcome would probably require another purchase of honey, oil, and rosemary. When the host saw this young hothead threatening to destroy his establishment unless his letter was found, he seized an iron spit, his wife grabbed a broom handle, and the servants picked up the same clubs they had used before. “My letter of recommendation!” cried d’Artagnan. “Or by God, I’ll spit you all like fowls!”

Unfortunately, circumstances were against the young man fulfilling his threat as he had entirely forgotten that his sword had been broken in half in his first brawl. When d’Artagnan drew his rapier he found himself armed with the stump of a sword 6 or 8 inches in length that the host had carefully replaced in the scabbard. As to the rest of the blade, the innkeeper had slyly put it aside for use as a larding-pin. However, this trick probably would not have stopped the fiery young man if it had not occurred to the host that his guest had a legitimate complaint. “Wait a minute,” he said, lowering the spit, “where is this letter?”

“Exactly! Where’s this letter?” cried d’Artagnan. “In the first place, let me warn you, this letter’s for Sir Tréville and it must be found. If it isn’t found, he’ll know how to see that it is found!”

This threat completely intimidated the host. After the king and the cardinal, Sir Tréville was probably the name most frequently on the lips of both the military and the middle class. (True, there was also Father Joseph but his name was never spoken aloud, such was the terror inspired by His Grey Eminence, as the cardinal’s familiar was called.) So the host dropped his spit, ordered his wife and servants to do the same with their weapons, and set the example by beginning to search for the lost letter himself. “Is this letter of great value?” he asked after some minutes of futile search.

“Sandis! I’d think so!” cried the Gascon who counted on this letter to help him make his way at Court. “It contained my fortune!”

“Letters of credit drawn on the public funds?” asked the host anxiously.

“Letters of credit drawn on the private treasury of His Majesty!” responded d’Artagnan who counted on entering the service of the king by virtue of the letter’s recommendation and therefore thought such a response was not stretching the truth too far.

“The devil!” said the host, now truly worried.

“But that’s of no importance,” said d’Artagnan with aplomb, “no importance, the money’s nothing – the letter’s everything! I’d rather have lost a thousand pistoles than that letter.”

He might as easily have said 20000 but he was restrained by a certain youthful modesty. As the host was consigning himself to the devil for his failure to find anything, a sudden light burst upon his mind. “That letter isn’t lost!” he cried.

“What!” said d’Artagnan.

“No – it’s stolen from you.”

“Stolen! By whom?”

“By the gentleman who’s here the other day. He came down into the kitchen where your doublet was and stayed there alone for a while. I’d wager he’s the one who stole it.”

“You think so?” replied d’Artagnan, unconvinced. He knew better than anyone that the value of the letter was purely personal and saw nothing in it to tempt anyone’s greed. He knew that neither servants nor guests of the inn had anything to gain by its possession. “Do you say,” resumed d’Artagnan, “that you suspect that impertinent gentleman?”

“I say that I’m sure of it,” said the host. “When I announced that Your Lordship was the protégé of Sir Tréville and you’d even a letter for that illustrious gentleman, he looked very uneasy. He asked me where the letter was and immediately went down into the kitchen where he knew your doublet to be.”

“Then that’s my thief,” replied d’Artagnan. “I’ll complain to Sir Tréville and Sir Tréville will complain to the king.” He then majestically drew 2 crowns from his purse and presented them to the host who accompanied him, hat in hand to the gate. D’Artagnan remounted his yellow horse and rode off. The horse carried him without further incident to the Porte Saint-Antoine at Paris where his owner sold him for three crowns – a good price, considering d’Artagnan had ridden him hard on the final stage. The dealer to whom d’Artagnan sold the nag made it clear that he gave the young man such an exorbitant sum solely due to the uniqueness of the horse’s colour. Thus d’Artagnan entered Paris on foot, carrying his saddlebags under his arm, and marched along until he found a chamber to rent that matched his limited resources. This chamber was a sort of attic situated in a house in the Rue des Fossoyeurs near the Luxembourg Palace. As soon as he made his down payment d’Artagnan took possession of his room, passing the rest of the day in sewing some ornamental lace onto his doublet and breeches. His mother had secretly removed this lace from a nearly new doublet belonging to d’Artagnan the elder and given it to her son. Next he went to the Quai of la Ferraille to have a new blade put on his sword, then went over to the Louvre to ask the first King’s Musketeer he should meet how to find the hôtel, or mansion, of Sir Tréville. This turned out to be in the Rue du Vieux-Colombier in the same neighbourhood as the room rented by d’Artagnan, a circumstance he took as a good omen for the success of his journey. After this, content with way he’d conducted himself at Meung, without remorse for the past, confident in the present, and hopeful for the future, he went to bed and slept the sleep of the brave. This naïve sleep carried him to nine o’clock the next morning, when he rose to make his way to the hôtel of the famous Sir Tréville, who was, in his father’s estimation, the third person of the realm.

The Antechamber of Sir Tréville

Sir Troisvilles as his family was still called in Gascony or Sir Tréville as he ultimately styled himself in Paris, really had begun like d’Artagnan: penniless but rich in audacity, spirit, and shrewdness – the assets that enable the poorest Gascon gentleman to make more of his family legacy than the richest noble of Périgord or Berry makes of his. Tréville’s courage that was greatest when the blows fell like hail, had hoisted him to the top of the ladder of Court Favour, a stairway he’d vaulted four steps at a time. He was a friend of the king, who worshipped the memory of his father, King Henry IV. Sir Tréville’s father had served Henry so faithfully in the wars against the Catholic League that after the fall of Paris, in place of money – a thing the Béarnaise king lacked all his life, often paying his debts with the only thing he never needed to borrow, that is to say, his wits – in place of money, Henry had authorised Tréville to take for his coat of arms a golden lion passant upon gules, with the motto Fidelis et Fortis. This was a great deal in the way of honour, though not much in the way of wealth; when this noble comrade of the Great Henry died, he left his sword and this motto as his sole legacy to his son. Thanks to this double gift, and the stainless name that went with it, Sir Tréville was admitted into the household of young Prince Louis. He served the king so well with his sword, and was so faithful to his motto, that Louis, one of the best blades in his kingdom, had said that if he had a friend who was about to fight a duel and needed a second, he would advise him to first choose himself, and next Tréville – or maybe even Tréville before him. So Louis XIII had a real affection for Tréville – a royal, egotistical affection, it’s true but an affection nonetheless. In those unhappy times a king needed to surround himself with men of Tréville’s mettle. Many might lay claim to the term “strong,” the second part of his motto but few gentlemen deserved to be called loyal. Tréville was one of those rare spirits who possessed the blind courage and intelligent obedience of a faithful watchdog. He had a quick eye that saw if the king was displeased with someone, and a hand that instantly struck the offender; he was a Besme, a Maurevers, a Poltrot of Méré, or a Vitry in other words. In short, Tréville needed nothing but a chance; and he was vigilant, always ready to seize opportunity by the short hairs whenever it came within reach. Thus Louis XIII had made him his Captain of Musketeers who were to the king in their devotion – or rather their fanaticism – what his Ordinaries had been to Henry III and his Scots Guard to Louis XI. In this respect, the cardinal took after the king. When he saw the formidable elite with whom Louis XIII had surrounded himself, this second, or rather this first King of France, thought that he too should have a guard. He therefore had his own company of musketeers, as Louis XIII had his, and these powerful rivals vied with each other in scouring all the provinces of France, and even foreign states, to recruit the most celebrated swordsmen. During their evening game of chess, Richelieu and Louis XIII would often debate the merits of their servants. They boasted of the courage of their men, and while openly deploring duels and brawls, each secretly encouraged his own bravos to tangle with the other man's, and was chagrined or thrilled by his men's defeat or victory. Tréville understood his master's weak side, and it was to this understanding that he owed the long and constant favour of a king who lacks the reputation of being faithful in his friendships. His soldiers formed a devil-may-care legion that answered to no one but him. He paraded his musketeers before Cardinal Armand du Plessis of Richelieu with a mocking air that made His Eminence's grey moustache bristle with fury. Tréville was well versed in the prevailing principle of war that stated that he who failed to live at the expense of his enemy, had to live at the expense of his friends. Drunk, disorderly, and insolent, the King's Musketeers – or rather Tréville's Musketeers – lounged around the taverns, the public squares, and the sporting greens, making loud remarks, twirling their moustaches, rattling their swords, and taking great pleasure in provoking the Cardinal's Guards whenever they encountered them. They would draw their swords right in the open street, joking about the risks – and though they might be killed, they were certain to be mourned and avenged. They often slew their opponents but could count on not being left to rot in prison for long, as Sir Tréville would come to claim them. So these men sang the praises of Tréville in every key; they adored him and, hard cases though they were, they trembled before him like students before their master. They were obedient to his every word and ready to die to uphold the honour of the Company and of Tréville. Sir Tréville employed this powerful tool primarily on behalf of the king and his friends, secondarily for himself and his own friends. Beyond that, in none of the memoirs of a time that left so many memoirs, is this worthy gentleman accused of exploiting his loyal followers for personal gain, not even by his enemies – and he had many, among men of the pen as well as men of the sword. With a rare genius for intrigue with whom Louis XIII had surrounded himself, he nonetheless retained his integrity and remained an honest man. Furthermore, despite constant conflict and an exhausting workload, Tréville had become one of the most gallant courtiers, dashing ladies' men, and wittiest gossips of his day. Tréville's good fortunes with the ladies were spoken of like those of Bassompierre 20 years earlier – and that was no small thing. By everyone, then, the Captain of the Musketeers was either admired, feared, or loved – and one can't do better than that. Louis XIV would absorb all the smaller stars of his court into his own vast radiance but his father, one sun among many, allowed each of his favourites their own personal splendour, each individual courtier his own character. Besides the daily levees, or morning receptions, of the king and the cardinal, at this time in Paris there were more than two hundred lesser levees, each with its daily attendees. Among these two hundred minor levees, that of Tréville was one of the busiest. The courtyard of his hôtel, situated on the Rue du Vieux-Colombier, resembled an armed camp, busy by six in the morning in summer and by eight o'clock in winter. Appearing in relays to ensure an imposing number, fifty or sixty musketeers continually swaggered about, armed to the teeth and ready for anything. There, ascending and descending one of those grand staircases so vast that modern civilization would fill the space with an entire house, one could see petitioners for favours, gentlemen from the provinces eager to enrol, and servants in liveries of all colours bringing messages from their masters to Sir Tréville. In the antechamber at the top, on long curving benches, sat the elect, the lucky ones who were soon to be summoned within. There was a continual buzz of conversation from morning till night, while Sir Tréville, in his office next to the antechamber, received visits, listened to complaints, gave his orders and, like the king on his balcony at the Louvre, had only to appear at his window to review his men and their arms. The day that d'Artagnan presented himself the crowd in the courtyard was impressive, especially to a provincial just arriving from his province. However, this provincial was a Gascon, and at this period in particular his countrymen had the reputation of being hard to intimidate. Once he'd passed through the massive street gate, studded with heavy square-headed nails, he found himself amid a troop of swordsmen strolling about the courtyard, calling out to one another, playing practical jokes, and quarrelling about nothing in particular. To make headway through this turbulence one had to be either an officer, a high-ranking noble, or a pretty woman. The young man advanced into the middle of this disorderly uproar, his heart thumping, his long rapier rapping against his lean leg, one hand on the brim of his hat, and wearing the embarrassed half-smile of the provincial. When he'd passed the first cluster of boasters he began to breathe more freely but he couldn't help noticing that they turned to look at him – and for the first time in his life, d'Artagnan, who until that day had had a high opinion of himself, felt rather ridiculous. Arriving at the broad staircase, he felt even worse. While ten or twelve musketeers waited on the landing to take their turns, four of their comrades above amused themselves with the following exercise: one of the four, on the top step, naked sword in hand, tried to prevent the other three from mounting to his level. The 3 below fenced with him with their own flickering swords that d'Artagnan at first took for foils, with their points buttoned. He soon saw the scratches that proved that, on the contrary, these arms were pointed and sharpened. At every scratch both fencers and spectators laughed like madmen. The one who occupied the top step at that moment kept his adversaries at bay with marvellous skill. A circle was formed around the players and the rule was that, at each hit, the person touched should quit the game, losing his turn to his opponent. In five minutes three were lightly hit, one on the wrist, another on the chin, and the third on the ear, by the defender of the upper stair, who was himself untouched: an achievement, according to the rules, worth three turns of favour. Though the young Gascon liked to think of himself as hard to surprise, this game astounded him. He'd seen in his province, that land of hotheads, a few of the boastful challenges that preceded duels but the Gasconades of these four fencers were the most outrageous he had ever heard, even in Gascony. He believed himself transported to that famous country of giants that had terrified Gulliver – and he hadn't even reached the landing, let alone the antechamber. On the landing they didn't fight, they told stories of women, while in the antechamber they told tales of Court. On the landing, d'Artagnan blushed; in the antechamber, he shuddered. His quick wits and vivid imagination that in Gascony had made him dangerous to young chambermaids, and sometimes even to their youthful mistresses, had never dreamed, even in moments of delirium, of half the amorous feats, or a quarter of the exploits of gallantry, attributed here to well-known names in indecent detail. But if his morals were shocked on the landing, his respect for the cardinal was outraged in the antechamber. There, to his great astonishment, d'Artagnan heard harsh criticism of the policies that made all Europe tremble, as well as jokes about the cardinal's private life, affairs many powerful nobles had been punished for daring to meddle in. That great man, revered by d'Artagnan the elder, was a laughingstock to the musketeers of Sir Tréville, who joked about his knock-knees and bent back. Some sang satirical songs about Madam of Combalet, his niece and mistress, while others made plans to harass the Cardinal's Guards, both of which seemed monstrous impossibilities to d'Artagnan. However, when the name of the king was dropped into this derision of the cardinal, a sort of gag closed all the mocking mouths for a moment, while everyone looked timidly around and seemed to wonder if they could trust the partition between the antechamber and the office of Sir Tréville. But soon a smart remark about His Eminence restored the conversation, the laughter resumed, and none of his activities were spared. I'm sure to see all these fellows either imprisoned or hanged, thought d'Artagnan, terrified, and me with them, no doubt. Having listened to them, I'll be taken as an accomplice. What would my father say, who wanted me to respect the cardinal, if he knew I was in the society of such pagans?

Needless to say, d'Artagnan didn't dare join in the conversation, only watched with both eyes and listened with both ears, straining so as to miss nothing. In spite of his confidence in his father's advice, his inclination and instincts were with rather than against this unheard-of behaviour. As an absolute stranger making his first appearance in the midst of Sir Tréville's courtiers, he was eventually asked what it was he wanted. At this demand, d'Artagnan modestly gave his name, emphasising that he was one of Sir Tréville's countrymen. He begged the inquiring footman to ask for a moment's audience with the captain, a request that the other promised, in good time, to convey. D'Artagnan, somewhat recovered from his initial surprise, now had leisure to study figures and faces. The centre of the most animated group was a very tall musketeer of haughty demeanour, dressed in an outfit so outlandishly gaudy it made him the centre of attention. He wasn't wearing the musketeer's tabard – which wasn't yet obligatory in that time of lesser liberty but greater independence – but rather a sky-blue jerkin, a bit faded and worn, and over this a magnificent shoulder-belt, a baldric embroidered in gold that shone like rippling water reflecting the sun. A long cloak of crimson velvet fell gracefully from his broad shoulders, revealing in front the splendid baldric, from which hung a gigantic rapier. This musketeer had just returned from guard duty and, complaining of having a cold, coughed affectedly from time to time. That was why he'd worn his cloak, he said to those around him. He spoke with a lofty air, and smugly twirled his moustache, while everyone admired his gilded baldric – d'Artagnan more than any. "What'd you have?" said the musketeer. "It's the coming fashion. It's a folly, I admit but still, it's the fashion. Besides, one must find some use for one's inheritance."

"Now, Porthos!" cried one of his satellites. "Don't try to persuade us that baldric came from paternal generosity! It was given to you by that veiled lady I met you with last Sunday near Porte Saint-Honoré."

"No, on the honour and faith of a gentleman, I bought it myself, with my own coin," replied the man called Porthos.

"Oh, right," said another musketeer, "the same way I bought this new purse with what my mistress put in the old."

"It's true," said Porthos, "and the proof is, I paid twelve pistoles for it."

At this their admiration was redoubled, though not all doubts were dispelled. "Isn't it so, Aramis?" said Porthos, turning toward another musketeer.

This other musketeer formed a perfect contrast with the one who'd named him as Aramis: he was a young man, aged twenty-two or twenty-three at most, with a suave and ingenuous manner, eyes dark but mild, and cheeks rosy and downy as an autumn peach. His delicate moustache marked a perfectly straight line across his upper lip; he seemed afraid to lower his hands, lest their veins swell; and from time to time he pinched the tips of his ears to maintain their tender pink transparency. He spoke rarely and slowly, bowed frequently, and laughed quietly without showing his teeth that were excellent – like the rest of his person, of which he seemed to take great care. He replied to his friend with an affirmative nod of his head. This seemed to dispel all doubts about the baldric; everyone continued to admire it but no more was said about it, and with one of those sudden changes of thought, the conversation passed on to another subject. "What do you think of this tale from Chalais's equerry?" asked another musketeer, addressing no one in particular.

"And what tale does he tell?" asked Porthos, self-importantly.

"He says that in Brussels he encountered Rochefort, the cardinal's henchman, disguised as a Capuchin monk, and that this cursed Rochefort, thanks to his disguise, had duped that simpleton Sir Laigues into betraying Sir Chalais."

"He's a simpleton, certainly," said Porthos, "but are you sure about this?"

"I had it from Aramis," replied the musketeer.

"Indeed?"

"As you well know, Porthos," said Aramis. "I told you just yesterday. Let's say no more about it."

"Say no more about it! Is that how you see it?" replied Porthos. "Say no more about it! Plague! You drop it rather quickly! What – the cardinal spies on a gentleman and steals his letters by means of a traitor, a brigand, a scoundrel! With the help of this spy, he's as good as cut Chalais's throat, all under the stupid pretext that the man wanted to assassinate the king and marry Sir his brother to the queen! No one had heard a word of this until you told us about it yesterday, to our great satisfaction. Then, while we're all still dumbfounded by the news, you come to us today and say, 'Let's say no more about it.'"

"Then let's talk about it, since that's what you want," replied Aramis patiently.

"This Rochefort!" cried Porthos. "If I were poor Chalais's equerry, I'd give him an ugly time of it!"

"And in return, you would pass a sad quarter-hour with the Red Duke," replied Aramis.

"Ha! The Red Duke! That's good, that is! The Red Duke!" applauded Porthos, nodding his head in approval. "The 'Red Duke' is quite charming. I'll spread that one about, my dear, be certain of it. He has wit, this Aramis! What a pity you didn't follow your old vocation! What a delightful abbot you'd have made!"

"Oh, it's only a brief delay," replied Aramis. "I'll be one yet, someday. You know very well, Porthos, that that's why I continue to study theology."

"He'll do as he says," Porthos announced. "He'll do it, sooner or later."

"Soon," said Aramis.

"He's only waiting for one thing to happen before resuming his cassock that hangs just behind his uniform," said one musketeer.

"And what thing is that?" asked another.

"For the queen to give birth to an heir to the Crown of France."

"No pleasantries on that subject, Gentlemen," said Porthos. "Thank God, the queen is still of an age to provide the crown with one."

"They say the Duke of Buckingham is in France," observed Aramis with a sardonic smile that gave this apparently simple remark a scandalous significance.

"Aramis, my friend, this time you're in the wrong," interrupted Porthos. "Your wit takes you too far. If Sir Tréville heard you, you'd be the worse for it."

"Are you lecturing me, Porthos?" cried Aramis, whose mild eyes suddenly flashed like lightning.

"My dear, be a musketeer or an abbot. Be one or the other but not both," replied Porthos. "You know what Athos told you just the other day: you try to drink from both sides of the cup. Now, don't get angry with us, if you please – it would be a complete waste of time. Remember the pact between you, me, and Athos. But see here, you visit Madam of Combalet, and pay court to her, then go straight to Madam of Bois-Tracy, that little cousin of Madam of Chevreuse, and you seem to be far along in the good graces of that lady. My God, don't tell us about your luck with the ladies – no one asks for your secrets, we all know how discreet you are. But since you're so discreet, why the devil don't you use your discretion on behalf of Her Majesty? Whoever wants to talk about the king and the cardinal, let them – but the queen is sacred. If anyone speaks of her, let him speak only well."

"Porthos, you're as conceited as Narcissus," replied Aramis. "You know I hate moralising, except from Athos. But you, 'my dear', wear too magnificent a baldric to stand there and moralize. I'll be an abbot when it suits me but in the meantime, I'm a musketeer. In that capacity I'll say what I please, and right now it pleases me to say that I'm losing my patience with you!"

"Aramis!"

"Porthos!"

"Gentlemen! Gentlemen!" the whole group cried out.

"Sir Tréville awaits Sir d'Artagnan," interrupted the footman, opening the door of the office. At this announcement everyone fell quiet. Amid the general silence the young Gascon crossed the antechamber and entered the sanctum of the Captain of the Musketeers, profoundly grateful at having escaped the end of that strange quarrel.

003 The Audience

Sir Tréville was in a sour mood. Nevertheless, he saluted young d'Artagnan politely, who replied by bowing to the ground. Tréville smiled on receiving this compliment and on hearing the Béarnaise accent that reminded him of his youth and his homeland, a double memory that makes a man smile at any age. But he stepped toward the antechamber while holding up a hand toward d'Artagnan as if asking permission to finish with others before starting with him. Then he called out 3 times, louder each time, his voice rising from imperative to angry: "Athos! Porthos! ARAMIS!" The musketeers who answered to the last 2 names left their comrades and approached the office, and as soon as they were inside the tapestry door dropped behind them. Their demeanour though not exactly serene, was nonetheless so nonchalant, and yet so dignified and deferential, that d'Artagnan could not help but admire them. He regarded these two men as demigods, and their chief as an Olympian Jupiter, armed with all his thunderbolts. When the two musketeers had entered and the door had dropped behind them, the buzz in the antechamber returned to normal – or even louder, doubtless increased by this summons. Meanwhile Sir Tréville, silent and frowning, paced the length of his office three or four times, passing each time before Porthos and Aramis who were as rigid and mute as if on parade. Suddenly he stopped and faced them, looked them up and down angrily, and demanded, "Do you know what the king said to me, no later than yesterday evening? Do you know, gentlemen?"

"No," responded the musketeers, after a moment's silence. "No, Sir, we don't."

"But I hope you will do us the honour of telling us," added Aramis in his most polite tone and with a graceful bow.

"He told me that from now on he plans to recruit his musketeers from among the guards of Your Eminence!"

"From the Cardinal's Guards! But why?" cried Porthos.

"Because he can see that our thin vintage needs to be strengthened by the addition of some strong honey!" The faces of the 2 musketeers went red to the whites of their eyes. D'Artagnan wished he were a hundred feet underground. "Yes! Yes!" continued Sir Tréville heatedly. "And His Majesty is right, for, upon my honour, the musketeers cut a sad figure at Court. Yesterday, while at cards with the king, with an air of condolence I didn't care for, Your Eminence related how the day before those damned musketeers, those devils incarnate – he lingered over those words with an ironical tone that stung me to the quick – those vandals, he said, with an eye like a tiger, had been loudly roistering past closing time in a cabaret in the Rue Férou, such that a squad of his guards had had to arrest the perpetrators. I thought he was going to laugh in my face! Morbleu! You must know something about this! Musketeers – arrested! You were there, and don't deny it! You were recognised, and the cardinal named you. Ah but it's my fault, yes, my fault, because I myself choose my men. See here, Aramis, why the devil did you ask me for a tabard when you'd be better off in a cassock? And you, Porthos, do you wear such a beautiful baldric just to hang a sword of straw from it? And Athos ... I don't see Athos. Where's he?"

"Sir," Aramis replied sadly, "he's ill – very ill."

"Ill! Very ill, you say? From what?"

"It's feared he's smallpox, Sir," replied Porthos, eager to get a word in, "a case so bad it's certain to ruin his face."

"Smallpox! You tell a fine story, Porthos. Smallpox at his age? Unlikely! But wounded, doubtless, perhaps killed ... if I only knew ... God! Gentlemen Mousquetaires, I'll not have this haunting of low dives, this picking of quarrels in the street, this swordplay in the crossroads. Most of all, I'll not see you laughed at by the Cardinal's Guards who're brave, patient, and skilful men who never have cause to be arrested – and would never allow themselves to arrested in any event! I'm sure they'd rather die on the spot than be arrested. To run away, scarper, and flee – what a fine thing for king's musketeer s to do!" Porthos and Aramis quivered with rage. They would have gladly strangled Sir Tréville if they had not felt it was his great love for them at the bottom that made him speak this way. They stamped on the carpet, bit their lips till they bled, and gripped their sword-hilts with all their might. Outside, everyone had heard Athos, Porthos and Aramis summoned in an angry voice by Sir Tréville. 10 curious heads leaned against the tapestry and grew pale with fury, for their ears had not missed a syllable of what was said and they repeated the captain's tirade to the whole population of the antechamber. Instantly from the office door to the street-gate, the entire hôtel was boiling with emotion. "So! King's Musketeers, arrested by Cardinal's Guards!" continued Sir Tréville furiously so that each word plunged like a stiletto into the breasts of his auditors. "So! Six of His Eminence's Guards arrest six of His Majesty's Musketeers! Morbleu! My path's clear! I'll go to the Louvre, resign as Captain of the King's Musketeers, and beg for a lieutenantcy in the Cardinal's Guards! And if he refuses me, Morbleu! I'll become an abbot."

At these words, the murmur outside the office became an explosion of oaths and blasphemies. The air was filled with "Morbleu!"

"God!"

And "Death of all the devils!"

D'Artagnan looked for a tapestry to hide behind and wished he could crawl under a table. "All right, my Captain," said Porthos, beside himself, "it's true, we were six against six but we were taken by a trick. Before we had time to draw our swords two of us were dead, and Athos so badly wounded he might as well have been. But you know Athos: he tried to get up twice, and twice he fell again. But we didn't surrender – no! They dragged us away by force, and on the way to prison we escaped. As for Athos, they left him for dead on the field of battle, not thinking it worth the trouble to carry him off. And that's the story! What the devil, Captain – one can't win every battle! The great Pompey lost at Pharsalia, and François I who was as good as anyone, still lost at Pavia."

"And I've the honour to assure you that I killed one of them with his own sword," said Aramis, "for mine broke at the first parry."

"I didn't know that," replied Sir Tréville, in a milder tone. "I see Your Eminence has exaggerated."

"But please, Sir," continued Aramis, seeing his captain somewhat mollified and seeking to take advantage of it, "please, Sir, don't tell anyone about Athos's wound. He'd be in despair if such news reached the ears of the king. And since the wound is very grave, passing from the shoulder down into the chest, it's feared..."

At that moment the tapestry was lifted, and a noble and handsome face, frightfully pale, appeared under the fringe. "Athos!" cried the two musketeers.

"Athos!" repeated Sir Tréville.

"You sent for me, Sir," said Athos to Sir Tréville, in a weak but perfectly calm voice. "You sent for me or so I've heard and I've come to receive your orders. Here I'm, Sir; what do you desire?"

And the musketeer, impeccably dressed, entered the office. Sir Tréville, moved to the bottom of his heart by this proof of courage, sprang toward him. "I was about to tell these gentlemen," he said, "that I forbid my musketeers to risk their lives needlessly, for brave men are very dear to the king, and the king knows his musketeers are the bravest men on earth. Your hand, Athos!" And without waiting for an answer, Sir Tréville seized his hand and gripped it with all his might. He didn't notice that Athos allowed a slight wince of pain to escape him, despite all his self-control, and if possible grew even paler than before. The door had remained open, and as everyone knew Athos was wounded despite all attempts at secrecy, his arrival had created a sensation. A general cry of satisfaction greeted the final words of the captain, and two or three heads, carried away by enthusiasm, appeared around the edge of the tapestry. Sir Tréville was about to reprimand this lapse, when he suddenly felt Athos's hand clench his own and realised he was about to faint. At the same instant Athos, who had rallied all his strength against the pain of his wound, was finally overcome by it, and fell on the parquet floor like a dead man, "A surgeon!" cried Sir Tréville. "My own – the king's – or better! A surgeon! Or, by God, my brave Athos will die!" At Tréville's cries, everyone rushed into the office and crowded around the wounded man in a perfectly useless frenzy of activity. Fortunately, the doctor in question happened to be in the hôtel. He pushed through the crowd to Athos, who was still unconscious, and, as all the uproar and milling about was hampering him, he demanded that the wounded musketeer be carried into a neighbouring chamber. Instantly Tréville opened a door and cleared the way for Porthos and Aramis, who followed him, carrying their comrade in their arms. The surgeon came next, and shut the door behind him. Then the usually sacrosanct office of Sir Tréville became a sort of extension of the antechamber. Everyone spoke at once, ranting, haranguing, swearing oaths, and consigning the cardinal and his guards to all the devils. After a few moments Porthos and Aramis re-entered the office, leaving the surgeon and Sir Tréville with the wounded man. At length Tréville also returned. The patient had regained consciousness and the surgeon declared there was no reason for the musketeer's friends to be uneasy as his weakness was simply due to loss of blood. Then Tréville waved them out, and everyone left – except d'Artagnan. He wasn't about to forget that he'd been granted an audience and he held his ground with Gascon tenacity. Once everyone had gone out and the door was closed, Sir Tréville turned and found himself alone with the young man. The events of the past few minutes had driven the youth's presence from his mind but he asked his stubborn petitioner what he could do for him. D'Artagnan repeated his name and Sir Tréville suddenly remembered everything. "Pardon me," he said, smiling, "your pardon, my dear countryman but I'd completely forgotten you. What would you have? A captain is nothing but the father of a family, charged with even more responsibility than the father of an ordinary clan. Soldiers are big children – but as I hold that the orders of the king, and above all the orders of Sir the Cardinal, must be carried out..." D'Artagnan couldn't hide a small smile. Seeing this smile, Sir Tréville concluded that he wasn't dealing with a fool and changed the subject, coming straight to the point. "I had a great liking for your father," he said. "What can I do for his son? Speak quickly, as my time isn't my own."

"Sir," said d'Artagnan, "upon leaving Tarbes to come here, I'd planned to ask you in remembrance of that unforgotten friendship, for the tabard of a musketeer. But after all I've seen in the past two hours I now understand how big a favour that would be and I'm afraid I may not deserve it."

"It's indeed a favour, young man," replied Tréville, "but it may not be as far above you as you think or appear to think. However, it's His Majesty's decision in any case and I regret to say that no one's received into the King's Musketeers who's not proved himself in several campaigns, through daring exploits or by having served for two years in some other regiment of less prestige than ours." D'Artagnan bowed and said nothing though he was more eager than ever to don the uniform of the musketeers now that he had learned how hard it was to obtain it. "But," continued Tréville, fixing his compatriot with a look that seemed to try to pierce to the depths of his heart, "out of respect for your father, my old companion, I'll do what I can for you, young man. Our cadets of Béarn aren't usually very wealthy and I doubt things have changed much since I left the province. I daresay you've brought none too much money with you." D'Artagnan drew himself up with a proud air that clearly conveyed that he asked charity of no one. "Very well, young man, very well," continued Tréville, "I see that you're proud. I first arrived in Paris with no more than four crowns in my pouch and would've fought anyone who told me I didn't have enough to buy the Louvre." D'Artagnan's pride redoubled, for thanks to the sale of his horse he was starting his career with 4 crowns more than Tréville had had at the beginning of his. "You'd do your best to conserve what you have, however much it is," Tréville continued, "but also perfect those skills becoming to a gentleman. I'll write you a letter to the Director of the Royal Academy and you'll be admitted without fee. Don't refuse this little favour. Our best-born and wealthiest gentlemen sometimes solicit it without success. You'll learn how to handle a horse, fence, dance, and make some valuable acquaintances. From time to time you can revisit me so I can see how you're doing and if I can do anything else for you."

D'Artagnan could not help but think that this was rather a cold welcome, though still a stranger to Court manners. "Alas, Sir!" he said. "I see now how much I miss the letter of recommendation my father gave me to present to you."

"Indeed," replied Sir Tréville, "I'm astonished you'd undertake such a long journey without that essential asset, the sole resource of poor Béarnaise like us."

"I'd one, Sir," lamented d'Artagnan, "and a good one but it's treacherously stolen from me."

And he related what had happened at Meung, describing his gentleman opponent in minute detail, speaking with a warmth and candour that charmed Sir Tréville. "This is strange, indeed," said Tréville after thinking about it. "You say you mentioned my name?"

"Yes, Sir. It's presumptuous of me but what'd you have? A name like yours is as good as a shield on such a journey. You may well suppose I didn't keep it a secret!"

Flattery was common practice at this time and Tréville was as pleased by it as any king or even cardinal. He could not restrain a satisfied smile but it was quickly suppressed. He returned to the adventure of Meung. "Tell me, had this gentleman a faint scar on his temple?"

"Yes as if he'd been grazed by a musket-ball."

"A good-looking man? Tall?"

"Yes."

"Pale complexion and brown hair?"

"Yes, yes, that's him! How is it, Sir, that you know this man? Ah, if I ever find him – and I'll find him, I swear it, if I have to follow him to Hell!"

"He's waiting for a woman?" continued Tréville.

"Yes! He left right after speaking for a moment to this woman he'd been waiting for."

"You didn't catch the gist of their conversation?"

"He delivered a box to her, told her the box contained her instructions, and that she'd not open it until she reached London."

"This woman's English?"

"He called her Milady."

"It's him!" murmured Tréville. "It's him! I thought he's still in Brussels!"

"Oh, Sir, if you know this man," cried d'Artagnan, "tell me who and where he's and you need do nothing more for me. I'd even give up admission into the musketeers for above all, I want to avenge myself."

"Watch yourself, young man," said Tréville. "If you see this man coming down one side of the street, cross over to the other! Don't cast yourself against this rock – he'll break you like glass."

"That won't stop me," said d'Artagnan. "If I ever find him..."

"In the meantime, if you'll take my advice, don't go looking for him," warned Tréville. All at once Tréville stopped, struck by a sudden suspicion. This great hatred, so loudly proclaimed by this young man for a strange gentleman who had rather improbably stolen his father's letter – mightn't this be some kind of trick? Could this young man have been sent by His Eminence to lay a trap for him? This supposed d'Artagnan could well be a spy the cardinal sought to introduce into Tréville's house, to win Tréville's confidence and later bring him down, as he'd done to a thousand others. He looked d'Artagnan over even more closely than before and was somewhat reassured by the young man's humble demeanour and obvious intelligence. I know he's a Gascon, he thought but he might just as well be a Gascon for the cardinal as for me. Very well, let's try him. "My friend," he said slowly, "I wish, as the son of an old comrade – and by the way, I believe your story of the lost letter – I wish, I say, to make up for my initial rather chilly reception by letting you in on the secret of our situation here. The king and the cardinal are the greatest of friends, and their apparent differences are only a game to deceive fools. I wouldn't want one of my countrymen, a handsome cavalier and brave youth who must get along here, to fall for these deceptions and be lost, as has happened to so many others. Understand that I am devoted to both these all-powerful masters, and that all my efforts are in service of the king and of Your Eminence, who is one of the most illustrious geniuses France has ever produced. Now, young man, be guided by this. And if you have, from your family, your relations, or even your instincts, any hostility toward the cardinal, such as we see in so many noble houses, bid me goodbye, and we'll say goodbye. I'll help you where I can but without attaching you to my person. I hope that my frankness, in any event, will make you my friend, as you are the only young man to whom I've ever spoken like this." To himself, Tréville said, "If the cardinal who knows how much I detest him has sent this young fox to me, he'll certainly have told his spy that the best way of paying court to me is to heap scorn on the cardinal. Therefore, despite my protestations, my cunning friend here will respond by denouncing His Eminence to me."

But it proved otherwise. D'Artagnan replied with the greatest sincerity, "Sir, I've come to Paris with exactly such intentions. My father recommended that I endure nothing from anyone but the king, the cardinal, and yourself whom he held to be the first three names in France." D'Artagnan had added Sir Tréville to the other two but he thought the addition would cost him nothing. "I've the greatest esteem for Your Eminence," he continued, "and the most profound respect for his actions. The better for me, Sir, as you say so frankly – for then I shall have the honour of sharing your opinions. On the other hand, if you distrust me, as naturally you might, then I'm probably ruining myself by speaking the truth. But I hope you will still honour me with your esteem that is worth more to me than anything else in the world."

Sir Tréville could not have been more surprised. He admired d'Artagnan's wisdom and candour though they did not entirely remove his doubts about him. The more superior this young man proved himself, the more dangerous he would be as a spy. Nevertheless, he shook d'Artagnan's hand and said, "You're an honest youth but what I've already offered is really the best I can do for you now. My hôtel will always be open to you. Call on me at need as opportunities arise and you'll probably be able to fulfil your desires."

"That's to say, Sir," replied d'Artagnan, "that you'll wait to see if I'm worthy. Very well, rest easy," he added with the familiarity of the Gascon, "you'll not have to wait long."

And he bowed as he withdrew as if henceforth he'd take care of himself. "Not so fast," said Tréville, stopping him. "I promised you a letter for the Director of the Academy. Are you too proud to accept it, my young gentleman?"

"No, Sir," said d'Artagnan, "and I'll answer for it that this one won't share the other's fate! I'll guard it, I swear, so that it arrives at its destination and woe to him who tries to take it from me!" Tréville smiled at this bravado and leaving his young countryman at the window where they had been talking, he seated himself at a table to write the promised letter of recommendation. Meanwhile d'Artagnan having nothing better to do, beat out a march with his fingers on the windowsill and watched the musketeers as they went down the street, one by one, following them with his eyes until they disappeared around the corner. Sir Tréville sealed the letter and rose, having written it, then approached the young man to give it to him but just as d'Artagnan reached out his hand to take it, Tréville was astonished to see him start, turn red with anger, rush from the office, crying, "God! He won't escape me this time!"

"Who won't?" demanded Tréville.

"Him – my thief!" shouted d'Artagnan. "Ah! The traitor!"

And he disappeared. "Devil take the madman!" murmured Sir Tréville. "Unless," he added, "this is a clever way to escape, having failed in his scheme."

The Shoulder of Athos, the Baldric of Porthos, & the Handkerchief of Aramis

D'Artagnan, furious, crossed the antechamber in 3 bounds and dashed for the stairs, planning to descend them 4 at a time. But carried away by his haste, he ran headfirst into a musketeer who was leaving Sir Tréville's chambers by a side door. D'Artagnan crashed into his shoulder, causing him to howl with pain. "Excuse me," said d'Artagnan, turning to resume his course, "but I'm in a hurry."

His foot was on the first stair when a hand of iron seized him by the sword-belt and stopped him. "You're in a hurry!" cried the musketeer, pale as a shroud. "On this pretext you crash into me, then say, 'Excuse me.' And you believe that to be sufficient? Not at all, my young man. Do you suppose that because you've heard Sir Tréville speak to us a little cavalierly today that others may treat us the same way? Don't fool yourself, my lad – you aren't Sir Tréville."

"My faith!" replied d'Artagnan, recognising Athos who was returning to his lodging after being bandaged by the doctor. "My faith, I didn't mean to do it so I said 'Excuse me.' It seems to me that's enough. I repeat perhaps once too often, that on my word of honour I really must hurry. Let go of me, I beg, and let me go about my business."

"Sir," said Athos, letting him go, "you're unmannerly. One can see that you come from somewhere a long way off."

D'Artagnan had already leaped down 3 or 4 stairs when this remark stopped him short. "Morbleu, Sir!" said he. "However far I've come, I warn you, you're not the man to give me a lesson in manners."

"Perhaps," said Athos.

"You know, if I weren't in such a hurry," snapped d'Artagnan, "if I weren't running after someone..."

"Sir Hasty, you can find me without running. Do you understand me?"

"And where's that, if you please?"

"Near the Carmelite convent."

"Time?"

"About noon."

"Very well, I'll be there about noon!"

"Don't keep me waiting, for I warn you, at a quarter past twelve I'll be running after you and cut off your ears on my way."

"Good!" cried d'Artagnan. "I'll be there ten minutes before twelve."

And he set off running like the devil, still hoping to catch up with the stranger, whose slow pace couldn't have carried him far. But at the courtyard gate Porthos was talking with the soldier on guard. Between them there was just enough space for a man to pass; d'Artagnan thought he could make it and sprang forward to dart between them. But he hadn't taken the wind into account. As he passed, the wind blew out Porthos's long cloak, and d'Artagnan ran full into it. Porthos must have had powerful reasons for retaining his cloak, for instead of letting it go, he pulled it toward him, so stubbornly that d'Artagnan was rolled up in the velvet. D'Artagnan, hearing the musketeer's oaths, tried to wriggle through the folds to escape from the blinding cloak. He particularly wanted to avoid damaging that magnificent baldric mentioned earlier; however, on timidly opening his eyes, he found his nose pressed right between Porthos's shoulders, exactly on the back of the baldric. Alas! Like so many things in this world that are nothing but appearances, the baldric was golden in front but only simple buff leather behind. The vainglorious Porthos couldn't afford a completely gilded baldric but he had at least half of one. The pretended head cold that necessitated his wearing a cloak was now explained. "Vertubleu!" cried Porthos, struggling to rid himself of d'Artagnan who was squirming against his back. "You must be crazy to run into people like that!"

"Excuse me," said d'Artagnan, reappearing under the shoulder of the giant, "but I'm in a great hurry! I'm running after someone and..."

"Do you always run with your eyes closed?" demanded Porthos.

"No," replied d'Artagnan, piqued. "No, and thanks to my eyes, I can see what others don't."

Porthos wasn't sure if he understood this but he understood it well enough to get angry. "Sir," he said, "I warn you, if you go running into musketeers, you're liable to get thrashed."

"Thrashed, Sir!" said d'Artagnan. "Strong words."

"Strong words become a man who's used to looking his enemies in the face."

"Well, by God! I know now why you don't turn your back on them!"

And the young man, delighted with his joke, laughed loudly as he walked away. Porthos, foaming with rage, made a grab for d'Artagnan. "Later, later," cried d'Artagnan, dodging, "when you're not wearing your cloak!"

"At one o'clock then, behind the Luxembourg!"

"Very well, at one o'clock," d'Artagnan called, turning the corner.

But d'Artagnan could see no one down either street. However slowly the stranger had walked, he had nonetheless gotten away or perhaps entered a house. D'Artagnan asked everyone he met about the man all the way down to the ferry, then returned up the Rue of Seine to the Croix-Rouge: nothing, absolutely nothing. However, at least the sweat of the chase cooled his angry heart. He reflected on recent events, numerous and boding nothing but ill. It was barely 11 o'clock in the morning yet he was already disgraced before Sir Tréville who could not help but find d'Artagnan's manner of leaving him a bit cavalier. In addition, he could look forward to duels with 2 men who were each capable of killing 3 d'Artagnans – with 2 King's Musketeers, no less, 2 of those heroes whom he esteemed in his heart and mind above all others. It was a sad situation. Sure of being killed by Athos, the young man was not worried overmuch about Porthos. However, as hope is the last thing extinguished in a man's heart, he hoped to somehow survive these 2 duels though probably with terrible wounds. In case he survived, he chided himself with the following reproaches: "What a hare-brained lout I'm! That brave and unfortunate Athos's wounded in the shoulder right where I ran into him headfirst like some ram. The only thing that astonishes me is that he didn't kill me on the spot. He certainly had the right – the pain I caused him must've been atrocious. And as for Porthos! Oh! As for Porthos – my faith, that's just too funny!" And in spite of himself the young man began to laugh while looking around to make sure no one was offended by his solitary laughter. "As for Porthos, that's droll, droll – but I'm still a brainless dolt. Does one run into people without warning? No! And does one look under cloaks to see what isn't there? No! He'd certainly have pardoned me if I hadn't mentioned that cursed baldric though I did so in veiled terms – no, not veiled, cloaked! Ha! Oh, cursed Gascon that I'm, my wit takes me from the frying pan to the fire. D'Artagnan, my friend," he continued, amiably lecturing himself, "if you escape that seems unlikely, henceforth you must take the path of perfect politeness. You must be admired for it, even cited as an example. To be obliging and polite doesn't make one a coward. Look at Aramis: charm and grace personified. Does anyone call Aramis a coward? No, certainly not and from now on he'll be my model. Ah! There he's now!" D'Artagnan had arrived within a few paces of the hôtel of Madam of Combalet as he walked and talked with himself and in front of that mansion he saw Aramis in conversation with 3 gentlemen of the French Guards. Aramis likewise saw d'Artagnan but he had not forgotten that earlier Sir Tréville had dressed him down in front of this young man and having seen the musketeers rebuked he was likely to be insolent so he pretended not to see him. D'Artagnan on the contrary, full of his plans of conciliation and courtesy, approached the 4 men and gave them a deep bow, smiling hopefully. All conversation immediately stopped. Aramis nodded his head slightly but did not smile. D'Artagnan was not so naïve as to fail to see he was intruding but also too ignorant of the manners of the beautiful world to know how to gracefully withdraw from a false position that is where a man usually finds himself when he interrupts a conversation that doesn't concern him. He was looking for the least awkward way out when he noticed that Aramis had his foot on a handkerchief that he had doubtless dropped by mistake. Here was a way to repair his blunder! He knelt, and with the most gracious air he could manage, pulled the handkerchief from under the musketeer's foot, in spite of the latter's efforts to keep it there. Then d'Artagnan presented it to him, saying: "Sir, I think that this is a handkerchief you'd be sorry to lose."

The handkerchief was in fact richly embroidered and had a coronet and arms on one of its corners. "Ah ha!" cried one of the guards. "Do you still insist, most discreet Aramis that you're not on good terms with Madam of Bois-Tracy when that gracious lady's the kindness to lend you one of her handkerchiefs?"

Aramis darted at d'Artagnan one of those looks that tell a man he has acquired a mortal enemy, then said, resuming his mild air, "You're misled, gentlemen. This handkerchief isn't mine and I've no idea why sir here fancies he'd return it to me rather than to one of you. As proof of what I say, here's mine in my pocket."

At these words he pulled out his own handkerchief that’s very elegant, of fine cambric (though cambric was then very expensive), without arms, and ornamented with a single initial, that of its owner. D’Artagnan said nothing, realising he had blundered again. But Aramis’s friends were not so restrained, unconvinced by his denial. One of them said to the young musketeer with pretended seriousness, “If it’s as you say, my dear Aramis, or rather pretend, I’d have to reclaim it myself – for as you know, Bois-Tracy is one of my closest friends and I can’t allow his wife’s personal items to be waved around like trophies.”

“Your critique’s poorly phrased,” replied Aramis, “and while I recognise the justice of your claim, I refuse it on account of its form.”

“The fact’s,” hazarded d’Artagnan timidly, “I didn’t see the handkerchief fall from Sir Aramis’s pocket. He’d his foot on it, that’s all, and I thought since the handkerchief’s under his foot, it must be his.”

“And you’re deceived, my dear sir,” replied Aramis coldly, unappeased. Then turning to the guard who had declared himself Bois-Tracy’s friend, he said, “Moreover, it occurs to me, my dear close friend of Bois-Tracy, that I’d keep it as he’s as much my friend as yours. Besides, the handkerchief could just as easily have fallen from your pocket as from mine.”

“No, upon my honour!” cried the guard.

“You’re about to swear upon your honour and I upon my word, and then it’ll be clear that one of us is lying. I have a better idea, Montaran. Let’s each take half of it.”

“Of the handkerchief?”

“Yes.”

“That’s perfect!” cried the other two guards. “The Judgement of King Solomon! Aramis, you’re wisdom itself!”

The young men burst out laughing, and naturally nothing more was made of the matter. The conversation over, the three guards and the musketeer cordially shook hands and parted, the guards going one way, Aramis the other. “Now’s the time to make my peace with this gentleman,” d’Artagnan said to himself, having stood to one side during the end of the conversation. With this noble intention he approached Aramis, who was going his way without paying any attention to him. “Sir,” d’Artagnan said to him, “you’ll pardon me, I hope.”

“Sir,” interrupted Aramis, “permit me to observe that you’ve not behaved in this matter as a man of good breeding should’ve.”

“What, Sir!” cried d’Artagnan, “Do you suppose…”

“I suppose, Sir, that you aren’t a fool and know very well that people don’t tread on handkerchiefs for no reason despite being from Gascony. What the devil! Paris isn’t paved with cambric.”

“Sir, it’s a mistake to try to humiliate me,” said d’Artagnan whose natural combativeness began to outweigh his peaceful intentions. “I’m from Gascony, it’s true, and since you know it, I don’t have to tell you that Gascons have short fuses. When they ask once to be pardoned even for a folly, they believe they’ve already done twice as much as they should.”

“Sir,” responded Aramis, “my remarks to you aren’t for the purpose of seeking a quarrel. I’m no ruffian, merely a temporary musketeer, thank God! I don’t fight unless forced to and always with great reluctance. However, this time the affair’s serious as a lady’s been compromised by you.”

“Say, rather, by us,” said d’Artagnan.

“Why did you so oafishly return me the handkerchief?”

“Why did you so carelessly let it fall?”

“I’ve said and I repeat, Sir, that the handkerchief didn’t fall from my pocket.”

“Then you’re twice a liar, Sir, for I saw it fall!”

“Oh ho! Are you going to take that tone, Sir Gascon? I see I must teach you how to behave.”

“And I, I’ll send you back to your mass, Sir Abbot! Draw if you please, and instantly!”

“Not now, my good friend; or at least, not here. Has it escaped your notice that we’re just outside the hôtel of Madam of Combalet that is full of the cardinal’s creatures? How do I know His Eminence’s not charged you with bringing him my head? I’m ridiculously partial to my head as it seems to go so well with my shoulders. No, you’ll die, rest assured – but quietly and in privacy, someplace where you’ll be able to boast to no one of your death.”

“Agreed – but don’t be so sure of success. And take the handkerchief whether or not it belongs to you; you may have occasion to need it.”

“Sir’s that much the Gascon then?” asked Aramis.

“I’m. Sir isn’t postponing this rendezvous through an excess of prudence?”

“Prudence, sir, is a virtue quite useless to musketeers – but indispensable to men of the Church and as I’m only a temporary musketeer, I’m prudent when I choose to be. At two o’clock I’ll have the honour of awaiting you at the hôtel of Sir Tréville. There I’ll name the site for our meeting.”

The two young men bowed, then parted, Aramis going up the street that led to the Luxembourg. D’Artagnan, seeing his appointed hour with Athos was nearly due, took the road to the Carmelite convent, saying to himself, “I certainly can’t turn back now – but at least if I’m to be killed, I’ll be killed by a musketeer!”

The Musketeers of the King & the Guards of the Cardinal

D’Artagnan knew no one in Paris so he went to his rendezvous with Athos without a second, resolved to be content with whomever his adversary should choose. Besides, he intended to make all proper apologies to the brave musketeer, though displaying no weakness. He wanted to avoid the usual outcome of a duel in which a young and vigorous man takes on an adversary who is weak from wounds: if he lost, it would be a double triumph for his antagonist; if he won, he would be accused of false courage and taking advantage of the other’s weakness. It must be clear by this point that d’Artagnan was no ordinary man. Though telling himself his death was inevitable, he refused to accept that death with resignation, as a less courageous man might have done in his place. He reflected on the different characters of his three antagonists and began to see his course more clearly. He hoped, by means of gracious and dignified excuses, to make a friend of Athos, whose air of nobility and whose austere demeanour he admired. He flattered himself he could intimidate Porthos by threatening to reveal the secret of the baldric that, if he weren’t killed on the spot, he could spread about to everyone. If he told the tale properly Porthos would be a laughingstock. As for sly Aramis, he wasn’t very afraid of him. If he should manage to make it that far, he felt confident he’d make short work of him, or at least mar his face, spoiling the beauty of which he was so proud as Caesar had recommended be done to the soldiers of Pompey. Above all, d’Artagnan was determined to follow his father’s advice to endure nothing from anyone but the king, the cardinal, and Sir Tréville. So he didn’t just walk toward the Carmelite convent, he flew. The Carmes-Deschaux, as it was then called, was a windowless building standing in an empty field adjacent to the meadow of Préaux-Clercs. It often served as a nearby rendezvous for antagonists with no time to waste. When d’Artagnan came in sight of the open ground at the foot of the convent, Athos had been waiting for only five minutes, and the bell in the tower was tolling twelve noon. Thus d’Artagnan was as punctual as the Samaritaine, and the most rigorous interpreter of the code duello could have no complaint. Athos, still suffering cruelly from his wound, though it had been dressed by Tréville’s surgeon, was sitting on a milestone and awaiting his adversary with that calm demeanour and noble air that never left him. At the sight of d’Artagnan he rose and stepped politely forward to meet him. D’Artagnan, on his part, met his adversary hat in hand, feather almost touching the ground. “Sir,” said Athos, “I’ve invited two of my friends to serve as seconds but they have not yet arrived. I’m surprised, as it’s not at all customary for them to be late for an occasion of this sort.”

“I myself have no seconds, Sir,” said d’Artagnan, “for having arrived only yesterday in Paris, so far I know only Sir Tréville. I was recommended to him by my father who’s the honour to be one of his friends in some degree.”

Athos reflected for a moment. “You know no one but Sir Tréville?”

“No, Sir. I know only him.”

“Ah but then,” continued Athos, speaking half to himself and half to d’Artagnan, “if I kill you, I’ll be called a child-eater.”

“Not quite,” replied d’Artagnan, with a dignified bow, “for you do me the honour to cross swords with me while hampered by a very painful wound.”

“Very painful indeed, you may take my word for it. You gave me a devil of a thump, I can tell you. But I’ll fight left-handed as I usually do in such circumstances. Don’t think I’m doing you a favour as I fight with either hand. In fact, it may be a disadvantage for you; a left-handed opponent can be a problem if one isn’t used to them. I regret not having informed you of this earlier.”

“Truly, Sir,” said d’Artagnan, bowing once again, “you display a courtesy that I very much appreciate.”

“You do me too much honour,” replied Athos with the air of a gentleman. “Let’s speak of something else, I beg. Ah! Blue blood! How you hurt me! My shoulder’s on fire.”

“If you’d permit me…” d’Artagnan said timidly.

“What, Sir?”

“I’ve a miraculous balm for wounds, a balm given to me by my mother, and which I’ve already proven upon myself.”

“Well?”

“Well, I’m sure that in three days this balm would cure you. Once you’re cured … it’d still be a great honour for me to meet with you.”

D’Artagnan said these words with a sincerity that ensured their politeness, casting no doubt on his courage. “By God, Sir,” said Athos, “your proposition pleases me; I can’t accept it but it savours of the gentleman a league off. That’s how the brave knights spoke in the time of Charlemagne and every cavalier should make them his model. Unfortunately, we don’t live in the time of the Great Emperor but in the time of Your Eminence and no matter how secret we kept it, within three days he’d know of our rendezvous and put a stop to our duel. Speaking of which, will these laggards never arrive?”

“If you’re pressed for time, Sir,” said d’Artagnan with the same simplicity with which a moment before he had proposed to postpone the duel three days, “if you’re in a hurry and would like to dispose of me at once, don’t delay on my account, I beg you.”

“I admire your way of speaking,” said Athos with a gracious nod to d’Artagnan. “That’s not the remark of a man without brains, still less a man without heart. Sir, I love men of your stamp. I can see that if we don’t kill each other, I’ll enjoy conversing with you hereafter. We’ll wait for the seconds if you don’t mind. I’ve plenty of time, and it’ll make the affair more correct. Ah! Here’s one now, I believe.” In fact, from the end of the Rue of Vaugirard, the gigantic form of Porthos began to appear. “What!” cried d’Artagnan. “Your first second’s Sir Porthos?”

“Yes. Does that displease you?”

“No, by no means.”

“And here’s the other one.”

D’Artagnan turned toward where Athos pointed and recognised Aramis. “What!” cried he, even more astonished, “Is your other second Sir Aramis?”

“Of course. Don’t you know that none of us are ever seen without the others and we’re known as the Three Inseparables by the musketeers and the guards at Court and in the city? Perhaps, since you come from Dax or Pau…”

“From Tarbes,” said d’Artagnan.

“Ah. You may then be somewhat ignorant of these details,” said Athos.

“My faith!” said d’Artagnan, “You’re well-named, gentlemen. My adventure here will certainly prove your alliance isn’t based on your differences if anyone hears of it.”

Meanwhile Porthos arrived, waved a greeting to Athos, and then turning toward d’Artagnan, froze in astonishment. (Let it be noted, in passing, that he had changed his baldric and given up his cloak.)

“What? What?” he said. “What does this mean?”

“It is with sir here, that I’m going to fight,” said Athos, indicating d’Artagnan with his hand, and saluting him with the same gesture.

“But … but I’m to fight with him also!” said Porthos.

“But not until one o’clock,” replied d’Artagnan.

“And I’m to fight with sir as well,” said Aramis, arriving.

“But not until two o’clock,” said d’Artagnan with the same nonchalance.

“But why’re you fighting him, Athos?” asked Aramis.

“My faith, I can’t quite say. Ah, yes – he hurt my shoulder. And you, Porthos?”

“My faith, I fight … because I fight!” answered Porthos, colouring.

Athos who missed nothing, saw a faint smile touch the Gascon’s lips. “We’d a discussion about wardrobe,” the young man said.

“And you, Aramis?” asked Athos.

“We’re fighting over theology,” answered Aramis, making a sign to d’Artagnan to keep quiet about the reason for their duel.

Athos saw a second smile cross d’Artagnan’s lips. “Really?” said Athos.

"Oh, yes – a passage in Saint Augustine upon which we'd not agree," said the Gascon.

"Decidedly, this man's his wits about him," murmured Athos.

"And now that you're assembled, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, "Permit me to make my excuses."

At the word excuses, Athos's brow clouded, a contemptuous smile touched Porthos's lips, and Aramis made a gesture of refusal. "You misunderstand me, gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, throwing back his head, its bold angles gilded by the sun. "I ask to be excused in case I may be unable to pay my debt of honour to all three of you. Sir Athos's the first right to kill me that seriously devalues your claim, Sir Porthos, and renders yours, Sir Aramis, nearly worthless. And so I repeat, gentlemen, please excuse me – but only on that account. Now, on guard!"

D'Artagnan drew his sword at these words with the air of a true cavalier. The blood had risen to his head and at that moment he would gladly have drawn his blade against all the musketeers in the realm. It was a quarter past noon. The sun was at its zenith and the ground chosen as the theatre of the duel was exposed to its full power. "It's quite hot," said Athos, drawing his sword in his turn, "and yet I can't remove my doublet, for I can tell my wound's bleeding, and I wouldn't care to disturb sir with a flow of blood that he's not drawn from me himself."

"Well said, sir," said d'Artagnan. "Drawn by myself or another, I assure you I'll always be sorry to see the blood of such a brave gentleman. I'll fight in my doublet like you."

"See here, see here," said Porthos, "enough of these compliments. Are we to wait all day to take our turns?"

"Speak for yourself, Porthos, when you speak so inappropriately," interrupted Aramis. "As for me, I find what they say very well said, entirely worthy of two such gentlemen."

"When you please, Sir," said Athos, coming on guard.

"I await your command," said d'Artagnan, crossing swords.

But the two rapiers had scarcely touched when a squad of His Eminence's guards came around the corner of the convent, commanded by Sir Jussac. "The Cardinal's Guards!" cried Aramis and Porthos. "Sheathe swords, gentlemen! Sheathe swords!"

But it was too late. The 2 combatants had been seen in a position that left no doubt as to their intentions. "Whoa!" cried Jussac, advancing toward them, and signalling his men to do likewise. "Whoa! Musketeers, here, and preparing to fight? And the edicts, what of them, eh?"

"You're generous men, gentlemen Guards," said Athos though with some hostility as Jussac had been one of the attackers of the day before. "If we're to see you fighting, I'd say let them fight without hindrance. Leave us be then and you may enjoy some free entertainment."

"Gentlemen," said Jussac, "I very much regret to say the thing's impossible. Duty before all. So sheathe if you please and follow us."

"Sir," said Aramis, parodying Jussac, "it'd give us great pleasure to obey your gracious invitation, if it were up to us. But unfortunately, the thing's impossible. Sir Tréville's forbidden it. Therefore, be on your way if you know what's good for you."

This railleery exasperated Jussac. He said, "If you disobey, we'll charge you."

"They are five," said Athos in an undertone, "and we're only three; we'll be beaten again, and must die on the spot for I swear, I'll never again appear defeated before the captain."

Athos, Porthos, and Aramis instantly closed in while Jussac drew his soldiers together. This brief moment was enough for d'Artagnan to choose his path. It was one of those events that decide a man's life; a choice between the king and the cardinal that once made is irrevocable. To fight was to break the law, risk his head, and make an enemy of a minister more powerful than the king himself in one stroke. All this the young man foresaw and to his credit he did not hesitate a second. Turning toward Athos and his friends, he said, "Gentlemen, may I make so bold as to correct you? You said you're only three but it seems to me we're four."

"But you're not one of us," said Porthos.

"That's true," answered d'Artagnan. "I lack the uniform but I'm with you in spirit. I've the heart of a musketeer, Sir – I feel it and must follow where it leads."

"Step aside, young man," called Jussac who had guessed d'Artagnan's plans, no doubt from his gestures and expression. "You may retire with our consent. Save your skin; be off!"

D'Artagnan stayed put. "What a fine fellow you are," said Athos, gripping the young man's hand.

"Come, come! Make up your minds," called Jussac.

"See here," said Porthos, "we must do something."

"Young man, you're generous to a fault," said Athos. But all three were worried about d'Artagnan's youth and inexperience. "We'll be but three, one of us wounded, plus a boy," resumed Athos, "but it'll nonetheless be said we're four men."

"Yes but to surrender!" said Porthos.

"It's rather difficult," replied Athos.

D'Artagnan understood their indecision. "Gentlemen, give me a try," he said, "and I swear to you on my honour that they won't take me from here alive."

"What're you called, my brave man?" said Athos.

"D'Artagnan, Sir."

"Well, then: Athos, Porthos, Aramis, and d'Artagnan – forward!" cried Athos.

"See here, gentlemen, have you decided to decide?" called Jussac for the third time.

"We're ready, gentlemen," said Athos.

"And may we know your plans?" asked Jussac.

"We're about to have the honour of charging you," replied Aramis, tipping his hat with one hand while drawing his sword with the other.

"So! You resist!" cried Jussac.

"God! Are you surprised?"

And the 9 combatants rushed each other with fury – but not without method. Athos took on a certain Cahusac, a favourite of the cardinal; Porthos had Biscarat; and Aramis found himself facing 2 adversaries. As for d'Artagnan, he dashed at Jussac himself. The young Gascon's heart pounded as if it would burst from his chest, not from fear – by the grace of God, he had no shadow of that – but from excitement and exhilaration. He fought like a furious tiger, turning 10 times around his adversary, repeatedly changing his ground and his guard. Jussac was a connoisseur of the blade as they said then and quite experienced but he was hard put to defend himself against an adversary who leaped so agilely this way and that, attacking from all sides at once while parrying like a man with the greatest respect for his own skin. Eventually Jussac began to lose patience with this contest. Furious at being held in check by one he had regarded as a boy, he got angry and began to make mistakes. D'Artagnan redoubled his nimble attacks; though short on experience, he had a profound natural instinct for fencing. Jussac made a savage thrust at his adversary, fed up at last but d'Artagnan managed to parry it and while Jussac was recovering, d'Artagnan slid like a serpent under his steel and passed his sword through his body. Jussac fell like a dead weight. D'Artagnan then anxiously surveyed the field of battle. Aramis had killed one of his adversaries but the other was pressing him hard. Nevertheless, Aramis's situation was good and well able to defend himself. Biscarat and Porthos had wounded each other: Porthos had taken a thrust through the arm and Biscarat through his thigh. But the wounds were not serious and they just fought with all the more determination. Athos was visibly paler, wounded anew by Cahusac but had not retreated a foot; he had only changed his sword hand and now fought with his left. D'Artagnan was free to aid whomever he liked according to the laws of duelling of the time. While he tried to decide which of his companions most needed his help, he caught a glance from Athos, a glance of sublime eloquence. Athos would rather die than call for help but he could look and his look could appeal. D'Artagnan understood and with a single bound he fell on Cahusac's flank, crying, "Look to me, Sir Guard, or die!" Cahusac turned. It was time for Athos who had been held together only by his great courage, fell to one knee. "God!" he cried to d'Artagnan. "Don't kill him, young man, I beg you. I've an old grudge to settle with him when I'm cured and in good health. Just disarm him – bind his sword. That's it! Good! Well done!"

Athos cried as Cahusac's sword went flying 20 paces from him. Cahusac and d'Artagnan sprang forward together, the one to recover the sword, the other to seize it but d'Artagnan reached it first and placed his foot on it nimbler. Cahusac ran to the body of the man Aramis had killed and grabbed his rapier, then returned toward d'Artagnan – but on his way he met Athos. The musketeer had recovered his breath during the pause d'Artagnan had provided and, afraid that d'Artagnan might kill his enemy, sought to re-enter the fight. D'Artagnan understood that Athos preferred to be left to handle Cahusac alone. In fact, within a few seconds Cahusac fell with a wound across his throat. At the same moment, Aramis placed his sword against his remaining enemy's breast and made him call for mercy. That left only Porthos and Biscarat. Porthos pelted him with a thousand taunts, asking Biscarat what time it could be, offering his compliments on Biscarat's brother having just obtained a command in the Regiment of Navarre, and so on – but however he joked, it gained him nothing. Biscarat was one of those iron men with no fear of death. However, it had to be brought to an end. The Watch might arrive and arrest all the combatants, wounded or not, Royalists or Cardinalists. Athos, Aramis, and d'Artagnan surrounded Biscarat and demanded that he surrender. Though standing alone, and with a sword wound through his thigh, Biscarat was inclined to fight on – but Jussac, who'd risen on his elbow, called for him to yield. However, Biscarat turned a deaf ear – he was a Gascon, like d'Artagnan – and just laughed. Between parries, he found a moment to point with his sword at a spot on the ground. "Here," he said, paraphrasing a Bible verse, "here dies Biscarat, last of those who were with him!"

"But there are four against you!" called Jussac. "I order you to yield!"

"Ah! If you order it, that's different," said Biscarat. "As you're my officer, it's my duty to obey."

He jumped backward, broke his sword across his knee, and threw the pieces over the convent wall. Then he crossed his arms, whistling a Cardinalist song. Courage is always respected even in an enemy. The musketeers saluted Biscarat with their swords, then returned them to their scabbards. D'Artagnan did likewise; then aided by Biscarat, the only guard still standing, he carried Jussac, Cahusac, and Aramis's wounded opponent under the awning of the convent. The other guard was dead. D'Artagnan and the musketeers gleefully rang the convent bell and then, carrying 4 swords out of 5, drunk with joy, they set out toward the hôtel of Sir Tréville. They walked arm in arm, taking up the whole width of the street, and hailing every musketeer they met until it became a triumphal march. D'Artagnan's heart swelled as he marched between Athos and Porthos, gripping them tenderly. "If I'm not yet a musketeer," he said to his new friends as they entered the gate of the Hôtel de Tréville, "at least now I'm an apprentice, aren't I?"

His Majesty King Louis XIII

The affair of the mêlée at the Carmelite convent made a great noise. Sir Tréville rebuked his musketeers in public and congratulated them in private. However, there was no time to lose in gaining the ear of the king, so Tréville hurried across the river to the Louvre. But he was too late: the king was engaged with the cardinal and Tréville was told he was too busy to receive him. That evening, Tréville went to play cards with the king. Always fond of money, the king was winning that put him in an excellent humour. Seeing Tréville from far off, he said, "Come here, Captain, so I can scold you. Are you aware that His Eminence's been complaining to me about your musketeers and so emotionally that it's made him ill? These musketeers of yours are devils incarnate!"

"No, Sire," replied Tréville, who saw right away how things stood. "No, on the contrary, they're good fellows, meek as lambs whose only desire's that their swords never leave their scabbards except in the service of Your Majesty. But what'd you have? The guards of Your Eminence are forever picking fights with them. For the honour of the corps, the poor young men are obliged to defend themselves."

"Listen to Sir Tréville!" said the king. "Hear him! You'd think he's speaking of a society of monks! In truth, my dear Captain, I'm inclined to relieve you of your commission and give it to Miss de Chemerault and give you the abbey I promised her. Do you think I'm going to take your word for everything? I'm called Louis the Just, Sir Tréville, and we'll see by and by what we'll see."

"And because I've perfect faith in that justice, Sire, I'll wait patiently and quietly on Your Majesty's good pleasure."

"Wait then, sir – wait," said the king. "I'll not keep you waiting long."

In fact, the king's luck soon changed. As his winnings began to dwindle, he was not sorry to find a reason to make Charlemagne (as the old expression has it) and quit while he was ahead. He stood up from the table and poured the money in front of him into his pockets, most of which was still winnings. "Take my place, La Vieuville," he said. "I must speak with Sir Tréville on an affair of some importance. Let's see, I'd eighty pistoles before me; put down the same sum, so the losers will have nothing to complain of. Justice before all!"

He turned toward Tréville and beckoned him into the embrasure of a nearby window. "Well, Sir, you say it's His Eminence's guards who sought to quarrel with the musketeers?" the king asked.

"Yes, Sire, as always."

"And how did this thing come to happen? Tell me, my dear Captain. A good judge always listens to both sides."

"How did it happen? Good God! In the most simple and natural way possible. Three of my best soldiers whom Your Majesty knows by name, whose devotion you've appreciated more than once – three of my best soldiers, I say, Gentlemen Athos, Porthos, and Aramis had planned an outing with a young Gascon cadet whom I'd introduced to them that morning. The party's to take place in Saint-Germain, I believe. They'd just met up at the Carmelite convent when they were accosted by Gentlemen of Jussac, Cahusac, Biscarat, and a couple of other guards who certainly didn't go there in such numbers without intending to violate the edicts."

"Ah! I tend to agree with you," said the king. "Doubtless they went to fight there themselves."

"I make no such accusation, Sire; but I'll leave it to Your Majesty to judge what might bring five armed men to an area as deserted as the neighbourhood of the Carmelite convent."

"Yes, you're right, Tréville – you're right!"

"Then they changed plans when they saw my musketeers. Their petty personal quarrels were nothing next to their hostility to our company – for Your Majesty must know that the musketeers who're for the king and no one but the king, are the natural rivals of the guards who're for Your Eminence."

"Yes, Tréville, I know," said the king in a melancholy voice, "and I think it's a shame to see two such factions in France, two heads to royalty. But all this will end, Tréville, all this will end. You say then that the guards sought a quarrel with the musketeers?"

"I say it's probable that such a thing occurred though I can't swear to it, sire. You know that judging the truth in such a matter is very difficult unless one is endowed with the kind of instincts that've earned Louis XIII the name of the Just..."

"That's so. But they're not alone, your musketeers – they had a youth with them?"

"Yes, Sire, and Athos's already wounded. So three King's Musketeers, one of them wounded, plus a youth, not only held their ground against five of the finest blades in the Cardinal's Guards, they even brought four of them down."

"But Tréville, this is a victory!" cried the king, radiant. "A complete victory!"

"Yes, sire, as complete as that of Ponts-de-Cé."

"Four men, one of them wounded, and one a youth, you say?"

"Barely a man. Nevertheless, he conducted himself so well, I'll take the liberty of recommending him to Your Majesty."

"His name?"

"D'Artagnan, sire. He's the son of one of my oldest friends, a man who served the king, your father of glorious memory in the civil wars."

"And you say he conducted himself well, this young man? Tell me about it, Tréville; you know how I love stories of war and combat."

King Louis XIII twirled his moustache delightedly and placed his hand on his hip. "Sire," continued Tréville, "As I said, Sir d'Artagnan is almost a boy, and as he's not the honour to be a musketeer, he's in civilian clothes. The Cardinal's Guards seeing how young he's and no musketeer, invited him to retire before they attacked."

"There, you see, Tréville," interrupted the king, "it's the guards who attacked."

"Quite so, sire, beyond all doubt. They called upon him to retire as I said but he replied that he's a musketeer at heart, devoted to Your Majesty, and will therefore remain with the gentlemen Musketeers."

"Brave young man!" murmured the king.

"In fact, he stayed with them so effectively, it's he who gave Jussac the terrible sword wound that's made Your Eminence so angry."

"He's the one who wounded Jussac?" cried the king. "A mere boy! Tréville, that's impossible."

"It's just as I've the honour to tell Your Majesty."

"Jussac, one of the first blades of the realm!"

"Well, Sire, it seems he's found his master."

"I'd like to see this young man, Tréville – I'd like to see him and if anything can be done for him, well, we'll make it our business."

"When would Your Majesty deign to receive him?"

"Tomorrow at noon, Tréville."

"Shall I bring only him?"

"No, bring me all four together. I'd like to thank them all at once. Such devoted men are rare, Tréville, and we must reward their devotion."

"At noon, Sire, we'll be at the Louvre."

"Ah ... come in the back way, by the Petit Escalier, Tréville. There's no point in letting the cardinal know about this."

"As you say, Sire."

"You understand, Tréville, an edict is still an edict. Duelling, on any account, is forbidden."

"But this encounter, Sire, was nothing like a duel. It was a brawl; what else can you call five Cardinal's Guards against three musketeers and Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Quite so," said the King, "but nonetheless, Tréville, come by the Petit Escalier."

Tréville smiled but it was already something of an accomplishment to have persuaded this child to rebel against his master so he bowed respectfully to the king and was given permission to retire. That evening the three musketeers were informed they were to have the honour of a royal audience. They'd been acquainted with the king for some time so this was no novelty for them; but d'Artagnan imagined his fortune was made and passed the night in golden dreams with his active Gascon imagination. By 8 o'clock the next morning he was already knocking on Athos's door. D'Artagnan found the musketeer dressed and ready to go out. As the audience with the king was not until noon, he had arranged to play tennis with Porthos and Aramis at the courts near the stables of the Luxembourg. Athos invited d'Artagnan to join them. Despite his ignorance of the game that he had never played, he accepted, not knowing what else to do with his time from 9 in the morning until nearly noon. The 2 other musketeers were already at the courts, knocking the balls about. Athos who excelled at all sports, led d'Artagnan onto the court and challenged them. However, though he tried to play left-handed with the first swing he discovered his wound was still too recent to allow such strenuous exercise. D'Artagnan kept at it but he was too much of a novice to play a regular game so they only volleyed balls back and forth without keeping score. One of these balls, served from Porthos's herculean wrist, passed so close to d'Artagnan's face that he thought if he had been struck by it, it probably would have cost him his royal audience. He could not possibly be presented to the king with a swollen face and in the Gascon's imagination his entire future depended on this audience. So he saluted Porthos and Aramis politely and bowed out of further play, offering to resume the game when he could meet them on more equal terms. He left the court and found a place in the gallery overlooking the net. Unfortunately for d'Artagnan, one of His Eminence's guards was among the spectators. Still seething about the defeat of his comrades the day before, he had sworn to seize the first opportunity for revenge and believed that now his chance had come. "It's no surprise that young man should be afraid of a mere ball," he said loudly to his neighbour. "He's probably an apprentice musketeer."

D'Artagnan spun around as if bitten by a snake and glared at the guard who'd made this insolent speech. "By God," continued the latter, with a mocking twist of his moustache, "look at me all you like, my little gentleman but I've said what I've said."

"And since what you've said is so clear that it needs no explanation," replied d'Artagnan, in a quiet voice, "I request you to follow me."

"And when'd you like me to do that?" asked the guard with the same mocking air.

"Immediately if you please."

"No doubt you know who I am."

"Me? I've no idea, and couldn't care less."

"Ah, that's where you're wrong. If you knew my name, you might not be in such a hurry."

"All right, then, what is your name?"

"Bernajoux – at your service!"

"Very well, Sir Bernajoux," said d'Artagnan quietly, "I'll await you at the door."

"Go on, Sir, I'll follow you."

"Not too quickly, Sir, or someone will notice that we're leaving together. You understand that for the business at hand, witnesses would be inconvenient."

"Fine," said the guard, still surprised that his name had had so little effect on the young man. Everyone knew the name of Bernajoux – except perhaps d'Artagnan – for it figured prominently in the daily accounts of those fights that not even the edicts of the king and the cardinal could control. Porthos and Aramis were involved in their game and Athos was watching them intently so none of them saw their young comrade leave. He waited outside the door and less than a minute later the guard came down. D'Artagnan's audience with the king was fixed for noon so he had no time to lose. He looked around and seeing the street deserted, said to his adversary, "My faith! It's lucky you've to deal with only an apprentice musketeer even if your name is Bernajoux. But don't worry, I'll do my best. On guard!"

"But it seems to me this isn't exactly the best place for a meeting," d'Artagnan's opponent said. "Hadn't we better go behind the Saint-Germain Abbey or out to the Préaux-Clercs?"

"What you say makes sense," replied d'Artagnan, "but unfortunately my time's short as I've an appointment at noon. So if you please, Sir, on guard!"

Bernajoux was not the sort to receive such a compliment more than once. In an instant his sword shone in his hand and he charged his adversary whom he hoped was young enough to be intimidated. But the day before d'Artagnan had gone through his apprenticeship. Emboldened by his victory, inflated by high hopes for his future, he was determined not to retreat a single step. Their swords crossed close to the guards and d'Artagnan stood firm so it was his adversary who stepped back. But during the split-second in which Bernajoux's blade deviated from the line, d'Artagnan disengaged, lunged, and pierced his opponent in the shoulder. He then stepped back and lowered his sword but Bernajoux rushed blindly at him, crying out that it was nothing and impaled himself on d'Artagnan's blade. He didn't fall but staggered back, shouting he was not yet defeated. But he broke off and stumbled across the street to the hôtel of the Duke of La Trémouille where a relative of his was in service. D'Artagnan who had no idea how serious Bernajoux's second wound was, followed close on his heels. He would doubtless have struck him a third time but two of the guard's friends had witnessed the exchange of words between d'Artagnan and Bernajoux, seen the pair go out, and then heard the commotion in the street. They now rushed out of the tennis courts, swords drawn, and attacked d'Artagnan. Athos, Porthos, and Aramis appeared next, and lit into the 2 guards attacking their young comrade, forcing them back. Bernajoux finally fell, leaving the Cardinal's Guards only 2 against 4 so they shouted, "To us! You there in the Hôtel of La Trémouille!"

At these cries, all the armed men in the hôtel came out and rushed the four companions who themselves shouted, "Musketeers! To us!"

This call generally brought reinforcements for everyone knew the musketeers were His Eminence's enemies and people loved them for their hostility to the cardinal. In a brawl, the guards of those companies not belonging to the Red Duke, as Aramis had called him, usually took sides with the King's Musketeers. 3 guards of Sir Des Essarts's company were passing; 2 went to the aid of the 4 companions while the third ran to the hôtel of Sir Tréville, crying, "To us, musketeers, to us!"

As usual, the Hôtel of Tréville was full of his company's soldiers and they rushed to the aid of their comrades. The mêlée became general but the musketeers had the advantage of numbers. The Cardinal's Guards and Sir La Trémouille's men retreated into their hôtel, slamming the gates shut just in time to prevent their enemies from following them. Bernajoux was in bad condition and was taken inside immediately. Excitement was at its height among the musketeers and their allies. They debated setting fire to the hôtel to punish the insolence of Sir La Trémouille's household for daring to attack King's Musketeers. It looked like this proposal would be put into action when fortunately the bells of the town struck 11 o'clock and d'Artagnan and his companions remembered their royal audience. They succeeded in calming the hotheads who consoled themselves by hurling some paving stones at the gates of the mansion – but the gates would not budge so they soon gave it up. Besides, their leaders had already left for the hôtel of Sir Tréville who was waiting for them, having heard of this latest outburst. "To the Louvre and quickly," he said, "without losing a moment. We must try to see the king before he's swayed by the cardinal. We'll describe this thing as a result of yesterday's affair and the two will be disposed of together."

Sir Tréville, accompanied by the four young men, marched off toward the Louvre; but to the great astonishment of the Captain of the Musketeers, he was informed that the king had gone stag-hunting in the forest of Saint-Germain. Tréville asked to have this news repeated to him twice, and each time his companions saw his face grow darker. He asked, "Did His Majesty have any plans yesterday for this hunt?"

"No, Your Excellency," replied the valet. "This morning the Royal Huntsman reported the tracks of a great stag in the forest. At first the king said he'd not go but can't resist a good hunt and set out after his morning meal."

"Has the king seen the cardinal?" asked Sir Tréville.

"Probably," answered the valet, "for this morning, when I saw the horses being harnessed to His Eminence's carriage, I asked where he was going, and they said, 'To Saint-Germain.'"

"We've been forestalled," said Sir Tréville. "Gentlemen, I'll see the king this evening but as for you, I advise you not to risk it." This advice was too reasonable for the four young men to dispute it, especially since it came from a man who knew the king so well. Tréville recommended they go home and wait for news from him. As he entered his own hôtel, it occurred to Tréville that it's always best to be the first to lodge a complaint. He sent one of his footmen to the Duke of La Trémouille with a letter demanding the expulsion of the Cardinal's Guards from his house and a reprimand to his people for their audacity in attacking the musketeers. But Sir La Trémouille, already biased by his equerry, Bernajoux's relative, replied that Tréville and the musketeers had no right to complain. On the contrary, the duke should be the one to complain, as it was his men the musketeers had attacked and his mansion they had threatened to burn. Tréville knew this sort of debate between two nobles could go on forever, each becoming more rigid in his position as time passed, so he decided on a course that might end it: he would make a personal call on Sir La Trémouille. He immediately went to La Trémouille’s hôtel and had himself announced. The two nobles saluted each other politely, for if they were not friends, they at least respected one another. Both were men of courage, honour, and as the Duke of La Trémouille, a Protestant who rarely saw the king, belonged to no faction, politics rarely coloured his social interactions. However, this time the duke’s welcome was colder than usual, though polite. “Sir,” said Tréville, “we believe we each have cause to complain of the other, so I’ve come myself to see if we can clear up this affair.”

“Willingly,” replied La Trémouille, “but I warn you I’ve already inquired into it and all the blame falls on your musketeers.”

“You are too just and reasonable a man not to accept the proposal I’m about to make to you,” Tréville said.

“I’m listening, Sir.”

“How fares your equerry’s relative, Sir Bernajoux?”

“Very poorly, Sir. Besides the sword wound in his arm that isn’t really dangerous, he’d another through the lung and the doctor doesn’t like the look of it.”

“But he’s still conscious?”

“Quite.”

“Can he talk?”

“He can talk but with difficulty.”

“Well, Sir! Let’s see him and put him under oath to speak the truth before God whom he may have to face all too soon. I’m willing to let him judge his own case and will abide by what he says.”

La Trémouille reflected for a moment but it was hard to think of anything more reasonable, so he accepted. The 2 went down to the chamber where the wounded man lay. When Bernajoux saw the 2 noble lords enter he tried to sit up in bed but he was too weak. Exhausted by the effort, he fell back and nearly passed out. La Trémouille revived him with some smelling salts. Then Sir Tréville who did not want to be accused of intimidating a sick man, invited La Trémouille to question Bernajoux himself. The questioning went as Tréville had foreseen. Hovering between life and death, Bernajoux had no intention of distorting the truth and he told the 2 gentlemen exactly what had happened. This gave Tréville everything he wanted. He wished Bernajoux a speedy recovery, took his leave of La Trémouille, and returned to his hôtel where he sent word inviting the 4 friends to dinner. Sir Tréville kept good company though his guests were always anti-Cardinalist. It goes without saying that the conversation throughout dinner dwelled upon the 2 recent reverses suffered by His Eminence’s guards. As d’Artagnan had been the hero of both occasions, all congratulations fell on him with the full approval of Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. They were good comrades and besides, they had had their turn in the limelight so often they could afford to let d’Artagnan have his. Around 6 o’clock Tréville announced it was time to go to the Louvre. The hour of their audience was long past so instead of entering by the Petit Escalier, Tréville decided to await the king with his 4 young men in the main royal antechamber. When they arrived the king had not yet returned from the hunt but they waited among the crowd of courtiers for no more than half an hour before the doors were thrown open and His Majesty was announced. D’Artagnan felt himself tremble to the marrow of his bones. The next few moments would decide the rest of his life in all probability. He stared in an agony of suspense at the door through which the king would enter. Louis XIII appeared first in advance of his entourage. He was dressed for the hunt, wearing tall boots, carrying a whip, and coated head to toe with dust. At first glance, d’Artagnan could see the king was in an ugly mood. The king’s obvious bad temper did not prevent the courtiers from ranging themselves along his path. In royal antechambers, it’s better to be seen by an angry eye than not to be seen at all. The 3 musketeers therefore stepped forward without hesitation though d’Artagnan remained timidly behind them. But though the king knew Athos, Porthos, and Aramis personally, he passed without looking or speaking to them, acting as if he had never seen them before. As for Tréville, when the eyes of the king paused for a moment on him, he sustained their regard so firmly that the king was the first to look aside. Then grumbling, His Majesty passed into his chambers. “The situation looks bad,” said Athos, smiling. “We’ll not be made Knights of the Order this evening.”

“Wait here ten minutes,” said Sir Tréville. “If by that time I haven’t come out, return to my hôtel, for it’ll be useless to wait any longer.”

The young men waited 10 minutes; a quarter hour; 20 minutes; then since Tréville did not reappear, they left, more than a little uneasy about what was to come. Sir Tréville boldly entered the king’s chambers where he found His Majesty in a foul temper, seated on an armchair, and beating the dust out of his boots with the back of his whip. Undaunted, Tréville inquired about His Majesty’s health.

“Bad, Sir, bad,” answered the king. “I’m bored unto death.” This was Louis’s most frequent complaint. He would often beckon one of his courtiers to stare out the window with him, saying, “Come, Sir, let’s be bored together.”

“How! Your Majesty, bored?” said Tréville. “Didn’t you have the pleasure of the hunt today?”

“Some pleasure! Upon my soul, everything decays, decays ... I don’t know whether it’s because the game leaves scent no more or the dogs have just lost their noses. We start a stag of ten points, chase him for six hours, and when we’re about to take him when Saint-Simon is already putting the horn to his mouth to sound the halloo – damn! The entire pack takes off on a false scent after a mere two-point buck. Soon I’ll have to give up riding to the hounds as I’ve had to give up falconry. You know, I’d only one decent gyrfalcon and he died the day before yesterday. Oh, I’m a sad and unfortunate king, Sir Tréville.”

“Sire: that is indeed a great misfortune. No wonder you despair. But don’t you still have a good number of falcons, hawks, and tiercels?”

“With no one to train them! Good falconers are a thing of the past. No one but me knows the art of venery anymore. After me it’ll be gone and people will hunt with pits, snares, and traps. If only I’d time to train some apprentices! But Your Eminence’s always there, never giving me a moment’s rest, always talking to me about Spain, Austria, and England! Devil take it! ... But speaking of the cardinal, Sir Tréville, I must say I’m quite displeased with you.”

Tréville had been waiting for this. He knew the king well, knew that all these complaints were just a preamble to encourage himself and now he would finally get to the point. “And in what way I’ve been as unfortunate as to displease Your Majesty?” asked Tréville in pretended astonishment.

“Is this how you fulfil your duty, Sir?” continued the king without directly answering Tréville’s question. “Is it for this that I named you my Captain of Musketeers for this: a man’s assassination, an entire quarter in riot, Paris nearly set ablaze – and you’ve nothing to say about it? But no doubt I’m hasty in accusing you, no doubt the perpetrators are already in prison, and you’ve come to announce that justice’s been done.”

“No, Sire,” said Tréville calmly, “it’s justice I come to demand from you.”

“What? Against whom?” cried the king.

“Against libellers and scandalmongers,” said Sir Tréville.

“Ah! That’s a new one,” replied the king. “Are you going to tell me that your three damned musketeers, Athos, Porthos, Aramis, your cadet from Béarn haven’t sprung like furies on poor Bernajoux and injured him so badly that by now he’s probably dead? Are you going to tell me that they didn’t lay siege to the hôtel of the Duke of La Trémouille and try to burn it down? Of course, that mightn’t be such a bad thing in times of war since it’s a nest of Huguenots – but in peacetime, it sets a bad example! Speak! Isn’t this what you’re going to tell me?”

“And who’s told you this fine story, Sire?” Tréville asked calmly.

“Who’s told me this fine story, Sir? Who but he who watches while I sleep, works while I play, manages everything inside and outside the realm, in France as in Europe?”

“Your Majesty must be speaking of God,” said Tréville, “for only God can be so far above Your Majesty.”

“No, Sir, I speak of the buttress of the State, my only servant, only friend – Your Eminence!”

“His Eminence is not His Holiness, Sire.”

“What do you mean by that?”

“I mean that only the pope is infallible, and that his infallibility doesn’t extend to his cardinals.”

“Do you mean to say he tricks me, betrays me? You accuse him, then? Come, speak – admit that you accuse him!”

“No, Sire; but I say that he makes mistakes; that he is ill-informed; that he has too hastily and unjustly accused Your Majesty’s musketeers, and has relied on information from poor sources.”

“This accusation comes from Sir La Trémouille, from the duke himself! What do you say to that?”

“I might say, Sire that he is too interested in the question to be an impartial judge but I don’t say that – far from it. I know the duke for a loyal gentleman, and I’m willing to defer the entire matter to him – but on one condition, Sire.”

“And that is?”

“That Your Majesty summons him here, and interrogates him yourself, face to face, with no witnesses, and that I shall see Your Majesty as soon as you have finished with the duke.”

“Really?” said the king. “And you agree to bow to whatever Sir La Trémouille says?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“You’ll accept his judgement?”

“Without question.”

“And you’ll submit to whatever reparations he requires?”

“Certainly.”

“La Chesnaye!” called the king. “La Chesnaye!” Louis’s Confidential Valet, who always stood just outside the door, entered and bowed. “La Chesnaye,” said the King, “send someone right away to find me Sir La Trémouille. I wish to speak with him this evening.”

Tréville said, “Your Majesty gives me your word you’ll see no one between La Trémouille and me?”

“Nobody, word of a gentleman.”

“Until tomorrow then, sire.”

“Until tomorrow, sir.”

“At what hour will it please Your Majesty to see me?”

“At whatever hour you like.”

“But if I come too early, I fear I might wake Your Majesty.”

“Awaken me? Do you think I sleep? I ever sleep no more, sir; I dream sometimes, that’s all. Come as early in the morning as you like, at seven o’clock – but take care if your musketeers are guilty!”

“If my musketeers are guilty, sire, the guilty shall find themselves in the hands of Your Majesty who’ll deal with them at your good pleasure. Does Your Majesty require anything more? Only speak; I’m ready to obey.”

“No, Sir, no. It’s with reason I’m called Louis the Just. Until tomorrow then, sir, until tomorrow.”

“Till then, may God preserve Your Majesty.”

However little the king slept that night, Tréville slept still less. He had advised his three musketeers and their comrade to be back at his hôtel by 6:30 the next morning. When he left for the Louvre he took them along. He promised nothing, assuring them only that their future, and his, depended upon this roll of the royal dice. When they arrived at the foot of the Petit Escalier, or the King’s Little Stair, His Majesty’s private entrance into the Louvre from an inside corner of the Cour Carrée, Tréville asked his men to wait. If the king was still angry with Tréville they could leave without being seen. If the king consented to receive him, he could easily send for his men. In the king’s private antechamber Tréville found La Chesnaye, who told him they’d been unable locate the Duke of La Trémouille the night before until after it was too late for him to call at the Louvre. He’d only just now arrived for his audience and was in with the king as they spoke. Tréville was very pleased with this turn of events, as it ensured that no one else would get a word in between La Trémouille’s audience and his own. In fact, scarcely ten minutes passed before the king’s study door opened and the Duke of La Trémouille came out. The duke saw Tréville and said, “Sir, His Majesty sent for me to ask for an account of the events that took place yesterday morning at my hôtel. I’ve told him the truth, that is to say, that the fault was with my people, and that I was prepared to offer you my excuses. Since I see you now, I ask that you receive them, and take me hereafter as one of your friends.”

“Sir Duke,” said Tréville, “I was so confident of your integrity that I asked His Majesty for no other defender than yourself. I see that was no mistake, and I’m grateful there’s still one man in France of whom one can speak well and not be proven wrong.”

“Good! Good!” said the king, who’d been listening to this exchange of compliments from the doorway. “Only, tell him, Tréville, since he wants to be one of your friends, that I also want to be one of his but he neglects me. It’s been almost three years since I last saw him, and I never see him at all unless I send for him. Tell him all this for me, as there are some things a king can’t say for himself.”

“Thank you, Sire,” said the duke. “But Your Majesty should know that it’s not necessarily those you see every day – Sir Tréville accepted – who are your most devoted servants.”

“Ah, you heard what I said! So much the better, Duke, so much the better,” said the king, advancing from the doorway. “So there you are, Tréville. Where are your musketeers? I told you the day before yesterday to bring them to me. Why haven’t you done so?”

“They’re below, sire, and at your leave La Chesnaye can call them to come up.”

"Yes, yes, have them come up right away. It's nearly eight and at nine I've an appointment. Go, Sir Duke but be sure to return. Come in, Tréville." The duke bowed and retired. As the door closed behind him, the 3 musketeers and d'Artagnan, conducted by La Chesnaye, appeared at the head of the staircase. "Come in, my braves, come in," said the King. "I'm going to scold you."

The musketeers advanced and bowed, d'Artagnan right behind them. "What the devil!" continued the king, "Seven of His Eminence's guards rendered hors of combat by you four in two days! That's too many, Gentlemen, too many. At this rate, His Eminence will have to replace his entire company in three weeks and enforce the edicts with full rigor. I say nothing about one now and then but seven in two days is far too many."

"As you see, Sire, they come here contrite and wholly repentant, ready to make you their excuses."

"Contrite and wholly repentant? Hah!" said the king. "I've no faith in their hypocritical faces. I see one lurking in the back who looks particularly Gascon. Come here, Sir."

D'Artagnan approached despondently, assuming he was now in for it. "What? Did you tell me there's a young man involved? This is a boy, Tréville, a mere boy! And he's the one who gave that nasty sword-thrust to Jussac?"

"And two fine wounds to Bernajoux."

"Indeed!"

"Without taking into account," said Athos, "that if he hadn't saved me from the hands of Cahusac, I'd not be here to have the honour of making my most humble reverence to Your Majesty."

"Why, Sir Tréville, we've a veritable demon in this Béarnaise! By the belly of the Grey Saint as the king my father used to say! But I repeat, this sort of thing results in too many punctured doublets and broken swords. Now, the Gascons are always poor, aren't they?"

"Sire, as yet they've discovered no gold mines in their mountains although the Lord owes them such a miracle as compensation for the way they supported the ambitions of the king, your father."

"In other words, it's the Gascons who made me king since I'm the son of my father? Well, I'd not disagree. La Chesnaye, go rummage through my pockets and see if you can find forty pistoles. And now, young man, on your word of honour, how did all this come to pass?" D'Artagnan related the adventure of the day before in all its details: how, unable to sleep for joy at the chance to see His Majesty, he had gone to see his 3 friends the morning before the audience; how they had met at the tennis courts, and how when he showed his fear of taking a ball in the face, he had been mocked by Bernajoux who had nearly paid for his mockery with his life – and Sir La Trémouille who had nothing to do with it, with the loss of his hôtel. "Good, very good," said the king. "This matches the account the duke gave me. Poor cardinal! Seven men in two days, and among them some of his best! But that's quite enough, Gentlemen, quite enough. You've had your revenge for the incident in the Rue Férou and more. You'd be quite satisfied."

"If Your Majesty is," said Tréville, "then so are we."

"Oh, I am," added the king and taking a handful of gold from La Chesnaye, he gave it to d'Artagnan. "You see," he said, "here's proof of my satisfaction."

At this period, a gentleman's pride did not prevent him from receiving money directly from the hand of the king and such a gift was not the least bit humiliating or improper. D'Artagnan put his 40 pistoles into his pocket without a second thought and thanked His Majesty very sincerely. "There!" said the King, looking at a clock. "There, it's now half-past eight so you must go, as I'm expecting someone at nine. Thank you for your devotion, Gentlemen. I can count on it, no?"

"Oh, sire!" d'Artagnan cried, speaking for all four companions. "We'd let ourselves be cut to pieces if it'd serve Your Majesty!"

"Fine, fine – but it's better to stay whole. You're more useful to me that way. Ah, Tréville," the king added in a low voice, "since we've decided that an apprenticeship is necessary before entering the musketeers and since right now there's no room in the company anyway, place this young man in the guards company of your brother-in-law, Sir des Essarts." He chuckled. "By God! I can already see the cardinal's scowl. He'll be furious – but I'm in the right so this time I don't care."

And the king saluted Tréville who left to rejoin his musketeers whom he found dividing up d'Artagnan's 40 pistoles. As His Majesty had predicted, the cardinal was furious, so much that he kept away from the king's card table for 8 days. Meanwhile the king was as pleasant as could be, even smug and when he met the cardinal he would ask, "Well, Your Eminence, how goes it with your poor Bernajoux and your poor Jussac? Hmm?"

The Domestic Life of the Musketeers

Once d'Artagnan was outside the Louvre he consulted his friends as to how best to use his share of the 40 pistoles. Athos advised him to order a fine dinner at the Pomme-de-Pin tavern, Porthos to hire a lackey, and Aramis to find himself a suitable mistress. They had the dinner that evening and the newly hired lackey waited on the table. Athos ordered the food and drink while Porthos had provided the lackey. He was a Picard whom the splendid musketeer had engaged that same day when he saw him on the Pont of La Tournelle, loitering and spitting into the water. Porthos said that this occupation indicated a reflective, thoughtful personality, and he had hired him on the spot with no other recommendation. Planchet – that was the name of the Picard – was delighted by the grand appearance of Porthos whom he thought was his new employer. When they reached Porthos's lodgings he was disappointed to find the position of lackey already filled by a fellow named Mousqueton. Porthos informed Planchet that the state of his household while grand, would not support 2 domestics, and he must enter the service of d'Artagnan. Planchet grumbled at this – but when he waited at his new master's sumptuous dinner and saw him pay for it with a handful of gold from his pocket, he thought his fortune was made and thanked heaven for landing him in the service of such a Croesus. He continued to feel this way even after the feast when the leftovers compensated for many days on short rations. But that evening when he made his master's bed, Planchet's golden hopes suddenly vanished. D'Artagnan's bed was the only one in the apartment that consisted of just one bedroom and one antechamber. Planchet had to sleep on the floor in the antechamber under a thin coverlet taken from d'Artagnan's bed and which d'Artagnan did without from then on. Athos had a valet he called Grimaud whom he had trained to serve him in a most unusual fashion. The worthy Athos was taciturn to a fault. In the years he had lived cheek-by-jowl with Porthos and Aramis, his friends had seen him smile often but had never heard him laugh. His speech was concise but expressive, saying exactly what he wanted to say and nothing more: no embellishments, no embroidery, and no flourishes. His conversation was all fact and no fancy. Although Athos was scarcely 30 years old, handsome, intelligent, and well-mannered, no one had ever heard of his having a mistress. He never spoke of women and while he did not discourage others from doing so, it was clear he found it a very disagreeable topic. He added nothing to such discussions ever but bitter words and sour opinions. His reserve, gruffness, and reticence made him almost an old man, and he was certainly very set in his ways. In order to ensure that his needs were attended to precisely and with a minimum of disturbance, he had trained his lackey Grimaud to obey him at a gesture, or even a simple movement of his lips. He never spoke to Grimaud unless he had to. Grimaud who feared his master like fire, was at the same time very attached to and held him in a respect that approached worship. Sometimes he thought he understood perfectly what Athos wanted, leaped to fulfil the command, and did the exact opposite of what Athos had in mind. Then his master would shrug his shoulders and quite calmly proceed to give Grimaud a sound thrashing. On these occasions, he spoke a little. As should be apparent, Porthos's character was the complete opposite of that of Athos. Not only did he speak a great deal, he was very loud about it. To be fair, he did not really care whether anyone listened or not; he spoke for the pleasure of speaking and for the pleasure of hearing himself speak. He delivered loud opinions on every subject except the sciences, begging in that case to be excused because ever since his childhood he'd always hated scholars. Porthos knew he lacked Athos's air of natural nobility and this had so irked him early in their acquaintance that he had frequently been short with Athos, almost rude, and sought to outdo him through the splendour of his wardrobe. But with his simple musketeer's tabard and nothing more than the way he held his head and advanced his foot, Athos demonstrated his innate nobility and relegated the pompous Porthos to the second rank. Porthos consoled himself by making the antechamber of Sir Tréville and the guardroom of the Louvre echo with tales of his good fortunes with the ladies, a subject of which Athos, of course, never spoke. Porthos had claimed to have enjoyed the favours of a lawyer's lady, and later those of a baroness – rising from the noblesse of the robe to the noblesse of the sword – and recently Porthos had implied that he'd dazzled the eyes of no less than a foreign princess. An old proverb says: Like master, like manservant. Let us pass then from Athos's lackey to Porthos's lackey, from Grimaud to Mousqueton. Porthos's lackey was a Norman whose name his master had changed from Boniface to the more sonorous and warlike Mousqueton. He had entered the service of Porthos in exchange for no pay other than clothing and lodging, so long as those were magnificent; he kept two hours a day to himself to find such work as would provide for his other needs. Porthos had accepted the bargain, and it suited him very well. He had his old doublets and cast-off cloaks recut for Mousqueton, and thanks to a clever tailor who restored the old to new by turning them inside out (and whose wife was suspected of wanting to persuade Porthos to cast his eyes on one below his station), Mousqueton served his master looking very fine indeed. As for Aramis, his lackey was called Bazin. Reflecting his master's hopes of one day entering into orders, he always dressed in black, as became the servant of a man of the Church. He was from Berry, aged between thirty-five or forty, mild, peaceable, plump, and occupied what leisure time his master left him in reading pious works. He was skilled at concocting a dinner for two even when short of provisions – the courses might be few but what was there was always excellent. Otherwise, as regarded his master's business he was deaf, dumb, blind, and of totally proven fidelity. Having met, superficially at least, the masters and their lackeys, let us pass on to their dwellings. Athos lived in the Rue Férou, a few paces from the Luxembourg; his apartment consisted of two small, well-appointed chambers in a furnished house. (The landlady, young and still quite pretty, cast amorous looks at him daily to no avail.) Here and there in this modest lodging were displayed remnants of past splendour. There was a richly damascened sword in the style of the time of François I, the hilt of which alone, encrusted as it was with precious stones, might be worth two hundred pistoles – and which, even in his moments of greatest poverty, Athos had never pawned nor sold. Porthos would have given ten years of his life for this sword, and owning it had long been one of his ambitions. One day, when he had a rendezvous with a duchess, he tried to borrow it from his friend. Athos, without saying a word, had emptied his pockets, gathered all his jewellery, coins, aiguillettes, and chains of gold into a pile, and offered it to Porthos; but as for the sword, he said, it was fixed in its place, and would go nowhere until he himself moved away. Besides the sword, Athos also had a portrait on the wall representing a noble lord dressed as in the reign of Henry III, attired in the greatest elegance, and wearing the Order of Saint-Esprit. The family resemblance to Athos indicated that this great sir, Knight of the Orders of the King, was his ancestor. In addition, a magnificent gilded coffer, displaying the same coat of arms as the sword and the portrait, stood in the middle of the mantelpiece, clashing frightfully with the rest of the interior decoration. Athos always carried the key to this coffer on him but one day he'd opened it in front of Porthos, and Porthos had noted (to his disappointment) that the coffer contained nothing but letters and papers: love letters and family documents, he supposed. Porthos lived in a very large and very sumptuous apartment on the Rue du Vieux-Colombier. Every time he passed by this apartment with one of his friends, Mousqueton would be standing at one of the windows in full livery. Porthos would raise his hand, cock his head proudly, and say, "There you see my home!" But he was never found to be at home, never invited anyone inside, and no one had ever seen this opulent apartment to report on what luxurious appointments it really contained. Aramis lived in a small ground floor apartment composed of a dressing room, a dining room, and a bedroom, the last of which opened onto a fresh little garden, green, shady, and completely hidden from the eyes of the neighbourhood. As for d'Artagnan, we know how he was lodged, and have already met his lackey, Master Planchet. D'Artagnan was by nature very curious, as people who have a genius for intrigue generally are, and he made every effort to learn who Athos, Porthos, and Aramis really were. He knew that each of these young men hid the name of a nobleman under his war name – Athos in particular who savoured of the Grand a league off – but only Sir Tréville knew their true names and qualities. D'Artagnan tried pumping Porthos for information about Athos and Aramis, and Aramis to learn about Porthos. Unfortunately, Porthos knew nothing of the former life of his silent comrade Athos except for what he'd seen personally. It was rumoured that he had suffered some great romantic misfortune, some horrible treachery that had forever poisoned the life of this gallant man. What was this treachery?

No one knew. As to Porthos, his life was easy to know. Vain and indiscreet, one could see through him as easily as through crystal. The only way one could be misled about him would be to believe what he said of himself. Aramis, on the other hand, while claiming to have no secrets, was a young man completely made of mysteries. He answered few questions and evaded any that pertained to himself. One day d'Artagnan asked about Aramis's own amorous adventures after interrogating him for a long time about Porthos and his supposed good fortune with a princess. "And you, my dear Aramis," he said to him, "what of you who speak so freely of the baronesses, countesses, and Princess of others?"

"Your pardon," interrupted Aramis, "I spoke of them only because Porthos did so himself. Rest assured, my dear d'Artagnan, that if I'd such stories from another source or if they'd been told to me in confidence, there's no confessor more discreet than I."

"I don't doubt it," replied d'Artagnan. "But it seems to me that you yourself are tolerably familiar with coats of arms – witness a certain embroidered handkerchief, to which I owe the honour of your acquaintance."

This time, Aramis wasn't offended. He assumed a modest air and said, "My dear, don't forget that I intend to join the Church, and thus abstain from all such worldly complications. That handkerchief wasn't mine, it had merely been forgotten at my house by one of my friends. I'd to recover it to prevent him and the lady he loves from being compromised. As for me, I've no mistress, nor do I want one. In that regard I follow the very judicious example of Athos."

"But, what the devil! You're not an abbot yet, you're a musketeer!"

"A musketeer only for the interim, my dear – as the cardinal says about being a minister, I'm a musketeer against my inclination but a man of the Church in my heart. Athos and Porthos are the ones who dragged me into this when I needed something to occupy my time. You see, just before I was to be ordained, I had a little difficulty with ... but that wouldn't interest you, and I'm taking up your precious time."

"By no means, that interests me a great deal," cried d'Artagnan, "and at the moment I've absolutely nothing to do."

"Perhaps so but I've my breviary to say," answered Aramis, "then some verses to compose that Madam of Combalet asked for and after that I must go to the Rue Saint-Honoré to buy some rouge for Madam of Chevreuse. So you see, my friend, that if you've nothing pressing, I do."

And Aramis offered his hand to his companion and took his leave. Despite all his efforts, d’Artagnan was unable to learn anything more about his three new friends. He decided he’d just have to believe everything that was said of their pasts and hope for more certain revelations in the future. In the meantime, he considered Athos an Achilles, Porthos an Ajax, and Aramis a Joseph. For the 4 friends, it was a good time to be alive. Athos spent a great deal of time gambling, always unluckily. Nonetheless, he never borrowed a sou from his friends, though his purse was always at their services. When he had gambled using his word as credit, he always awakened his creditor at six o’clock the next morning to pay him his debt of the night before. Porthos gambled only occasionally but when he did, he went all in. When he won, he was smug, arrogant but generous with his winnings; when he lost, he disappeared completely for several days, reappearing pale-faced and worn but with money jingling in his purse. As for Aramis, he never gambled. In fact, he was the most unsocial, least fun-loving musketeer one could ever hope to see. There was always some task he had to go attend to. Sometimes, in the middle of dinner, when conversation and honey were flowing freely, and everyone believed they still had 2 or 3 hours at the table ahead of them, Aramis would look his watch, rise with a gracious smile and bid them goodbye – going, he might say, to consult a theologian with whom he had a rendezvous. Or he might return to his lodging to write a thesis, begging his friends not to disturb him. Athos would just smile that charming, melancholy smile that so became his noble appearance, while Porthos drained his glass, and swore that Aramis would never be anything but a village curate. Planchet, d’Artagnan’s valet, seemed quite satisfied with his lot. His pay was thirty sous per day, and during that first month he was gay as a chaffinch and always affable toward his master. But when the winds of adversity began to blow on the household in the Rue des Fossoyeurs – in other words, when King Louis’s forty pistoles were finally spent – he began to make whining complaints that Athos found nauseating, Porthos indecent, and Aramis ridiculous. Athos advised d’Artagnan to dismiss the rogue, Porthos wanted to pummel him first, while Aramis stated that a master should simply ignore everything from a servant but compliments. “That’s easy for you to say,” replied d’Artagnan. “You, Athos, who live like a mute with Grimaud, who forbid him to speak, and therefore never have cross words with him; you, Porthos, who lead such a magnificent life that you’re a virtual god to your valet Mousqueton; and finally you, Aramis, who, thanks to your theological studies, inspire a profound respect in the mild and religious Bazin. I, who have neither credit nor resources, who am not yet a musketeer – let alone a guard! – what am I supposed to do to inspire affection, terror, or respect in Planchet?”

“The thing is serious,” answered Aramis.

“It’s the same with valets as it is with wives,” said Athos. “You must immediately put things on the footing where you’d like them to remain. Reflect thus.”

D’Artagnan reflected. He decided to thrash Planchet for his own good, a decision he put into effect with that conscientiousness that d’Artagnan brought to everything he did. Having thrashed him well, he forbade Planchet to quit his service without his permission. “The future is bright,” he said to him, “and better times are certain. If you stay with me, your fortune is made – and I’m much too good a master to allow you to miss your chance by letting you go, just because you ask for it.” This domestic policy of d’Artagnan’s won him a great deal of respect among his friends the musketeers. Planchet was likewise filled with admiration and spoke no more about leaving. The lives of the 4 young men had merged and become communal. D’Artagnan who had arrived from the country into the middle of a world completely new to him had no set habits and therefore fell easily into the routines of his friends. They rose around 8 in the morning in winter, 6 o’clock in summer, and went to the Hotel of Tréville to hear their daily orders and see how affairs were going. D’Artagnan, though not a musketeer, performed the duties of one with touching dedication. He was always on guard because he always kept company with whichever one of his friends was on duty. Everyone knew him at the mansion of the musketeers where he soon had the reputation of a good comrade. Sir Tréville who had appreciated him at first glance and genuinely liked him, recommended him regularly to the king. For their part, the 3 musketeers were very fond of their young comrade. The friendship that united these 4 men was such that they felt a need to see each other 3 or 4 times a day whether for a duel, business, or pleasure. The Inseparables were always running after each other like shadows, criss-crossing the Faubourg Saint-Germain, from the Palais of Luxembourg to the Place Saint-Sulpice or from the Rue du Vieux-Colombier back to the Luxembourg. Meanwhile, the promises of Sir Tréville began to become a reality. One fine day, the king commanded Sir Des Essarts to accept d’Artagnan as a cadet in his company of the royal French Guards. D’Artagnan sighing, put on his new uniform that he would have given 10 years of his life to exchange for the tabard of a musketeer. But Sir Tréville promised him that favour after service of 2 years in the guards – or less if d’Artagnan should find the opportunity to render some important service to the king or achieve some brilliant exploit. D’Artagnan consoled himself with this promise and joined the French Guards the next day. Then it was the turn of Athos, Porthos, and Aramis to mount guard with d’Artagnan when he was on duty. The day it took in d’Artagnan, the company of Sir Des Essarts thus gained 4 men instead of 1.

008 A Court Intrigue

Meanwhile, the 40 pistoles of King Louis XIII had come to an end like everything in this world and the 4 companions had fallen into financial embarrassment. For a while Athos supported them with money of his own. Porthos had succeeded him, and thanks to one of those mysterious disappearances of his, had provided for everyone’s needs for nearly a fortnight more. Then it was Aramis’s turn that he accepted with good grace; he succeeded in procuring a few pistoles by means, he said, of selling some of his theology books. Next they turned, as they usually did, to Sir Tréville, who gave them some advances on their pay. However, as they were already considerably in arrears this didn’t amount to much, and couldn’t carry three musketeers, plus a guard who had yet to be paid, very far. Finally, when they were on the verge of bankruptcy, they managed to scrape together eight or ten pistoles that Porthos took to the gaming tables. Unfortunately, his luck was out: he lost it all, plus twenty-five pistoles more on his word. Then the embarrassment became distress, and the quartet, followed by their lackeys, could be seen haunting the quays and the guard-rooms, calling on their friends for meals wherever they could – for on the advice of Aramis, when prosperous they had bestowed dinners left and right, so as to be able to call in their favours when times were hard. Athos received four such invitations, and each time brought along his friends and their lackeys. Porthos managed six, and likewise used them for the benefit of his comrades. Aramis had eight such invitations; as has already been shown, he was a man who got great results with little fuss. As for d’Artagnan, who as yet knew hardly anyone in the capital, he turned up nothing but a breakfast of chocolate from a Béarnaise priest and a dinner invitation from a cornet of the French Guards. He brought along his small army of friends to the priest’s house, where they devoured two months’ worth of the poor man’s provisions, and to the cornet’s, who outdid himself; but as Planchet said, “No matter how much you eat, you eat only one meal at a time.”

D’Artagnan was embarrassed at having provided his friends only one and a half dinners – for the breakfast at the priest’s couldn’t be counted as more than half a meal – in exchange for the feasts provided him by Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. He felt like a burden on their society, forgetting in his youthful enthusiasm that he’d fed that society for a month, and he put his wits to work to find a way to do better. It occurred to him that this coalition of four young men, all brave, enterprising, and active, ought to be able to find something more useful to do than fencing lessons, playing practical jokes, and swaggering around. In fact, four men like these, four men devoted to each other, from their purses to their very lives; four men always supporting each other, never yielding, executing alone or together their common resolutions; four arms menacing the four cardinal directions, or turning toward one point; these four, whether by covert means or overt, by mine or by trench, by ruse or by force, must inevitably make for themselves a road to any goal, no matter how well defended or how distant. The only thing that astonished d’Artagnan was that his companions had never thought of this before. He was sure that this fourfold force, like Archimedes’ lever, might lift the world if used properly. He was mulling over this idea, racking his brains for an objective, when someone rapped lightly on the door. D’Artagnan awakened Planchet and sent him to open it. Please note that the phrase: D’Artagnan awakened Planchet should not be taken to indicate that it was night or that the day had not yet begun. On the contrary: the church bells had just sounded four in the afternoon. Planchet, two hours earlier, had asked his master for dinner, and d’Artagnan had responded with the proverb, “Who sleeps, eats.”

So Planchet had been eating by sleeping. Planchet returned to introduce a man humble in appearance and with the air of a bourgeois, a person of the middle class. For his dessert, Planchet would have liked to listen in on the conversation but the bourgeois declared that what he had to say was important and confidential, so he preferred to speak to d’Artagnan alone. D’Artagnan therefore dismissed Planchet and offered his visitor a seat. There was a moment of silence during which the two men discreetly sized each other up, then d’Artagnan bowed and indicated he was ready to listen.

“I’ve heard it said that Sir d’Artagnan is a very brave young man,” began the bourgeois, “and this reputation, doubtless well earned, led me to decide to confide in you.”

“Speak, Sir, speak,” said d’Artagnan who instinctively scented something to his advantage.

The bourgeois paused once more, then continued, “My wife is a linen maid in the queen’s household, Sir, and she lacks neither wisdom nor beauty. I married her three years ago, though she had only a small dowry, because Sir La Porte, the queen’s cloak bearer, is her godfather and protector...”

“Well, Sir?” asked d’Artagnan.

“Well,” replied the bourgeois, “well, Sir: my wife was abducted yesterday morning, as she was leaving her workroom.”

“And who abducted her?”

“I know nothing for sure, Sir – but I suspect someone.”

“And who is this person you suspect?”

“A man who has pursued her for some time.”

“The devil!”

“But let me say, Sir,” continued the bourgeois, “that I’m convinced there’s less of love than of politics in this.”

“Less love than politics,” repeated d’Artagnan thoughtfully, “and what do you suspect?”

“I don’t know if I should tell you what I suspect...”

“Sir, allow me to point out that I have asked you absolutely nothing. It’s you who’ve come to me, you who said you had a secret to confide. Do as you please – stop now, if that’s what you want.”

“No, Sir, no; you seem to be an honest young man and I’ve confidence in you. Let me say I believe that it’s not because of my wife’s amours that she was arrested but because of those of a much greater lady than she.”

“Ah! Do you speak of Madam of Bois-Tracy?” said d’Artagnan who wanted to give the bourgeois the impression that he was well up on affairs at Court.

“Much higher, Sir, much higher.”

“Of Madam of Combalet?”

“Higher yet.”

“Of Madam of Chevreuse?”

“Higher, much higher!”

“Of the...” d’Artagnan stopped himself.

“Yes, Sir,” the bourgeois whispered.

“And with whom?”

“With whom could it be if not with the Duke of...?”

“The Duke of ...!”

“Yes, Sir!” whispered the bourgeois even lower.

“But how do you know all this?”

“You ask how do I know this?”

“Yes, how do you know this? And no half-truths, understand?”

“I got it from my wife, Sir – from my wife herself.”

“And who does she get it from?”

“From Sir La Porte. Didn’t I tell you she was the goddaughter of La Porte, the queen’s confidential valet? Well, Sir La Porte had placed her near to Her Majesty so our poor queen would have at least one person she could confide in, since she’s abandoned by the king, spied on by the cardinal, and betrayed by everyone.”

“Ah! I begin to get the picture,” said d’Artagnan.

“Now, my wife came home four days ago, Sir. One of the conditions of her job is that she be allowed to come see me twice a week; for, as I had the honour to tell you, my wife loves me dearly. Anyway, on my wife’s last visit she told me that the queen is exceedingly anxious.”

“Indeed!”

“Yes. It seems Your Eminence pursues her and persecutes her more than ever. He can’t forgive her for the episode of the Sarabande. You know about the episode of the Sarabande?”

“Know it? I should say so!” replied d’Artagnan, who knew nothing whatsoever but wanted to have the air of being au courant.

“So that now, you see, his persecution is more than just a matter of hate – it’s a matter of revenge.”

“Truly?”

“And the queen believes...”

“Yes, yes – what does the queen believe?”

“She believes someone has written to Sir the Duke of Buckingham in her name.”

“In the queen’s name?”

“Yes, to make him come to Paris – and once he arrives, to draw him into a trap.”

“The devil! But your wife, my dear Sir, what does she have to do with all this?”

“Everyone knows of her devotion to the queen so they want to separate her from her mistress or frighten her into revealing Her Majesty’s secrets, or maybe seduce her into serving them as a spy.”

“Yes, that’s probably right,” said d’Artagnan. “But the man who abducted her, do you know him?”

“As I said, I believe I know him.”

“His name?”

“That I don’t know; all I know is that he’s a creature of the cardinal, one of his right-hand henchmen.”

“But you’ve seen him?”

“Yes, my wife pointed him out to me one day.”

“Is there anything special about him? How would I recognise him?”

“That’s easily done! He’s a haughty-looking noble, with black hair, a brown or tan complexion, white teeth, eyes that look right through you, and a scar on the temple.”

“A scar on his temple, black hair, a dark complexion, white teeth, piercing eyes, and arrogant,” cried d’Artagnan. “That’s my man of Meung!”

“What do you mean, that’s your man?”

“He must be – but that has nothing to do with it. No, wait, I’m wrong, it simplifies things immensely: if your man is my man, then with one blow I’ll avenge us both! But where can I find him?”

“As to that, I know nothing.”

“You have no idea where he lives?”

“None! One day, as I was walking my wife back to the Louvre, he was coming out as she was going in, and she pointed him out to me.”

“The devil! The devil!” murmured d’Artagnan. “This is all so vague. How did you learn that your wife had been carried off?”

“From Sir La Porte.”

“Did he give you any details?”

“He didn’t know any.”

“And you’ve learned nothing from anywhere else?”

“Well, yes, I’ve received...”

“What?”

“Oh ... it would be rash, reckless of me to tell you!”

“You keep coming back to that. Isn’t it a little late to retreat?”

“And I won’t retreat. God!” cried the bourgeois, swearing to keep his courage up. “Besides, by the faith of Bonacieux...”

“You’re called Bonacieux?” interrupted d’Artagnan.

“Yes, that’s my name.”

“Pardon me for interrupting you but that name seems familiar to me.”

“Ah!” said d’Artagnan, half rising and bowing. “You’re my landlord?”

“Yes, Sir, yes. And as it’s been three months since you came to my house, and since, distracted no doubt by your important affairs, you’ve forgotten to pay me my rent; since, I must point out, I’ve not harassed you once about it, I thought you might be appreciative of my restraint.”

“Why, my dear Sir Bonacieux!” replied d’Artagnan, “Rest assured that I very much appreciate your tact in this matter, and that if there’s anything I can do for you...”

“I believe you, Sir, I believe you, and as I was about to say, by the faith of Bonacieux, I have full confidence in you.”

“Let’s hear the rest of it, then.”

Bonacieux took a paper from his pocket and presented it to d’Artagnan. “A letter!” said the young man.

“I received it this morning.”

D’Artagnan opened it, and as the light was beginning to dim, he approached the window. The bourgeois followed him. ““Don’t search for your wife,”” read d’Artagnan. ““She will be returned when there is no more need for her. If you take a single step to recover her, you are lost.”” Nothing vague about that,” continued d’Artagnan, “but after all, it’s only a threat.”

“Yes but that threat terrifies me. I, Sir, am no man of the sword, and I fear the Bastille.”

“Hmm!” said d’Artagnan. “I don’t care for the Bastille any more than you. If it were only a matter of a sword fight, I’d venture it.”

“But, Sir, I’ve been counting on you.”

“You have?”

“Yes! I’ve seen you so often surrounded by proud musketeers, and I know these musketeers belong to Sir Tréville, so they’re enemies of the cardinal. I thought that you and your friends, while serving our poor queen, would be delighted to do a disservice to His Eminence.”

“No doubt.”

“And then I thought that, as you owe me three months’ rent that I’ve never mentioned...”

“Yes, yes, you’ve already given me that reason, and I think it’s an excellent one.”

“And I was further reckoning that as long as you do me the honour to remain in my house, I would never mention your rent again...”

“Most generous!”

“And on top of this – if I must – I thought to offer you fifty pistoles if, against all probability, you should find yourself short at the moment.”

“A happy thought! But you are rich then, my dear Sir Bonacieux?”

“I’m comfortable, Sir – comfortable is the word for it. The textile business brings in something like two or three thousand crowns a year, and I profited by investing in the final voyage of the celebrated navigator, Jean Mocquet, so that ... but wait a moment!” cried the bourgeois.

“What?” demanded d’Artagnan.

“There! Do you see him?”

“Where?”

“Across the street, in that doorway: a man wrapped in a cloak.”

“By God! This time,” cried d’Artagnan, grabbing his sword, “he won’t escape me!”

And drawing his sword from its scabbard, he rushed out of the apartment. On the staircase he met Athos and Porthos who were on their way up to see him. They split left and right, and d’Artagnan darted between them. “Ah it!” bellowed Porthos. “Where do you think you’re going?”

“The man of Meung!” cried d’Artagnan as he disappeared. D’Artagnan had more than once told his friends about his adventure with the stranger in Meung, and the stranger’s meeting with the beautiful traveller in which he’d appeared to confide an important mission to her. It was Athos’s opinion that d’Artagnan had lost his letter in the scuffle. A gentleman, he said – and, based on d’Artagnan’s description of the stranger, he must have been a gentleman – a gentleman would be incapable of such a base act as stealing a letter. Porthos had seen nothing in the story but an amorous rendezvous between a lady and a cavalier, a meeting that had been disrupted by the appearance of d’Artagnan with his yellow horse. Aramis had said that these sorts of things were always mysterious, and it was best not to sift through them. Athos and Porthos understood, then, from d’Artagnan’s brief explanation, that this was the matter at hand. They assumed that after either overtaking his man or losing sight of him d’Artagnan would return home, so they continued up the stairs. When they entered d’Artagnan’s chamber, they found it empty. Afraid of what would happen when the young man caught the stranger, and in accord with how he’d described his own character, the landlord had thought it high time to make himself scarce.

D’Artagnan Begins to Show Himself

D’Artagnan returned after half an hour as Athos and Porthos expected. Once again he had lost the stranger who had disappeared seemingly as if by magic. D’Artagnan had run through all the neighbouring streets, sword in hand but had found no one who resembled his man of Meung. Then he finally did what he probably should have done in the first place and knocked at the doorway where he had seen the stranger standing. After he pounded on the door-knocker 10 or 12 times without an answer, a neighbour stuck his head out his window, attracted by the commotion and told d’Artagnan that the house had been closed up and empty for 6 months. While d’Artagnan was running through the streets and knocking on doors, Aramis had joined his 2 companions at his lodging so when he returned home d’Artagnan found their society was complete. “Well?” said the 3 musketeers together as d’Artagnan entered, dripping with sweat and livid with anger. “Well!” he cried as he threw his sword on the bed. “This man’s the devil himself. He’s disappeared like a phantom – shadow – spectre!”

“Do you believe in ghosts?” Athos asked Porthos.

Porthos shrugged. “I don’t believe in what I’ve not seen and since I’ve never seen a ghost, I don’t believe in them.”

“The Bible requires us to believe in them,” said Aramis. “The shade of Samuel appeared to Saul, you know. I’d be sorry to see you cast doubt on such an article of faith, Porthos.”

“In any case, man or devil, illusion or reality, this man’s born to be my nemesis,” d’Artagnan said. “His escape’s cost us a lovely piece of business, Gentlemen, an affair worth as much as a hundred pistoles – maybe more.”

“How’s that?” said Porthos and Aramis at the same time.

Athos merely interrogated d’Artagnan with a look, laconic as always. “Planchet,” said d’Artagnan to his servant who was eavesdropping just outside the half-open door, “go down to my landlord, Sir Bonacieux, and tell him to send up a half-dozen bottles of Monuca honey; it’s my favourite.”

“Oh ho! So you have open credit with your landlord?” asked Porthos.

“Yes,” answered d’Artagnan, “a standing account as of today, and believe me, if the honey is bad, we’ll send for him to find a better one.”

“One must use and not abuse,” said Aramis sententiously.

“I always said that d’Artagnan had the most wits of any of us,” stated Athos.

D’Artagnan acknowledged this compliment with a bow and Athos returned to his accustomed silence. “But see here, what is all this about?” asked Porthos.

“Yes,” said Aramis, “let us in on the secret, my dear friend – unless the honour of some lady’s involved, in which case you’d best keep it to yourself.”

“Don’t worry,” said d’Artagnan, “no one’s honour’s compromised in what I’ve to tell you.”

He related word for word the conversation between him and his host and his conviction that the man who had carried off his landlord’s wife was identical with the stranger he’d crossed swords with at the Inn of the Jolly Miller. “Your affair shows promise,” said Athos after tasting the honey like a connoisseur and nodding his approval, “and one might perhaps extract from this valiant mercer as much as fifty or sixty pistoles. But are fifty or sixty pistoles worth the risk of four heads?”

“Don’t forget there’s a woman in this affair,” said d’Artagnan, “a woman abducted, endangered, maybe tortured, and all because she’s loyal to her mistress!”

“Take care, d’Artagnan, take care,” said Aramis. “You’re allowing yourself to be caught up in the fate of this Madam Bonacieux. Woman’s created for our ruin and from her come all our miseries.”

At these words, Athos knit his brow and gnawed his lips. “You mistake me,” said d’Artagnan. “It’s not Madam Bonacieux I’m concerned about but rather the queen whom the king abandons, the cardinal persecutes, and who must look on as the heads of her friends fall, one by one.”

“Why must she love what we hate the most in the world, the Spanish and the English?” said Porthos.

“Spain’s her homeland,” said d’Artagnan simply. “It’s only natural she’d love the Spanish who are children of the same soil as she. As to your second reproach, I’ve heard that it’s not the English she loves but an Englishman.”

“Aye! My faith,” said Athos, “I must say this Englishman’s worthy of being loved. I’ve never seen one with a grander and nobler air than he has.”

“Not to mention that he dresses like no one else,” said Porthos. “I was at the Louvre the day he scattered his pearls and by God! I grabbed up two that I sold for ten pistoles apiece. What about you, Aramis – do you know him?”

“As well as you, gentlemen, for I was among those who arrested him in the garden at Amiens where I was introduced by Sir Putanges, the queen’s equerry. I was just out of seminary at the time; it seemed to me the episode must’ve been very cruel for the king.”

“Nonetheless,” said d’Artagnan, “if I knew where the Duke of Buckingham was, I’d gladly take him by the hand and conduct him to the queen if only to spite the cardinal; for our true, only, eternal enemy, gentlemen, is the cardinal, and if we can find a way to play him a nasty trick, I confess that I’d happily risk my head.”

Athos looked thoughtful. “Didn’t the mercer tell you, d’Artagnan, that the queen believed someone sought to summon Buckingham by a forged message?”

“So she fears.”

“Wait a moment,” said Aramis.

“What?” asked Porthos.

“Carry on – I’m trying to remember something that might be relevant.”

D’Artagnan said, “I’m convinced that this abduction of the queen’s woman is connected with this possible presence of Sir Buckingham in Paris.”

“The Gascon is full of ideas,” said Porthos with admiration.

“I like to hear him talk,” said Athos. “His accent amuses me.”

“Gentlemen,” interrupted Aramis, “listen to this.”

“We’re listening,” said his 3 friends.

“Yesterday I found myself at the house of a doctor of theology whom I sometimes consult for my studies...” Athos smiled. “He lives in a quiet neighbourhood,” continued Aramis. “His tastes and his profession require it. Now just as I was leaving his house...”

Here Aramis stopped. “Well?” demanded Porthos. “At the moment you’re leaving his house?”

Aramis looked uncertain like a man who runs into an unexpected complication in the middle of telling a lie; but the eyes and ears of his 3 companions were on him and there was no way to retreat.

“Ah! He’s a niece,” said Porthos with satisfaction.

“A very respectable lady!” said Aramis.

The 3 friends began to laugh. “God! If you laugh or doubt me, I’ll tell you nothing,” said Aramis.

Athos half-bowed and said, “We believe like loyal Muslims and are as mute as catafalques.”

“Then I continue,” sniffed Aramis. “This niece sometimes visits her uncle. I found her there yesterday by chance and could do no less than offer to conduct her to her carriage.”

“Ah! She has a carriage, this doctor’s niece?” interrupted Porthos, one of whose faults was an inability to keep his mouth shut. “She’s well-connected then. Not bad, my friend!”

“Porthos,” replied Aramis, “I’ve already had to observe more than once that you’re very indiscreet and it damages your reputation among the ladies.”

“Gentlemen, gentlemen,” cried d’Artagnan who began to see where this was going, “the thing’s serious! Can we leave out the jokes? Go on, Aramis, go on.”

“We’re accosted by a tall, dark man with the manners of a gentleman – a man much like yours, it seems, d’Artagnan.”

“The same perhaps!” he said.

“It’s possible,” continued Aramis. “He approached me, accompanied by five or six men who followed ten paces behind him. In the most polite tone, he said, ‘Sir Duke and you, Madam,’ addressing the lady who had taken my arm...”

“The doctor’s niece?”

“Silence, Porthos!” said Athos. “You’re insupportable.”

“The man continued, ‘I must request you to enter my carriage, and to do so without making the least noise or resistance.’”

“He took you for Buckingham!” cried d’Artagnan.

“So I believe,” replied Aramis.

“But the lady?” asked Porthos.

“He took her for the queen!” said d’Artagnan.

“Just so,” responded Aramis.

“The Gascon’s the devil!” said Athos. “Nothing escapes him.”

“In fact,” said Porthos, “Aramis’s the same height as Buckingham and shaped much like the handsome duke; but still, it seems to me that in the outfit of a musketeer...”

“I wore a very large cloak,” said Aramis.

“In early September? The devil!” said Porthos. “Is this doctor afraid you might be recognised?”

Athos shook his head. “I can see how the spy’s taken in by the figure but the face...”

“I had a very large hat,” said Aramis.

“My God,” laughed Porthos, “what precautions for studying theology!”

“Gentlemen, gentlemen,” said d’Artagnan, “these jokes just waste time. Let’s scatter and search for the mercer’s wife. She’s the key to this intrigue.”

“A woman of such inferior rank! Do you really believe that, d’Artagnan?” said Porthos, curling his lip with contempt.

“Haven’t I told you? She’s the goddaughter of La Porte, the queen’s confidential valet. For all we know, Her Majesty may be deliberately relying on a person of low station. Higher heads are more visible and the cardinal’s good eyes.”

“All right,” said Porthos. “Then set a price with this mercer, and a good one.”

“Don’t worry about him,” said d’Artagnan. “I have a feeling our reward will come from other hands than his.”

Suddenly footsteps came pounding up the stairs, the door opened with a crash, and the hapless mercer dashed into the chamber where the musketeers were taking counsel. “Gentlemen!” he cried.

“Save me, in the name of heaven, save me! There’re four men who’ve come to arrest me! Save me, save me!”

Porthos and Aramis leaped up. “Wait!” cried d’Artagnan. “Put up your swords! It’s not courage we need here, it’s prudence.”

“But, really,” protested Porthos, “we can’t just let them...”

“You’ll listen to d’Artagnan on this,” said Athos. “I say again, he has the sharpest wits of all of us, and I fully intend to follow his lead. Do as you will, d’Artagnan.”

At this moment, four city guards appeared at the door of the antechamber. Seeing four musketeers with their swords at their sides, they hesitated to come any further. “Enter, Gentlemen, enter,” cried d’Artagnan. “You’re welcome in my house; we’re all loyal servants of the king and Your Eminence.”

“Then, gentlemen, you’ll not oppose the execution of our orders?” asked the one who appeared to be the leader of the squad.

“On the contrary, gentlemen, we’re ready to lend a hand, if needed.”

“What did he say?” muttered Porthos.

“You’re a simpleton,” said Athos. “Silence!”

“But you promised me...” whimpered the poor mercer.

“We can’t save you unless we remain at liberty,” d’Artagnan said rapidly in a low voice. “If we appear to defend you, we’ll be arrested as well.”

“Yes but it seems to me...”

“Come in, Gentlemen, come in,” said d’Artagnan loudly. “I have no reason to defend sir. I’ve seen him today for the first time, and as for why, he can tell you himself: he came to collect my rent. Isn’t that so, Sir Bonacieux? Answer!”

“That’s the honest truth,” cried the mercer, “but sir doesn’t tell you...”

“Silence about me, about my friends, and about the queen above all, or you’re so lost that no one can save you,” d’Artagnan hissed. “Come, come, Gentlemen, take this man away!”

And d’Artagnan pushed the stunned mercer into the hands of the guards, while saying to him, “You’re a scoundrel, my dear. You, come to demand money of me – of me! Of a musketeer! To prison, Gentlemen! I say again, take him to prison, and keep him under lock and key as long as possible. That will give me time to pay his miserable debt.”

The city guards overwhelmed them with thanks. As they began to lead away their trembling prey, d’Artagnan clapped the squad leader’s shoulder. “Won’t you join me in a drink?” he said, filling two glasses of the Monuca honey he had from the generosity of Sir Bonacieux.

“It would be an honour for me,” said the squad leader, “and I accept with gratitude.”

“Then, to your health, Sir ... how are you named?”

“Boisrenard.”

“Sir Boisrenard!”

“To your health, my gentleman. And how’re you named if you please?”

“D’Artagnan.”

“To yours, Sir d’Artagnan!”

“And above all others,” cried d’Artagnan, as if carried away with enthusiasm, “to that of the king and the cardinal.”

The squad leader might have doubted d’Artagnan’s sincerity if the honey had been bad; but the honey was good, so he was convinced. “What devilish villainy was that?” said Porthos, once the squad leader had rejoined his companions and the four friends found themselves alone. “The shame of it! Four musketeers allow an unfortunate man who asked for aid to be arrested from among them! And then, worst of all, for a gentleman to raise a glass with a mere bailiff!”

“Porthos,” said Aramis, “Athos has already told you that you’re a simpleton, and I agree with him. D’Artagnan, you’re a great man, and when you occupy Sir Tréville’s place, I’ll ask for your influence to get me an abbey.”

“I’m completely lost,” said Porthos. “You mean you approve of what d’Artagnan’s done?”

“For God’s sake! I should think so!” said Athos. “Not only do I approve of what he’s done, I congratulate him on it.”

“And now, Gentlemen,” said d’Artagnan, without bothering to explain his conduct to Porthos, “all for one, and one for all – that’s our motto, isn’t it?”

“But...” said Porthos.

“Extend your hand and swear!” cried Athos and Aramis at the same time.

Bowing under pressure but still muttering to himself, Porthos extended his hand, and the four friends repeated in one voice the slogan dictated by d’Artagnan: “All for one, and one for all.”

“Good! Now let’s all retire to our homes,” said d’Artagnan as if he’d done nothing but command all his life. “But beware! For from this moment on, we’re at odds with the cardinal!”

A 17TH Century Mousetrap

The mousetrap is no recent invention. When the earliest societies had a need for security, they invented the police – and the police, in turn, invented mousetraps. But the reader may be unfamiliar with police jargon, so it would be best to explain. When the resident of a house is arrested for a crime that arrest is kept secret, and four or five men are quietly placed inside the house. When someone knocks on the door, he is admitted – and arrested. In this way the police can lay their hands on all the habitués of a house within two or three days. And that is a mousetrap. They'd made a mousetrap of Master Bonacieux's apartment, and anyone who entered was taken and interrogated by the cardinal's people. A private entrance and staircase led to the first floor apartment where d'Artagnan lived, so he could receive visitors without fear of their arrest. In any event, his three musketeer friends were his only visitors. They'd each undertaken their own quest for information about the missing Madam Bonacieux but had found and discovered nothing. Athos had even gone so far as to question Sir Tréville that had surprised the captain, given the habitual reticence of his worthy musketeer. But Tréville knew nothing: only that, the last time he'd seen the cardinal, the king, and the queen, the cardinal was preoccupied, the king looked nervous, and the queen's red eyes showed she'd spent the night either wakeful or crying. This last didn't count for much, as the queen, since her marriage, had often cried or lain awake. Tréville just reminded Athos of his duty to the king, and moreover to the queen, and asked him to make the same recommendation to his comrades. As for d'Artagnan, he had converted his chamber into an observation post and never left his house. From the windows he watched all those who arrived downstairs and were taken. He'd removed several tiles from his floor and pried up the plank beneath, so only a thin ceiling separated him from the chamber below. When the bailiffs interrogated their prisoners, he heard everything that passed between the inquisitors and the accused. After a thorough search of the person arrested, the interrogations almost always began with the following questions: "Has Madam Bonacieux sent anything to you for her husband or any other person?"

"Has Sir Bonacieux sent anything to you for his wife or any other person?"

"Has either of them confided anything to you by word of mouth?"

"If they knew anything definite, they wouldn't be asking these questions," d'Artagnan said to himself. "Now, what is it they want to know? They want to know if the Duke of Buckingham is in Paris, and if he has set up an interview with the queen."

D'Artagnan was quite taken with this idea that seemed to him quite likely, based on what he'd heard. Meanwhile, the mousetrap continued, and so did the vigilance of d'Artagnan. On the evening of the day after the arrest of poor Bonacieux, as the bells of Saint-Sulpice began to toll nine o'clock, Athos had just left d'Artagnan to go call on Sir Tréville, and Planchet was beginning his nightly task of making the bed. D'Artagnan heard a knock on the street door below, followed by the sound of the door opening, then immediately closing again. Someone was taken in the mousetrap. D'Artagnan sprang to his eavesdropping post, lay down on the floor and listened. He heard cries, then groans that someone tried to stifle. There was no sign of an interrogation. "The devil!" said d'Artagnan to himself. "It seems to me this must be the missing wife. They're searching her but she's resisting ... they're using force! The dogs!"

D'Artagnan could hardly restrain himself from racing downstairs to her rescue, despite his resolutions of prudence. "Why won't you listen?" cried the unfortunate woman. "I tell you I'm Madam Bonacieux, the mistress of the house! I belong to the queen!"

"Madam Bonacieux! I was right!" murmured d'Artagnan. "Am I so lucky as to have found the woman everyone's looking for?"

The thought was immediately confirmed: "This is the woman we've been waiting for," said one of the bailiffs. She tried to speak again but her voice was muffled. Thuds and crashes echoed from the walls, indicating the victim was resisting as well as a single woman could resist four men. D'Artagnan heard her say, "Ah! No, gentlemen! Plea..." before her voice was reduced to inarticulate sounds. "They're gagging her! They're going to carry her off," cried d'Artagnan, and straightened like an unstrung bow. "My sword! Good, it's at my side. Planchet!"

"Sir?"

"Run and find Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. One of them must be at home, maybe all of them. They must grab their weapons and come here as fast as they can. No, wait – Athos is at Sir Tréville's."

"But where are you going, Sir, where are you going?"

"Out the window! It's quickest. You, put back the tiles, sweep the floor, run out the door, and do what I said."

"Oh! Sir, Sir, you're going to kill yourself," cried Planchet.

"Be quiet, you idiot," said d'Artagnan. And grabbing hold of the windowsill, he clambered out and let himself drop from the first floor. Fortunately this was no great height, so he landed without mishap. He immediately went to knock on Bonacieux's door, thinking, I'll catch myself in this mousetrap, and woe to any cats who try to pounce on a mouse like me.

At the sound of the door-knocker, the tumult inside ceased. Footsteps approached, the door opened, and d'Artagnan, with naked sword, launched himself into Master Bonacieux's front room. The door, attached to a spring, closed itself behind him. Then those neighbours who lived near the unfortunate house of Bonacieux heard shouts, stamping, a clash of swords, and a prolonged shattering of furniture. The ones who went to their windows to learn the cause of this commotion were rewarded with the sight of the door opening to emit four men in black clothes. They didn't so much run out as fly, like frightened crows, leaving shreds of their black plumage on the ground and on the corners of the furniture that came hurtling after them. D'Artagnan was victorious – without too much trouble, it must be said, for only one of the bailiffs had been armed, and he'd defended himself solely for form's sake. The other three had tried to knock d'Artagnan down with chairs, stools, and hurled pots but two or three scratches from the Gascon's sword put an end to that. A few moments after he'd entered, d'Artagnan was sole master of the field of battle. The neighbours, who had opened their windows with the sangfroid usual to Parisians in those times of perpetual riots and street brawls, closed them again when they saw the four black-clad men in flight, since it appeared, for the moment, that all was over. Besides, it was getting late, and then as now they went to sleep early in the quarter of the Luxembourg. D'Artagnan was now alone with Madam Bonacieux, and he turned to assist her. The poor woman had collapsed onto an armchair, half-fainting. D'Artagnan took her in at a glance. She was a charming woman, aged twenty-five or twenty-six, a brunette with blue eyes, a nose slightly retroussé, beautiful teeth, and a complexion of rose and opal. However, that was the limit of any resemblance between the mercer's wife and a lady of high rank. Her hands were white but not delicate, and her feet didn't bespeak a woman of quality. Fortunately, d'Artagnan wasn't yet aware of such details. As d'Artagnan examined Madam Bonacieux, he saw on the floor near her feet a fine batiste handkerchief. He automatically picked it up, and noted on one corner the same cipher he'd seen on the fallen handkerchief that had nearly set him and Aramis at each other's throats. Since then, d'Artagnan had been suspicious of handkerchiefs bearing coats of arms, so without saying a word he replaced it in Madam Bonacieux's pocket. At that light touch, Madam Bonacieux regained her senses. She opened her eyes and looked around her, terrified but saw only her apartment, and that she was alone with her liberator. She immediately held out her hands to him and smiled. And Madam Bonacieux had the most charming smile in the world. "Ah! Sir!" she said. "You've saved me. Permit me to thank you."

"Madam," said d'Artagnan, "I did only what any gentleman would do in my place. You owe me no thanks."

"I do, Sir, I do, and I hope to prove to you that I'm not ungrateful. But what did those men want with me? I thought at first they were robbers! And why isn't Sir Bonacieux here?"

"Madam, those men are far more dangerous than robbers. They're agents of Your Eminence. As for your husband, he's not here because yesterday he was taken to the Bastille."

"My husband, in the Bastille!" cried Madam Bonacieux. "Oh, my God! What did he do? The poor, dear man! He's innocence itself!"

And something like a smile touched the face of the still fearful young woman. "What did he do, Madam?" said d'Artagnan. "I believe his only crime is to have the simultaneous good and bad fortune to be your husband."

"But, Sir, you know then..."

"I know that you've been abducted, Madam."

"But by whom? Do you know? Oh! If you know, tell me!"

"By a man aged forty to forty-five, with black hair, a dark complexion, and a scar on his left temple."

"That's him, that's him! But his name?"

"That I can't tell you."

"And my husband knew I'd been abducted?"

"He was informed of it by a letter from the scoundrel himself."

"And does he suspect what was behind it?" asked Madam Bonacieux with some embarrassment.

"I believe he thought it was politics."

"I agree with him – that's what I've thought from the first. So dear Sir Bonacieux hasn't suspected me for an instant of...?"

"Oh, far from that, Madam. He's proud of your talents, and even more so of your love."

A second barely perceptible smile flickered across the rosy lips of the pretty young woman. "But how did you get away?" continued d'Artagnan.

"I was certain from this morning as to why I'd been carried off, so I took advantage of a moment when they left me alone to use the drapes to climb down from the window. I thought my husband would be at home, so I rushed here first."

"To put yourself under his protection?"

"Oh, no! Poor dear man, I know quite well he's incapable of defending me; but there was another way he could help, and I wanted to tell him of it."

"What's that?"

"I can't tell you. It's not my secret."

"In any case, this is hardly the place to share secrets," said d'Artagnan. "The men I chased off will be back with reinforcements, and if they find us here, we're lost. I've sent for three of my friends but who knows if they'll be at home?"

"Yes, yes, you're right." Madam Bonacieux shuddered, frightened anew. "We must go!" She took d'Artagnan's arm and pulled him toward the door.

"Yes but go where?" said d'Artagnan. "Where would we be safe?"

"First let's get far from this house, and then we'll see." So the young woman and the young man left, without even bothering to close the door. They went down into the Rue des Fossoyeurs, hurried along the Rue of Vaugiard to the Rue des Fossés-Sir-le-Prince, and didn't stop until they'd circled back around to the Place Saint-Sulpice. "Now what?" asked d'Artagnan, "Is there some place you'd like me to conduct you?"

"I wish I knew," said Madam Bonacieux. "I'd intended to send my husband to tell Sir La Porte what had happened. I need to know what's taken place in the Louvre in the last three days, and whether it's safe for me to go there."

"Well, I can certainly go to inform Sir La Porte," said d'Artagnan.

"You could but unfortunately, while they know Sir Bonacieux at the Louvre and would let him pass, they don't know you. They'd shut the door on you."

D'Artagnan smiled. "Don't tell me there isn't some postern gate at the Louvre where there's a concierge who's devoted to you, and who will respond to a password."

Madam Bonacieux looked searchingly at the young man. "And if that's so, and I give you this password, will you immediately forget it once it's been used?"

"Word of honour, faith of a gentleman!" said d'Artagnan with a ring of truth that convinced the young woman.

"Take it then; I believe you," she said. "You have the air of a brave young man, and maybe you'll be lucky enough to find a reward for such devotion."

"Reward or no, I'll do everything in good conscience that I can do to serve the king and help the queen," said d'Artagnan. "Regard me as a friend, and put me to use."

"But me – where shall I go in the meantime?"

"Is there some friend's house where you can stay until Sir La Porte sends for you?"

"No. I can trust no one."

"Wait," said d'Artagnan, "we're almost at Athos's door. Yes, that's it."

"Who is Athos?"

"One of my friends."

"But what if he's home, and sees me?"

"He's not home, and anyway, I'll take the key away with me once you've entered his apartment."

"But what if he returns?"

"He won't return; but if he does, I'll arrange to have him told that I brought a woman for a visit, and that she's in his rooms."

"But that will compromise me terribly!"

"What does that matter at this point? No one here knows you, and in our situation, we're going to have to put up with an inconvenience or two."

"Then let's go to your friend's house. Where does he live?"

"Rue Férou, two steps from here."

"Come on."

And the pair resumed their course. As d'Artagnan had foreseen, Athos wasn't home. He took the key that was customarily given to him as a friend of the household, climbed the stairs, and introduced Madam Bonacieux into that small apartment that has already been described. "Make yourself at home," he said. "When I leave, lock the door from the inside and open it to no one, unless you hear three knocks, like this."

He knocked three times, two rather hard taps close together, followed after a pause by a final light tap. "I have it," said Madam Bonacieux. "Now, it's my turn to give you my instructions."

"I'm listening."

"Present yourself at the postern of the Louvre on the Quai of l'École side and ask for Germain."

"Very well. After that?"

"He'll ask you what you want, and you'll answer with these words: 'Tours and Brussels.' That will put him at your orders."

"And what do I order him to do?"

"To go look for Sir La Porte, the queen's valet."

"And when he's found him and Sir La Porte has come?"

"You will send him to me."

"That's fine – but where and how will I see you again?"

"Do you want to see me again?"

"Very much!"

"Well, leave that in my care, and rest easy."

"I can count on your word?"

"You can count on it."

D'Artagnan bowed to Madam Bonacieux, fixing the most amorous look he could on her charming petite person. As he descended the stairs, he heard the door close behind him and the double turn of the lock. In two bounds he was at the Louvre: as he entered the postern of l'École, ten o'clock was sounding. All the events so far related had occurred in a single hour. Everything turned out as predicted by Madam Bonacieux. At the password, Germain bowed, and ten minutes later, La Porte was at the gatehouse. In a few words, d'Artagnan conveyed what had happened, and where Madam Bonacieux was to be found. La Porte made sure of the address by having d'Artagnan repeat it twice, then left at a run. However, he'd gone barely ten paces before he returned. "Young man," he said to d'Artagnan, "some advice for you."

"Which is?"

"There could be trouble for you over these events."

"You believe so?"

"Yes. Do you have some friend whose clock runs slow?"

"Perhaps. What then?"

"Go see him, so he can be a witness that you were at his house at half-past nine. In the law, that's called an alibi."

D'Artagnan found this advice sensible. He took to his heels and hurried to the Hôtel de Tréville. Instead of passing through the antechamber with everyone else, he asked to enter through Sir Tréville's study. As d'Artagnan was one of the habitués of the hôtel, no one saw any difficulty about this. A footman went to inform the captain that his young countryman had something important to say to him and desired a private audience. Five minutes later, Sir Tréville entered the study. He asked d'Artagnan what he could do for him, and what brought him to visit at such a late hour. "Your pardon, Sir!" said d'Artagnan, who had used his time alone in the room to turn back the hands of the clock by three-quarters of an hour. "I thought that, since it's only twenty-five past nine, I had plenty of time."

"Twenty-five past nine!" said Sir Tréville, looking at his clock. "But that's impossible!"

"Just see, Sir," said d'Artagnan.

"So it is," said Tréville. "I'd have thought it was later. Well, then, what'd you have of me?" D'Artagnan launched into a long story about the queen, recounting his worries about Her Majesty, and relating what he'd heard about the cardinal's plans for the Duke of Buckingham. It was all told with a self-possession and aplomb that quite convinced Sir Tréville of his sincerity, the more so since Tréville himself had remarked that there was something fresh going on between the cardinal, the king, and the queen. As the clock struck ten, Sir Tréville thanked d'Artagnan for his information, reminded him to keep always at heart the service of the king and queen, and then returned to his salon. D'Artagnan took his leave but at the foot of the stairs, he told the guard on duty that he'd forgotten his cane. He ran back up, re-entered the study, and with a turn of his finger set the clock back to its proper time. Certain now that no one would notice it had been disturbed, and that he had a witness to prove his alibi, he descended the stairs and found his way to the street.

011 The Plot Thickens

With his alibi established, d'Artagnan left Sir Tréville's and walked the deserted streets toward his home, taking the longest possible way. What was on d'Artagnan's mind on his roundabout route as he looked up at the stars in the sky, sometimes sighing, sometimes smiling? He was thinking of Madam Bonacieux who was almost an ideal lover for an apprentice musketeer. She was pretty, mysterious, and initiated into the inner secrets of the Court that added the spice of drama to her youth and grace. And he suspected her of being attracted to him as well – an irresistible appeal to a novice lover. Moreover, d'Artagnan had rescued her from interrogation at the hands of Richelieu's demons, a service that inspired the sort of gratitude that can so easily assume a tender character. So quickly do dreams soar on the wings of fancy that d'Artagnan already imagined he soon might be approached by some messenger from the young woman, a page who would pass him a letter setting a rendezvous, or a gold chain or diamond. Young cavaliers, as has already been shown, accepted gifts from their king without a qualm; in those times of easy morals it was no more shameful for them to accept presents from their mistresses who often gave them souvenirs both precious and durable as if trying to defy the transience of emotion with the solidity of gifts. It was no shame for a man to make his way with the help of women. Those who were only beautiful gave of their beauty that is doubtless the origin of the proverb, "The most beautiful girl in the world can give no more than she has." Those who were rich gave of their wealth, and many a hero of that gallant epoch would never have won his spurs in the first place, nor his battles thereafter, without the heavy purse that his mistress had attached to his saddlebow. D'Artagnan had nothing. His mantle of provincial diffidence had been blown to the winds by the unorthodox counsels of his three musketeer friends. In d'Artagnan's mind, his life in Paris was like that of a soldier on campaign, no less than if he had been at war in Flanders: conquer the Spaniard there, the woman here. He was in enemy territory, and had to live by what spoils he could take. However, at this moment d'Artagnan was moved by a nobler, more selfless sentiment. The mercer had told him he was rich, and the young man could guess that with a dolt like Sir Bonacieux for a husband, the wife must hold the purse strings. But the feelings Madam Bonacieux inspired in d'Artagnan far outweighed any financial considerations. Outweighed them but didn't eradicate them: to find that a young woman, beautiful, graceful, and spirited, was rich as well, only augmented the first bloom of love. Wealth enables the purchase of all those little whimsies that are so becoming to beauty. A fine white stocking, a silk dress, a lace collar, a delicate slipper, or a crisp new ribbon won't make an ugly woman pretty but they can make a pretty woman beautiful. And wealth beautifies a woman's hands – for a woman's hands must remain idle to remain beautiful. D'Artagnan was no millionaire obviously. He hoped to be one someday but in his mind the date when he would reach that happy state was still far off. In the meantime, how miserable it would be to see his ladylove pining for those thousand nothings that constitute female happiness, and to be powerless to provide her those thousand nothings! At least, when a woman is rich and her lover is not, those things he can't buy her she can buy for herself. Usually these presents to herself are paid for with her husband's money, though it's rarely to him that she's grateful. D'Artagnan was prepared to be the tenderest lover but at the same time he was determined to continue to be a most devoted friend, so though preoccupied with his amorous plans for the mercer's wife, he didn't forget his three comrades. The pretty Madam Bonacieux was just the woman to promenade beside in the Saint-Denis countryside, or at the Fair of Saint-Germain, in the company of Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. D'Artagnan would be proud to show off such a conquest to them. Of course, he'd noticed that after walking for a while, one is always joined by hunger. How pleasant it would be to conclude such an outing with one of those charming little dinners where a man felt on one side a friend's hand, and on the other a mistress's foot. Moreover, d'Artagnan would become his friends' saviour in hard times, thanks to the generosity of his mistress. And what of Sir Bonacieux, whom d'Artagnan had thrust into the hands of the bailiffs while promising, in an undertone, to save him? It must be confessed that he never crossed d'Artagnan's mind – or if he did, it was with the thought that it was just as well that he was where he was, wherever that might be. Love is the most selfish of all the passions. (But let the reader rest assured that if d'Artagnan had forgotten his landlord – or conveniently overlooked him – the author has not, and knows just where he is. However, for now, let's imitate the amorous Gascon. As for the worthy mercer, we'll return to him later.) D'Artagnan, dreaming of the future course of his new love, smiling at the stars and even, sometimes, speaking to them, drifted west to the edge of the Faubourg and then came back up the Rue du Cherche-Midi – or Chasse-Midi, as it was then called. He realised he was in Aramis's neighbourhood and decided to drop in on his friend, to explain why he'd sent Planchet around earlier with that urgent message summoning him to the mousetrap. If Aramis had been at home when Planchet had arrived, he'd doubtless run to the Rue des Fossoyeurs. Maybe he'd encountered his two other comrades, who must have had no more idea than he why they'd been sent for. This imposition called for an explanation – at least, that's what d'Artagnan said aloud. But to himself he added that it would give him an opportunity to talk to someone about pretty little Madam Bonacieux, of whom his mind, if not his heart, was already quite full. First love brings such a gush of joy that, if it does not find a way to overflow, the lover feels as if he will drown. Paris had been dark for two hours and the streets were nearly deserted. Eleven o'clock echoed in the mild air from all the belfries of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. D'Artagnan followed an alley not yet called the Rue d'Assas, inhaling the heady scents borne on the night breeze from dew-freshened gardens along the Rue of Vaugirard. From far off, muffled by shutters and distance, came the sound of drinking songs from the cabarets along the Pré-aux-Clercs. D'Artagnan turned right, up the Rue des Canettes, and crossed the Place Saint-Sulpice to where the street became the Rue Férou. Aramis's house was on the Rue of Vaugirard between the Rue Férou and the Rue des Fossoyeurs. D'Artagnan had just turned onto the Rue of Vaugirard and could already see the door of his friend's house, shrouded under a vast umbrella of sycamores and clematis, when something like a shadow appeared to detach itself from the darkness of the Rue des Fossoyeurs. This something was enveloped in a cloak, and at first d'Artagnan thought it was a man but by its small stature and uncertain step he soon recognised it for a woman. It seemed she wasn't sure which house she wanted: she looked around, stopped, retraced her steps, and then came back again. D'Artagnan was intrigued. "Suppose I went and offered her my services?" he said to himself. "She looks young and maybe she's pretty. I'd do it! ... On the other hand, a woman on the streets at this hour can only be going to meet her lover. Plague take it! If I interfere with a rendezvous, it'll be a bad start to a relations-hip." The young woman came back again, this time counting houses and windows. This didn't take long: there were only three buildings on the block, with only two windows at street level. One window was in a pavilion next door to Aramis's house and the other was Aramis's own. "By the love of God!" said d'Artagnan to himself, suddenly recalling the tale of the theologian's niece. "Wouldn't it be funny if this late-flying dove was searching for my friend's house? Wait – upon my soul, that's what it looks like! Ah, my dear Aramis, I've you this time." And d'Artagnan, making himself as small as he could, melted into the shadows, watching from a stone bench at the back of a niche in the wall. The young woman advanced a few more paces, making no sound but for those light footsteps that had betrayed her gender and a little cough that suggested a sweet voice. D'Artagnan thought this cough sounded like a signal. Whether in response to the cough or to some other signal, the young woman appeared to recognise that she'd reached her destination. She resolutely approached Aramis's shutter and made three evenly spaced taps on it. "All's well to Aramis," murmured d'Artagnan. "Ah, Sir Hypocrite, now I see what theology you study!"

The third tap was scarcely struck when the inner casement opened and light glimmered through the panes behind the shutter. "Oh ho!" said the listener. "She was awaited, not at the door but at the window. Now the sash will open and the lady will enter by escalade. Excellent!"

But to d'Artagnan's surprise, the window stayed closed. The light that had flared for an instant disappeared and all returned to darkness. D'Artagnan told himself this could not last long and continued his surveillance, eyes and ears open wide. He was right: after some seconds, 2 sharp taps resounded from the interior. The young woman in the street answered with a single tap and the shutter was half opened. One can guess how avidly d'Artagnan looked and listened. The light within had been carried into another room but the eyes of the young man were used to the night. It is said the eyes of Gascons are like cats' and can see in the dark. As d'Artagnan watched, the young woman drew a white object from her pocket and unfolded it until it took the shape of a handkerchief. She then displayed a corner of this object to the person inside the window. This brought to mind for d'Artagnan the handkerchief he'd found at the feet of Madam Bonacieux that in turn recalled the one he'd found at the feet of Aramis. "What the devil," he said to himself, "could this handkerchief signify?" From where he was, d'Artagnan could not see the face of the person inside the window but the young man had no doubt but that it was his friend Aramis who was conversing with the lady on the outside. Curiosity prevailing over prudence, he took advantage of their preoccupation with the handkerchief to leave his hiding place. Quick as lightning but softly, he slid along to an angle of the wall where he could see into the interior of Aramis's apartment. D'Artagnan almost let out a cry of surprise: it was not Aramis inside the window, it was a woman. He could make out the form of her garments but could not distinguish her features. As he watched, the woman in the house drew a second handkerchief from her own pocket and exchanged it for the one that had been shown to her. Some final whispered words passed between the two women, and then the shutter was closed. The woman outside the window turned and walked away, passing within four paces of d'Artagnan while lowering the hood of her cloak; but the precaution was too late, for d'Artagnan had already recognised Madam Bonacieux.

Madam Bonacieux! He'd suspected it was her since she'd taken the handkerchief from her pocket but how likely was it that Madam Bonacieux, who was supposedly being conducted to the Louvre by Sir La Porte, should be running through the streets of Paris alone at half past eleven at night, risking a second abduction? She must have a very urgent reason to do such a thing. And what reason is most urgent to a woman of twenty-five? Love. But was it on her own account, or for some other person that she endangered herself so?

That was what d'Artagnan asked himself, the demon of jealousy gnawing at his heart as if he were already the young woman's acknowledged lover. There was one very simple means to find out where Madam Bonacieux was going and that was to follow her. This course was so natural that d'Artagnan instinctively assumed it. But, at the sound of footsteps behind her, and the sight of a shadow detaching itself from the wall like a statue from its niche, Madam Bonacieux uttered a little cry and fled. D'Artagnan ran after her. It wasn't hard for him to catch a small woman embarrassed by a large cloak, and he caught up to her before she'd gone a third of the length of the block. The unfortunate woman was exhausted, not by fatigue but by terror; when d'Artagnan placed his hand on her shoulder, she fell to the ground and cried out in a choked voice, "Kill me if you want but I'll tell you nothing!" D'Artagnan passed his arms around her waist and lifted the half-fainting woman, trying to reassure her with protestations of devotion. The words were nothing to Madam Bonacieux, for such things are often said with the worst intentions in the world; but the voice was everything. The young woman thought she recognised that voice, and opened her eyes to look at the man who'd so terrorized her. Seeing it was d'Artagnan, she gave a cry of joy. "Oh! It's you! Thanks be to God!"

"Yes, it's me, whom God has sent to watch over you," said d'Artagnan.

"Was it with that intention that you followed me?" she asked, smiling coquettishly, her spirits instantly restored.

All fear had disappeared the moment she'd recognised a friend in one she'd taken for an enemy. "No," said d'Artagnan, "no, I confess it was chance that put me in your path; I saw a woman knocking at the window of one of my friends..."

"One of your friends?" interrupted Madam Bonacieux.

"But yes. Aramis is one of my best friends."

"Aramis? Who's that?"

"Come, now! Are you going to tell me that you don't know Aramis?"

"This is the first time I've heard his name."

"Is it the first time then that you've been to that house?"

"Of course."

"And you didn't know that a young man lives there?"

"No."

"A musketeer?"

"Not at all."

"Then he wasn't the one you came looking for?"

"Not the least in the world. Besides, as I'm sure you'd see, the person I spoke with was a woman."

"That's true; but maybe she's one of Aramis's friends."

"I know nothing of that."

"Since she's staying in his house."

"That has nothing to do with me."

"Well, then, who's she?"

"Oh! That's not my secret."

"My dear Madam Bonacieux, you are charming but at the same time you're the most mysterious of women."

"Do I lose by that?"

"On the contrary, you're adorable."

"Then give me your arm."

"Most willingly. And now?"

"Now, escort me."

"To where?"

"Where I'm going."

"But where are you going?"

"You'll see when you leave me at the door."

"Should I wait for you?"

"There would be no point to that."

"You'll return, then, alone?"

"Perhaps, and perhaps not."

"But the person who accompanies you then, will it be a man or a woman?"

"I don't know yet."

"But / will know!"

"How's that?"

"I'll wait to see you leave."

"In that case, goodbye!"

"Why?"

"I have no need for you."

"But you asked for..."

"The aid of a gentleman, not the surveillance of a spy."

"Spy! That's a hard word!"

"And what do you call those who follow people in spite of them?"

"The indiscreet."

"The word is too mild."

D'Artagnan sighed. "Very well, Madam. I can see I must do just what you wish."

"I'd think better of you if you'd done so at once."

"Is there no merit in repentance?"

"And do you really repent?"

"I have no real idea what we're talking about! All I know is, I promise to do everything you want if you let me escort you to where you're going."

"And you'll leave me afterward?"

"Yes."

"Without spying on my exit?"

"No."

"Word of honour?"

"Faith of a gentleman!"

"Take my arm then and let's go."

D'Artagnan offered his arm to Madam Bonacieux, and she took it, half laughing, and half trembling. Together they walked to the Porte Saint-Michel and passed through, to the top of the Rue of La Harpe. Beyond the Cluny bath house the young woman appeared to hesitate, as she had in the Rue of Vaugirard. But from certain signs she seemed to recognise one particular door. Approaching it, she said, "This is where I have business. A thousand thanks for the honour of your company that has protected me from the dangers I would have been exposed to if alone. However, I've arrived at my destination, and the moment has come for you to keep your word."

"You'll have nothing to fear when returning?"

"I'll have nothing to fear but robbers."

"Are robbers nothing?"

"What could they take from me? I don't have a denier on me."

"You forget that beautiful handkerchief, embroidered with a coat of arms."

"What?"

"The one I found at your feet, and returned to your pocket."

"Hush, you fool!" cried the young woman. "Quiet, or I'm lost!"

"So, there is still danger for you, since a single word terrifies you, and you admit that if it were overheard, you'd be lost. Ah, Madam, take what I offer!" cried d'Artagnan, seizing her hand and looking ardently at her. "Confide in me! Haven't you seen in my eyes the devotion of my heart?"

"I have," replied Madam Bonacieux. "Ask me for my secrets, and I'll tell you; but don't ask me for the secrets of others."

"All right," said d'Artagnan. "I'll discover them myself. Since these secrets have an influence over your life, these secrets must be mine."

"Take care, Sir! I beg you, in the name of whatever feelings I inspire in you, in the name of the services you've rendered me, and which I shall never forget – I beg you, I say, not to get mixed up in my affairs." Madam Bonacieux said this with a gravity that chilled d'Artagnan despite himself. "Believe what I tell you. Don't concern yourself any further about me. If you're wise, I'll no longer exist for you, just as if you'd never seen me."

"Must Aramis forget you as well, Madam?" said d'Artagnan, piqued.

"Again that name! Sir, I've told you two or three times already that I don't know him."

"You don't know the man whose shutter you knocked on? Come, Madam! How gullible do you think I am?"

"Admit that you invented that story, and created this Aramis person just to make me talk!"

"I invent nothing, Madam, I create nothing. I speak the exact truth."

"You hold to your story that one of your friends' lives in that house?"

"I say and repeat once again, that house is inhabited by my friend, whose name is Aramis."

"All this will have to be cleared up later," murmured the young woman. "Now, Sir, hush! That's quite enough."

"If you could see everything in my heart," said d'Artagnan, "you would read there so much curiosity that you'd pity me, and so much love that you would instantly satisfy my curiosity. They have nothing to fear from those who love them."

"You speak very quickly of love, Sir!" said the young woman, shaking her head.

"It's just that love has conquered me quickly, for the first time – and because I'm only twenty years old."

The young woman stole a glance at him, then looked down. “You may as well tell me, because I’m already on the track. Listen,” said d’Artagnan. “About three months ago, I nearly fought with Aramis over a handkerchief like the one you showed to the woman in his house, over a handkerchief that I’m sure bore the same coat of arms.”

“Sir, I swear, you’re exhausting me with all these questions,” said the young woman.

“But think, Madam, if you go about alone and are arrested with that handkerchief, won’t you be compromised?”

“Not at all. The initials on it are my own: C.B. – Constance Bonacieux.”

“Or Camille de Bois-Tracy.”

“Hush, Sir!” She stamped her foot in frustration. “Since endangering me won’t silence you, think of the danger to yourself!”

“Me?”

“Yes, you. You could be imprisoned, even killed, just for knowing me.”

“Then I definitely mustn’t leave you.”

“Sir,” said the young woman, clasping her hands, “Sir, in the name of heaven, by the honour of a soldier, in the name of the courtesy of a gentleman, leave here! There, midnight is sounding – that’s when I’m expected!”

“Madam,” said the young man, bowing, “I can refuse nothing asked of me thus; be content, I depart.”

“And you won’t follow me, won’t spy on me?”

“I return home this instant.”

“Ah! I knew I could depend on you!” said Madam Bonacieux as she held out her hand to him.

She placed the other on the knocker of a door so small it could easily be overlooked. D’Artagnan seized her hand and kissed it passionately. “Ah! I wish I’d never seen you,” he cried, with that naïve roughness that women often prefer over affectations of politeness, because they reveal the heart and prove that emotion prevails over reason. “Well,” replied Madam Bonacieux tenderly, pressing d’Artagnan’s hand, “well, I won’t go that far: what’s lost for today isn’t lost for tomorrow. Who knows, when this is all over, whether I won’t satisfy your curiosity?”

“And will you make the same promise about my love?” cried d’Artagnan, elated.

“Oh! On that, I can’t commit myself. That depends on the feelings you inspire in me.”

“Then, today, Madam…”

“Today, Sir, I haven’t yet gotten beyond gratitude.”

“You abuse my love,” said d’Artagnan sadly.

“No, I use your generosity, that’s all. But, believe me, with some people, everything comes around.”

D’Artagnan brightened. “Then I’m the happiest man alive. Promise me you’ll never forget this evening – and never forget that promise.”

“Dear friend, in the proper time and place I will remember everything. But go, now, go, in the name of heaven! They expect me at midnight exactly, and I’m late.”

“By five minutes.”

“Yes but sometimes five minutes are five centuries.”

“When one loves.”

“Well, who says I don’t have business with a lover?”

“Here we go again,” said Madam Bonacieux with a half-smile that was not free from a certain tinge of impatience.

“No, no, I’m going. I depart; I believe in you and want all the credit for my devotion even if that devotion’s stupidity. Goodbye, madam, goodbye!”

And as if he lacked the strength to detach himself from her hand except by a jolt, he turned and left at a run. Madam Bonacieux knocked as she had at the shutter with 3 light, evenly spaced taps. When d’Artagnan arrived at the corner of the next street, he turned for a final look but the door had already opened and closed and the pretty mercer’s wife had disappeared. D’Artagnan continued on his way. He had given his word not to spy on Madam Bonacieux, and if his life depended on knowing where she was going, or with whom, he would still have gone home. Five minutes later, he was in the Rue des Fossoyeurs. “Poor Athos,” he said. “He’ll never know what this was all about. He’ll have fallen asleep waiting for me, or returned home and been told that a woman has been there. A woman in Athos’s house! Well, after all,” continued d’Artagnan, “there was certainly one in Aramis’s house. All this is very strange, and I’m very curious to know how it will end.”

“Badly, Sir, badly,” replied a voice for d’Artagnan had been soliloquising aloud, preoccupied.

The young man recognised Planchet, waiting in the alley at the base of the stairway that led to his apartment. “What do you mean, badly? What kind of stupid remark is that?” d’Artagnan asked. “Has something happened?”

“All sorts of misfortunes.”

“Such as?”

“First of all, Sir Athos is arrested.”

“Arrested! Athos, arrested! Why?”

“They found him in your house and took him for you.”

“Who arrested him?”

“The city guards sent by those men in black you chased off.”

“Why didn’t he name himself? Why didn’t he tell them he was a stranger to this affair?”

“He was careful not to, Sir. On the contrary, he approached me and said, ‘It’s your master who needs his liberty right now, and not me, since he knows everything and I know nothing. They’ll believe d’Artagnan’s been arrested, and that will give him time; in three days I’ll reveal who I am, and they’ll have to let me go.’”

“Bravo, Athos! Noble heart,” murmured d’Artagnan, “That sounds like him, all right! And what did the guardsmen do?”

“Four of them took him someplace: maybe the Bastille, maybe the prison at For-l’Évêque. Two stayed behind, guarding the door, while those men in black searched everywhere and took all your papers. When they were finished, they all went away, leaving the house wide open.”

“And Porthos and Aramis?”

“I couldn’t find them.”

“But you left word that I awaited them?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Good. They might show up at any moment, so don’t budge from here. If they come, tell them what’s happened, and ask them to wait for me at the Pomme-de-Pin cabaret. It’s too dangerous to wait here; the house might be spied upon. I’ll run to Sir Tréville’s to acquaint him with all of this, and then I’ll join them.”

“Very well, Sir,” said Planchet.

D’Artagnan started to leave, then had second thoughts and turned back. “You’ll stay, won’t you, even if you’re afraid?” he said to Planchet.

“Don’t worry, Sir,” said Planchet. “You don’t really know me yet. I’m brave once I get going; it’s all a matter of setting myself up. Besides, I’m a Picard.”

“So, you’d be killed rather than quit your post?”

“Oh, yes, Sir. There’s nothing I wouldn’t do to prove to Sir how attached I am to him.”

“Excellent,” said d’Artagnan to himself. “It seems the method I adopted for managing this fellow was a good one. I’ll have to repeat it now and then.”

And with what speed was left in his legs after all the running around he’d already done, d’Artagnan took himself to the Rue du Vieux-Colombier. However, Sir Tréville was not at his hôtel; he was with his company, on guard at the Louvre. He had to get to Tréville; it was important that he be told what had happened. D’Artagnan resolved to try to enter the Louvre. His uniform of a guard in des Essarts’s company would have to be his passport. He went down to the river by the Rue des Petits-Augustins and turned right along the quay to take the Pont Neuf across to the royal palace. He’d considered crossing by the ferry but on arriving at the water’s edge and checking his purse, he’d discovered he didn’t have enough money for the fee. As he passed the opening of the Rue Guénégaud he saw two people coming out of the Rue Dauphine ahead of him. He was struck by their appearance: one was a man, one a woman. The woman was shaped like Madam Bonacieux, and wore that black cloak d’Artagnan had seen silhouetted against the shutter on the Rue of Vaugirard. The man resembled no one so much as Aramis, and wore the uniform of the musketeers. The woman’s hood was lowered, while the man held his handkerchief to his face, precautions that showed the pair had an interest in not being recognised. They walked onto the bridge. That was d’Artagnan’s road, too, since his destination was the Louvre, so he followed them. He hadn’t gone twenty paces before he was convinced that the woman was Madam Bonacieux and the man was Aramis. Instantly he was overwhelmed by jealousy. He felt doubly betrayed by his friend and the woman whom he already loved like a mistress. Madam Bonacieux had sworn to him by all that was holy that she didn’t know Aramis, and here, a quarter of an hour later, he found her on Aramis’s arm. D’Artagnan didn’t reflect that he’d only known the pretty mercer’s wife for three hours, that she owed him nothing but some gratitude for having delivered her from her abductors, and that she’d promised him nothing. He saw himself as an outraged lover, betrayed and scoffed at. The blood mounted to his face, and he decided it was time to clear up this affair. The young woman and the young man noticed they were being watched and followed, and they doubled their pace. Breaking into a run, d’Artagnan cut across to the walkway on the right-hand side of the bridge, passed them, and ran all the way to the other end. Then he returned to accost them just as they passed in front of La Samaritaine. A lamp on the front of the great pump-house lit this whole part of the bridge. D’Artagnan halted before the couple and they stopped short. “What do you want, Sir?” asked the musketeer, drawing back a step and with a foreign accent that proved to d’Artagnan that he was wrong about at least one of his conclusions. “It’s not Aramis!” d’Artagnan cried.

“No, Sir, it’s not Aramis. By your exclamation I see that you’ve taken me for another, so I pardon you.”

“You, pardon me!” said d’Artagnan.

“Yes,” replied the stranger. “Let me pass then, since I’m not the one you have business with.”

“You’re right, Sir,” said d’Artagnan, “it’s not with you I have business, it’s with Madam.”

“With Madam! You don’t know her,” said the stranger.

“Wrong, Sir, I do know her.”

“Ah!” said Madam Bonacieux in a tone of reproach, “Ah, Sir! I had your word as a soldier and your faith as a gentleman. I’d hoped I could count on them.”

“And I, Madam,” said d’Artagnan, embarrassed, “you’ve promised me … that’s…”

“Take my arm, Madam,” said the stranger, “and let’s continue on our way.”

But d’Artagnan, though stunned and practically annihilated by all that had happened to him, still stood, arms crossed, before the musketeer and Madam Bonacieux. The musketeer took two steps forward and shoved d’Artagnan aside. D’Artagnan leaped back and drew his sword. At the same time, like lightning, the stranger drew his. “In the name of heaven, Milord!” cried Madam Bonacieux, throwing herself between the combatants and grabbing the blades in her gloved hands.

“Milord!” cried d’Artagnan, struck by a sudden idea. “Milord! Pardon, sir but you’re then…”

“Milord, the Duke of Buckingham,” said Madam Bonacieux in an undertone. “And now you can ruin us all.”

“Milord – Madam – pardon, a hundred pardons! I love her, milord, and I was jealous. You know what it’s to love, Milord! Pardon me and tell me how I can get myself killed in Your Grace’s service.”

“You’re a brave young man,” said Buckingham. He gave d’Artagnan his hand and shook it respectfully. “I accept the offer of your services. Follow twenty paces behind us as far as the Louvre – and if anyone spies on us, kill him.” D’Artagnan put his naked sword under his arm, let Madam Bonacieux and the duke go twenty steps ahead, and followed them, ready to execute to the letter the instructions of the noble and elegant minister of Charles I. Fortunately, the youth had no occasion to prove his devotion to the duke, and the young woman and the handsome musketeer entered the Louvre by the postern of l’École without trouble. As for d’Artagnan, he went immediately to the Pomme-de-Pin cabaret, where he found Porthos and Aramis waiting for him. Without explaining any inconvenience he might have put them to, he told them he’d wound up the affair on his own and hadn’t needed their help. Now, let’s leave the three friends, each to return to his home, and follow the Duke of Buckingham and his guide through the maze of the Louvre.

George Villiers, the 1ST Duke of Buckingham

Madam Bonacieux was known to belong to the queen, and the Duke of Buckingham wore the uniform of Tréville's musketeers who were on guard that night so they were able to enter the Louvre without difficulty. Germain, the keeper of the postern gate was one of the queen's partisans so the worst that could happen was that Madam Bonacieux might be accused of having brought her lover into the Louvre. Any blame would fall on her. Her reputation would be lost, of course – but of what value in the world was the reputation of a mercer's little wife? Once within the grounds of the Louvre, the duke and the young woman followed the base of the wall for about twenty-five paces to a small service door that was open by day but ordinarily closed at night. This door yielded to Madam Bonacieux's hand and they entered. When she'd closed it again they were in darkness but Madam Bonacieux knew all the ins and outs of the servants' corridors in that part of the Louvre. She took the duke by the hand, felt her way forward a few steps, located a banister, and led him up a staircase. The duke counted two flights of stairs. At the top she turned right, led him down a long corridor, and descended another flight of stairs into another hall, where she put a key into a lock and opened a door. She conducted the duke into a chamber lit only by a night lamp, saying, "Remain here, milord Duke. Someone will come for you."

Then she left by the same door, locking it with the key so that Buckingham found himself literally a prisoner. However, though left quite alone, it must be said that the Duke of Buckingham never felt a moment's fear. A yen for adventure and the love of romance were the keynotes of his character. Brave, enterprising, even reckless, this was not the first time he'd risked his life in such an endeavour. He'd already learned that the pretended message from Anne of Austria that had drawn him to Paris, was a snare – but instead of returning to England, he'd taken advantage of the situation to declare to the queen that he wouldn't depart without seeing her. At first the queen had refused but then she'd feared that if frustrated, the duke might do something rash. She decided to receive him and beg him to leave immediately – but Madam Bonacieux, whose task it was to find the duke and bring him to the Louvre, had been abducted on the very evening of the queen's decision. For two days Anne and her people had no idea what had become of her, and everything hung in suspense. Once Madam Bonacieux was free and in contact again with La Porte, events had resumed their course, and she'd gone to complete the dangerous task that but for her arrest, would have been accomplished three days earlier. Buckingham, alone in the little room, noticed a mirror and approached it. The uniform of a King's Musketeer suited him very well indeed. At thirty-five, he was justly called the most handsome gentleman and the most elegant cavalier of France or England. The favourite of two kings, wealthy beyond counting, all-powerful in a realm that he roiled at a whim and calmed at a caprice, George Villiers, the Duke of Buckingham, lived one of those fabulous lives that are still astonishing centuries after the fact. Sure of himself, convinced of his power, certain that the laws that govern other men had no power over him, he went straight toward his goal no matter what it was, even if it were so elevated and so overwhelming that it would be madness for another to reach for it. This was how he'd managed repeatedly to approach the beautiful and haughty Anne of Austria, and make her love him by dazzling her. George Villiers, still before the mirror, primped his striking blond hair to restore the curls the hat had flattened, and twisted his moustache into points. His heart swelling with joy at being so close to that moment he'd so long desired, he smiled at himself with hope and pride. At that moment, a door hidden behind a tapestry opened and a woman appeared. Buckingham saw this apparition in the mirror and uttered a cry: It's the queen!

Anne of Austria was then 26 or 27 and in all the splendour of her youthful beauty. She had the poise of royalty or divinity; her beautiful eyes that shone with glints of emerald, were at the same time sweet and majestic. Her mouth was small, rosy, and though her lower lip, like those of the Hapsburg princes, protruded slightly, her lips were as eminently graceful when curved in a smile as they were profoundly disdainful when curled in contempt. Her soft, velvety skin was renowned, and hands and arms were of such surpassing beauty that all the poets of the time sang of them as incomparable. Her hair that from blond in her youth had darkened to chestnut, and which she wore powdered and very lightly curled, framed her face admirably. It was a face that even the most rigorous critic could only wish wore a little less rouge, and in which the most exacting sculptor could only wish for a little more delicate shape to the nose. Buckingham stood for a moment, dazzled: though he'd seen her at balls, fêtes, and promenades, never had Anne of Austria appeared more beautiful than at that moment, attired in a simple dress of white satin. She was accompanied by Doña Estefania, the only one of her Spanish women who had not been driven away by the jealousy of the king or the persecution of Richelieu. Anne of Austria took two steps forward; Buckingham threw himself at her feet, and before the queen could prevent him, he kissed the hem of her dress. "Duke," she said, "you already know that it wasn't I who wrote to you."

"Yes, Your Majesty, I know," said the duke. "And I know that I've been mad to hope that snow could come alive or marble warm itself. But what of that? When one loves, one easily believes in love. And I can't consider this journey a loss if I see you as a result."

"Yes," replied Anne, "but you know why and how you see me, Milord. You see me from pity for yourself. You see me because insensitive to my troubles, you nonetheless stubbornly remain in a city where you risk your life and I risk my honour just by being here. I see you now to tell you that everything separates us: the depths of the sea, the hostility of kingdoms, and the sanctity of vows. It's a sacrilege to contend against all these things, milord. I see you at last to tell you that we must see each other no more."

"Speak on, madam. Speak, O queen," said Buckingham. "The sweetness of your voice makes up for the harshness of your words. You talk of sacrilege! The sacrilege's in the separation of two hearts that God's formed for each other."

"Milord," said the queen, "you forget that I've never told you that I love you."

"But you've never said you don't love me and truly, Your Majesty could say nothing so ungrateful ever. For tell me, where else can you find a love like mine, a love that neither time, nor absence, nor despair can extinguish: a love that's content with a lost ribbon, a stray glance, a chance word? It's been three years, madam, since I first saw you and for three years I've loved you thus. Do you want me to tell you how you were dressed the first time I saw you? Do you want me to detail every ornament of your wardrobe? I can see you still: you were seated on cushions, Spanish-style, wearing a dress of green satin embroidered with gold and silver with hanging sleeves fastened up to display your beautiful arms. You wore diamonds, a petite ruff about your neck on your head a small bonnet the colour of your dress and on the bonnet a heron's plume. Oh, Queen! I shut my eyes and see you as you're then; I reopen them and see you as you're now, a hundred times more beautiful still!" "What folly!" murmured Anne of Austria who had not the will to think ill of the duke for having retained such a portrait of her in his heart, "What madness to feed a useless passion with such memories!" "And on what'd you've me live then? I've nothing but these memories. They're my happiness, treasure, and hope. Each time I see you is like a new diamond to enclose in the coffer of my heart. This is the fourth gem that you've let fall for me to pick up; for in three years, madam, I've seen you only four times: the first I was just speaking of, the second at the hotel of Madam of Chevreuse, and the third in the garden at Amiens."

"Duke," said the queen, blushing, "never speak of that evening."

"On the contrary, let's speak of it, madam, let's speak of it! It's the happiest, most radiant evening of my life. Do you recall what a beautiful night it was? How the air's soft and perfumed, how the sky's midnight blue and frosted with stars? Ah! Then madam, I was able for one instant to be alone with you; then you're ready to tell me everything – the loneliness of your life, the grief of your heart. You're leaning on my arm, on this very arm. As I leaned toward you, I felt your beautiful hair brush my face, and each time it touched me I shivered from head to foot. Oh, queen, my queen! You can't know the heavenly happiness, the joys of paradise contained in that moment. I'd give everything, my worldly goods, fortune, power, and glory, all the days left me to live for one more such moment in one more such night! For that night, madam, that night you loved me – I swear it!"

"Milord, it's possible that under the influence of that place, the charm of that beautiful evening, the fascination of your regard – in short, that the thousand circumstances that sometimes combine to destroy a woman, came together on that fatal evening. But you saw, milord, the queen come to the rescue when the woman faltered: at the first word you spoke, at the first touch you dared, I called out."

"That's true. And at such a blow, any other love but mine would've given up. But it just made my love all the more ardent, all the more eternal. You thought you'd flee from me by returning to Paris, thinking I'd not dare to leave your sister Henriette, the treasure my master King Charles had charged me to watch. But what importance to me are all the treasures of the world and all the kings of the earth? Eight days later I returned to you, Madam. That time, you'd nothing to say to me. Though I'd risked royal disfavour even my life, to see you for a second, I didn't so much as touch your hand. You pardoned me on seeing me so submissive and repentant."

"Yes but though we did nothing, lying tongues have made much of these foolish meetings – as you well know, milord. The king, goaded by Your Eminence, made a terrible uproar. Madam du Vernet's driven away, Putanges was exiled, Madam of Chevreuse fell into disfavour and when you wanted to return as Ambassador to France, the king himself – remember, milord! – The king himself opposed it."

"Yes, and France will pay with a war for her king's refusal. So, I'm unable to see you, Madam? Very well then – but every day you'll hear of me. What do you think is the goal of my planned invasion of the Isle of Ré and alliance with the Protestants of La Rochelle? Nothing but the pleasure of seeing you! I daren't hope to penetrate to Paris, sword in hand – I know that very well. But this war will have to end in a peace that peace will require a negotiator, and that negotiator will be me. They'll not dare to refuse me then. I'll come back to Paris, I'll come back to you and be happy if just for a moment. True, thousands of men will pay with their lives for my happiness but what does that matter to me, provided I see you again? Perhaps this is all folly, even insane but tell me: what woman in the world's a lover more amorous? What queen's a servant more devoted?"

"Milord, Milord, what you say in your defence just condemns you all the more! These so-called proofs of your love verge on being crimes!"

"Because you do not love me, madam! If you loved me, you wouldn't see it like that. Oh but if you loved me – that would be too much happiness, and I would go mad. Madam of Chevreuse was less cruel than you; the Earl of Holland loved her, and she returned his love."

"Madam of Chevreuse was not a queen," murmured Anne of Austria, overcome despite herself by the expression of a love so profound.

"You would love me, then, if you were not a queen? Madam, say it – you would love me then? I can believe that it's only the dignity of your rank that makes you so cruel to me, that if you'd been Madam of Chevreuse, poor Buckingham might have hoped? Thanks for those sweet words, my beautiful Majesty, a hundred times thanks!"

"No, Milord, you've misunderstood. I didn't mean to say..."

"Hush! Hush!" said the duke. "If I'm happy in my mistake, please don't be so cruel as to take it away from me. You said yourself that I've been drawn into a snare that might cost me my life, and it may yet do so." The duke smiled a smile both sad and charming, and said, "For some time I've had strange premonitions of my own death."

"My God!" Anne cried with a terror that showed she cared much more than she wanted to say.

"I don't say this to frighten you, Madam. I shouldn't have mentioned it to you – please believe I'm not preoccupied by such dreams. But what you've said to me, the hope you've nearly given me, is worth everything, even my life."

"But, Milord," said Anne of Austria, "I, too, have had premonitions and dreams. I dreamed I saw you lying, bleeding from a wound."

"On the left side, wasn't it, and from a knife?" interrupted Buckingham.

"Yes, Duke, that's it – on the left side, with a knife! Who could have told you about this dream? I've confided it only to God, in my prayers."

"I want nothing more. You love me, Madam. All is well."

"I, love you? Me?"

"Yes, you. Would God send us the same dreams if you didn't love me? Would we have the same premonitions if our lives weren't joined at the heart? You love me, O Queen! Will you weep for me?"

"Oh! My God! My God!" cried Anne of Austria. "This is more than I can bear. Leave, Duke – in the name of heaven, go! I don't know if I love you or if I don't love you; but I do know that I won't break my word. Have pity on me, and leave. Oh! If you were caught in France, if you died in France, if I thought your love for me was the cause of your death, I'd never recover – I would go mad! Leave, then, leave – I implore you!"

"How beautiful you are this way! How I love you!" said Buckingham.

"Leave! Leave! I beg you. Come back later, if you must: come back as an ambassador, come back as a minister, come back surrounded by guards who will defend you, by servants who will watch over you. Then I shall fear no more for the length of your days, and I'll be happy to see you."

"Is ... is this true what you tell me?"

"Yes..."

"Then give me a pledge of your indulgence, something from you that will remind me that I didn't dream this, something you've carried and that I can carry in my turn: a ring, a necklace, a chain."

"And you'll leave, you'll really leave, if I give you what you ask?"

"Yes."

"This very instant?"

"Yes."

"You'll leave France, you'll return to England?"

"Yes, I swear to you!"

"Wait, then – wait."

Anne of Austria re-entered her chambers and came out again almost immediately, holding in her hands a small coffer of rosewood, marked with her cipher and chased with gold. “Here, Milord Duke,” she said. “Guard this in memory of me.”

Buckingham took the coffer and fell a second time to his knees. “You promised me you would leave,” said the queen.

“And I keep my word. Your hand, your hand, Madam, and I depart.”

Anne of Austria offered Buckingham one hand while closing her eyes and leaning on Estefania with the other, for she felt that her strength was going to fail her. Buckingham passionately kissed that beautiful hand, then rose. “Within six months,” he said, “if I’m not dead, I will see you again, Madam, if I must set the world at war to do it.” Then, true to his promise, he hastened from the room. In the corridor he found Madam Bonacieux awaiting him, who, with the same precautions as before, and with the same success, conducted him out of the Louvre.

Sir Bonacieux

It may be remarked that there was one person in this affair who, despite his precarious position, seems to have been all but forgotten: the worthy Sir Bonacieux, martyr to the tangled political and amorous intrigues of this gallant epoch of chivalry. Fortunately, as the reader may recall, we promised not to lose sight of him. The officers who had arrested Bonacieux took him straight to the Bastille. Inside its gates he passed, trembling, before a platoon of soldiers loading their muskets. He was taken down into a semi-subterranean gallery, where Bonacieux was subjected to gross insults and some rough handling by his guards. The gendarmes saw that they were not dealing with a gentleman and treated him as if he were the lowliest peasant. After half an hour or so, a magistrate’s clerk arrived and put an end to these torments but not to Sir Bonacieux’s fears, as he ordered him conducted to the Interrogation Chamber. Ordinarily prisoners were interrogated in their own cells but apparently Bonacieux didn’t deserve such a dignity. Two gendarmes took possession of the mercer, marched him to a corridor guarded by three sentries, opened a door, and pushed him into a low chamber, the total furnishings of which were a table, a chair, and a commissioner. The commissioner was seated on the chair and busily writing on the table. The commissioner remained buried in his papers for a few moments, then looked up to see what he had to deal with. He was a repulsive little man, with a pointed nose, jaundiced cheeks stretched taut over sharp cheekbones, tiny, piercing eyes, and an expression suggesting both fox and weasel. His head balanced on the end of a long, mobile neck, issuing from a large, black robe like a turtle’s head protruding from its carapace. He began by demanding of Bonacieux his family and given names, age, condition, and address. The accused replied that he was called Jacques-Michel Bonacieux, his age was fifty-one, he was a retired mercer, and lived in the Rue des Fossoyeurs. Instead of asking further questions, the commissioner then launched into a long, rambling lecture about the perils awaiting an obscure bourgeois who dared to interfere in matters of state. He went on to praise the power and policies of His Eminence the Cardinal – that incomparable minister, who had eclipsed all past ministers, and was an example for all ministers to come, a man whose purposes and power none could flout with impunity. After completing this impressive speech, the commissioner fixed his eye on poor Bonacieux like a hawk surveying a mouse, and urged him to reflect on the gravity of his situation. The mercer had already done so, consigning La Porte to the devil for suggesting that Bonacieux should marry his goddaughter, and that this goddaughter should be received into the queen’s household as linen maid. The fundamental ingredients of Master Bonacieux’s character were a profound selfishness mixed with sordid avarice, the whole seasoned by utter spinelessness. Whatever love his young wife had inspired in him was entirely secondary to these basic elements. Bonacieux mulled over the commissioner’s speech. “But Sir Commissioner,” he said timidly, “please believe that I more than anyone recognise and appreciate the merits of the incomparable cardinal by whom we have the honour to be governed.” “Really?” asked the commissioner, with a doubtful air. “If that’s so, how is it that you’re here in the Bastille?”

“How I came here, or rather why I came here, is impossible for me to say, as I don’t know myself,” replied Bonacieux, “but certainly it’s not for having knowingly disobliged Your Eminence.”

“Nevertheless, you must have committed some crime, since here you are, accused of high treason.”

“High treason!” cried Bonacieux, terrified. “High treason! How could a poor mercer who hates the Huguenots and abhors the Spanish be accused of high treason? Sir, Sir – the thing is materially impossible!”

“Sir Bonacieux,” said the commissioner, his gaze boring into the accused as if his tiny eyes could see to the bottom of his heart, “Sir Bonacieux ... you’ve a wife?”

“Yes, Sir,” replied the trembling mercer, certain that now they were approaching the root of his troubles. “That is to say, I had one.”

“What? You had one? What have you done with her, if you no longer have her?”

“She was abducted from me, Sir.”

“She was abducted from you?” said the commissioner. “Ah!”

This “Ah!” confused Bonacieux more than ever.

“She was abducted from you!” resumed the commissioner. “And do you know who committed this abduction?”

“I ... believe I know him.”

“Who is he?”

“Take note that I affirm nothing, Sir Commissioner, I only suspect.”

“Whom do you suspect? Come, answer freely.”

Sir Bonacieux was perplexed. Should he deny everything, or tell all? If he denied everything, they would be sure to think he knew more than he was saying. If he told all, it would be proof of his willingness to cooperate. He decided to tell all. “I suspect,” he said, “a tall, dark man of haughty demeanour, with the air of a Grand. He followed us a number of times, I believe, when I went to the postern of the Louvre to meet my wife and bring her home.”

This reply seemed to make the commissioner nervous. “And his name?” he said.

“Oh! As to his name, I know nothing – but if I ever met him, I’d recognise him instantly out of a thousand people, I swear it.”

The commissioner’s face darkened. “You’d know him in a thousand, you say?”

“That is to say,” resumed Bonacieux, who saw he’d taken a wrong turn, “that is to say...”

“You have stated positively that you would recognise the man,” said the commissioner ominously. “That will be quite enough for today. Before we proceed further, I must report that you know your wife’s ravisher.”

“But I didn’t say I know him!” cried Bonacieux in despair. “I told you on the contrary...”

“Take the prisoner away,” said the commissioner to the pair of guards.

“And where should we take him?” asked the clerk.

“To a dungeon.”

“Which one?”

“For God’s sake! Whichever one you come to first, so long as it’s dark and deep,” replied the commissioner with an indifference that horrified poor Bonacieux.

“Alas! Alas!” he said to himself. “I’m doomed. My wife’s committed some frightful crime – they think I’m her accomplice, and will punish me as well. She must have talked, she must have confessed and told all. Women are so weak! And now I’m to be thrown into a dungeon, the first we come to. It’s all over! One night is soon past, and then tomorrow, it’s to the wheel, or the gallows! May God have pity on me!”

Without paying any attention to the lamentations of Master Bonacieux, having heard such laments a thousand times, the two guards took the prisoner by the arm and led him away. Meanwhile the commissioner hastily wrote a letter, then consigned it to the clerk. Once incarcerated in his dungeon, Bonacieux couldn’t even close his eyes – not because his dungeon was too disagreeable but because his anxieties were too great. He remained all night crouched on his stool, starting at every sound. By the time the first rays of daylight shone into his chamber, even the dawn appeared to him sombre and funereal. Suddenly he heard the bolts being drawn, and leaped up wildly. He thought they were coming to conduct him to the scaffold, so when he saw the commissioner and his clerk in place of the executioner he’d expected, he was ready to embrace them both. “Your affair has become more complicated since yesterday evening, my good man,” said the commissioner, “and I advise you to tell the whole truth, for only a full confession can stave off the cardinal’s anger.”

“But I’m ready to tell everything!” cried Bonacieux. “At least, everything I know. Interrogate me, I beg you.”

“Where is your wife, first of all?”

“I told you – she’s been abducted from me.”

“Yes but since five o’clock yesterday afternoon, she’s escaped – thanks to you.”

“My wife has escaped!” cried Bonacieux. “Oh! The wretch! Sir, if she has escaped, it’s not my fault, I swear to you.”

“Why then did you go to the rooms of your neighbour, Sir d’Artagnan, with whom you had a long conference?”

“Ah! Yes, Sir Commissioner, yes, that’s true, and I confess my mistake. I have been to Sir d’Artagnan’s.”

“What was the object of this visit?”

“To beg his aid in recovering my wife. I thought I had a right to reclaim her but apparently I was mistaken, and I ask your pardon.”

“And what did Sir d’Artagnan say to this?”

“Sir d’Artagnan promised me his aid but at the first chance, he betrayed me.”

“Do you think you can laugh in the face of justice? I tell you, Sir d’Artagnan made a deal with you. By virtue of this deal he chased off the policemen who had come to arrest your wife, and now he’s hidden her where no one can find her.”

“Sir d’Artagnan has abducted my wife? Wait, what are you telling me?”

“Happily, Sir d’Artagnan is in our hands, and you shall confront him.”

“Ah! My faith, I ask nothing more,” cried Bonacieux. “I won’t be sorry to see anyone I know.”

“Bring in Sir d’Artagnan,” said the commissioner to the guards.

The two guards brought in Athos.

“Sir d’Artagnan,” said the commissioner, addressing Athos, “declare everything that passed between you and sir, here.”

“But this isn’t Sir d’Artagnan!” cried Bonacieux.

“What?” said the commissioner, “This isn’t Sir d’Artagnan?”

“Not the least in the world,” replied Bonacieux.

“What’s his name, then?” demanded the commissioner.

“I can’t tell you, because I don’t know him.”

“What? You don’t know him?”

“No.”

“Have you ever seen him before?”

“I have; but I don’t know what he’s called.”

“Your name?” demanded the commissioner.

“Athos,” replied the musketeer.

“But that’s not the name of a man, that’s the name of a mountain!” cried the poor interrogator, who was beginning to lose his head.

“That’s my name,” said Athos tranquilly.

“But you said your name was d’Artagnan.”

“Me?”

“Yes, you.”

“To be precise, when they met me, my guards said, ‘You are Sir d’Artagnan?’ I replied, ‘You think so?’ They said they were sure I was. I didn’t want to contradict officers in the pursuit of their duty. Besides, I could be wrong myself.”

"Sir, you insult the majesty of justice!"

"By no means," said Athos calmly.

"You are Sir d'Artagnan."

"There, you see? You keep telling me that."

"But I tell you, Sir Commissioner, there isn't the slightest doubt here," cried Bonacieux in his turn. "Sir d'Artagnan is my tenant, and I ought to know him when I see him, all the more so as he doesn't pay me my rent. Sir d'Artagnan is a young man, barely nineteen or twenty, and sir here is at least thirty. Sir d'Artagnan is in Sir Des Essarts's guards, and sir here is in the company of Sir Tréville's musketeers. Just look at his uniform, Sir Commissioner, look at his uniform!"

"That's true," murmured the commissioner, "by God, that's true."

At this moment the door was opened from outside and one of the Bastille gatekeepers admitted a messenger, who hurriedly gave a letter to the commissioner. "Oh! Wretched woman!" cried the commissioner, reading it.

"What's that? Of whom do you speak? Not my wife, I hope!" said Bonacieux.

"On the contrary, it is about her. Your little affair is becoming very pretty."

"That can't be!" cried the harried mercer. "Oblige me by telling me, Sir, how my affairs can get worse by what my wife does while I'm in prison!"

"Because she acts following a plan arranged between you – an infernal plan!"

"I swear to you, Sir Commissioner, that you are in the most profound error, and that I know nothing in the world about what my wife is doing. I'm entirely ignorant of what she's done, and if she's committed any follies, I disown, I deny, and curse her!"

"Bah!" said Athos to the commissioner. "If you have no more need of me here, send me elsewhere. Your Sir Bonacieux is very tiresome."

"Take the prisoners back to the dungeons," said the commissioner, indicating with the same gesture Athos and Bonacieux, "and see to it they are guarded more closely than ever!"

"I must say," Athos said, with his habitual calm, "if you have business with Sir d'Artagnan, I don't very well see how I can take his place."

"Do as I said!" cried the commissioner. "And maintain absolute secrecy! Do you hear?"

Athos shrugged his shoulders and followed his guards, while Sir Bonacieux uttered lamentations so pitiful they would have softened the heart of a tiger. They led the mercer back to the same dungeon where he'd passed the night and left him to himself for the rest of the day. All day Bonacieux wept like the tradesman he was, not being at all a man of the sword, as he himself admitted. In the evening, around nine o'clock, just when he'd decided to put himself to bed, he heard footsteps in the corridor. The footsteps approached his dungeon, his door opened, and the guards appeared. "Follow me," said an exempt, a military policeman who came behind the guards.

"Follow you!" cried Bonacieux. "Follow you, at this hour! My God, to where?"

"To where we have an order to conduct you."

"But that's no answer!"

"It is, however, the only one I can give you."

"Dear God," murmured the poor mercer, "this time I'm lost!" And he followed his guards mechanically and without resistance. They took the same corridor they'd taken before, crossed a courtyard, and then passed through another wing of the fortress. Finally, at the gate of the forecourt, Bonacieux was brought to a carriage surrounded by four mounted guards. They marched him into this carriage, the exempt got in beside him, they locked the door, and the two found themselves in a rolling prison. The carriage moved slowly, like a funeral hearse. Through the padlocked grille at the rear, the prisoner could see only houses and pavement. However, true Parisian as he was, Bonacieux recognised each street by familiar milestones, by signs, and by streetlights. When they arrived at Saint-Paul, where the Bastille's condemned were executed, he nearly fainted, and crossed himself twice. He thought the carriage was going to stop there ... but the carriage passed on. Farther on, a still greater terror took him as they skirted the Saint-Jean Cemetery, where state criminals were interred. The only thing that reassured him was that before these criminals were buried they generally cut off their heads, and his head so far was still on his shoulders. But when he saw the carriage take the route to the Place of Grève, when he saw the gabled roofs of the Hôtel of Ville, and the carriage began to pass beneath the hôtel arcade, he thought that everything was over for him. He tried to confess to the exempt, who refused to listen to him. At this, he made such pitiable cries that the exempt swore they were deafening him. He threatened Bonacieux that if he continued, he would have him gagged. This threat reassured Bonacieux somewhat: if they meant to execute him at the Place of Grève they wouldn't take the trouble to gag him, this close to the place of execution. In fact, the carriage crossed the fatal square without stopping. There was nothing further to fear but the Croix-du-Trahoir: the carriage was taking the road that led right to it. This time, there could be no doubt – for it was at the gallows of the Croix-du-Trahoir that they executed minor criminals. Bonacieux had been flattering himself to think he was worthy of attention at Saint-Paul or the Place of Grève; clearly, it was at the Croix-du-Trahoir that he would finish his journey and find his fate! He couldn't yet see this woeful cross but he felt somehow that it was coming to him. When they were within twenty paces of it, he heard the sound of a crowd, and the carriage halted. After everything he'd gone through, this was more than poor Bonacieux could bear; he uttered a feeble groan, like the last gasp of the dying, and fainted.

014 The Man of Meung

The crowd at the Croix-du-Trahoir hadn't gathered expecting a hanging but to gawk at a man already hanged. Sir Bonacieux's carriage-prison stopped for an instant, then resumed its progress, forcing a passage through the throng. It continued threading its way along the broad, teeming Rue Saint-Honoré, turned onto the narrower Rue des Bons-Enfants, and stopped before a low gate. The gate opened, and the exempt handed the stunned Bonacieux out of the carriage and into the arms of two guards. The guards frogmarched him through an alley, up a flight of stairs, and finally deposited him in an antechamber. Bonacieux responded to all this motion in a purely mechanical fashion, marching like one in a dream. He glimpsed his surroundings as if through a fog, heard sounds without comprehending them. At that moment he could have been executed without raising a hand to defend himself, or saying a word to beg for mercy. He slumped in the antechamber on a bench, leaning back against a wall, arms hanging down beside him, staying in the same place and position where his guards had deposited him. He gradually became aware that nothing threatened him, nothing indicated any immediate danger – and as the bench was comfortably upholstered, the wall he leaned against was covered in handsome Cordovan leather, and red damask curtains with golden tiebacks fluttered before the window, he slowly came to the conclusion that his fright was exaggerated. Tentatively, he moved his head right and left, then up and down. No one opposed this action. Encouraged, he ventured to draw up one leg, then the other, and finally, aided by his hands, raised himself from the bench and found his feet. At this moment, a door opened and an impressive-looking officer appeared in the doorway. He finished exchanging a few words with somebody in the next room and then approached the prisoner. "Are you named Bonacieux?"

"Yes, officer, at your service," stammered the mercer, more dead than alive.

"Enter," said the officer, stepping aside so the mercer could pass.

The latter obeyed without a word, entering the chamber where it seemed he was awaited. It was a large study, the walls adorned with arms offensive and defensive. The atmosphere was close and stifling, and there was a fire in the hearth, though it was not yet the end of September. A square table occupied the centre of the room, covered with books and papers upon which was unrolled an immense map of the city of La Rochelle. Standing before the chimney was a man of medium height, of a haughty and proud demeanour, with piercing eyes, a high forehead, and a slender face elongated further by the pointed goatee called a Royale, surmounted by a thin, sharp moustache. Although this man was barely thirty-six or thirty-seven years of age, his hair, moustache, and Royale were greying. He lacked a sword but had the aura of a man of war, and his buff boots were still lightly covered with the dust that showed he'd ridden a horse that day. This man was Armand-Jean Duplessis, Cardinal of Richelieu – not as he is often represented, a broken old man, suffering like a martyr: body crippled, voice fading, buried in a large armchair like one anticipating the tomb, living only by the force of his genius, while the strings with which he made the states of Europe dance like puppets gradually fall from his fingers. This was Richelieu as he really was at that time, a dynamic and gallant cavalier, his physical strength already beginning to fail but sustained by that moral force that made him one of the most extraordinary men of history. This was Richelieu, after having taken Nîmes, Castres, and Uzès, making his plans to drive the English from the coast of France and lay siege to La Rochelle, then support the Duke of Nevers in his claim to the Duchy of Mantua. At first glance, nothing about him denoted the cardinal, and it was impossible for one who didn't know his face to recognise who he was. The poor mercer remained standing in the doorway, while the eyes of the man before the chimney fixed upon him, eyes that seemed able to peer into the depths of the past. "Is this that Bonacieux?" he asked after a moment of silence.

"Yes, My Lord," replied the officer.

"Very well, give me those papers and leave us."

The officer picked up the designated papers from the table, handed them to the cardinal, bowed to the ground, and left. Bonacieux recognised the papers as a transcription of his interrogation in the Bastille. From time to time, the man by the chimney raised his eyes from the vellum and plunged them like daggers into the poor mercer's heart. At the end of ten minutes' reading of the papers, and ten seconds' scrutiny of Bonacieux, the cardinal's mind was made up. "That head has never conspired," he murmured, "but no matter, let us test him."

"You are accused of high treason," said the cardinal slowly.

"That's what they told me, My Lord," cried Bonacieux, giving his interrogator the honorific he'd heard the officer use, "but I swear I know nothing about it."

The cardinal repressed a smile. "You've conspired with your wife, Madam of Chevreuse, and Milord the Duke of Buckingham," he said sternly.

"In fact, My Lord," replied the mercer, "I have heard her mention those names."

"On what occasion?"

"She said that Cardinal Richelieu had drawn the Duke of Buckingham to Paris to destroy him, and the queen with him."

"She said that?" the cardinal barked.

"Y-yes, My Lord! But I told her that she was wrong to bother about such matters, and that His Eminence was incapable..."

"Be silent. You are an imbecile," said the cardinal.

"That's just what my wife said, My Lord."

"Do you know who abducted your wife?"

"No, My Lord."

"You have suspicions, however?"

"Yes, My Lord; but these suspicions appeared to disturb Sir Commissioner, so I no longer have them."

"Your wife has escaped, did you know that?"

"No, My Lord! I heard about it only since I've been in prison, through Sir Commissioner, a nice, amiable man!"

The cardinal repressed a second smile. "Then you are ignorant of what has become of your wife since her escape?"

"Absolutely, My Lord; but I'm sure she'll return to the Louvre."

"As of one o'clock this morning, she had not yet returned."

"Good God! What has become of her, then?"

"We shall know, rest assured. Nothing can be hidden from the cardinal; the cardinal knows all."

"In that case, My Lord, do you think the cardinal would consent to my asking him what has become of my wife?"

"Perhaps. But first of all, you must confess everything you know about the relations of your wife with Madam of Chevreuse."

"But, My Lord, I know nothing about Madam of Chevreuse. I've never even seen her!"

"When you went to fetch your wife from the Louvre, did you always return directly home?"

"Almost never. She had business with linen merchants, and I escorted her to their houses."

"And how many of these linen merchants were there?"

"Two, My Lord."

"Where did they dwell?"

"One, just around the corner in the Rue of Vaugirard, and the other, halfway down the Rue of La Harpe."

"Did you enter these houses with her?"

"Never, My Lord. I always waited at the door."

"And what pretext did she give you for entering alone?"

"She didn't give me any. She told me to wait, so I waited."

"You are a complaisant husband, my dear Sir Bonacieux," said the cardinal.

"He calls me his dear sir!" the mercer said to himself. "Plague! Affairs go well!"

"Would you recognise those doors?"

"Yes."

"You know the addresses?"

"Yes."

"What are they?"

"Number 25 in the Rue of Vaugirard and number 75 in the Rue of la Harpe."

"That's good," said the cardinal. He picked up a small silver bell and rang it, and the officer re-entered. "Go, and find me Rochefort," the cardinal said in an undertone. "He's to come immediately, if he's returned."

"The count is already here," said the officer, "and requests to speak with Your Eminence right away."

"With Your Eminence!" murmured Bonacieux, who knew this was the title ordinarily given to the cardinal. "To Your Eminence!"

"Let him come in, then, let him come in!" said Richelieu.

The officer hastened from the room, with the speed the servants of the cardinal usually displayed in obedience to his orders. "To Your Eminence!" murmured Bonacieux again. Five seconds scarcely elapsed between the officer's exit and the appearance in the doorway of a new face. Bonacieux took one look and cried, "That's him!"

"Who?" asked the cardinal.

"The man who abducted my wife!"

The cardinal rang a second time. The officer reappeared. "Return this man to the custody of his guards. He's to wait until I call for him."

"No, My Lord, that's not him!" cried Bonacieux. "I was deceived! It was another man who doesn't resemble him at all! Sir here is a very respectable person!"

"Take that imbecile away!" said the cardinal.

The officer took Bonacieux by the arm and returned him to the antechamber, where his guards awaited him. The new arrival gazed after Bonacieux impatiently until he was gone. When the door was firmly closed, he said, "They have seen each other."

"Who?" asked His Eminence.

"She and he."

"What? The queen and the duke?" said Richelieu.

"Yes."

"And where was this?"

"At the Louvre."

"You're sure of this?"

"Perfectly sure."

"Who told you of it?"

"Madam of Lannoy who is devoted to Your Eminence as you know."

"Why didn't she say so sooner?"

"By chance or by distrust, the queen had made Madam of Fargis sleep in her chamber, and she was under her eye all day."

"Well, we're beaten. Let us try to take our revenge."

"I am yours, My Lord."

"How did this happen?"

"At half past midnight, the queen was with her women, in her bedchamber, when someone came and brought her a handkerchief from her linen maid."

"And then?"

"The queen immediately reacted with some strong emotion, becoming pale despite the rouge on her face."

"And then? And then?"

"The queen rose, and in a strangely altered voice, said, 'Mesdames, wait for me ten minutes, and I'll return.' Then she opened the door of her alcove and went out."

"Why didn't Madam of Lannoy come to inform you that instant?"

"Nothing was yet certain; besides, the queen had said, 'Mesdames, wait for me,' and she didn't dare disobey the queen."

"How long was the queen out of her chamber?"

"Three quarters of an hour."

"Did none of her women accompany her?"

"Only Doña Estefania."

"Did she return at all during this time?"

"Yes, once. She took a small rosewood coffer, with her cipher on it, then left immediately."

"And when she returned later, did she have the coffer?"

"No."

"Does Madam of Lannoy know what she kept in that coffer?"

"Yes: the twelve diamond studs that His Majesty gave to the queen."

"And you say she returned without this coffer?"

"Yes."

"Madam of Lannoy's opinion, then, is that she gave them to Buckingham?"

"She is sure of it."

"How so?"

"During the day in her capacity as lady-in-waiting, Madam of Lannoy looked for the coffer and appeared uneasy at not finding it. Finally she asked the queen if she knew where it was."

"And the queen...?"

"The queen flushed, and replied that having broken one of the studs the previous evening, she had sent it to her goldsmith for repair."

"He must be interviewed to see whether or not this is true."

"I have just come from there."

"So – the goldsmith?"

"The goldsmith has heard nothing whatsoever of the matter."

"Well, well! Rochefort, all is not lost, and perhaps ... perhaps all is for the best!"

Rochefort frowned. "Of course, I don't doubt that Your Eminence's genius..."

"... Will repair the blunders of my agent. Is that it?"

"That's just what I was going to say, if Your Eminence had let me finish my sentence."

"Now, do you know the hiding places of the Duchess of Chevreuse and the Duke of Buckingham?"

"No, My Lord, my people could tell me nothing positive on that."

"But I know."

"You, My Lord?"

"Yes, there's not the least doubt. One stayed in the Rue of Vaugirard at number 25 and the other in the Rue of la Harpe, number 75."

"Does Your Eminence wish me to arrest them both?"

"It's too late – they'll be gone."

"Nonetheless, we can make sure."

"Take ten of my guards and search the two houses."

"I go, My Lord."

With a bow, Rochefort hurried from the room. The cardinal, left alone, reflected a moment, then rang a third time. The same officer appeared. "Bring in the prisoner," said the cardinal. Master Bonacieux was introduced anew. At a gesture from the cardinal, the officer retired. "You have deceived me," said the cardinal sternly.

"Me?" cried Bonacieux. "Me, deceive Your Eminence!"

"Your wife, when going to the Rue of Vaugirard and the Rue of la Harpe, wasn't going to the houses of linen merchants."

"And where was she going, by the good God?"

"She was going to meet the Duchess of Chevreuse and the Duke of Buckingham."

"That's right," said Bonacieux, recalling the events in question. "Yes, that's it, Your Eminence is right. I said to my wife many times that it was astonishing that linen merchants should live in such houses, houses that had no trade signs, and each time my wife laughed. Oh, My Lord!" Bonacieux threw himself at His Eminence's feet. "Oh! How truly you are the cardinal, the great cardinal, the man of genius whom all the world reveres."

To triumph over so lowly a creature as Bonacieux was no great victory but the cardinal nonetheless took a moment to enjoy it. Then, as if a new thought had occurred to him, a smile creased his lips, and taking the hand of the mercer, he said to him, "Rise, my friend. You are a worthy man."

"The cardinal has touched my hand! I have touched the hand of the great man!" said Bonacieux. "The great man has called me his friend!"

"Yes, my friend; yes!" said the cardinal, with that warm paternal tone that he knew how to assume sometimes but which didn't deceive those who knew him. "And since you have been unjustly suspected, well, you must be indemnified. Here: take this purse of a hundred pistoles, and be so kind as to pardon me."

"I, pardon you, My Lord!" Bonacieux hesitated to take the purse, fearing no doubt this pretended gift was only a joke. "But you are the master, free to have me arrested, to have me tortured, even to have me hanged, and no one would make the least objection. Pardon you, My Lord! You can't mean that!"

"Ah, my dear Sir Bonacieux! I see that you are generosity itself, and I thank you. So you'll take this purse, and won't go away too dissatisfied?"

"I shall go away enchanted, My Lord."

"Goodbye, then – or rather au revoir, for I hope that we shall meet again."

"Whenever My Lord wishes! I am completely at the orders of Your Eminence."

"It will be often, rest assured, for I've found your conversation extremely charming."

"Oh, My Lord!"

"See you shortly, Sir Bonacieux, see you shortly."

And the cardinal dismissed him with a friendly gesture. Bonacieux replied by bowing to the ground and backing out of the room. When he reached the antechamber, the cardinal heard him crying out enthusiastically, "Long live My Lord! Long live His Eminence! Long live the Great Cardinal!"

The cardinal listened smiling as Bonacieux's cries of praise dwindled into the distance. "Good," he said. "Henceforth, that man would kill himself for me." And the cardinal turned to examine with the greatest attention the map of La Rochelle that was open on the table, tracing with a pencil the line of the famous dyke that, eighteen months later, would close the port of the besieged city. As he was in the depths of his strategic meditations, the door reopened and Rochefort entered. "Well?" said the cardinal, rising with an eagerness that showed how important he considered the task he'd given the count.

"Well!" said the latter. "A young woman, aged twenty-six to twenty-eight, and a man, aged thirty-five or forty, were lodged in the houses indicated by Your Eminence, the one for four days and the other for five; but the woman left last night, and the man this morning."

"It was them!" cried the cardinal, looking at the clock. "By now it's too late to pursue them: the duchess is at Tours, and the duke at Boulogne. It's in London that we must catch up with them."

"What are Your Eminence's orders?"

"No one is to speak a word of what has passed. Let the queen remain perfectly secure, ignorant that we know her secret. Drop hints that will lead her to believe we're searching for some conspiracy or other. I shall need to see the Keeper of the Seals, Sir Séguier."

"And that man, what has Your Eminence done with him?"

"What man?" asked the cardinal.

"That Bonacieux."

"I've done all that could be done with him: I've set him to spy on his own wife." The Count Rochefort bowed in tribute to the superiority of the master and retired. Left alone, the cardinal seated himself anew, wrote a letter that he sealed with his personal signet, then rang the bell again. The officer entered for the fourth time. "Have Vitray come to me," he said, "And tell him to prepare for a long journey." Within minutes, the man he had asked for was standing before him, booted and spurred. "Vitray," said the cardinal, "you will leave immediately for London. Don't pause for an instant on the way. In London you will deliver this letter to Milady. Here is a note for two hundred pistoles: call upon my treasurer and have him pay you. You shall have as much again if you return here within six days and if you've executed your commission well." Without a word, the messenger bowed, took the letter and the note for two hundred pistoles, and left. The contents of the letter were as follows:

Milady,

Attend the first ball where you can meet the Duke of Buckingham. On his doublet will be a dozen diamond studs. Approach him and cut off 2. Once these studs are in your possession, inform me immediately.

The Men of the Robe & the Men of the Sword

Athos's imprisonment on d'Artagnan's behalf weighed on the young man's conscience. The day after Athos's interview with the cardinal, d'Artagnan and Porthos informed Sir Tréville of the circumstances of Athos's disappearance. Aramis was absent: he'd asked for a five-day leave, and was at Rouen, it was said, on family business. Sir Tréville was like a father to his soldiers. No matter how lowborn or obscure a man might be, once he donned the uniform of the company he could count on Tréville's aid and support as if the captain was his own brother. Tréville immediately went to call on the magistrate who oversaw the Paris police. The magistrate summoned the officer who commanded the Croix-Rouge precinct, and through his inquiries they determined that Athos was at that moment lodged at the prison of For-l'Evêque. Athos had passed through the same interrogations that Bonacieux had suffered. He'd said nothing until his confrontation with the mercer, for fear that if d'Artagnan were hampered by the police, he might not have time to complete his mission. But after his interview with the commissioner Athos insisted his name was Athos and not d'Artagnan. He added that he knew neither Sir nor Madam Bonacieux and had never spoken with either. He'd gone at ten in the evening to pay a visit to his friend Sir d'Artagnan but before that hour he'd been dining at Sir Tréville's; twenty witnesses could attest to this fact, and he named several distinguished gentlemen, including the Duke of La Trémouille. The Commissioner of the For-l'Evêque was as confounded by the musketeer's simple and firm declaration as the Commissioner of the Bastille had been. He was eager to take that vengeance that the Men of the Robe love to win over the Men of the Sword but the mighty names of Gentlemen of Tréville and of La Trémouille inspired caution. The commissioner decided he was out of his depth and sent Athos back to the cardinal but unfortunately the cardinal was at the Louvre, conferring with the king. At precisely this moment Sir Tréville himself arrived at the Louvre. After leaving the criminal lieutenant he'd called on the Governor of For-l'Evêque but had been unable to find Athos. As Captain of the Musketeers, Sir Tréville had entrée to the king at all hours and was taken directly to His Majesty. It's well-known how suspicious the king was of the queen, suspicions the cardinal continually encouraged, as in matters of intrigue he himself mistrusted women infinitely more than men. A principal cause of the king's distrust was the friendship of Anne of Austria for Marie of Rohan, the Duchess of Chevreuse. These two women worried him more than the wars with Spain, the disputes with England, and the chronic embarrassment of the finances. The king believed that Madam of Chevreuse served the queen not only in her political intrigues but what was far worse, in her amorous affairs. At the cardinal's first mention of Madam of Chevreuse the king grimaced with anger. Exiled to Tours, she'd been believed to be in that city. Now the king learned that she'd been in Paris for five days, outmanoeuvring the police, and this made Louis furious. Though himself capricious and unfaithful, this king wished to be known as Louis the Just and Louis the Chaste. Posterity has had difficulty awarding him these titles, as history concerns itself with facts rather than intentions. The cardinal added that not only had Madam of Chevreuse been in Paris but that the queen had renewed her correspondence with her through the aid of a mysterious cabal. Just as the cardinal had been on the verge of untangling this web of intrigue and arresting the queen's emissary in flagrante delicto with all necessary proofs, a King's Musketeer had dared to interfere, disrupting the course of justice by falling, sword in hand, on the honest lawmen charged with investigating the affair on the King's behalf. At these words, Louis XIII could no longer contain himself and made a threatening step toward the queen's apartments, trembling with that pale and mute indignation that at times led this prince to commit acts of the coldest cruelty. And the cardinal had not yet said a word about the Duke of Buckingham. At this moment Sir Tréville entered: cool, polite, and irreproachable in dress and demeanour. Warned of what had passed by the presence of the cardinal and by the look on the king's face, Tréville felt very much like Samson before the Philistines. Louis already had his hand on the doorknob; at the sound of Tréville's entrance, he turned. "Your arrival is timely, Sir," said the king, who could never dissemble when in a passion. "I've learned some pretty things about your musketeers."

"And I," said Sir Tréville coolly, "have some pretty things to tell Your Majesty about your Men of the Robe."

"Do you say so?" said the king, haughtily.

"I have the honour to inform Your Majesty," continued Tréville in the same tone, "that a party of bailiffs, functionaries, and police, worthy men but inveterately biased against the uniform, have dared to arrest, lead away through the open street, and throw into the For-l'Evêque, one of my musketeers – or rather one of yours, Sire. They've done all this on an order they've refused to show me, imprisoning a man whose conduct is irreproachable, whose reputation is illustrious, and whom Your Majesty knows well: Sir Athos."

"Athos," said the King, mechanically. "Yes, as a matter of fact, I do know that name."

"Your Majesty may recall," said Tréville, "that Athos is the musketeer who had the bad luck to grievously wound Sir Cahusac in that unfortunate duel at the Carmelite convent. Speaking of whom, My Lord," continued Tréville, addressing the cardinal, "Sir Cahusac is quite recovered, is he not?"

"He is, thank you!" said the cardinal, lips pinched with anger.

"The other evening," continued Tréville, "Sir Athos went to pay a visit to one of his friends, a young Béarnaise who is a cadet in des Essarts's company of His Majesty's Guards. This friend was absent, so Athos decided to wait but scarcely had he sat and picked up a book, when a swarm of bailiffs and officers appeared. They laid siege to the house, forcing numerous doors..."

The cardinal made a gesture to the king that signified: This was the affair I spoke to you about.

"We know all about that," interrupted the king, "because it was all done on our service."

"Then," said Tréville, "was it also on Your Majesty's service that they seized one of my innocent musketeers, placed him between two guards like a malefactor and promenaded him before a jeering populace? This gallant man, who has ten times shed his blood in Your Majesty's service, and would do so again?"

"Bah!" said the king, disturbed. "Is that how it was handled?"

"Sir Tréville fails to mention," said the cardinal phlegmatically, "that this innocent musketeer, this so-gallant man, had an hour before drawn his sword on four Commissioners of Inquiry, men delegated by me to investigate an affair of the highest importance."

"I defy Your Eminence to prove it," cried Sir Tréville, with his Gascon verve and military brusqueness, "for, one hour before, after having dined with me, Sir Athos did me the honour to converse in the salon at my hôtel with Sir Duke of La Trémouille and Sir Count of Charlus. Sir Athos, I must confide to Your Majesty, is under his real name a man of the highest quality."

The king looked at the cardinal. Responding to this mute inquiry, the cardinal said, "A full process verbal supports the accusation, and the maltreated officers have drawn up the following indictment that I have the honour to present to Your Majesty."

"A process verbal of Men of the Robe against the word of honour of a Man of the Sword?" replied Tréville haughtily.

"Come, come, Tréville, calm yourself," said the king.

"If His Eminence suspects one of my musketeers," said Tréville, "the justice of Your Eminence is sufficiently well-known for me to demand an inquest of him."

The cardinal was undisturbed. "Lodging in this house upon which justice had descended is, I believe, a Béarnaise friend of the musketeer."

"Your Eminence speaks of Sir d'Artagnan?"

"I speak of a young man whom you've made a protégé, Sir Tréville."

"Yes, Your Eminence, that's the one."

"We suspect this young man of having been a malign influence..."

"On Sir Athos, a man double his age?" interrupted Sir Tréville. "No, My Lord. Besides, Sir d'Artagnan had passed the evening at my hôtel."

"Really?" said the cardinal. "Did everyone involved in this affair spend the evening at your hôtel?"

"Your Eminence doubts my word?" said Tréville, face reddening with anger.

"No, God forbid!" said the cardinal. "But tell me, at what hour was he with you?"

"Now that I can speak about knowledgeably as when he entered, I remarked that it was half-past nine, though I'd thought it was later."

"And at what hour did he leave your hôtel?"

"At ten-thirty, an hour after the event."

"But then," replied the cardinal, who didn't doubt Tréville's integrity for a moment, and sensed that the victory was escaping him, "you can't deny that Athos was taken in that house on the Rue des Fossoyeurs."

"Is it forbidden for a friend to visit a friend? Or a musketeer of my company to fraternize with a guard of des Essarts's company?"

"Yes, when the house in which he fraternizes with his friend is suspected."

"You see, that house is suspected, Tréville," said the king. "Perhaps you didn't know that?"

"No, Sire, I was ignorant of the fact. But even if the house is suspected, I'm sure it doesn't apply to the part inhabited by Sir d'Artagnan. For I must say, Sire, that, to hear him tell it, there exists no more devoted servant of Your Majesty, or more profound admirer of Your Eminence."

"Wasn't this d'Artagnan the one who wounded Jussac in that unfortunate encounter near the Carmelite convent?" the king asked the cardinal who flushed with irritation.

"Yes, Sire, and Bernajoux the next day. Your Majesty has an excellent memory."

"Come, how shall we resolve this?" said the king.

"That's up to Your Majesty," said the cardinal. "Personally, I would affirm the man's guilt."

"And I would deny it," said Tréville. "But Your Majesty has judges. Let the judges decide."

"Quite so," said the king. "Let's set the case before the magistrates. It's their job to judge, so let them judge."

"Only it's tragic that in these sad times, even a pure life of incontestable virtue can't exempt a man from infamy and persecution," continued Tréville. "Believe me, Your Majesty's army won't be happy about seeing one of their own maltreated on account of police affairs."

The choice of words was provocative but Sir Tréville had used it quite deliberately. He wanted an explosion, because an exploding mine emits fire, and fire casts light. "Police affairs!" cried the king, echoing Tréville. "Police affairs! And what do you know of those, Sir? Stick to your musketeers, and stop vexing me! According to you, if by some mischance we arrest one musketeer, all France is endangered. All this fuss about one musketeer? I'd arrest ten of them, Blue belly! A hundred even – the whole company! And no one can dare tell me not to!"

"From the moment Your Majesty suspects them," said Tréville, "the musketeers are guilty. In that case, Sire, I'm ready to surrender my sword to you. No doubt Your Eminence, after accusing my men, will end by accusing me. I'll consider myself a prisoner along with Sir Athos, who is already under arrest, and Sir d'Artagnan, who will doubtless be arrested at any moment."

"Are you finished with your Gasconade?" said the king.

"Sire," replied Tréville, without lowering his voice in the least, "order my musketeer restored to me or let him be tried."

"He shall be tried," said the cardinal.

"Very well, so much the better. I will demand of His Majesty permission to plead for him."

The king wanted to avoid a judicial brawl. He said, "If His Eminence didn't have a personal interest..."

The cardinal saw where the king was going, and forestalled him. "Pardon me," he said, "but the moment Your Majesty regards me as a prejudiced judge, I must recuse myself."

"Enough of this," said the king. "Tréville, will you swear to me, by the name of my father, that Sir Athos was at your hôtel during the event and took no part in it?"

"By your glorious father and by yourself, whom I love and venerate more than all else in the world, I swear it!"

"Reflect, if you please, Sire," said the cardinal. "If we set the prisoner free, we will never be able to know the truth of this affair."

"Sir Athos will always be available," replied Sir Tréville, "ready to appear whenever it pleases the Gentlemen of the Robe to interrogate him. He'd never desert, Your Eminence – I'll answer for it."

"It's true, he'd never desert," said the king. "One can always summon him, as Sir Tréville says. Besides," he added, lowering his voice and almost pleading with His Eminence, "let's give them a little security – it would be politic, don't you think?"

Louis XIII's politics made Richelieu smile. "Order it so, Sire. You have the right of amnesty."

"The right of amnesty applies only to the guilty," said Tréville, out to get the last word, "and my musketeer is innocent. Thus it's not a ruling of amnesty, Sire but justice."

"You say he's in For-l'Evêque?" said the king.

"Yes, Sire, in solitary confinement in a dungeon, like the worst kind of criminal."

"The devil! The devil!" murmured the king. "What to do?"

"Sign the order that puts him at liberty and there's nothing more to say," replied the cardinal. "Like Your Majesty, I believe the guarantee of Sir Tréville is more than sufficient."

Tréville bowed respectfully but his joy was tainted by suspicion; he would have preferred stubborn resistance from the cardinal to this sudden compliance. The king wrote the order for Athos's liberation and gave it to Tréville, who immediately prepared to take his leave. As he was about to go, the cardinal gave him a friendly smile, and said to the king, "In your musketeers, Sire, perfect harmony reigns between the soldiers and the commander. It's a credit to the service, and benefits everyone."

"He's about to play me some dirty trick," Tréville said to himself. "I'll never get the last word when dealing with such a man. But quickly, quickly – the king could change his mind any moment. And most importantly, it's harder to get a man back into the Bastille or For-l'Evêque once he's out, than to keep him there once he's in."

Sir Tréville made a triumphant entrance into For-l'Evêque, from whence he delivered his musketeer, who'd continued to maintain his serene indifference. Then, the first time Tréville saw d'Artagnan, he said, "You've had a lucky escape; this squares the account for your wounding of Jussac. But there still remains the reckoning for Bemajoux, so don't be too cocksure."

Wise advice, for Sir Tréville had good reason to fear that the cardinal might have yet another arrow in his quiver. The Captain of Musketeers had scarcely closed the door behind him before His Eminence said to the king, "Now that we're alone, we can talk seriously, if it please Your Majesty. Sire, Sir Buckingham has been in Paris for five days, and only left it this morning."

In Which Séguier, the Keeper of the Seals Looks More Than Once for the Bell He Used to Ring

It is impossible to convey the effect the name Buckingham had upon Louis XIII. He grew red, then pale, then red again; and the cardinal saw that with one phrase he'd won back all the ground he'd lost to Tréville. "Buckingham! In Paris!" cried the king. "Why did he come here?"

"No doubt to conspire with your enemies, the Huguenots and the Spanish."

"No, by God – no! He came to conspire against my conjugal honour, with Madam of Chevreuse, Madam of Longueville, and the Condés!"

"Sire! What an idea! The queen is far too prudent, and loves Your Majesty too well."

"Woman is weak, Your Eminence," said the king, "and as for loving me too well, I have my own opinion about that."

"Nonetheless, I maintain that the Duke of Buckingham came to Paris for no other reason than politics," said the cardinal.

"And I am quite sure that he came for something else, Your Eminence! By God! If the queen is guilty, she'll suffer for this!"

"In point of fact," said the cardinal, "reluctant though I am to contemplate such treachery, Your Majesty's ire compels me to consider it. Madam of Lannoy – whom I interrogate frequently, as Your Majesty has commanded – Madam of Lannoy told me this morning that Her Majesty was up very late the night before last. Furthermore, this morning she was crying, and spent hours writing something."

"Writing! To him, no doubt," said the King. "Cardinal, I must have the queen's papers."

"But how can you get them, Sire? It seems to me that neither Your Majesty nor I can demand them of her."

"How did they do it with Concini's wife?" roared the king. "They searched her armoires, desks, and finally they searched her."

"Concini's wife was merely Concini's wife: a Florentine adventuress, Sire, nothing more. Your Majesty's august spouse is Anne of Austria, Queen of France – in other words, one of the most exalted Princess on earth."

"That doesn't make her any less guilty, Your Eminence! The more she forgets her high position, the guiltier she is, and the farther she has to fall! I decided some time ago to put an end to all these petty intrigues of love and politics. She has in her household a certain La Porte..."

"Whom I believe is the mastermind behind all this," said the cardinal.

"So you think, as I do, that she's deceiving me?" said the king.

"Sire, I believe, and I repeat once again, that the queen conspires against Your Majesty's power, not Your Majesty's honour."

"And I tell you it's against both! I tell you, the queen does not love me. I tell you, she loves another. I tell you, Sir, she loves that wretch the Duke of Buckingham! Why didn't you have him arrested while he was in Paris?"

"What? Arrest the Duke of Buckingham, the Prime Minister of King Charles of England? What can you be thinking, Sire? There'd be an international uproar! Worse, if Your Majesty's suspicions – which I don't by any means endorse – were discovered to have any foundation to them, what a scandal there would be!"

"But since Buckingham's proven himself a rogue and a sneak, he should have been..." Louis XIII stopped short, terrified by what he'd almost said. Richelieu stretched his neck toward him, hoping to coax out the word that remained unsaid on the king's lips.

"...Yes, Sire? He should have been..."

"Nothing," said the king, "nothing. But, while he was in Paris, I assume you never lost sight of him?"

"Oh, no, Sire."

"Where did he stay?"

"A house in the Rue of La Harpe."

"Which is where?"

"In the neighbourhood of the Luxembourg."

"And you're sure that he and the queen didn't see each other?"

"I believe the queen is too committed to her duties, Sire."

"But they've corresponded – it's to him the queen's been writing all day. Your Eminence, I must have those letters!"

"But, Sire..."

"Your Eminence, I must have them – whatever the price!"

"If I could observe to Your Majesty..."

"Do you betray me as well, Sir, by this way you have of always opposing my will? Are you, too, allied with the Spanish and the English, with Madam of Chevreuse and the queen?"

"Sire," replied the cardinal, sighing, "I thought I was above such suspicions."

"Your Eminence, I have spoken. I will have those letters!"

"In that case, there's only one way to do it."

"Which is?"

"To charge the Keeper of the Seals with the mission. This kind of task falls within the duties of Sir Séguier's position."

"Have him sent for this instant!"

"He should be at my hôtel, Sire. I had asked him to call, and when I left for the Louvre, I left orders to have him wait for me if he appeared."

"Have him sent for this instant!"

"Your Majesty's orders shall be executed, of course; but..."

"But what?"

"But ... the queen may refuse to obey."

"What? Disobey my orders?"

"She might, if she doesn't know the order came from the king."

"Very well: to remove all doubt, I'll go and tell her myself!"

"Your Majesty won't forget that I've done all I could to prevent an open break?"

"Yes, I know that you're very indulgent toward the queen – too indulgent, perhaps. And I must say, I may have to speak to you about that later."

"Whenever it pleases Your Majesty. But I shall always be happy and proud, Sire, to sacrifice myself for the cause of harmony between you and the Queen of France."

"Fine, Cardinal, fine; but meanwhile send for the Keeper of the Seals. As for myself, I will go see the queen."

And Louis XIII opened the door and passed into the chamber that led to the suite of Anne of Austria. The queen was in the midst of her women: Madam of Guitaut, Madam of Sable, Madam of Montbazon, and Madam of Guéménée. In the corner was her Spanish lady-in-waiting, Doña Estefania, who had followed her from Madrid. Madam of Guéménée was reading aloud and everyone was listening attentively, with the exception of the queen. She'd requested this reading so that, while pretending to listen, she could follow the thread of her own thoughts. These thoughts, gilded as they were in the glow of love, were nonetheless sad. Anne of Austria was deprived of the confidence of her husband and pursued by the hatred of the cardinal, who could not forgive her for having repulsed his own tender feelings. She had before her eyes the example of the queen mother, now also tormented by the hatred of the cardinal – although Marie de Médicis, if the memoirs of the time can be believed, had at one time granted the cardinal the favour Anne of Austria had refused him. One by one the queen's most devoted servants, her most intimate confidants, her dearest favourites, had all been sent away. It was as if she was endowed with a fatal gift that brought misfortune to all she touched; her friendship was a curse, a magnet for persecution. Her closest friends, Madam of Chevreuse and Madam du Vernet, had been exiled; and her cloak-bearer, La Porte, admitted to her that he expected to be arrested at any minute. She was deep in the most profound and sombre of these reflections when the door to the chamber opened and the king entered. The reader instantly stopped, the ladies all rose, and there was a heavy silence. The king made no pretence of politeness but marched right up to the queen. "Madam," he said, stuttering slightly, "y-you will receive a visit from Sir the K-keeper of the Seals. He will communicate certain matters to you, with which I have charged him."

The unhappy queen paled under her rouge. Though she had been threatened before with divorce, exile, or even trial and repudiation, she couldn't help saying, "But why this visit from the Keeper of the Seals, Sire? What can Sir Séguier say to me that Your Majesty can't tell me yourself?"

The king turned on his heel without reply, and at almost the same instant the Captain of the Queen's Guard, Sir Guitaut announced the arrival of the Keeper of the Seals. By the time Sir Séguier appeared, the king had already left by another door. The Keeper of the Seals entered half-smiling, half-blushing. As he may reappear in the course of this history, he deserves a brief introduction. This Sir Séguier was a pleasant gentleman. It was des Roches le Masle, canon at Notre-Dame and former secretary to the cardinal, who had introduced him to His Eminence as a totally devoted man. The cardinal trusted him and found him useful. Among the stories told of him, one is that, after a stormy youth, he had retired into a monastery for a while, to do penance for the follies of adolescence. However, once behind the doors of the holy place, the poor penitent found they were unable to shut out the passions of carnal lust that pursued him. These passions obsessed him; he confided his disgrace to the superior, who recommended that, when tormented by the demon of temptation, he should take to the bell-rope and toll the bells until he was exorcised. At the sound of the bells, the monks would know that a brother was besieged by temptation, and the entire community would go to prayers. This seemed like good advice to the future Keeper of the Seals. He tried to exorcise the evil spirit of lust with the assistance of the monks' prayers but the devil is not so easily dispossessed from a fortress he has garrisoned. As the monks redoubled their prayers, so Satan redoubled his temptations. Day and night the bells pealed out, proclaiming the penitent's need of mortification. The monks no longer had a minute of rest. By day, they did nothing but go up and down the steps that led to the chapel; by night, in addition to the prayers of compline and matins, they had to leap twenty times from their beds and prostrate themselves on the floors of their cells. No one knows whether it was the devil who let go or the monks who gave up but, in less than three months, the penitent reappeared in the world outside, with the reputation of having had the most terrible demonic possession ever recorded. After leaving the monastery, Séguier became a magistrate. He stepped into the presiding judgeship formerly held by his uncle and embraced the party of the cardinal that proved he didn't lack brains. Appointed Keeper of the Seals, he served His Eminence with zeal in his campaign against the queen mother and his vengeance on Anne of Austria. He oversaw the judges in the Chalais affair, and encouraged the efforts of Sir Laffemas, Grand Executioner of France. Finally, having completely earned the confidence of the cardinal, he was given the singular mission for which he had presented himself in the chambers of the queen. The queen was still standing when he entered but as soon as she noticed him she re-seated herself on her armchair, and made a sign to her women to resume their cushions and stools. Then, in a tone of supreme hauteur, Anne of Austria said, "What do you desire, Sir? Why are you here?"

"To make, Madam, in the name of the king, and with all due respect to Your Majesty, a thorough investigation of your papers."

"What, Sir! An investigation of my papers? Such a thing would be a gross indignity."

"I beg your pardon, Madam but under the circumstances, you can see that I'm merely the king's instrument. Wasn't His Majesty just here, and didn't he warn you to prepare for this visit?"

"Search, then, Sir! It seems I am a criminal. Estefania, give him the keys of my desks and secretaries."

Sir Séguier for form's sake searched all the furniture, though he knew quite well that he wouldn't find the queen's letter in a desk. When the bureaucrat had opened and closed the desk drawers twenty times, he had no choice but to overcome his hesitation and proceed to the affair's inevitable conclusion: in other words, to search the queen herself. With an air of embarrassment, the Keeper of the Seals advanced toward Anne of Austria and said in an unnatural voice, "And now it's time for me to make the principal investigation."

"Which is?" demanded the queen, who didn't understand, or rather was unwilling to understand.

"His Majesty is certain that you wrote a letter today, and he knows it hasn't yet been sent. This letter isn't in your desk, or your secretary but nonetheless, it is somewhere."

"Would you dare to lay a hand on your queen?" said Anne of Austria, drawing up to her full height and glaring at the bureaucrat with an expression almost menacing.

"I am a loyal subject of the king, Madam, and all that His Majesty orders, I will do."

"There's no doubt of that," said Anne of Austria, "and the spies of Your Eminence have served him well. I have written a letter today, and that letter has not yet been sent. The letter ... is here."

And the queen pressed her beautiful hand to her bosom. "Then give me that letter, Madam," said Sir Séguier.

"I will give it to no one but the king, Sir," said Anne.

"If the king had wanted that letter given up to him, Madam, he'd have demanded it of you himself. I must repeat, I'm the one who's been charged with recovering it from you and if you won't give it up..."

"Well?"

"His Majesty has charged me to take it from you."

"How! What's that you say?"

"That my orders go far, Madam. I'm authorised to search for the suspected letter even on the person of Your Majesty."

"What horror!" cried the queen.

"Be kind enough, Madam, to comply with my mission."

"To lay hands on me would be an act of infamous violence! Do you know that, Sir?"

"The king commands, Madam; please excuse me."

In the queen ran the hot imperial blood of Spain and Austria. "I will not tolerate it!" she cried. "No, no – I would rather die!" Séguier made a deep and reverential bow, then, clearly intending to fully execute his commission, he approached Anne of Austria like the torturer's assistant in a chamber of inquisition. The queen's eyes gushed tears of rage. The queen was a great beauty as has been noted. Some might consider Séguier's mission rather indelicate but the king was so jealous of Buckingham he was no longer jealous of other men. No doubt Sir Séguier's hands clutched at that moment for the famous bell-rope but not finding it, he reached instead for where the queen had said he could find the letter. Anne of Austria took a step backward, so pale she looked like death. Then, leaning with her left hand on a table behind her to keep from falling, with her right she drew the paper from between her breasts and handed it to Keeper of the Seals. "You see, Sir, here is the letter. Take it!" the queen cried in a broken, trembling voice. "Take it, and take your odious presence away from me."

Sir Séguier, trembling as well for reasons it's easy to guess, took the letter, bowed to the ground, and retired. The door was scarcely closed on him when the queen fell, half-fainting, into the arms of her women. The Keeper of the Seals carried the letter to the king without reading a single word of it. The king took it with shaking hands, looked for an address, and finding none, became very pale. He opened it slowly, and then, seeing from the first words that it was addressed to the King of Spain, he read it rapidly. The whole thing was a plan of attack on the cardinal. The queen urged her brother and the Emperor of Austria to seem injured, as in fact they were, by the policies of Richelieu, whose eternal preoccupation was the defeat of the Hapsburgs. She urged them to declare war on France and demand the dismissal of the cardinal as a condition of the peace. But of love, the letter contained not a single word. The king, overjoyed, inquired if the cardinal was still in the Louvre. On being told that His Eminence awaited the orders of His Majesty in the study, the king went straight to him. "There, Cardinal," he said, "you were right, and I was wrong. The whole intrigue is political, and there's not the slightest question of love in this letter. On the other hand, there is a great deal about you."

The cardinal took the letter and read it with the greatest attention: once, and then a second time. "Well, Your Majesty," he said, "You see how far my enemies will go. They menace you with two wars unless you dismiss me. In truth, if I were in your position, Sire, I would yield to such powerful arguments. Personally, it would be a relief for me to retire from public affairs."

"What are you saying, Cardinal?"

"I'm saying, Sire, that these struggles, these never-ending labours are destroying my health. In all probability I won't have the stamina for a siege of La Rochelle, and Your Majesty is better off appointing either Condé or Bassompierre for it, a valiant man who is in the right condition to lead a war, rather than me. I'm a man of the Church, though I've been diverted from my vocation and have had to apply myself to things for which I have no aptitude. Release me, Sire: you would be much happier in your domestic affairs, and you'd be applauded for it abroad."

"Your Eminence," said the king, "I understand. Rest easy: all those who are named in that letter will be punished as they deserve, even the queen herself."

"What are you saying, Sire? God forbid the queen should suffer the least inconvenience on my account! She has always believed I'm her enemy, Sire, though Your Majesty can bear witness that I always take her side, even against you. Of course, if she betrayed Your Majesty's honour, that would be another thing. In that case I'd be the first to say, 'No mercy, Sire – no mercy for the guilty!' But fortunately there's no question of that, and in this letter Your Majesty has a new proof of it."

"That's true, Your Eminence," said the king, "and you were right, as always. But the queen nonetheless deserves my anger."

"I beg your pardon but it's you, Sire, who have earned her anger. In truth, if she were to hold this against Your Majesty, I could understand it. Your Majesty has treated her with such severity ...!"

"That's how I will always treat my enemies, and yours, Cardinal, no matter how high their place, and how dangerous it may be to treat them severely."

"The queen may be my enemy, Sire but she's not yours. On the contrary, she's a devoted wife, submissive and irreproachable. Please allow me to intercede for her with Your Majesty."

"She should humble herself and reconcile with me first!"

"On the contrary, Sire, set the example! You were first to be in the wrong, since it was you who suspected the queen."

"What, me – reconcile with her first?" said the king. "Never!"

"Sire, I implore you to do so."

"Besides, how could I reconcile with her?"

"By doing something you know she would like."

"Such as?"

"Give a ball. You know how much the queen loves to dance. I will answer for it, she can't hold onto her resentment if you offer her a fête."

"Your Eminence, you know I don't enjoy such worldly pleasures."

"The queen will be all the more grateful to you since she knows you dislike such frivolous amusements. Besides, it would be an opportunity for her to show off those beautiful diamond studs you gave her for her birthday, and which she's not yet had a chance to display."

"We shall see, Your Eminence, we shall see," said the king. In his delight at finding the queen guilty of a crime he didn't care about, and innocent of the offence he so dreaded, the king was entirely ready for a rapprochement. "We shall see but, upon my honour, you are too indulgent toward her."

"Sire," said the cardinal, "leave severity to your ministers. Clemency is a royal virtue; rely on clemency, and you'll be pleased with the results." Upon which the cardinal, hearing the clock strike eleven, bowed deeply and asked permission of the king to retire. Anne of Austria, after the seizure of her letter, expected some reproach, and was astonished when the next day the king made overtures of reconciliation. Her first reaction was to reject him; her womanly pride and queenly dignity had both been so cruelly outraged that she simply couldn't make up with him at the first advance. However, on the advice of her women, she finally began at least to pretend to forget. The king took advantage of this favourable moment to immediately tell her that he was considering giving a ball. A ball was such a rare thing for poor Anne of Austria that at this announcement, just as the cardinal had predicted, the last trace of her resentment disappeared – if not from her heart, at least from her face. She asked when this ball would take place but the king replied that he must discuss this point with the cardinal. Thereafter, the king asked the cardinal every day when this ball should occur, and every day the cardinal put off settling it on one pretext or another. A week passed away thus. The eighth day after the king proposed the fête to the queen, the cardinal received a letter, postmarked in London, consisting of nothing more than the following lines:

I have them but cannot leave London for lack of money. Send me five hundred pistoles, and four or five days after I have received them, I shall be in Paris.

The same day that the cardinal received this letter, the king asked his usual question. Richelieu counted on his fingers, and said to himself, "She'll arrive four or five days after receiving the money. Figure on four or five days to get the money to her, and four or five days for her to return that makes ten days. Allowing for contrary winds, bad luck, and a woman's weakness, we'll make it twelve days."

"Well, Your Eminence," said the king, "have you completed your calculations?"

"Yes, Sire. Today is September twentieth. The City Aldermen are giving a fête on October third. That would suit your purposes perfectly as you won't seem to be going too far in reconciling with the queen." Then the cardinal added, "By the way, Sire, don't forget to tell Her Majesty, the night before the ball, that you want to see how she'll look wearing those diamond studs."

017 In the Bonacieux Household

This was the second time the cardinal had made a point of mentioning the diamond studs to the king. Louis XIII was struck by this and thought there must be something important behind the cardinal's suggestion. More than once the king had been humiliated by the superior knowledge of the cardinal. His Eminence's police were excellent, and he was often better informed than Louis himself about what was happening in his own household. The king hoped a conversation with the queen might shed some new light on her activities, so he could return afterward to His Eminence knowing some secret that, whether the cardinal knew it already or not, would elevate him in the eyes of his minister. So he went to the queen and, following his usual practice, bullied her by making threats against the people of her household. Anne of Austria lowered her head and let the torrent flow by without reply, hoping it would run out once the king was satisfied. However, that wasn't what Louis XIII had in mind. The king wanted to provoke a response that would cast some light on events, convinced as he was that the cardinal was up to something and was preparing some terrible surprise in the way that only His Eminence knew how. Through persistent accusations, he eventually got what he wanted. “Please, Sire,” Anne cried, fed up with his vague attacks, “tell me what you really want. What have I actually done? What crimes have I committed? Your Majesty can’t possibly be this upset because of one letter written to my brother.”

The king, confronted directly like this, was unsure of what to say. He decided it was a good time to make the suggestion he was supposed to hold until the night before the ball. “Madam,” he said majestically, “there will soon be a ball at the Hôtel de Ville. To honour our worthy aldermen, I wish you to appear in full ceremonial attire, and I particularly want you to wear the diamond studs I gave you for your birthday. There: that is my response.” This response was terrible. Anne of Austria thought it meant that Louis knew everything, and that the cardinal had persuaded him to pretend otherwise for the last week, a deceit that was quite in character for him. She blanched, and groped for the support of a bureau with one of her beautiful hands that suddenly resembled a hand of wax. She looked at the king with terror in her eyes, and was unable to utter a single word. “You hear, Madam?” said the king, who was enjoying her embarrassment to its fullest, without comprehending its cause. “You hear?”

“Yes, Sire. I hear,” stammered the queen.

“You will appear at this ball?”

“Yes.”

“With those studs?”

“Yes!”

The queen’s pallor increased still more, till she was white as the lace of her collar. The king saw this and revelled in it, with that cold cruelty that was one of the worst sides of his character. “Then it’s agreed,” said the king, “and that’s all I have to say to you.”

“But when is this ball to take place?” asked Anne of Austria, barely able to speak.

Louis XIII felt instinctively that he should evade this question. “Very soon, Madam,” he said, “but I can’t precisely recall the date. I will ask the cardinal.”

“It was the cardinal, then, who proposed this fête to you?” cried the queen.

“Yes, Madam,” replied the king, astonished. “But what of that?”

“He’s the one who told you to require me to appear with the studs?”

“That is to say, Madam...”

“It was he, wasn’t it? Wasn’t it?”

“Yes, yes! What of it? What does it matter whether it was he, or I? Is there some crime in this request?”

“No, Sire.”

“Then, you’ll be there?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Fine,” said the king, retiring. “That’s fine. I count upon it.”

The queen curtsied, less from etiquette than because her knees were failing her. The king departed, delighted with his interview. “I’m lost!” murmured the queen. “Lost! The cardinal knows everything! He’s the one who’s been urging on the king who knows nothing yet but will soon know it all. I’m lost! My God! My God! My God!”

She knelt on a cushion and prayed, her head enfolded in her trembling arms. In truth, her position was dire. Buckingham had returned to London, Madam of Chevreuse was at Tours. More closely watched than ever, the queen felt sure that one of her women was betraying her but didn’t know how to tell which. La Porte didn’t dare leave the Louvre. She hadn’t a soul in the world in whom she could confide. Overcome by her troubles, threatened, menaced and feeling completely abandoned, she broke down and sobbed. “Is there anything I can do to help Your Majesty?” said a voice, full of sweetness and pity.

The queen turned eagerly, for there was no mistaking the tone of that voice. This was the voice of a friend. There, at one of the doors that gave onto the queen’s apartments, was the pretty Madam Bonacieux. She had been busy arranging dresses and linen in a closet when the king had entered. She’d been unable to leave and had heard everything. The queen, surprised and confused, gave a little shriek, for at first she didn’t recognise the young woman who had been brought into her household by La Porte. “Oh! Don’t be afraid, Madam,” said the young woman. Seeing the queen’s anguish brought tears to her own eyes, and joining her hands, she pleaded, “Listen, Your Majesty! I’m yours, body and soul, and no matter how far below you I may be, no matter how different our rank, I think I may be able to find a way to help Your Majesty out of this dilemma.”

“You! Oh, heavens! You!” cried the queen. “Come here. Look me in the face. I am betrayed on all sides. How can I confide in you?”

“Oh, Madam!” cried the young woman, falling to her knees, “Upon my soul, I’m ready to die for Your Majesty!”

This cry came from the bottom of her heart, like her first words, and couldn’t possibly be a deception. “You’re right, Madam,” continued Madam Bonacieux, “there are traitors here; but, by the holy name of the Virgin, I swear to you that no one is more devoted to Your Majesty than I am. Those studs the king demanded, you gave them to the Duke of Buckingham, didn’t you? I think those studs were kept in a little rosewood box that he carried away under his arm. Am I right? Isn’t that the case?”

“Oh, my God! My God!” murmured the queen, teeth chattering with fright.

“Very well,” said Madam Bonacieux, “we must get the studs back.”

“Yes, of course, that’s it,” cried the queen. “But how to do it?”

“Someone must be sent to the duke.”

“But who? Who can I trust?”

“Have confidence in me, Madam. Do me that honour, my queen, and I’ll find a messenger!”

“But I must write!”

“Oh, yes! That’s indispensable. I need a few words from the hand of Your Majesty, under your private seal.”

“But these few words could be my condemnation. It would mean divorce – exile!”

“Yes, if they fall into the wrong hands. But I will answer for it that these words are delivered to their address.”

“Dear God! Must I then place my life, my honour, my reputation, all in your hands?”

“Yes! Yes, Madam, you must, and I will save them all!”

“But how? Tell me that, at least.”

“My husband was set free a few days ago, though I haven’t yet had time to see him. He’s a brave and honest man with neither hatred nor love for anyone. He’ll do whatever I want: he’ll leave on an order from me without knowing what he carries; he’ll deliver Your Majesty’s letter to its address, without even knowing it’s from Your Majesty.”

The queen impulsively took up the young woman’s hands and looked at her as if to read into the depths of her heart. Seeing nothing but sincerity in her beautiful eyes, she embraced her tenderly. “Do it, then,” she said to her, “and you will have saved my life and honour!”

“Please, Madam, don’t exaggerate my service – I’m happy to do anything for you. Your Majesty’s honour is above question, there’s nothing for me to save. You’re just the victim of horrible schemes.”

“That’s true, my child, you’re quite right,” said the queen.

“Then give me that letter, Madam. We have little time.”

The queen ran to a small table on which she found ink, paper, and pens. She wrote two lines, sealed the letter with her private seal, and gave it to Madam Bonacieux. “But we’ve forgotten one absolute necessity,” said the queen.

“What’s that?”

“Money.”

Madam Bonacieux blushed. “Yes, that’s true,” she said, “and I confess to Your Majesty that my husband...”

“Your husband has none, is that what you want to say?”

“No, he does have some but he’s very greedy – that’s his one vice. However, Your Majesty shouldn’t be concerned – we’ll find the means.”

“I have none, either,” said the queen. (Those who’ve read the memoirs of Madam of Motteville won’t be surprised by this.) “But wait a moment.” Anne of Austria ran to her jewellery box. “Here,” she said, “here is a ring of great value or so I’ve been told. It comes from my brother, the King of Spain, and it’s mine to dispose of. Take this ring and convert it into cash, and then your husband can depart.”

“Within the hour, you shall be obeyed.”

“You see the address,” added the queen, speaking so low she could barely be heard. “To Milord the Duke of Buckingham, in London.”

“The letter shall be delivered to him personally.”

“Generous child!” cried Anne.

Madam Bonacieux kissed the queen’s hands, cached the paper in her bosom, and disappeared with the lightness of a bird. Ten minutes later she was at home. As she’d told the queen, she hadn’t seen her husband since his release, so she was ignorant of his new opinion of the cardinal, a change effected by His Eminence’s money and flattery, and confirmed since by two or three visits from the Count of Rochefort, who was Bonacieux’s new best friend. Rochefort had persuaded him there was nothing behind the abduction of his wife beyond mere political precaution. Madam Bonacieux found Sir Bonacieux alone, struggling to put his house back in order. On his return he’d found all but a few pieces of furniture broken and his wardrobes mostly empty, Justice not being one of the three things that King Solomon had stated leave no traces of their passage. The housemaid was gone, having fled upon the arrest of her master. The poor girl had been so overcome by fright she hadn’t stopped running from Paris until she reached her native province of Burgundy. Upon returning to his house, the worthy mercer had sent the news of his happy return to his wife, and his wife had replied with congratulations, assuring him she would pay him a visit at the first moment she could steal away from her duties. That first moment had taken five days to come about. Under other circumstances, this would have seemed rather long to Master Bonacieux; but his visit with the cardinal, and the visits from Rochefort, had given him plenty of subjects for reflection – and, as they say, nothing passes time like reflection. This was especially true in the case of Bonacieux, whose reflections were all rose-coloured. Rochefort called him his friend, his dear Bonacieux and kept telling him that the cardinal thought the world of him. The mercer already saw himself on the road to fortune and honours. For her part, Madam Bonacieux had also reflected but, it must be said, on something completely other than ambition. Despite herself, her thoughts constantly returned to that handsome young guardsman, so brave, and apparently so much in love. Married at eighteen to Sir Bonacieux, she’d always socialized with her husband’s friends, who lacked all attraction for a young woman whose heart was far above her position. Madam Bonacieux had remained indifferent to men and hadn’t fallen prey to any vulgar seductions. However, in this period, the title of gentleman had an irresistible allure for people of the middle class – and d’Artagnan was a gentleman. What’s more, he wore the uniform of the French Guards that, after the musketeers, was the uniform most admired by the ladies. Plus, he was handsome, young, and adventurous, and he spoke of love like a man who loved, and who longed to be loved in return. This was more than enough to turn the head of a twenty-three-year-old, and Madam Bonacieux had just arrived at that happy age. Though they hadn’t seen each other for more than a week, a week during which serious events had occurred for both of them, the two spouses found each other somewhat preoccupied. Nevertheless, Sir Bonacieux lit up with real joy and advanced toward his wife with open arms. Madam Bonacieux presented her cheek to him. “Let’s talk a bit,” she said.

“What?”

Bonacieux was astonished. “Yes, let’s talk. I have something of the greatest importance to tell you.”

“Indeed, and so do I – I have some rather serious questions of my own. Explain to me this abduction, if you would.”

“What’s this important thing, then? Is it about my imprisonment?”

“No, I didn’t know about that until the day it happened. But since you weren’t guilty of any crime, and weren’t an accomplice in any intrigue – since you know nothing, in fact, that might compromise either you or anyone else, I didn’t consider your imprisonment particularly important.”

“That’s easy for you to say, Madam!” replied Bonacieux, wounded at how little interest his wife had in his troubles. “Do you know I was plunged for a day and a night into a dungeon of the Bastille?”

“Well, a day and a night soon pass away. Let’s put your captivity behind us, and return to the thing that brings me to you.”

“What! The thing that brings you to me? Wasn’t it the desire to see a husband you haven’t seen for eight days?” asked the mercer, stung to the quick.

"Of course, that most of all – but something else besides."

"Tell me."

"It's very important, and our fortune may depend on it."

"Our fortune has already greatly changed since I saw you last, Madam Bonacieux. In fact, a few months from now, it wouldn't surprise me if we were the envy of a lot of people."

"That's right, especially if you follow the instructions I'm about to give you."

"To me?"

"Yes, to you. There's a good and holy mission to accomplish, Sir – with plenty of money to be gained at the same time." Madam Bonacieux knew that by mentioning money to her husband, she was preying on his weakness. But a man who has talked for ten minutes with Cardinal Richelieu, even if he's only a mercer, is not the same man. "Plenty of money to be gained!" said Bonacieux, pursing his lips.

"Yes, quite a bit."

"How much, do you think?"

"Maybe a thousand pistoles."

"So what you have to ask of me is very serious, then?"

"Yes."

"What must be done?"

"You must leave right away on a journey. I'll give you a letter that you mustn't part with for any reason, and which you will deliver into the proper hands at journey's end."

"And where am I supposed to go?"

"To London."

"Me – to London! Come now, you're joking, I have no business in London."

"But others need you to go there."

"Who are these 'others'? I warn you, I'll do nothing blindly. I intend to know not only what I'm exposing myself to but who I'm being exposed for."

"An illustrious person sends you, an illustrious person awaits you, and the reward will exceed your desires. That's all I'm able to promise you."

"Intrigues, intrigues, always more intrigues! I won't have any more to do with such things, thank you very much. That course is clear to me, thanks to Your Eminence."

"The cardinal!" cried Madam Bonacieux. "Have you seen the cardinal?"

"He sent for me," the mercer answered proudly.

"And I suppose you went when he called! You're so thoughtless."

"I must say I had little choice about whether to go or not, as I was taken between two guards. I must also say that, as I didn't yet know His Eminence, if I'd been able to avoid the visit, I'd have been happy to do so."

"Were you mistreated, then? Did he threaten you?"

"He gave me his hand, and called me his friend – his friend! Do you hear, Madam? I am the friend of the Great Cardinal!"

"The Great Cardinal!"

"Would you care to dispute that title, Madam?"

"I'm not about to dispute anything with him. But I warn you, the favour of a minister doesn't last – you'd be crazy to attach yourself to him. There are powers above the cardinal that don't depend on the whim of one man or the outcome of events. These are the powers we should commit ourselves to."

"I'm sorry for it, Madam but I acknowledge no power higher than that of the great man whom I have the honour to serve."

"You serve the cardinal?"

"Yes, Madam. And as his servant I won't permit you to conspire in plots against the security of the State, or to serve the intrigues of a woman who isn't really French, who is Spanish at heart. Fortunately, the Great Cardinal is among us, vigilant against conspiracy, seeing to the bottom of every plot."

Bonacieux was repeating, word for word, something he'd heard from the Count of Rochefort. Whatever its source, it made his poor wife shudder. She'd counted on her husband, had answered for him to the queen, and now she trembled at how close she'd come to confiding in him, and at how helpless she was. However, knowing how weak her husband was, and moreover how greedy, she still hoped to bend him to her will. "So, you're a Cardinalist, Sir!" she sneered. "You'd join with those who manhandle your wife and insult your queen!"

"Private interests are as nothing before the interests of all. I am for those who preserve the State!" said Bonacieux emphatically.

This was another of Rochefort's phrases, and he'd been waiting for an opportunity to use it. "And what do you know about this 'State' you talk about?" said Madam Bonacieux, shrugging her shoulders.

"Be content to be a simple bourgeois, and ally with the side that offers the best return."

"Oh? Oh?" said Bonacieux, slapping a bulging purse that jingled with money. "What do you say to that, Madam Know-it-all?"

"Where did that money come from?"

"Can't you guess?"

"From the cardinal?"

"From him, and from my friend the Count of Rochefort."

"The Count of Rochefort! But he's the one who abducted me!"

"That's as may be, Madam."

"And you accept money from that man?"

"Haven't you said yourself that the abduction was purely political?"

"Yes but their goal was to make me betray my mistress, to torture me into a confession that could compromise the honour, and maybe the life, of my august mistress!"

"Madam," replied Bonacieux, "your august mistress is a perfidious Spaniard. That which the cardinal does, is well done."

"Sir," shrilled the young woman, "I knew you were cowardly, greedy, and stupid but I didn't know you were villainous!"

"Madam!" Bonacieux was taken aback. He'd never seen his wife lose her temper, and he recoiled from her anger. "Madam, what are you saying?"

"I say you're a miserable wretch!" continued Madam Bonacieux, who saw she was regaining the upper hand. "You'd meddle with politics, would you? And worse, with Cardinalist politics! For money, you'd sell yourself, body and soul, to the devil!"

"No, to the cardinal."

"It's the same thing!" cried the young woman. "Who says Richelieu, says Satan."

"Hush, Madam, hush! Someone might hear you!"

"Yes, you're right. I'd be ashamed if anyone knew of your cowardice."

"All right, all right! What do you need me to do? Come, now!"

"I told you: you must leave this instant, and faithfully complete the mission I give you. If you do that, I'll forget everything, I'll forgive everything – and besides," she held out her hand, "I'll give you all my love." Bonacieux was moved. He was greedy, and a coward but he loved his wife. A man of fifty can't be angry for long with a wife of twenty-three. Madam Bonacieux saw that he hesitated. "Come, have you decided?" she said.

"But, my dear love, think a little about what you're asking of me. London is far from Paris, very far, and this mission may not be without its dangers."

"What does that matter, if you avoid them?"

The mercer gulped. "In that case, Madam Bonacieux," he said, "I definitely refuse. Intrigues frighten me! I've seen the Bastille, I have. Grr! It's frightful, the Bastille! Just thinking of it makes my flesh crawl. They threatened me with torture! Do you know how they torture you in the Bastille? They force wooden wedges between your legs until your bones break! No, no, I'm definitely not going. Morbleu, why don't you go yourself? In truth, I think I've been wrong about you – I think really you must be a man, and a crazy one, at that!"

"And you, you're a woman, a low-down, miserable, and stupid woman! So, you're afraid, are you? Well, if you don't leave this instant, I'll have you arrested on the queen's orders, and you'll be put back in that Bastille you're so afraid of."

This gave Bonacieux something to think about. In his mind, he weighed the wrath of the cardinal against that of the queen – but there was no comparison, the wrath of the cardinal was infinitely weightier. "Go ahead, have me arrested in the name of the queen," he said. "I'll simply protest it to His Eminence."

At this, Madam Bonacieux saw that she'd overdone it, and was horrified by how far she'd let the matter go. She looked for one terrified moment at that stupid face, fortified with the invincible resolve of the fool who is governed by fear. "Very well, let it go!" she said. "Maybe you're right, when all is said and done. After all, a man knows more about politics than a woman – and moreover, you, Sir Bonacieux, are a man who's spoken with the cardinal. And yet, it's hard," she added, "that my husband, a man whose affection I thought I could count on, treats me so disgracefully and won't comply with any of my little whims."

"Your little whims lead you too far," replied Bonacieux triumphantly, "and I don't trust them."

"I'll give it up, then," the young woman sighed. "It's just as well; say no more about it."

"You might, at least, tell me what I was supposed to do in London," said Bonacieux, remembering a little late that Rochefort had urged him to try to discover his wife's secrets.

"There's no point in telling you that," said the young woman, whose instinctive mistrust impelled her to draw back. "It was just a matter of one of those little nothings that women like, a small gift that could have brought a large return."

But the more the young woman evaded the subject, the more Bonacieux thought that what she was refusing to tell him must be important. He decided he'd better go to Rochefort right away and tell him that the queen was looking for a messenger to send to London. "Pardon me for leaving so suddenly, my dear Madam Bonacieux," he said, "but, not knowing that you were coming to see me, I'd set up a rendezvous with one of my friends. I'll be right back – just wait for me for half a minute, and I'll return as soon as I've finished with my friend. Then, since it's growing late, I'll escort you back to the Louvre."

"A thousand thanks, Sir," replied Madam Bonacieux, "but as you aren't brave enough to be of any use to me whatsoever, I'd just as soon return to the Louvre alone."

"As you please, Madam Bonacieux," replied the former mercer. "Will I see you again soon?"

"Next week, probably. Hopefully, my work will leave me a little free time, and I'll take advantage of it to come and put things in order here, as they appear rather disarranged."

"Very well, I'll expect you. Do you need anything more from me?"

"No, nothing at all, dear."

"See you soon, then?"

"See you soon!"

Bonacieux kissed his wife's hand and quickly left.

"So much for that!" said Madam Bonacieux, once her husband had shut the street door and she found herself alone. "The only thing that imbecile lacked was to be a Cardinalist! And I've answered for him to the queen, I've promised my poor mistress ... dear God! She'll take me for one of those lying wretches who swarm about the palace, and are set to spy upon her. Ah, Sir Bonacieux! I never loved you very much but now, I positively hate you! And upon my word, you'll pay for this!"

As she said these words, a rap on the ceiling made her look up. A voice that appeared to come through the plaster said, "Dear Madam Bonacieux! Open the little door on the staircase for me and let me come down to you."

“Ah, Madam,” said d’Artagnan, entering by the door the young woman had opened for him. “If you don’t mind my saying so, that’s a sad husband you have there.”

“You overheard our conversation?” asked Madam Bonacieux with a mixture of unease and eagerness.

“I heard it all.”

“Oh, my God! But how could you do that?”

“By a little method I have, the same way I overheard the more animated conversation you had with the cardinal’s bailiffs.”

“And what did you gather from what you heard us say?”

“A thousand things! First of which, I’m happy to say, is that your husband is a simpleton and a fool. Second, that you’re in trouble that suits me perfectly, as it gives me the chance to place myself at your service – and God knows I’m ready to jump into a fire for you! Finally, that the queen needs a brave, intelligent, and devoted man to travel to London for her. I have at least two of those three qualities – and here I am!”

Madam Bonacieux’s heart leaped with joy, and a secret hope shone from her eyes. “And what guarantee can you give me if I agree to confide this mission to you?” she asked.

“My love for you. Come, speak: command me! What’s to be done?”

“My God,” murmured the young woman. “Must I confide such a secret to you, Sir? You’re practically a child!”

“Do you want someone to vouch for me?”

“Yes, that would be very reassuring.”

“Do you know Athos?”

“No.”

“Porthos?”

“No.”

“Aramis?”

“No. Who are these gentlemen?”

“They’re King’s Musketeers. Do you know Sir Tréville, their captain?”

“Oh! Yes, I know him – not personally but I’ve heard the queen speak of him more than once as a brave and loyal gentleman.”

“You’re not afraid he’d betray you to the cardinal, then?”

“Certainly not.”

“All right, then reveal your secret to him, no matter how important, precious, or terrible it is, and ask him whether you can trust it to me.”

“But this secret doesn’t belong to me – I can’t reveal it that way.”

“You were going to tell it to Sir Bonacieux,” said d’Artagnan, piqued.

“Yes, the same way one confides a letter to a hollow tree, a pigeon’s leg, or a dog’s collar.”

“But you can clearly see that I love you.”

“So you say.”

“I’m an honourable man!”

“I believe it.”

“I’m brave!”

“Oh! I’m sure of that.”

“Then put me to the test.”

Madam Bonacieux looked searchingly at the young man, hesitating on the brink. His eyes were so ardent, the enthusiasm in his voice was so persuasive, that she felt drawn to trust him. Besides, she was in one of those situations where one must risk everything on one throw of the dice. The queen could just as easily be ruined by too much caution as by too much trust. In the end, it was her own feelings for her young protector that impelled her to speak. “Listen,” she said, “I give in. I’ll accept your assurances. But I swear, before God who hears us, that if you betray me, and I escape my enemies, I’ll kill myself and accuse you of my death.”

D’Artagnan was impressed. “As for me, Madam,” he said, “I swear before God that if I’m taken while trying to accomplish your mission, I’ll die before I’ll do or say anything that would compromise anyone.” Then the young woman confided to him the terrible secret, some of which he’d already stumbled across by chance, that night in front of La Samaritaine. This was their mutual declaration of love. D’Artagnan was radiant with joy and pride. The possession of this secret, and the love of this woman, made him a giant. “I go,” he said. “I’ll go this minute!”

“You’ll go?” said Madam Bonacieux. “But what about your regiment, and your captain?”

“Upon my soul, you’ve made me forget all that, dear Constance! You’re right – I’ll have to ask for leave.”

“Yet another obstacle,” Madam Bonacieux murmured sadly.

“Don’t worry about that,” said d’Artagnan, after a moment of reflection. “I’ll manage it.”

“But how?”

“I’ll go this very evening to Sir Tréville and ask him to request my leave as a favour from his brother-in-law, Sir Des Essarts.”

“Good! But there’s still something else.”

Madam Bonacieux hesitated. “What is it, love?” asked d’Artagnan.

“You ... have no money, perhaps?”

“No ‘perhaps’ about it,” said d’Artagnan, smiling.

“Well, then,” Madam Bonacieux opened an armoire and pulled out the bag her husband had caressed so lovingly half an hour before, and said, “Take this purse.”

“The cardinal’s money!” d’Artagnan laughed.

Thanks to his hole in the floor, he’d heard every word of the conversation between the mercer and his wife. “The cardinal’s money,” said Madam Bonacieux. “It looks like a respectable sum.”

“By God!” said d’Artagnan. “It’ll be twice as funny if we save the queen with His Eminence’s money!”

“I like a man with a sense of humour,” said Madam Bonacieux, smiling, “and believe me, the queen won’t be ungrateful.”

“I’m already well paid!” cried d’Artagnan. “I love you, and you allow me to do what you ask. That’s already more happiness than I ever dared hope for.”

Madam Bonacieux started. “Hush!”

“Why?”

“Someone’s talking in the street.”

“Of my husband! I thought I recognised it!”

D’Artagnan ran to the door and threw the bolt. “Don’t let him in until I’ve left,” he said. “When I’m gone, open the door for him.”

“But I should leave too. How am I supposed to explain the disappearance of his money?”

“You’re right – you have to go.”

“But how? He’ll see us if we go out.”

“Then you must come up to my room.”

“Oh!” cried Madam Bonacieux. “You say that in a tone that frightens me!”

Tears of confusion sprang to her eyes. D’Artagnan was troubled, and knelt at her feet. “In my rooms,” he said, “you’ll be as safe as in a church, I give you my word as a gentleman.”

“Then let’s go,” she said. “I put my trust in you, my friend.” D’Artagnan carefully drew back the bolt of the inner door, and then, as light as shadows, they glided through the doorway and into the passage. They climbed quietly up the stairs and entered d’Artagnan’s apartment. Once in his rooms, the young man barricaded the door for greater security. They both then went to the window. Through the slats of the shutter they could see Sir Bonacieux who was talking with a man in a cloak. At the sight of the man in the cloak, d’Artagnan started, half drew his sword, and sprang toward the door. It was his man of Meung. “What are you doing?” cried Madam Bonacieux. “You’ll ruin us!”

“But I’ve sworn to kill that man!” said d’Artagnan.

“Your life is committed to another! In the name of the queen, I forbid you to throw yourself into any danger unrelated to your mission!”

“And what about in your name? Don’t you command anything for yourself?”

“For myself? In my own name, then, I beg you!” she said, her voice strained by emotion. “But listen! It sounds like they’re talking about me.”

D’Artagnan pressed his ear to the window. Sir Bonacieux had unlocked his door and seeing the apartment empty, had returned to the man in the cloak, whom he’d left in the doorway. “She’s gone,” he said. “She must have returned to the Louvre.”

“You’re sure she had no idea of your intentions when you left?” said the stranger.

“Oh, no,” Bonacieux replied smugly. “She’s too shallow a woman for that.”

“Is that guard cadet at home?”

“I don’t think so. Look: his shutters are closed, and you can’t see any light through the blinds.”

“Quite so – but let’s make sure.”

“How?”

“By knocking on his door.”

“I’ll ask his lackey.”

“Go.”

Bonacieux re-entered his house, passed through the same inner door as the two fugitives, climbed the stairs and knocked on d’Artagnan’s door. No one answered. Porthos, to cut a grand figure, had borrowed Planchet for the evening. When Bonacieux rapped on the door, the two young people within felt their hearts leap inside them. But d’Artagnan was careful to maintain complete silence.

“Nobody’s home,” called Bonacieux.

“Never mind. Come back down to your apartment; it’s safer than talking in the doorway.”

“Oh, my God!” murmured Madam Bonacieux. “We’ll hear nothing more.”

“On the contrary,” whispered d’Artagnan, “we’ll hear all the better.”

D’Artagnan raised the three or four tiles that made his chamber into a listening post, spread a carpet on the floor, knelt over the opening, and gestured to Madam Bonacieux to do the same. “You’re sure nobody’s there?” said the stranger in the apartment below.

“I’ll answer for it,” said Bonacieux.

“And you think your wife...?”

“Has returned to the Louvre.”

“Without speaking to anyone but you?”

“I’m sure of it.”

“That’s an important point – do you understand that?”

“So, the news I brought you is valuable?”

"Very, my dear Bonacieux. I won't try to hide that from you."
"Do you think the cardinal will be pleased with me?"
"No doubt about it."
"The Great Cardinal!"
"Are you certain your wife mentioned no names in her conversation with you?"
"I don't think so."
"She didn't mention Madam of Chevreuse, or Sir Buckingham, or Madam du Vernet?"
"No, she only told me she wanted to send me to London to serve the interests of an illustrious person."
"The traitor!" murmured Madam Bonacieux.
"Hush!" whispered d'Artagnan, taking her hand that she unconsciously allowed him to keep.
"No matter," continued the man in the cloak, "though you were a fool not to have pretended to accept the mission. You'd have that letter; the State that is threatened, would be saved; and you..."
"And me?"
"You? The cardinal would have presented you with the letters patent that would elevate you to the nobility."
"Did ... he say that?"
"Yes, I happen to know he was planning to surprise you with that."
"Don't give up on me yet!" replied Bonacieux. "My wife adores me! There's still time."
"The dolt!" murmured Madam Bonacieux.
"Quiet," said d'Artagnan, pressing her hand with his.
"How is there still time?" asked the man in the cloak.
"I'll run to the Louvre and ask for Madam Bonacieux. I'll say that I've reconsidered, accept the mission, and obtain the letter. Then I'll go straight to the cardinal's hôtel."
"Well, get moving! I'll return shortly to find out how it went."
The stranger left. "That cowl!" said Madam Bonacieux, speaking less than tenderly of her husband.
"Silence!" said d'Artagnan, squeezing her hand more tightly than ever.
They were interrupted by a terrible howl. Her husband had discovered the disappearance of his purse and was crying thief. "Oh, my God!" cried Madam Bonacieux. "He'll rouse the whole neighbourhood."
Bonacieux yelled for several minutes. But such cries were rather frequent in the Rue des Fossoyeurs, and attracted little notice – and besides, the house of the mercer had acquired a rather bad reputation of late. When no one came, Bonacieux ran out into the street, still shouting, and his voice could be heard trailing off in the direction of the Rue du Bac. "Now that he's gone, it's your turn to depart," said Madam Bonacieux. "Be brave but above all be careful and remember what you owe to the queen."
"To her, and to you!" cried d'Artagnan. "Rest assured, sweet Constance, I'll return worthy of her gratitude. But will I also return worthy of your love?"
The young woman replied only by the blush that rose to her cheeks. D'Artagnan departed a few moments later, enveloped like the stranger in a great cloak that barely covered the scabbard of his long sword. Madam Bonacieux followed him with her eyes, with that lingering look a woman sends after the man she loves. But once he'd turned the corner, she fell to her knees, clasped her hands, and cried, "Dear God! Protect the queen – and protect me!"

The Plan of the Campaign

D'Artagnan went straight to the Hôtel de Tréville. It had occurred to him that in a few minutes the cardinal would be alerted by that damned stranger in the cloak who appeared to be his agent. He thought, quite rightly, that he hadn't a moment to lose. The young man's heart overflowed with joy. With this mission he had an opportunity to gain both money and glory – and, as an even greater incentive, to do a deed for the woman he adored. At one blow, he'd been given a chance to accomplish more than he would ever have dared pray for. Sir Tréville was in his salon, surrounded by his usual entourage of gentlemen. D'Artagnan, who was recognised as a regular visitor of the house, went straight to Tréville's study and made it known that he wished to speak to the captain on a matter of some importance. D'Artagnan waited no more than five minutes before Sir Tréville entered. One glance at the joy radiating from the cadet's face told the veteran captain that something new was up. All the way there, d'Artagnan had wrestled with whether he ought to confide in Sir Tréville or whether he should only ask him for a carte blanche for a secret mission. But Tréville had always been so good to him, and was so devoted to the king and the queen – and hated the cardinal so cordially – that the young man decided to tell him everything. "You asked for me, my young friend?" said Tréville.
"Yes, Sir," said d'Artagnan, "and I hope you'll pardon me for troubling you, once you know how important it is."
"Speak, then; I'm listening."
D'Artagnan lowered his voice. "It concerns nothing less than the honour, and maybe the life, of the queen."
"What's that you say?"
Tréville glanced around to make sure they were alone, then fixed his gaze on d'Artagnan, questioning him with a look. "Sir, chance's made me privy to a secret..."
"Which I hope you'll keep, young man, as sacred as your life."
"But which I must confide to you, Sir, for only you can help me in the mission I've received from Her Majesty."
"Is this your secret?"
"No, Sir – it's Her Majesty's."
"Are you authorised by Her Majesty to tell it to me?"
"No, Sir. On the contrary, I've been told not to reveal it."
"So why are you about to betray it to me?"
"Because, as I said, without you I can do nothing – and I was afraid you might refuse me the favour I've come for if you didn't know why I asked for it."
"Keep your secret, young man, and tell me what you want."
"I'd like you to ask Sir Des Essarts to give me a leave of absence of fifteen days."
"Starting when?"
"Tonight."
"You're leaving Paris?"
"I'm going on a mission."
"Can you tell me where?"
"To London."
"Does anyone have an interest in preventing you from arriving?"
"The cardinal, I believe, would give the world to stop me."
"And you're travelling alone?"
"I'm going alone."
"In that case, you won't get past Bondy, as sure as my name is Tréville."
"How's that?"
"You'll be assassinated."
"Then I shall die doing my duty!"
"Yes, I dare say. But your mission will be unfulfilled."
"That's true," said d'Artagnan.
"Believe me," said Tréville, "in ventures of this sort, you need to start out with four to be sure one arrives."
"You're right, Sir," said d'Artagnan, "but you command Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, and it's up to you to decide if they can help me."
"Wouldn't you have to share with them the secret I didn't want to know?"
"The four of us are sworn to blind, mutual devotion no matter what. Besides, you can tell them you have complete confidence in me, and that will settle it."
"Hmm. I can give them each a leave of fifteen days but no more. I'll send Athos, who still suffers from his wound, to the spa waters of Forges. Porthos and Aramis can accompany their friend, whom they wouldn't want to abandon in his sad condition. My issuing their leaves of absence will prove that I authorise their journey."
"You're too kind, Sir! A thousand thanks!"
"Go and find them this minute, and get this business under way tonight. Ah! But you may have had a spy on your heels, so first write your request to Sir Des Essarts. That way, if your visit here comes to the attention of the cardinal, it will be accounted for." D'Artagnan jotted down his request and gave it to Tréville, who assured him that before two o'clock in the morning the leave papers would be at the homes of the four friends. "Have the goodness to send mine to Athos's place, if you please," said d'Artagnan. "I'm afraid there'll be trouble if I go home to mine."
"Don't worry. And now, goodbye, and have a nice voyage!" said Sir Tréville. Then, after a pause, he said, "No, wait – come back a moment."
D'Artagnan returned. "Have you any money?" Tréville asked.
For answer, d'Artagnan slapped the bulging purse in his pocket. "Enough?" asked Tréville.
"Three hundred pistoles."
"Well! You could go to the end of the world with that. Go then."
D'Artagnan bowed to Sir Tréville, who gave him his hand; d'Artagnan took it with respect and gratitude. Since he'd arrived in Paris, he'd had nothing but well from this excellent man, whom he'd always found worthy, loyal, and generous. His first visit was to Aramis. He hadn't returned to the house of his friend since that evening when he'd followed Madam Bonacieux to his window. Since then, he'd scarcely seen the young musketeer but each time he had, he'd sensed a deep sadness in his friend. He found Aramis sitting up, sombre and pensive. D'Artagnan asked a few cautious questions about this profound melancholy but Aramis only gave as his excuse that he had to write a commentary on the eighteenth chapter of Saint Augustine in Latin for the following week, and it was that which preoccupied him. After the two friends had been chatting for a few minutes, a servant from Sir Tréville entered, carrying a sealed packet. "What's this?" asked Aramis.
"The leave papers Sir asked for," replied the lackey.
"I haven't asked for a leave!"
"Be still and take it," said d'Artagnan. "And you, my friend, here's a half-pistole for your trouble. Tell Sir Tréville that Sir Aramis is very much obliged to him. Go."
The lackey bowed to the ground and departed. "What's this all about?" asked Aramis.
"Pack whatever you need for a fifteen-day journey and follow me."
"But I can't leave Paris right now, not without knowing..."
Aramis stopped. "What's become of her, is that it?" said d'Artagnan.
"Who?" said Aramis.
"The woman who was here, the woman of the embroidered handkerchief."
Aramis turned pale as death. "Who told you there was a woman here?"
"I saw her."
"And you know who she is?"
"I think I suspect, at least."

"Listen," said Aramis, "since you know so much, do you know what has become of her?"

"I presume she's returned to Tours."

"To Tours? It could be – I see you do know her. But how could she return to Tours without telling me?"

"Because she was afraid she'd be arrested."

"But why didn't she write to me?"

"Because she was afraid she might compromise you."

"D'Artagnan, you restore me to life!" cried Aramis. "I thought I was scorned – betrayed, even. You know, I was so happy to see her again! I didn't think she'd risk her liberty for me but why else would she have returned to Paris?"

"For the cause that takes us today to England."

"And what cause is that?" demanded Aramis.

"One day you'll know, Aramis – but for the moment, I must imitate the discretion of the theologian's niece."

Aramis smiled, remembering the story he'd told his friends. "Well, then, since you're sure she's left Paris, nothing holds me back, and I'm ready to follow you. You say we're going...?"

"To Athos's place, at the moment – and if you're going with me, please hurry, as we're losing precious time. By the way, tell Bazin."

"Bazin is going with us?" asked Aramis.

"Maybe. In any case, it's best that he follow us right now to Athos's."

Aramis called Bazin, and after ordering him to join them at Athos's apartment, he took up his cloak, his sword, and three pistols, then opened several drawers to see if he could find a stray coin or two. But it was useless, so he followed d'Artagnan, while asking himself how it was that this young cadet of the guards should know the lady who had visited him so well, knowing even better than him what had become of her. As they were leaving, Aramis took d'Artagnan by the arms, looked him in the eye, and said, "Have you spoken of this woman to anyone?"

"To no one in the world."

"Not even to Athos or Porthos?"

"I haven't breathed a word to them."

"Good." With this important point settled, Aramis willingly followed d'Artagnan, and the two soon arrived at Athos's lodgings. They found him holding his leave papers in one hand and the letter from Sir Tréville in the other. "Can you explain to me the significance of this leave and this letter I've just received?" said Athos, astonished. He quoted from the letter:

My dear Athos, it would be well, as your health requires it, to take fifteen days of rest. Go, then, and take the waters of Forges, or any others that you may find convenient, and recover. Your affectionate, Tréville.

D'Artagnan said, "These leave papers and this letter mean that you must follow me, Athos."

"To the waters of Forges?"

"There – or elsewhere."

"In the king's service?"

"The king, or the queen. Are we not servants of both Their Majesties?"

At that moment, Porthos came in. "For the love of God!" he said. "Here's a strange thing! Since when, in the musketeers, are men granted leaves of absence they haven't asked for?"

"Since they have friends who ask for it for them," said d'Artagnan.

"Ah ha!" said Porthos. "So something's up, then?"

Aramis said, "Yes, we're going..."

"Going? Going where?" demanded Porthos.

"My faith! I know nothing about it," said Athos. "Ask d'Artagnan, here."

"We go to London, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan.

"To London!" cried Porthos. "What business do we have in London?"

"That's what I can't tell you, Gentlemen. You'll just have to trust me."

"But to go to London takes money, and I don't have any," Porthos boomed.

"Nor I," said Aramis.

"Nor I," said Athos.

"Well, I have," said d'Artagnan. He pulled his purse from his pocket and dropped it jingling on the table. "In this purse are three hundred pistoles. That ought to be enough to take us to London and back." He shrugged. "But we probably won't all make it to London anyway."

"And why is that?"

"Because, in all probability, some of us will be left en route."

"What is this we're undertaking, a campaign?"

"Yes, and I must warn you, it's a dangerous one."

"But if we're going to risk being killed," said Porthos, "I'd very much like to know why at least."

"Much good that will do you!" said Athos.

"Nonetheless," said Aramis, "I am of Porthos's opinion."

D'Artagnan said, "Is the king in the habit of giving you his reasons? No; he just says, 'Gentlemen, there is fighting in Gascony, or in Flanders; go there, and fight.' And you go. You don't bother yourself with why."

"D'Artagnan is right," said Athos. "Here are the leave papers from Sir Tréville, and here are three hundred pistoles, from where I don't know. Let's go and get killed where we're told. Is life really worth so many questions? D'Artagnan, I'm ready to follow you."

"Me too," said Porthos.

"And I, as well," said Aramis. "Anyway, I'm not sorry to leave Paris. I can use a little distraction."

"Well, you'll have plenty of distractions, Gentlemen, I promise you that," said d'Artagnan.

"So, when do we leave?" said Athos.

"Right away," d'Artagnan replied. "There's not a moment to lose."

"Grimaud! Planchet! Mousqueton! Bazin! Whoa!" cried the four young men, calling their lackeys. "Shine my boots! Bring the horses from the hôtel!"

The musketeers kept their horses, and those of their lackeys, at the Hôtel de Tréville that acted in town as a barracks. Planchet, Grimaud, Mousqueton, and Bazin departed at a run. "Now, let's lay out the plan of campaign," said Porthos. "Where do we go first?"

"To Calais," said d'Artagnan. "That's the shortest route to London."

"Well, here's my advice," said Porthos.

"Let's hear it."

"Four men travelling together would be suspicious, so we should split up. D'Artagnan will give each of us our instructions. I will go by way of Boulogne to clear the road; Athos will leave two hours later, and go by way of Amiens; Aramis will follow us through Noyon; and as for d'Artagnan, he'll take whatever route he likes but dressed as Planchet, while Planchet will follow d'Artagnan but dressed in the uniform of the guards."

"Gentlemen," said Athos, "my opinion is that lackeys should have nothing to do with such an affair. A secret might be betrayed accidentally by gentlemen but it's nearly always sold by lackeys."

"Porthos, I'm afraid your plan won't work," said d'Artagnan, "since I don't know myself what instructions to give you. I'm the bearer of a letter, nothing more. I can't make three copies of the letter because it's sealed, so it seems to me we must travel together." He tapped the breast of his doublet. "The letter is here, in my pocket. If I'm killed, one of you must take it and continue on the road; if he's killed, it's another's turn, and so on. Provided one of us arrives, that's all that's needed."

"Bravo, d'Artagnan! Your opinion is mine," said Athos. "Besides, we must be consistent with our story. I'm going to take the waters, with your companionship. But instead of the waters of Forges, I'll go to take sea waters, as I'm free to choose. If we're stopped, I'll show Sir Tréville's letter and you will all show your leave papers. If we're interrogated, we'll maintain stubbornly that our only intention was to dip ourselves a few times in the sea. If we're attacked, we'll defend ourselves. They'd have an easy time of dealing with four isolated men but four men together are a troop. We'll arm our four lackeys with pistols and muskets. If they send an army against us, we'll give battle – and the survivor, as d'Artagnan says, will carry the letter."

"Well said!" cried Aramis. "You don't speak often, Athos but when you do, you're like Saint John of the Golden Mouth. I endorse Athos's plan. What about you, Porthos?"

"Me too," said Porthos, "if it suits d'Artagnan. He's the letter-bearer, so naturally he's the general of this campaign. What he says, goes."

"Very well," said d'Artagnan, "I decide that we'll adopt Athos's plan and leave in one half-hour."

"Agreed!" chorused the three musketeers. And each one reached his hand into the purse, took 75 pistoles, and went off to prepare to depart at the appointed time.

020 The Journey

At two o'clock in the morning, the four adventurers left Paris by Porte Saint-Denis. As long as it was night they were subdued and remained silent; despite themselves, they were oppressed by the darkness, and saw ambushes everywhere. With the first light of day their tongues loosened, and their spirits rose with the sun. It was like the eve of battle: their hearts beat, their eyes laughed, and they felt the life they might be about to lose was, after all, a good thing. Their cavalcade looked truly formidable. The musketeers' black horses, and their warlike demeanour as they rode with the regular march of a cavalry squadron, would have betrayed them as gentleman soldiers no matter how they were disguised. Their lackeys followed, armed to the teeth. All went well until Chantilly that they reached at about eight in the morning. It was time for breakfast. They stopped at an inn with a sign that showed Saint Martin giving half his cloak to a pauper that seemed to promise a generous hospitality. They ordered the lackeys to unsaddle the horses but to hold themselves ready to depart immediately. They entered the common room and sat at one of the long tables. A gentleman, who'd just arrived by the route from Dammartin, was sitting at the same table, eating his breakfast. He said something about the weather, and the travellers replied in kind; he drank their health, and the four friends returned the compliment. Mousqueton came in to announce that the horses were ready, and they were just rising from the table when the stranger proposed to Porthos to drink the health of the cardinal. Porthos replied, "I ask nothing better if you'll join me in drinking the health of the king."

The stranger leaped up from his bench, crying, "I recognise no king but His Eminence!"

"You must be drunk," said Porthos.

"I may be drunk," said the stranger, drawing his sword, "but you'll answer for that!"

"This is folly," said Athos, "but it can't be helped now. Kill the man and rejoin us as quickly as you can."

The three remounted their horses and departed at a good clip, as Porthos was promising to perforate his adversary with every thrust known to swordplay. "One down!" said Athos after five hundred paces.

"But of all of us, why did that man pick Porthos to quarrel with?" asked Aramis.

"Porthos talks the loudest, so he took him for our leader," said d'Artagnan.

"I always said this Gascon cadet was a well of wisdom," said Athos.

And the travellers continued on their way. They paused at Beauvais to breathe their horses and to wait for Porthos. He still hadn't arrived after two hours, and there was no news of him, so they reluctantly resumed their journey. A league beyond Beauvais, at a place where the road narrowed between two embankments, they met eight or ten men with shovels working on the roadbed, filling the ruts with mud. They were flinging it around rather freely, and Aramis, afraid they'd soil his boots, told them off rather sharply. Athos tried to restrain him but it was too late. The workers began to jeer and heckle the travellers. They were so insolent they even irritated the usually cool-headed Athos, who rode his horse against the loudest of the gang. At this, the men retreated to a brushy ditch, and then reappeared, each with a loaded musket. They fired a volley and the cavalcade was literally riddled with musket-balls. Aramis took a ball through his shoulder, and Mousqueton another ball where the buttocks meet the thigh. Only Mousqueton fell from his horse – not because he was severely wounded but because, since he couldn't see the wound, he thought he was more dangerously hurt than he really was. "It's an ambush!" d'Artagnan shouted. "Don't waste time shooting back! Ride on!"

Aramis, though wounded, gripped the mane of his horse that carried him on with the others. After a few moments Mousqueton's horse rejoined them and galloped along at their side. "We can use that horse as a spare," said Athos.

"I'd rather have a hat," said d'Artagnan. "Mine was knocked off by a musket-ball. My faith, it's a good thing I wasn't carrying the letter in it."

"But, damn it all, they'll kill poor Porthos when he passes through," Aramis said through teeth gritted with pain.

"If Porthos were on his legs, he'd have rejoined us by now," said Athos. "My guess is that, once they reached the duelling-ground, that drunkard was completely sober."

They galloped on for two more hours, though their horses were so worn out they seemed on the verge of refusing their service. The travellers had detoured onto a side road, hoping that way to avoid trouble but at Crèvecœur Aramis declared he could go no farther. In fact, it had taken all the courage he concealed beneath his elegant form and polite manners to carry him that far. He was growing paler by the moment, and soon they had to support him on his horse. They put him down at the door of a cabaret and left Bazin with him, since if they got into a skirmish Aramis's valet was really more embarrassing than useful. D'Artagnan and Athos then resumed their way, in hopes of sleeping that night in Amiens. "Morbleu!" said Athos, as they left Crèvecœur. "Reduced to two masters, plus Grimaud and Planchet. Well, I won't fall for their monkey tricks. I won't open my mouth, or draw my sword between here and Calais. I swear..."

"Don't waste your breath," said d'Artagnan. "Let's gallop, if our horses will consent to it."

They dug their spurs into their mounts' flanks and the horses recovered some of their former speed. They arrived in Amiens at midnight, and stopped at the Inn of the Golden Lily. The host had the air of the most honest man in the world, and received the travellers with candlestick in one hand and nightcap in the other. He wanted to give a charming chamber to each of them but unfortunately these two charming chambers were on opposite sides of the inn, so d'Artagnan and Athos refused them. The host protested that he had no other rooms worthy of Their Excellencies but the travellers declared they would sleep in the common room, on mattresses thrown on the floor. The host insisted but the travellers held firm, and in the end he did as they asked. They had just laid out their beds and barricaded their door from the inside when someone tapped on the shutter of the courtyard window. They asked who was there, recognised the voices of Planchet and Grimaud, and opened up. "Grimaud can guard the horses," said Planchet, "and if you like, Gentlemen, I'll sleep across your doorway. That way you can be sure no one will come near you."

"And what will you sleep on?" asked d'Artagnan.

"I have my bed right here," said Planchet, displaying an armful of straw.

"You know, I think you're right," said d'Artagnan. "I don't trust our host's face – he's entirely too polite."

"Neither do I," said Athos.

Planchet came in through the window and installed himself across the doorway. Grimaud said that by five in the morning he would have their horses ready, then went and shut himself inside the stable. The night was tranquil until about two in the morning, when someone tried to open the door to their room. But Planchet awoke and called out, "Who goes there?" Whoever it was said he was mistaken and went away. At four in the morning, there was a great racket in the stables. Grimaud had tried to awaken the stable boys but the stable boys took offence and beat him up. When d'Artagnan opened the window they saw the poor fellow lying unconscious in the courtyard, head split open by a blow from a pitchfork handle. Planchet went down into the yard to saddle their mounts but the horses were still exhausted. Mousqueton's horse had travelled for five or six hours the night before without a rider, and might have been able to continue but by some incredible error a veterinary surgeon, who'd come to bleed one of the host's horses, had bled Mousqueton's instead. This was beginning to be annoying. Such a chain of accidents might possibly be the result of chance but they might just as likely be the product of a plot. D'Artagnan and Athos went out to find breakfast elsewhere, while Planchet went to see if there might be three horses for sale in the neighbourhood. At the door of the inn stood two fine horses, fully equipped for travel, fresh and vigorous. Just the thing!

Planchet asked where he could find their masters; he was told they had spent the night in the inn, and were preparing to settle their accounts with the host. Athos went down to pay their own bill, while d'Artagnan and Planchet waited at the street gate. Athos was directed toward a lower chamber in the back that was strange but it didn't occur to him to be suspicious. He found the room indicated and drew two pistoles from his pouch to settle the bill. The host was alone, seated behind his desk that had one drawer half-open. He took the coins that Athos gave him and turned them over and over in his hands. "These are counterfeit!" he suddenly cried. "I'll have you and your friend arrested as coiners!"

"You rogue!" Athos snarled, advancing toward him. "I'll cut your ears off!" But the host pulled two pistols from the half-open drawer and pointed them at Athos, meanwhile calling for help. Athos drew his own pistols but at the same moment four men, armed to the teeth, came in through the doors on either side of the room and jumped him. "I'm taken!" shouted Athos, at the top of his lungs. "Get out, d'Artagnan! Ride on! Ride on!"

Two pistol shots rang out from below. D'Artagnan and Planchet didn't need to be told twice: they untied the two horses that were waiting at the door, jumped into the saddles, buried their spurs in the horses' sides, and left at a gallop. "You were closer. Could you see what happened to Athos?" d'Artagnan asked Planchet as they rode.

"It was Athos who fired," said Planchet. "I could see through the door. One enemy dropped at each shot, and then he drew steel on the others."

"Brave Athos!" murmured d'Artagnan. "And to think we had to abandon him! The same fate may await us at the next bend of the road. Forward, Planchet, forward! You're a brave man."

"I told you, Sir," replied Planchet, "in action, we Picards show what we're made of. Besides, I'm in my own country here, and that puts me on my mettle."

Spurring on, they arrived at Saint-Omer without stopping once. They had to rest their mounts but to prevent any more accidents from happening, they held their horses' bridles in one hand while with the other they had a quick bite to eat from a street vendor. Then they departed again. A hundred paces from the gates of Calais, d'Artagnan's horse fell beneath him. It wasn't going to get up again; blood ran from its nose and eyes. They still had Planchet's horse but now that it had stopped, it refused to go any farther. Fortunately, they were just outside the city gates. They left their ailing mounts on the high road, passed through the gates, and ran toward the port. At the wharf, Planchet spotted a gentleman with his lackey who had arrived just ahead of them and pointed him out to his master. They eagerly approached this gentleman. His boots were covered with dust and he appeared to be in a great rush. They heard him inquire if he could immediately pass over to England. "Nothing would be easier," replied the captain of a ship ready to set sail, "except that this morning an order arrived that no one may leave the port without the express permission of the cardinal."

"I have that permission," said the gentleman, taking a paper from his pocket. "Here it is."

"Have it countersigned by the Governor of the Port," said the captain, "and I'm your man."

"Where can I find the governor?"

"At his estate."

"And where is his estate?"

"A quarter of a league from the city. Look, you can see it from here – at the foot of that little hill, the house with the slate roof."

"Excellent," said the gentleman.

And followed by his lackey, he headed toward the governor's estate. D'Artagnan and Planchet followed the gentleman at five hundred paces. Once they were out of the city, d'Artagnan picked up his pace and caught up with the gentleman as he was entering a little wood. "Sir," d'Artagnan said to him, "you appear to be in a great hurry."

"I couldn't be more so, Sir."

"I'm sorry to hear it," said d'Artagnan, "because I'm also in a great hurry, and I must beg you to do me a favour."

"What?"

"To let me go ahead of you."

"Impossible," said the gentleman. "I've gone sixty leagues in forty-four hours, and by noon tomorrow I must be in London."

"I've travelled the same road in forty hours, and must be in London tomorrow by ten in the morning."

"That's too bad, Sir – for I got here first, and won't go second."

"It is too bad, Sir, for I got here second, and I will go first."

"In the name of the king!" said the gentleman.

"In the name of myself!" said d'Artagnan.

"Look, it seems to me this is a pretty pointless quarrel," said the gentleman.

"For God's sake! Not at all!"

"What is it that you want?"

"You really want to know?"

"Certainly."

"Well, I want that order you're carrying, since I don't have one and you do."

"You must be joking."

"I never joke."

"Let me pass!"

"I'm afraid I can't."

"You know, young man, I believe I will blow your brains out. Lubin! My pistols!"

D'Artagnan said, "You take the lackey, Planchet, and I'll take the master."

Planchet, emboldened by his previous success, sprang upon Lubin. Strong and vigorous, he quickly pinned Lubin to the ground and put his knee on his chest. "Go about your business, Sir," said Planchet. "Mine is under control."

The gentleman, angered, drew his sword and pounced on d'Artagnan – but he got more than he'd bargained for. In three seconds d'Artagnan had wounded him three times, shouting, "One for Athos – one for Porthos – one for Aramis!"

At the third blow, the gentleman collapsed in a heap. D'Artagnan thought he was dead, or at least senseless, and bent over him to take the vital order. But as he reached out, the wounded man raised his sword and stabbed him in the chest, gasping, "And one for you!"

"And one for me – the best for last!" cried d'Artagnan furiously, nailing the man to the ground with a fourth thrust through the body.

This time, the gentleman closed his eyes and passed out. D'Artagnan searched his pockets, found the order for passage, and took it. It was in the name of the Count of Wardes.

He spared a final glance at the handsome young man, who was barely twenty-five, and whom he was leaving there, lying senseless and perhaps dead. He sighed for that strange destiny that leads men to destroy each other in the interests of people who are strangers to them, and who often don't even know they exist. He was soon drawn from these reflections by Lubin, who began shouting for help at the top of his lungs. Planchet took him by the throat and squeezed as hard as he could. "Sir," he said, "as long as I hold him like this he can't shout but as soon as I let him go he'll start up again. I can tell he's a Norman, and these Normans are stubborn."

In fact, gripped though he was, Lubin was still trying to make as much noise as he could. "Hold on," said d'Artagnan.

And taking out his handkerchief, he gagged him. "Now let's tie him to a tree," said Planchet.

This completed, they dragged the Count of Wardes over and laid him next to his servant. Night was beginning to fall, and since the gagged man and the wounded man were some yards into the woods, it seemed likely they would remain there until the next day. "And now," said d'Artagnan, "to the governor's house!"

"But aren't you wounded?" said Planchet.

"It's nothing. Let's deal with the most urgent business first, and we'll attend to my wound later. Anyway, I don't think it's very serious."

And they set out at a trot for the estate of the worthy bureaucrat. D'Artagnan had himself announced as the Count of Wardes, and was introduced to the governor's study. "You have an order signed by the cardinal?" said the governor.

"Yes, Sir," replied d'Artagnan. "Here it is."

"Ahem. Yes, this appears to be in order, and drawn up properly," said the governor.
"But of course," replied d'Artagnan. "After all, I'm one of the cardinal's loyal."
"It appears His Eminence wants to prevent someone from reaching England."
"Yes – a certain d'Artagnan, a Béarnaise gentleman who left Paris with three of his friends with the intention of getting to London."
"Do you know him personally?" asked the governor.
"Intimately so."
"Describe him for me."
"Nothing could be easier."
And d'Artagnan gave, point by point, a detailed description of the Count of Wardes. "Is anyone with him?"
"Yes, a Norman lackey called Lubin."
"We'll watch for them, and if we can lay our hands on them, we'll send them back to His Eminence in Paris under heavy escort."
"Do that, Sir Governor, and you'll have the cardinal's personal thanks," said d'Artagnan.
"Will you see him on your return, Sir Count?"
"Of course."
"Tell him for me, if you will, that I'm his loyal servant."
"Count on it."

Delighted with this assurance, the governor countersigned the passage order and returned it. D'Artagnan lost no more time in useless compliments – he just thanked the governor, bowed, and departed. Outside, he and Planchet immediately set out for Calais, taking a detour around the wood and entering the city by a different gate. The ship was ready to sail, and the captain was waiting on the wharf. "Well?" he said as d'Artagnan came up to him.
"Here's my pass, duly countersigned," said d'Artagnan.
"What happened to the other gentleman?"
"He can't go with us today," said d'Artagnan, "but I'll pay you for his passage as well."
"In that case, let's go," said the captain.
"As soon as you can," said d'Artagnan, leaping aboard. He was followed by Planchet, and five minutes later they were on their way out of the harbour. None too soon: they were barely half a league out when they saw a gun flash on the Calais wall, followed by a boom. It was the cannon that announced the closing of the port. D'Artagnan now had time to take a look at his wound. Fortunately, as he'd thought, it wasn't a bad one: the point of the sword had hit a rib and slid along the bone. Furthermore, his shirt had stuck to the wound and held it closed, so he hadn't lost much blood. But d'Artagnan was exhausted; they laid a mattress on the deck for him and he threw himself onto it and immediately fell fast asleep. Next morning at daybreak they found themselves still three or four leagues from the English coast. The breeze had been light all night and they'd made little headway. At 10 o'clock the ship finally dropped anchor in the port of Dover; at half past ten the ship's boat put them ashore and d'Artagnan set foot on English soil, saying, "I'm here at last!"
But they still had to get to London. In England the post was well-served by a good post-horse service; d'Artagnan and Planchet rented horses and rode, led by a postilion, who went ahead to show them the way. In a few hours they reached the capital. D'Artagnan knew nothing of London and didn't speak a word of English but he wrote the name of Buckingham on a paper, and everyone he showed it to direct him towards the duke's town-house. At Buckingham's mansion they learned that the duke was hunting at Windsor with the king. D'Artagnan asked for the duke's confidential valet, who spoke fluent French, having accompanied him on all his travels. D'Artagnan told him he'd come from Paris on a matter of life and death and had to speak with his master immediately. Patrick, the confidential valet, was convinced by d'Artagnan's earnestness. He had two horses saddled, and went himself as guide to the young cadet. As for Planchet, he'd gotten off his horse as stiff as a stick, and stayed behind. The poor fellow was at the end of his strength but d'Artagnan seemed to be made of iron. They arrived at the castle and inquired after the duke. The king and Buckingham were hawking in the marshes, two or three leagues away. Riding hard, they reached there in twenty minutes, and Patrick soon heard the voice of his master, calling his falcon. "Whom shall I announce to milord duke?" asked Patrick.
"The young man who sought a quarrel with him one evening on the Pont Neuf, in front of La Samaritaine."

"That's an unusual introduction!"
"You'll see that it's better than any other."
Patrick galloped up to the duke and announced that a messenger awaited him, describing him in the terms d'Artagnan had given him. Buckingham immediately realised that the messenger must be d'Artagnan. Suspecting that something was going on in France that he ought to know about, he only asked where this messenger was, and immediately set out toward him. As he approached, he recognised the uniform of the French Guards, put his horse into a gallop and rode straight up to d'Artagnan. Patrick discreetly held back behind him. "Surely nothing bad has happened to the queen?" cried Buckingham.
And all his mind and all his heart were in the question. "I don't think so," said d'Artagnan, "but I believe she is in some great danger from which only Your Grace can save her."
"Me?" cried Buckingham. "But what? I'd do anything for her. Speak! Speak!"
"Read this letter, Milord," said d'Artagnan.
"This letter! Who is this letter from?"
"From Her Majesty, or so I believe."
"From Her Majesty!" said Buckingham, turning so pale that d'Artagnan thought he might faint. He took the letter and broke the seal. "Why is it ripped here?" he said, showing d'Artagnan a place where the letter was pierced through.
"I hadn't noticed that!" said d'Artagnan. "That must have happened when the Count of Wardes stabbed me in the chest."
"You're wounded?" asked Buckingham, opening the letter.
"It's nothing! A scratch!" said d'Artagnan.
The duke scanned the letter. "What's this? Heavens above! Patrick, stay here, or rather, join the king wherever he is. Tender His Majesty my humblest excuses but tell him an affair of the highest importance calls me to London. Come, Sir, come!" And both set off at a gallop on the road to the capital.

021 The Countess Winter

As they galloped toward London, the duke fired questions at d'Artagnan to try to get a clearer picture of the queen's situation. He asked d'Artagnan to tell him only what he knew, not what he thought might have happened. Combining what he heard from the young man with his own information, he was able to form a pretty fair idea of the position, the seriousness of which had been conveyed by the queen's letter, so short but so explicit. What astonished him the most was that the cardinal, who had so much at stake in making sure that d'Artagnan never set foot in England, had nonetheless failed to stop him en route. When the duke remarked on this, d'Artagnan told him of the precautions they'd taken, and how, thanks to the devotion of his three friends, now left scattered and bloody on the road, he'd arrived having suffered no more than the single sword-thrust that had pierced the queen's letter (and for which he'd repaid of Wardes in such terrible coin). D'Artagnan told his story simply and modestly, while the duke listened in astonishment, as if unable to believe that so much prudence, courage, and devotion could be wrapped up in a person apparently no more than twenty years old. The horses went like the wind, and in what seemed like only a few minutes they found themselves in London. D'Artagnan had thought that on arriving in the city the duke would slacken his pace but no: he raced through the streets at full speed, with little regard for those unlucky enough to find themselves in his path. There were two or three minor collisions but Buckingham didn't even turn his head to see what had become of those he'd knocked over. D'Artagnan followed him amid cries that sounded a lot like curses. On entering the courtyard of his town house, Buckingham leaped down from his horse and, paying no more attention to it, threw the bridle on its neck and sprang up the steps to the door. D'Artagnan followed but with a little more concern for his mount, a noble creature whose virtues he appreciated. As he went in, he was consoled by seeing three or four grooms run from the stables to take charge of their horses. The duke marched so rapidly through his mansion that d'Artagnan could hardly keep up with him. They passed through a number of chambers more elegant than anything the grandest nobles of France could conceive of and arrived at last in a bedchamber that was a miracle of taste and splendour. In the alcove of this chamber they found a door hidden behind a tapestry that the duke opened with a small golden key that hung from his neck by a chain of the same metal. D'Artagnan discreetly held back but seeing the young man's hesitation, Buckingham said, "Come with me. And if you have the good fortune to be admitted to Her Majesty's presence, tell her what you've seen here."
Encouraged, d'Artagnan followed the duke through the door, who shut it behind them. They found themselves in a small chapel hung with Persian silk tapestries and gold brocade, brightly lit by a vast number of candles. Above a sort of altar, and beneath a canopy of blue velour trimmed with white and red plumes, was a full-length portrait of Anne of Austria, so lifelike that d'Artagnan gasped in surprise: one could almost believe the queen was present and about to speak. Upon the altar, beneath the portrait, was the coffer that contained the diamond studs. The duke approached the altar, knelt like a priest before the cross and opened the coffer. "Look," he said, drawing forth a deep blue neck-ribbon sparkling with diamonds. "Here are those precious studs. I'd sworn an oath to be buried in them. But the queen giveth, and the queen taketh away. Her will be done like that of a god in everything."
Then, one by one, he began to kiss the glittering diamonds he was about to part with. Suddenly he gave a terrible cry. "What is it?" d'Artagnan asked anxiously. "What is it, Milord?"
"All is lost!" Buckingham cried, turning pale as death. "There are only ten! Two of the studs are missing!"
"Could you have lost them, Milord, or do you think they were stolen?"
"Stolen!" said the Duke. "And the cardinal is behind it. Here, look: the ribbons that held them have been cut with scissors."
"If Milord has an idea who stole them, they may still be in that person's hands."
"Wait; let me think," said the duke. "The only time I wore the studs was at a royal ball at Windsor Castle, about eight days ago. I'd quarrelled with Countess Winter but she made up with me at that ball. I was surprised at how affectionate she was but it was nothing more than a jealous woman's revenge! I haven't seen her since that night. I'm convinced that woman is an agent of the cardinal."
"He must have agents all over the world!" said d'Artagnan.
"Oh, he does," said Buckingham, grinding his teeth in anger. "He's a terrible enemy! Tell me, when is this ball in Paris supposed to take place?"
"On Monday next."
"Monday next! We still have five days – more time than we need. Patrick!" the duke shouted, opening the door of his secret chapel. "Patrick!" The confidential valet appeared. "My jeweller and my secretary," the duke said. The valet left with a speed that showed he was accustomed to obey blindly and without question. Though the jeweller had been mentioned first, the secretary arrived more quickly, since he resided in the house. He found Buckingham seated before a table in his bedchamber, writing orders in his own hand. "Mister Jackson," the duke said, "go see the Lord Chancellor and tell him that I charge him with the execution of these orders. I would like them promulgated immediately."
Jackson glanced over the memo. "But, Milord," he said, "If the Lord Chancellor questions me as to Your Grace's reasons for taking such an extraordinary measure, what shall I tell him?"
"That such is my good pleasure, and that I account for my orders to no one."
"Is that what he should tell His Majesty," said the secretary, smiling, "if by chance His Majesty is curious to know exactly why no vessel may leave any port in Great Britain?"
"You're right," replied Buckingham. "If the king asks, he should say that I've decided on war, and this measure is my first act of hostility against France."
The secretary bowed and retired. "We're covered on that side," said Buckingham, turning toward d'Artagnan. "If the studs have not yet left for France, they won't arrive there until after you do."
"How is that?"
"I've just placed an embargo on all ships currently in His Majesty's ports. Without specific permission, none of them can raise anchor." Now it was d'Artagnan's turn to be astonished. Here was a man so elevated by the confidence of his king that he could exercise virtually unlimited power in pursuit of his personal love affairs. Buckingham saw, by the expression on the young man's face, what was passing in his mind, and smiled. "Yes," he said, "Anne of Austria is my true queen. On a word from her, I'd betray my country, king, and even God. She asked me not to send the Protestants of La Rochelle the help I'd promised them, and I've withheld it. I broke my word but what does that matter? I obeyed her desire, and haven't I been richly paid for my obedience? It's thanks to that obedience that she sent me her portrait." D'Artagnan was amazed by what fragile and unknown threads the destinies of people and the lives of men are sometimes suspended. He was still deep in these reflections when the goldsmith entered. He was an Irishman, one of the most able of his art, and he openly boasted that he earned a hundred thousand livres per year from the Duke of Buckingham's commissions. "Mister O'Reilly," said the duke, leading him to the chapel, "look at these diamond studs and tell me what they're worth apiece." The goldsmith glanced at their elegant settings, calculated together what the diamonds were worth, and said without hesitation, "Fifteen hundred pistoles each, Milord." "How many days would it take to make two studs like these others? You see that two of them are missing."

"Eight days, Milord."

"I'll pay you three thousand pistoles apiece if I can have them the day after tomorrow."

"Done, Milord!"

"You're a gem yourself, O'Reilly – but there's more. This work cannot be entrusted to anyone else and must be completed here in my mansion."

"Impossible, Milord. I'm the only one who can cut them so no one can tell the difference between the new and the old."

"Then, my dear Mister O'Reilly, you are my prisoner. You couldn't leave my house now if you wanted to – so make the best of it. Name me the assistants you need, and what tools they should bring."

The goldsmith knew the duke, and knew it was useless to object, so he made up his mind to comply. "Am I permitted to inform my wife?" he asked.

"You may even see her, my dear Mister O'Reilly. Believe me, your captivity will be a mild one. And, since every inconvenience should have its compensation here over and above the price of the studs is an order for a thousand pistoles to help you forget the trouble I put you to." D'Artagnan could not get over his surprise at this minister who so openhandedly juggled men and millions. As for the goldsmith, he wrote to his wife, sending her the order for a thousand pistoles, requesting that in return she send him his most able apprentice, the necessary tools, and an assortment of diamonds that he gave the names and weights. Buckingham led the goldsmith to the chamber he was to use that was transformed into a workshop inside of half an hour. A guard was placed at each door and ordered to admit no one, with the exception of the confidential valet, Patrick. Needless to say, O'Reilly and his assistant were forbidden to leave for any reason. This matter arranged, the duke returned to d'Artagnan. "Now, my young friend, all England is ours. What would you like? What is your desire?"

"A bed," replied d'Artagnan. "Right now, that's what I need most."

Buckingham gave d'Artagnan a chamber adjacent to his own. He wanted to have the young man near at hand – not from mistrust but so he could have someone to talk to constantly about the queen. One hour later, it was announced from London that no ship could leave the ports of England for France, not even the packet-boat with the international mail. To everyone, this was tantamount to a declaration of war between the two realms. By eleven the following morning the two diamond studs were finished: such exact imitations, so perfectly alike, that Buckingham couldn't tell the new ones from the old, and even experts in such matters would have done no better. He immediately called d'Artagnan. "Here are the diamond studs you came for," he said, "and you are my witness that I've done everything in human power that could be done."

"Milord, you can be sure I'll report what I've seen. But is Your Grace giving me the studs without their box?"

"The box would just be an encumbrance. Besides, the box is precious to me – it's all I have left. Tell her I've kept it."

"I'll repeat your message word for word, Milord."

"And now," said Buckingham, looking earnestly at the young man, "how can I ever repay what I owe you?"

D'Artagnan coloured up to his eyes. He saw that the duke was looking for a way to give him something, and the idea that his blood, and that of his companions, was to be paid for in English gold was strangely repugnant to him. "Let's understand each other, Milord," said d'Artagnan, "and let's be clear up front, to avoid any mistake. I'm in the service of the King and Queen of France, and a member of the French Guards in the company of Sir Des Essarts, who like Sir Tréville is particularly attached to Their Majesties. Everything I've done has been done solely for the queen and not for Your Grace. Moreover, I might not have done any of it except to please someone who is my lady, as the queen is yours."

"Ah!" The duke smiled. "I think I know this other person. She's..."

"Milord, I have not named her," the young man interrupted sharply.

"Quite so," said the duke. "So it's to this other person whom I must be grateful for your devotion."

"As you say, Milord. In fact, right now, with war probable, I confess I see in Your Grace nothing but an Englishman – in other words, an enemy, whom I'd much rather encounter on the battlefield than in the park at Windsor or the corridors of the Louvre. Not that that will prevent me from completing my mission – even dying to accomplish it, if necessary. But I repeat to Your Grace, you owe me nothing more at this second meeting in London than you did at our first in Paris."

Buckingham nodded. "Here we say, 'proud as a Scotsman.'"

"As we say, 'proud as a Gascon,'" replied d'Artagnan. "The Gascons are the Scots of France."

D'Artagnan bowed to the duke and prepared to take his leave. "So, you're going away, just like that?" said the duke. "To where? And how?"

"Well ... I must admit, those are good questions," said d'Artagnan. "I'd forgotten that England is an island, and you are its king."

"Damn me! These Frenchmen haven't a clue! ... Go to the docks, ask for the brig Sund and give this letter to the captain. He'll carry you to a little port in France where no one would expect you, a place ordinarily used only by fishing boats."

"What is this port called?"

"Saint-Valery. But listen: when you arrive there, you'll find a wretched little inn, with no name and no sign – a mere angler's shack. There's only one, so you can't miss it."

"What then?"

"Ask for the host and say to him in British English: 'Forward!'"

"Meaning?"

"The French for it is 'en avant.' It's the password. He'll give you a horse, saddled and ready to go, and indicate what route you should follow. This will take you to another relay: you'll find four along your route. Each horse is fully equipped for a campaign. If you like, give your address in Paris at each of these relays, and the four horses will follow you there later. You already know two like them – we rode them to London – and you appeared to appreciate them like a connoisseur. Take my word for it, the others are no worse." Buckingham smiled. "No matter how proud you are, you can't refuse to accept one of them, and accept the other three on the behalf of your companions. Anyway, you can use them against us in the war. As you French say, the end justifies the means, what?"

"Yes, Milord – and I accept them," said d'Artagnan. "And if it please God, we'll make good use of your gifts."

"Excellent! And now, young man, your hand. We may meet soon on the battlefield – but in the meantime, I hope we'll part good friends."

"Yes, Milord – in hopes of soon becoming enemies."

"Don't worry, that I can promise you."

"I'm counting on your word, Milord." D'Artagnan bowed to the duke and took his leave, heading without delay for the port. Opposite the Tower of London he found the designated ship and gave his letter to the captain. It was countersigned by the Governor of the Port and they prepared for immediate departure. Fifty ships were at the wharfs, waiting permission to leave. While passing alongside one of them, d'Artagnan thought he recognised the woman of Meung, the one the stranger had called "Milady," and whom d'Artagnan had thought so beautiful. But the current was strong and the wind was favourable – his vessel passed so quickly that he saw her for only an instant. Around nine o'clock the next morning he disembarked at Saint-Valery. D'Artagnan immediately went looking for the tiny inn that he found by following the sound of loud voices and singing. The sailors were celebrating the coming of war between England and France. D'Artagnan pushed his way through the throng, found the host, and said, "Forward!" The host made a sign for d'Artagnan to follow him, left by a door that gave onto the yard, and conducted him to a stable, where a horse, already saddled, awaited him. The host asked if he needed anything else. "I need to know what route I should follow," said d'Artagnan.

"Go from here to Blangy and from Blangy to Neufchâteau. At Neufchâteau, find the Golden Harrow Inn, give the password to the host, and like here, you'll find a saddled horse ready to go."

"What do I owe you?" asked d'Artagnan.

"It's all paid for," said the host, "and generously too. Now go, and God guide you!"

"Amen!" said the young man, and set off at a gallop.

Four hours later he was at Neufchâteau. He followed his instructions exactly, and as at Saint-Valery, he found a mount saddled and waiting. He was about to transfer the pistols from the saddle of the old horse to the saddle of the new when he found that its holsters were already furnished with similar weapons. "Your address in Paris?" asked the host.

"Hôtel des Gardes, des Essarts's company."

"Fine," said the man.

"What route should I take?"

"By way of Rouen but pass the city on your right, then stop at the little village of Ecouis. There's an inn there called the French Crown. Don't judge it by appearances; you'll find a horse in its stables that's as good as this one."

"Same password?"

"Exactly."

"Then goodbye, master host!"

"Have a good journey, Sir. Do you need anything?" D'Artagnan shook his head in reply, and departed at full speed. At Ecouis, the scene was repeated: he found a host just as genial and a horse just as fresh. As before, he gave the man his address in Paris and left at speed for Pontoise. At Pontoise he changed horses for the final time and at nine o'clock galloped into the courtyard of the Hôtel of Tréville. He'd ridden almost sixty leagues in twelve hours. Sir Tréville received him as if he'd just seen him that morning, except that he shook the young man's hand even more warmly than usual. With a smile, he announced that des Essarts's company was on guard duty at the Louvre – and he thought d'Artagnan might want to report at once to his post.

The Ballet of La Merlaison

The next day, the only topic of conversation in Paris was the ball the city aldermen were to give that night to the king and queen where Their Majesties were to dance the king's favourite ballet, La Merlaison. For over a week an army of labourers had been working at the Hôtel of Ville to prepare for this important event. The city carpenter had overseen the erection of multi-tiered scaffolds to provide seats for the lady guests; the municipal grocer had furnished the halls with two hundred flambeaux of white wax, an unheard-of luxury at the time; and twenty violinists had been engaged, at double the usual rate, on condition that they play all night. At ten in the morning, the Sieur of La Coste, ensign in the King's Guards, followed by two exempts and a squad of archers, came to demand of Clément, the city registrar, all the keys of the doors, chambers, and offices of the Hôtel of Ville. The keys were instantly rendered up to him, each with its label of location, and from that moment La Coste commanded all the doors and corridors. Duhallier, Captain of the City Guards, came in his turn at eleven o'clock, bringing with him fifty archers who were immediately assigned to guard duty at all the various doors of the hôtel. At three o'clock came the rest of Duhallier's guards, a company of Swiss, and des Essarts's company of the Gardes Françaises. At six in the evening the guests began to arrive. As they entered, they were ushered to their assigned places on the tiered scaffolds in the great hall. At nine o'clock the wife of the First President of Parliament arrived. After the queen, she was the most important lady invited to the fête, so she was received personally by the aldermen and placed in a loge opposite to that designated for Her Majesty. At ten o'clock a collation of sweets and preserves was laid out for the king in a small side chamber, served on the city's formal silver service that was guarded by four archers. At midnight shouting and cheering could be heard from outside. The king was approaching along the streets from the Louvre to the Hôtel of Ville that were lit for the occasion by coloured lanterns. At the sound of the cheers, the Paris Aldermen, attired in their finest robes and preceded by six sergeants holding flambeaux, went to welcome the king. They met him on the steps of the hôtel: the merchants' provost offered the official welcome, to which His Majesty replied with an apology for coming so late, laying the blame on Your Eminence, who had detained him until eleven o'clock discussing affairs of State. His Majesty, in full ceremonial dress, was accompanied by His Royal Highness Sir, by the Count of Soissons; the Grand Prior, the Duke of Longueville, the Duke d'Elbeuf, the Count d'Harcourt, and the Count of La Roche-Guyon; by Sir Liancourt, Sir Baradas, the Count of Cramail, and the Knight of Souveray. Everyone noticed that the king seemed melancholy and preoccupied. Dressing rooms had been prepared for the king and Sir, as well as the queen and Madam President, each containing costumes for a masque. The gentlemen and ladies of Their Majesties' suite were to dress, two at a time, in another pair of rooms. Before entering his dressing room, the king asked to have someone notify him the moment the cardinal arrived. Half an hour after the appearance of the king the cheering resumed, heralding the arrival of the queen. The aldermen, preceded by their sergeants, went out to meet their royal guest. As the queen entered the great hall, everyone could see that, like the king, she appeared sad – and moreover, genuinely fatigued. As she entered, the curtain on a small loge drew back and the pale face of the cardinal appeared, above the costume of a Spanish cavalier. His eyes were fixed on those of the queen and a smile of terrible joy passed over his lips – for the queen wasn't wearing her diamond studs. The queen paused briefly to receive the compliments of the city aldermen and to acknowledge the salutations of their ladies. Suddenly, the king appeared with the cardinal at one of the doors of the hall. The cardinal was speaking to him in a low voice and the king was very pale. The king made his way through the press, unmasked and with the ribbons of his doublet barely tied. He approached the queen and said in a strained voice, “Madam, tell me if you please, why you haven’t worn your diamond studs when you know I particularly wanted you to be seen in them.”

The queen looked about and saw the cardinal behind the king, smiling a diabolical smile. “Sire,” replied the queen, her own voice strained, “I was afraid that in a great crowd like this, something might happen to them.”

“And you’re wrong, Madam! If I gave you such a gift, it was so you would appear in them. You were wrong, I tell you!”

The king’s voice trembled with anger, astonishing everyone within earshot for no one understood what was really going on. “Sire,” said the queen, “they’re in the Louvre, of course. I can send for them, if that accords with Your Majesty’s wishes.”

“Do so, Madam, do so – and as soon as possible. The ballet starts within the hour.”

The queen bowed in submission and followed the ladies who were to conduct her to her dressing room. The king turned on his heel and went to complete his own costume. A wave of dismay and confusion passed through the great hall. Everyone had noticed there was some kind of trouble between the king and the queen but as they’d spoken in low voices everyone nearby had respectfully drawn back, so nobody had heard much of anything. The violins began wailing with all their might but nobody paid any attention to them. The king was the first to leave his dressing room. He wore a most elegant hunting costume, and Sir and the other nobles were dressed to match. This was the costume most becoming to the king, and he truly looked like the first gentleman of his realm. The cardinal approached the king and presented him with a small, exquisite box. The king opened it and found two diamond studs within. “What does this mean?” he asked the cardinal.

“Oh, nothing,” the cardinal replied. “Only, if the queen has her studs that I presume to doubt – count them, Sire. If you find only ten, ask Her Majesty who could have taken the two you see here.”

The king looked at the cardinal as if he wanted to interrogate him but before he could utter a question the room erupted in applause and cries of admiration. If the king looked like the first gentleman of his realm, tonight the queen was beyond doubt the most beautiful woman in France. As with her husband, a hunting costume became her marvellously well: she wore a beaver hat with blue feathers, an overskirt of pearl-grey velvet with diamond clasps, and an underskirt of blue satin embroidered with silver. On her left shoulder glittered the diamond studs, on a broad bow of the same blue as the feathers and underskirt. The king trembled with joy, the cardinal with anger. The queen had her studs – but had she ten, or twelve? At this distance they couldn’t count them. The violins immediately sounded the fanfare that began the ballet. The king advanced toward Madam President, his partner for the dance, and His Royal Highness Sir led out the queen. They took their places and the ballet began. The king was placed opposite the queen, and each time he passed her he peered closely at the studs but was never able to count them all. A cold sweat shone on the cardinal’s brow. The ballet had sixteen movements and lasted an hour. It concluded amid the applause of the entire hall as each lord led his lady to her place. However, the king took advantage of his privileged position to leave his own partner and advance eagerly toward the queen. “I thank you, Madam,” he said to her, “for deferring to my wishes but I think you lack two studs. Allow me to return them to you.”

And he held out the pair of studs the cardinal had given him. “Why, Sire!” cried the young queen, pretending surprise. “You’re giving me two more? Then I’ll have fourteen!”

The king hesitated and then counted. There were twelve studs on Her Majesty’s shoulder. His Majesty called over the cardinal and asked, in a severe tone, “What does this mean, your Eminence?”

“It means, Sire,” Replied the cardinal after the briefest pause, “that I wanted to present these two studs to Her Majesty but didn’t dare to offer them myself, so I adopted this means of doing so.”

“And I’m all the more grateful to Your Eminence,” said Anne of Austria with a smile that proved she wasn’t deceived by this ingenious bit of gallantry, “as I’m certain these two studs cost you more than the other dozen cost His Majesty.”

The queen bowed to the king and cardinal, then walked majestically off toward her dressing room. The attention focused in the first part of this chapter on the high and mighty has diverted the story for an instant from the young man to whom Anne of Austria owed her unprecedented triumph over the cardinal. Abashed, ignored, jostling in the crowd near one of the doors, he watched from afar this scene that made sense to only four persons: the king, the queen, His Eminence, and himself. The queen had just re-entered her dressing room and d’Artagnan was preparing to leave the hall when he felt a light touch on his shoulder. He turned and saw a young woman who made a sign to him to follow her. This woman’s face was concealed by a black velvet domino mask but despite this precaution that was taken more against others than against him, he instantly recognised his usual guide, the lively and clever Madam Bonacieux. They had scarcely seen each other the night before in the apartment of Germain the Swiss, where d’Artagnan had gone to ask for her. She’d been in such a hurry to tell the queen the good news of her messenger’s happy return that they’d barely had time to exchange more than a few words. Now d’Artagnan followed Madam Bonacieux through the crowd, driven by both love and curiosity. He wanted to stop her, take hold of her and look at her, if only for a moment, all the more so as the corridors they traversed became more deserted – but, quick as a bird, she always glided out from between his hands. When he started to speak, she placed her finger on her mouth in a charming but imperative little gesture that reminded him that he was under the command of another, a power that he must blindly obey, without comment or complaint. At last, after a series of turns and detours, Madam Bonacieux opened a door and led the young man into a lightless closet. She repeated the sign for silence. Then she opened slightly a second door hidden behind a tapestry, and a sliver of bright light streamed into the closet. She touched him lightly on the cheek and disappeared back through the door to the corridor. D’Artagnan remained frozen for a moment, asking himself where he was but the ray of light that came in through the half-open door brought with it a warm breath of perfumed air and the conversation of two or three women, in language at once respectful and elegant. The word Majesty repeated several times, made it clear to him that he was in a closet adjoining the queen’s dressing room. The young man stood in the shadows and waited. The queen seemed jolly and happy that astonished her women who were used to seeing her nearly always anxious and careworn. The queen attributed her joy to the beauty of the ball and the pleasure she’d taken in dancing the ballet – and as it wasn’t permitted as a ring. Immediately the door closed and d’Artagnan found himself in complete darkness. He put the ring on his finger and again waited; there was evidently more to come. After the reward for his devotion must come the reward for his love. Besides, though the ballet was over, the evening was scarcely begun: supper was to be served at three, and the clock of nearby Saint-Jean had only just struck two-thirty. Little by little the sound of voices diminished in the neighbouring chamber as one by one the occupants departed. Then the corridor door of d’Artagnan’s closet quietly opened and Madam Bonacieux darted in. “You at last!” cried d’Artagnan.

“Silence!” said the young woman, placing her hand on the young man’s lips. “Silence! And go back the way you came.”

“But where and when will I see you again?” d’Artagnan said desperately.

“You’ll find a note in your rooms that will tell you. Now go! Go!” At these words she opened the door to the corridor and pushed d’Artagnan out of the closet. D’Artagnan, docile, obeyed like a child – that proved beyond doubt that he was really in love.

023 The Rendezvous

D’Artagnan returned home as fast as his feet could take him, and though it was three in the morning, and he had to traverse some of the nastiest quarters in Paris, trouble passed him by. Everyone knows that God watches over drunkards and lovers. He found the door of his staircase open, ran up the steps, and knocked lightly, in the manner prearranged with Planchet, whom he’d sent home two hours earlier from the Hôtel of Ville, with orders to wait up for him. The lackey came and opened the door. “Has anyone brought a letter for me?” d’Artagnan asked eagerly. “No one has brought a letter, Sir,” replied Planchet, “but one has come on its own.”

“What does that mean, dolt?”

“What it means is that, though I’d had the key to the door in my pocket the whole time I was out, when I came in I found a letter on the green baize table in your bedchamber.”

“And where is this letter?”

“I left it where it was, Sir! It’s not natural for letters to enter people’s houses this way. If the window had been open, even a little, I’d think nothing of it; but no, it was shut tight. Take care, Sir – there’s some sort of sorcery in this.” Despite Planchet’s warning, the young man had already darted into the bedchamber and opened the letter. It was from Madam Bonacieux:

I owe you a thousand thanks, and I want you to have all of them. This evening, around ten o’clock, be in Saint-Cloud, in front of the pavilion on the corner of Sir d’Estrées’s estate.

C.B.

Reading this letter, d’Artagnan felt his heart swell and clench in that happy lover’s spasm that torments and caresses. It was the first such note he’d ever received, and his first call to a lover’s tryst. He felt himself at the gates of the earthly paradise of love; his heart was so drunk with joy, he thought it would melt. “You see, Sir?” said Planchet, watching his master’s face go from red to white to red again. “I was right, wasn’t I? A letter that appears like that can only bring bad news.”

“This time you were wrong, Planchet,” said d’Artagnan, “and to prove it, here’s a crown for you to drink my health with.”

“Much obliged for the crown, Sir, and I promise to do as you ask with it – but still, letters that find their own way into closed houses...”

“Fall from heaven, my friend, fall from heaven!”

“You mean, it’s all right?” asked Planchet.

“My dear Planchet, I’m the happiest of men!”

“Then may I take advantage of Sir’s happiness and go to bed?”

“Yes, go!”

“May the blessings of heaven descend upon you, sir. But still, that letter...”

And Planchet retired, shaking his head worriedly, despite d’Artagnan’s generosity. Left alone, d’Artagnan read and reread his letter, then kissed twenty times over the lines that had been traced by the hand of his beautiful mistress. Finally he took himself to bed, where he slept, and dreaming golden dreams. At seven the next morning he rose and called Planchet, who opened the door at the second call, his face still lined with his anxiety of the night before. “Planchet,” said d’Artagnan, “I’m going out, perhaps for all day. You’re at liberty until seven o’clock this evening when you must be prepared to go, with two horses ready.”

“Go!” said Planchet. “So we’re off again to have more holes poked into our hides.”

“Bring your musketoon and pistols.”

“Just as I thought!” cried Planchet. “I knew it! It’s that lousy letter!”

“Right! Like that pretty little trip the other day, when it rained bullets and sprouted steel traps.”

“All right, if you’re really afraid, I’ll go without you,” said d’Artagnan. “I’d rather travel alone than with a chicken-heart.”

“Oh, that’s harsh, Sir!” said Planchet. “I thought you’d seen me in action.”

“Yes but I thought maybe you’d used up all your courage in one episode.”

“Then I’ll show Sir that there’s still some left. But I must beg you not to spend it too quickly, if you want it to last.”

“Do you think you might have a bit available for this evening?”

“I hope so.”

“Good. I’m counting on you.”

“I’ll be ready at the time you said – but I thought Sir had only one horse in the guards’ stables.”

“There may be only one now but by this evening there’ll be four.”

“So, we went on that journey just to get spare horses?”

“Exactly,” said d’Artagnan. He clapped Planchet on the back and left. Sir Bonacieux was standing in his doorway. D’Artagnan had planned to pass the worthy mercer without speaking to him but the man greeted him so warmly that he thought he ought to stop and chat for a moment. Besides, it’s nearly impossible to avoid being a little condescending to a husband whose wife has set a rendezvous with you that evening in Saint-Cloud in front of Sir D’Estrées’s pavilion!

D’Artagnan approached with the friendliest air he could muster. Their talk naturally touched on the poor man’s incarceration. Sir Bonacieux, who didn’t know that d’Artagnan had heard his conversation with the stranger of Meung, related to his young tenant his persecutions at the hands of that monster, Sir Laffemas, whom he called the cardinal’s hatchet man, and went on at length about the Bastille: the locks, the bars, the dungeons, the chains, and the instruments of torture. D’Artagnan listened as if to his best friend. When Bonacieux had finished, he asked, “And Madam Bonacieux, do you know who abducted her? For I recall, it was due to that nasty business that I owe the pleasure of your acquaintance.”

"Ah!" said Bonacieux. "They were careful not to tell me that, and my wife, on her part, has sworn by all that's holy that she has no idea. But you," continued Bonacieux, in a tone of perfect bonhomie, "what became of you for the last few days? I haven't seen you, or any of your friends – and it's not from the streets of Paris, I think, that you collected all the dust I saw Planchet brush from your boots yesterday."

"You're right, my dear Sir Bonacieux; my friends and I took a little trip."

"Did you go far?"

"Lord, no! Only about forty leagues. We went to take Sir Athos to the waters of Forges, and my friends stayed there with him."

"But you came back, didn't you?" said Bonacieux, with a knowing smile. "A handsome fellow like you doesn't take a long leave of absence from his mistress. We were impatiently awaited in Paris, weren't we?"

"My faith!" the young man laughed. "I admit it! I can see there's no hiding anything from you, my dear Sir Bonacieux! Yes, I was awaited, and impatiently, too!"

A shadow passed over Bonacieux's brow but so quickly that it escaped d'Artagnan's notice. "And are we going to be repaid for all our devotion and hard work?" continued the mercer with a slight edge to his voice that d'Artagnan also missed.

"This very evening! It looks like you're right about that, too!" d'Artagnan said, smiling.

"I just wondered if you were going to be coming back late," said Bonacieux.

"Why?" asked d'Artagnan. "Are you planning to sit up for me, my dear host?"

"No, it's just that since my arrest and the robbery from my house, I'm alarmed every time I hear a door open, especially at night. Dame, what would you have? I'm no man of the sword, like you!"

"Well, don't be alarmed if I come home at one, two, or even three o'clock in the morning. In fact, I may not come home at all."

This time, Bonacieux turned so pale that d'Artagnan couldn't help but notice it. "What's wrong?" he said.

"Nothing," said Bonacieux, "nothing. It's just that, since my recent troubles, I've been subject to bouts of weakness that come over me all at once. I felt a little faint, that's all. Pay no attention – you've got your hands full being happy."

"It does keep me busy!"

"Just wait till this evening, as you said."

"And the evening will come, by God! But maybe you're just as impatient for it as I am – maybe this evening Madam Bonacieux will visit the conjugal abode!"

"Madam Bonacieux is not free this evening," her husband said grimly. "She is detained at the Louvre by her duties."

"Too bad for you, my dear host! When I'm happy, I want everyone to be happy but I guess that's just not possible."

And the young man went on his way, laughing at his little joke that he thought only he could understand. "Laugh while you can," said Bonacieux ominously.

But d'Artagnan was too far away to hear him, and even if he had in his current state of mind he wouldn't have paid any attention. D'Artagnan made his way toward the hôtel of Sir Tréville. His visit on the previous evening, he recalled, had been too brief to give the captain a proper explanation. He found Sir Tréville as cheerful as he'd ever seen him. The king and the queen had been charming to him at the ball, though the cardinal had been rather peevish and sullen. Shortly after the ballet, Tréville had retired under the pretext of feeling poorly. As to Their Majesties, they hadn't returned to the Louvre until six in the morning. "Now," said Sir Tréville, lowering his voice and glancing into the corners of his study to make sure they were alone, "let's talk about you, my young friend – for it's obvious that your fortunate return had something to do with the king's pleasure, the queen's triumph, and His Eminence's humiliation. You'd better watch out for yourself."

"What do I have to fear as long as I have the good luck to enjoy the favour of their Majesties?" d'Artagnan said.

"Everything, believe me. The cardinal is not the kind of man to leave troubles unattended to until he's settled accounts with the troublemaker, and the troublemaker in this case seems to me to be a certain young Gascon of my acquaintance."

"Do you suppose the cardinal knows as much as you and realises I'm the one who went to London?"

"London! The devil you say! Was it from London that you brought back that beautiful diamond that glitters on your finger? Take care, my dear d'Artagnan – it's not a good thing to accept a present from an enemy. Isn't there a Latin verse or two about that? Wait a moment..."

"Yes, I'm sure. There must be," said d'Artagnan who'd never been able to master the simplest rules of that language and had driven his tutor to despair.

"I'm certain of it," said Sir Tréville, who had a smattering of the classics. "Sir Benserade was citing it just the other day. Hold on ... ah! Here it is: timeo Danaos et Doña ferentes. Which means, 'Beware of the enemy who gives you gifts.'"

"But this diamond doesn't come from an enemy, Sir," said d'Artagnan, "it comes from the queen."

"From the queen! Oh ho!" said Tréville. "To be sure, it's a truly royal jewel, worth a thousand pistoles if it's worth a denier. Who did the queen delegate to send you this little present?"

"She gave it to me herself."

"Do you say so! Where was that?"

"In a closet adjoining her dressing room."

"How did she do it?"

"She gave me her hand to kiss."

"You kissed the hand of the queen?" Tréville was impressed. "Her Majesty did me that honour."

"And in the presence of witnesses! Oh, that's rash and reckless!"

"Don't worry, Sir, no one saw her," replied d'Artagnan.

He told Sir Tréville how it had been managed. "Ah, the women, the women!" cried the old soldier. "They live for romance! Everything mysterious is charming to them! So, you saw nothing more than an arm; you could meet the queen and not recognise her and she could see you and never know you."

"No but thanks to this diamond..."

"Listen," said Tréville, "will you accept some good advice from a friend?"

"You honour me, Sir," said d'Artagnan.

"Take that diamond to the first goldsmith you come across and sell it for whatever he'll give you. Even a Jew will give you no less than eight hundred pistoles for it. Money has no name, young man. That ring bears an awesome one and might betray he who wears it."

"Sell this ring!" cried d'Artagnan. "Sell the ring that comes from my sovereign! Never!"

"Then at least turn the stone inside, you poor fool, for everyone knows that a cadet from Gascony doesn't find such gems in his mother's jewel box."

"You really think I have something to fear?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Young man, a person sleeping over a landmine with a lit fuse is perfectly safe compared to you."

"The devil!" Tréville's certainty was finally beginning to get through to d'Artagnan. "What should I do?"

"You must be on your guard – always. The cardinal has a long memory and a longer arm. Believe me, he'll do you some sort of injury."

"Yes but what?"

"Who can say? He knows every trick in Satan's book. At a minimum, he'll have you arrested."

"What? Would they dare to arrest a man in His Majesty's service?"

"For the love of God! They certainly dared to arrest Athos! In any case, young man, take the word of someone who's been thirty years at Court: never let down your guard for a moment, or you're lost. On the contrary – it's I who tell you this! – watch for enemies everywhere. If anyone picks a fight with you, even a ten-year-old child, avoid it. If you are attacked, day or night, beat a retreat without shame. If you cross a bridge, check every plank, or it may give way beneath your feet. If you pass a house being built, look up, or a stone may fall on your head. If you stay out late, make sure you're followed by your lackey, and make sure he's armed – and for that matter, make sure you can trust your lackey. Trust no one: not your friend, not your brother, not your mistress – especially not your mistress."

D'Artagnan blushed. "My mistress," he said stiffly. "Why her more than another?"

"Because a mistress is the cardinal's favourite tool. He has none more useful: a woman will sell you for ten pistoles. Think of Delilah. You know your Scriptures, don't you?" D'Artagnan thought of the rendezvous Madam Bonacieux had arranged with him for that evening; but to our hero's credit, it must be said that Sir Tréville's poor opinion of women didn't make d'Artagnan the slightest bit suspicious of his pretty landlady. Tréville broke in on his thoughts. "Do you know what's happened to your three comrades?"

"I was about to ask if you had any news of them."

"None, I'm afraid."

"Well, I left them on the road: Porthos at Chantilly with a duel on his hands; Aramis at Crèvecœur with a ball in his shoulder; and Athos at Amiens, accused of counterfeiting."

"God's blood! And how did you escape?"

"I have to say, Sir, it was by a miracle, though I took a sword thrust in my chest on a back road near Calais, where I nailed Sir Count of Wardes like a butterfly to a tapestry."

"You see? Wardes – a cardinal's man and Rochefort's cousin. But wait, my friend, I'm getting an idea."

"What's that, Sir?"

"In your place, here's what I'd do. While His Eminence was looking for me in Paris, I, without blowing my horn about it, would return up the road to Picardy to look for news of my three comrades. What the devil! They deserve some consideration from you."

"That's good advice, Sir, and I'll set out tomorrow."

"Tomorrow! And why not tonight?"

"Tonight, Sir, I'm detained in Paris on a vital matter."

"Ah! Young man! Some little love affair? Take care, I repeat to you. It's women who're our ruin, women who ruin us all. Trust me and leave tonight."

"Impossible, Sir."

"You've given your word?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Then that's quite another thing. But promise me that, if you're not killed tonight, you'll set out tomorrow."

"I promise."

"Do you need any money?"

"I still have fifty pistoles. That's as much as I'll need, I think."

"But your companions?"

"I don't think they'll be short. We each left Paris with seventy-five pistoles in our pockets."

"Will I see you again before you leave?"

"I don't think so, Sir, unless there's some new trouble."

"Then, the best of luck, and have a safe journey."

"Thanks, Sir."

And d'Artagnan took his leave of Sir Tréville, touched more than ever by his fatherly solicitude for his musketeers. He called successively at the homes of Athos, Porthos, and Aramis but none of them had returned. Their lackeys were likewise absent, and no one had heard news of any of them. He would have asked their mistresses about them but he didn't know those of Porthos and Aramis – and Athos, of course, had none. Passing by the Hôtel des Gardes, he glanced into the stables: three of the four horses had already arrived. Planchet, amazed, was in the midst of grooming them and was already done with the first two. "Ah, Sir!" Planchet said. "How glad I am to see you!"

"And why is that, Planchet?"

"Do you trust our landlord, Sir Bonacieux?"

"Trust him? Not the least in the world."

"That's a good thing, Sir."

"Why do you ask?"

"It's just that, while you were talking with him, I watched from above, and his face changed colour two or three times."

"Bah!"

"Sir may not have noticed, as he was preoccupied with the letter he'd received. But I, on the other hand, was on my guard, due to the strange way that letter got into our house. I paid close attention to the way Sir Bonacieux looked at you."

"And you thought he was...?"

"Treacherous, Sir."

"Really!"

"Moreover, as soon as Sir had disappeared around the corner, Sir Bonacieux took his hat, shut his door, and set off at a run in the opposite direction."

"I think you're right, Planchet; that does sound fishy. Rest assured, we won't pay our rent until the affair is explained to our complete satisfaction."

"Sir is pleased to joke about it – but we'll see."

"What would you have, Planchet? What the fates have written, will be!"

"Sir has not given up on this evening's outing, then?"

"On the contrary, Planchet. The more I have against Sir Bonacieux, the more eager I am to keep the rendezvous that was arranged in that letter that makes you so nervous."

"Then, Sir is determined..."

"Immovably, my friend. Be ready here, at nine o'clock, and I'll come to get you." Planchet, seeing there was no longer any hope of getting his master to renounce his excursion, heaved a profound sigh and set to grooming the third horse. As to d'Artagnan, he was basically a careful youth, so instead of returning home, he went and dined with that Gascon priest who, during the financial distress of the four friends, had given them a breakfast of chocolate.

The Pavilion

At nine that evening d'Artagnan was at the Hôtel des Gardes, where he found that the fourth horse had arrived. Planchet was ready to go, armed with his musketoon and pistol. D'Artagnan had his sword and had thrust a pair of pistols into his belt. Quietly, they mounted their horses and departed. It was a dark night and no one saw them leave. Planchet fell in behind his master, about ten paces back. D'Artagnan followed the river quays past the Louvre and the Tuileries, left the city by Porte La Conference, and travelled along the road, prettier then than now, that leads to Saint-Cloud. While they were in the city, Planchet maintained his respectful distance from d'Artagnan but as the road became more lonely and dark, he drew gradually nearer. By the time they entered the Bois of Boulogne, he found himself quite naturally riding side by side with his master. The truth is, the swaying of the great trees and the moonlight dappling the dark underbrush made him rather uneasy. D'Artagnan noticed that something was on his lackey's mind. "Well, Sir Planchet," he said, "What is it this time?"

"Don't you find, Sir that the woods are like churches?"

"How's that?"

"Because one doesn't dare speak too loudly in either."

"Why don't you dare speak up, Planchet? Afraid?"

"Yes, Sir – afraid of being overheard."

"Afraid of being overheard! Our conversation is quite moral and proper, my dear Planchet, and no one could find fault with it."

"Ah, Sir, that Bonacieux has a cunning look to his eyebrows," said Planchet, returning to his former theme, "and he has a nasty way of twitching his lips!"

"What the devil brings Bonacieux to mind?"

"Sir, we think of what we must, not of what we will."

"Only because you're a coward, Planchet."

"Sir, don't confuse caution with cowardice. Prudence is a virtue."

"And you're very virtuous, aren't you, Planchet?"

"Sir, isn't that the barrel of a musket shining over there? Shouldn't we duck our heads?"

"Tréville was right," murmured d'Artagnan, remembering the captain's warning. "This fellow's fear will end up infecting me."

He put his horse into a trot. Planchet trotted beside him, following his master's movements as if he were his shadow. "Are we going to keep up this pace all night, Sir?" he asked as they emerged from the woods.

"No, Planchet, for you've arrived."

"I've arrived? How's that? And what about you, Sir?"

"I still have a little farther to go."

"But Sir is leaving me alone here?"

"Are you scared, Planchet?"

"No but Sir will please observe that it's a very cold night, that chills can bring on rheumatism, and that a lackey who has rheumatism makes a poor servant, especially for a master as active as Sir is."

"If you're cold, go into one of those cabarets you can see down the road there. Just be waiting for me by the door at six in the morning."

"Sir, I did as you asked with the crown you gave me this morning and ate and drank to your health but now I don't have a sou left for something warm to ward off the cold."

"Here's a half-pistole. I'll see you tomorrow."

D'Artagnan dismounted from his horse, threw the bridle to Planchet and strode off, enveloped in his cloak. "God but I'm cold!" said Planchet as soon as he'd lost sight of his master. Shivering, he hurried off to knock on the door of a building that bore all the hallmarks of a small suburban cabaret. Meanwhile, d'Artagnan, who'd detoured onto a side road, continued on his way into Saint-Cloud. Instead of following the high street, he took a path behind the château, went down a back lane, and soon found himself opposite the pavilion he sought. It was a lonely spot. A high wall ran along one side of the street, at the corner of which was the pavilion; on the other side behind a hedge was a garden behind a rundown cottage. He had arrived at his rendezvous. The letter hadn't mentioned how he was to signal his presence, so he waited. Not a sound could be heard; he could have been a hundred leagues from the capital. D'Artagnan glanced around, then leaned himself against the hedge. Beyond the hedge, the garden, and the cottage, a thick, dark mist cloaked the sprawling city of Paris, a black void from which only an occasional light glittered, like stars fallen from heaven to glimmer in hell. But for d'Artagnan, the world was garbed in happiness, the future smiled upon him, and every shadow would fade. The hour of his rendezvous had arrived. The great bell in the belfry of Saint-Cloud tolled slowly ten times. There was something doleful in its sonorous bronze voice, mournful to hear in the middle of the night – but the young man's heart vibrated in harmony with every stroke that sounded the hour he'd awaited so long. His eyes were fixed on the little pavilion on the corner. All its windows were closed and shuttered, except one up on the first floor. From this window shone a soft light that silvered the shivering leaves of the lime trees that grew just outside the park. Evidently behind this little window with its pleasant glow, waited pretty Madam Bonacieux. Comforted by this sweet idea, d'Artagnan waited with patient docility for half an hour, eyes glued to that charming little room. He could see part of a ceiling with gilded mouldings that hinted at the elegance of the rest of the apartment. The belfry of Saint-Cloud struck ten-thirty. This time without quite knowing why, d'Artagnan felt a cold shiver run through his veins. But maybe the chill was beginning to creep into him, and he'd mistaken a mere physical sensation for a shudder of apprehension. Suddenly he was convinced that he'd gotten the rendezvous wrong, that it was actually for eleven o'clock. He crossed the alley and approached the window, drew the letter from his pocket, and read it again in the dim light from above. He hadn't been wrong: the rendezvous was for ten o'clock. He went back and resumed his post, though the silence and the solitude were beginning to make him uneasy. Eleven o'clock sounded. Now d'Artagnan really began to fear that something had happened to Madam Bonacieux. He clapped his hands three times, the usual lovers' signal but there was no reply – not even an echo. He then thought, with a certain irritation, that maybe the young woman had fallen asleep while waiting for him. He crossed over to the wall and tried to climb it but the mortar between the bricks had been pointed recently and he couldn't get a good hold. As he slipped back to the ground he thought of the trees, their leaves still limned by the light. One of them hung over the road, and he thought that from within its branches he might be able to see into the pavilion. Climbing the tree was easy. Besides, d'Artagnan was barely twenty and still remembered his schoolboy skills. In an instant he was among the branches, looking through the windows deep into the interior of the pavilion. The calm, unwavering glow of the lamp with its soft light illuminated a scene of unspeakable chaos, and the strange contrast sent a chill through d'Artagnan from his soles to his scalp. One of the windowpanes was cracked; the door to the room had been broken in and hung in two pieces on its hinges; a table that had been covered with an elegant supper, lay overturned on the floor, amid shattered glass and smashed fruit. Everything in the chamber told the story of a violent and desperate struggle. D'Artagnan even thought he could see among the debris pieces of clothing and bloodstains spattered on the carpets and curtains. The young cadet dropped back down to the street, heart pounding frantically, to see if he could find other traces of violence in the soft light that still shined into the calm night. He then saw that the ground was trampled and pockmarked here and there with a confusion of footprints of men and horses. He hadn't noticed it before because he hadn't thought to look. Furthermore, the wheel-marks of a carriage had made a deep imprint in the soft earth near the wall. The carriage appeared to have come from Paris, turned around in front of the pavilion, and returned the way it came. At length d'Artagnan's search turned up a torn woman's glove near the wall. Still light and fresh in those places where it hadn't touched the muddy ground, it was the kind of perfumed glove that lovers like to pluck from a pretty hand. As d'Artagnan searched, a cold sweat dripped from his forehead, his breathing was ragged, and his heart clenched in horrible anguish. For reassurance, he told himself that the chaos in the pavilion might have nothing to do with Madam Bonacieux; that the young woman's rendezvous with him was for in front of the pavilion, not in the pavilion; that she might have been detained in Paris by her duties, or by the jealousy of her husband. But all these rationalizations were overwhelmed by an agonized conviction, that feeling we get that tells us with certainty that we're victims of a horrible fate. Then d'Artagnan nearly went mad. He ran wildly back along the high road, returning along his route from Paris. At the ferry across the river, he found the boatman and plied him with desperate questions. The boatman said that at about seven in the evening he'd carried across a woman enveloped in a black cloak, who seemed anxious not to be recognised. However, just because of that, the boatman had paid special attention to her and had noticed that she was young and pretty. There was then, as now, a regular series of young and pretty women who come to Saint-Cloud with an interest in not being seen but d'Artagnan didn't doubt for an instant that this woman was Madam Bonacieux. He took advantage of the lamp in the boatman's cabin to read her letter one more time and reassured himself that he'd made no mistake. The rendezvous had been at Saint-Cloud and not elsewhere in front of the pavilion of Sir d'Estrées and not in some other street. Everything seemed to confirm d'Artagnan's premonition of evil. Something awful had happened. He ran back to the château. Something might have occurred at the pavilion in his absence and some new clues might await him. The alley was still deserted, and the same soft light shone from the window. D'Artagnan then thought of that silent, dark cottage behind the hedge. Someone there might have seen something and might be willing to talk about it. The gate of the little enclosure was shut but d'Artagnan leaped over the hedge and approached the cottage, despite the barking of a chained-up dog. There was no response to his first few knocks. As with the pavilion, a deathlike silence reigned over the cottage. But the cottage felt like his last chance, so he kept at it. After a little while he thought he heard a noise from inside: a timid noise, a noise that seemed afraid of being heard. D'Artagnan stopped knocking and began to beg, to implore in a voice so filled with worry and terror, promises and cajolery, that even the most frightened person would have been reassured by it. At length an old, worm-eaten shutter was opened, or rather shoved ajar, and then suddenly slammed shut again when the light from a miserable lamp had shone on d'Artagnan's baldric, sword, and pistols. But in that moment d'Artagnan had glimpsed the pale head of an old man. "In the name of heaven!" he cried. "Listen to me! I've been waiting on someone who hasn't come and I'm worried to death. Has there been any trouble nearby? Tell me!" The window slowly opened and the aged face appeared again but even more pale than before. D'Artagnan told his story simply with no names. He told how he'd had a rendezvous with a young woman before the pavilion and how when she didn't appear, he'd climbed the lime tree, where by the light of the lamp he'd seen the terrible state of the room within. The old man listened attentively, nodding as if to say, "Just so."

When d'Artagnan was finished, he shook his head sadly. "Tell me what you mean!" cried d'Artagnan. "In the name of heaven! Speak! Explain yourself!"

"Oh, Sir!" said the old man. "Please ask me nothing. If I tell you what I've seen, it's certain that no good will come to me."

"You have seen something then? In that case in the name of heaven – and this coin—" d'Artagnan threw the man a pistole – "tell me what you've seen. I give you the word of a gentleman that I'll keep what you say locked in my heart."

The old man read so much truth and sorrow in d'Artagnan's face that he beckoned him closer. He said in a low voice, "At nearly nine o'clock, I heard a noise in the street. I wondered what it could be but when I approached my gate I saw that someone was trying to get in. I'm poor and not afraid of being robbed, so I went to open it and saw three men in the alley. In the shadow of the trees there was a two-horse carriage and several saddled horses that apparently belonged to the three men, who were dressed as cavaliers. 'My good Gentlemen,' I called, 'what can I do for you?'

'Do you have a ladder?' said one who appeared to be the leader.

'Yes, Sir, the one I use to pick my fruit.'

'Give it to us and go back into your house. Here's a crown for your trouble. Only remember that if you speak a word about what you see and hear – for you will spy and eavesdrop, I'm sure, no matter how we threaten you – if you speak a word, I say, you're lost.'

"At these words, he threw me a crown that I picked up, and he took my ladder. He was right: after shutting my gate behind them, I pretended to return to my house but I immediately went out the back door and sneaked through the shadows into those elderberry bushes, from which I could see everything. The three men quietly drew up the carriage, then brought a little man out of it, fat, short, grey, and dressed in shabby dark clothes. He carefully climbed the ladder, peeked into the lit chamber, came quietly back down, and whispered, 'It's her!' Immediately the one he'd spoken to approached the door of the pavilion, opened it with a key, entered, and closed the door behind him. Meanwhile the other two men climbed the ladder. The little old man waited at the door of the carriage, the driver held the carriage horses, and a lackey held the saddled horses. All at once shouts came from the pavilion, and a woman ran to the window and opened it, as if to jump out. But as soon as she saw the two men she shrieked and backed away. The two men sprang after her into the chamber. Then I could see no more but I heard the sound of furniture breaking. The woman shouted and called for help but then her cries were muffled. The two men appeared at the window, carrying the woman in their arms. They climbed down the ladder and took her into the carriage, followed by the little old man. The leader, who was still in the pavilion, closed the window and came out the door a moment later. He made sure the woman was in the carriage, then sprang into the saddle, followed by his two companions. The lackey climbed up next to the driver and the carriage set off at a gallop, escorted by the three cavaliers. That was the end of it, and from that moment I have heard and seen nothing."

D'Artagnan was crushed by this terrible news into a mute paralysis, while the demons of anger and jealousy howled in his heart. "Please, my gentleman," said the old man, affected more by this mute dejection than he would have been by tears and laments, "don't despair. They didn't kill her, and that's what really matters."

D'Artagnan said, "Do you know anything of the man who led this hellish crew?"

"Nothing at all."

"But since you spoke to him, you must have seen him."

"Oh, you want a description of him?"

"Yes."

"A tall dark fellow, with black mustachios, dark eyes, and the air of a gentleman."

"That's him!" d'Artagnan cried. "Him again! Always him! He's my nemesis, it seems. And the other?"

"Which?"

"The short one."

"Oh! He was no nobleman, I'll answer for it. Besides, he didn't carry a sword, and the others treated him with no respect."

"Some lackey," murmured d'Artagnan. "Ah! Poor woman! Poor woman! What have they done with you?"

"You promised to keep my secret," said the old man.

"And I repeat my promise. Never fear, I'm a gentleman. A gentleman's only his word and I've given you mine." With a weight on his soul, d'Artagnan returned along the road to the ferry. Sometimes he tried to believe that it hadn't really been Madam Bonacieux, that he'd find her tomorrow returned to the Louvre; sometimes he feared that she'd had an affair with some other man, who in a jealous rage had surprised her and carried her off. He wavered between grief and despair. "If only I had my friends!" he groaned. "Then I might at least have some hope of rescuing her. But who knows what's become of them?" It was nearly midnight. His next concern was to find Planchet. D'Artagnan checked all the cabarets along the high road that still showed a little light but Planchet was in none of them. As he entered the sixth cabaret, it occurred to him that this midnight search was rather hazardous. D'Artagnan had told his lackey to meet him at six in the morning, and wherever he'd gone, he was within his rights to be gone until then. Besides, it occurred to d'Artagnan that if he remained in the neighbourhood of the crime something might yet occur that would shed some light on the mysterious affair. So d'Artagnan stopped in the sixth cabaret, asked for a bottle of their best honey, then installed himself in the darkest corner of the room and settled in to wait for daylight. Once again his hopes came to naught, for though he listened to the cabaret's clientele with both ears, he heard nothing but crude insults and coarse jokes from the labourers, servants, and drovers who composed the honourable society of which he was temporarily a part. There was nothing at all about his poor abducted lady. Lacking options, he availed himself of his bottle until it was empty, and then to avoid suspicion he curled up to try to sleep as best he could. Of course, he was only twenty years old, an age when sleep has inalienable rights that must be obeyed, even over hearts in despair. Around six in the morning d'Artagnan awoke with that sticky feeling that generally follows a bad night. He straightened his clothes and checked to make sure no one had taken advantage of his sleep to rob him. His diamond was on his finger, his purse in his pocket and his pistols in his belt, so he arose, paid for his bottle, and left to see if he'd have any better luck finding his lackey in the morning than he'd had the night before. The first thing he saw in the damp, grey mist was honest Planchet, holding two horses outside the door of a cabaret so small, that the previous night d'Artagnan had passed it without even suspecting it was there.

The Mistress of Porthos

Instead of returning directly home d'Artagnan stopped at Sir Tréville's gate, where he ran up the stairs. This time, he'd decided to tell the whole story of what had happened. No doubt Tréville could give him some good advice on the matter; and, as the captain saw the queen almost daily, he might be able to learn something from Her Majesty about poor Madam Bonacieux, now paying so dearly for her devotion to her mistress. Sir Tréville listened to the young man's account with a seriousness that indicated he saw something more in it than a mere love affair. When d'Artagnan had finished, he said, "Hum! This stinks of His Eminence a league off."

"But what should I do?" said d'Artagnan.

"There's absolutely nothing you can do right now except get out of Paris as soon as possible – as I told you yesterday. I'll see the queen and give her the details of this poor woman's disappearance, of which she's doubtless ignorant. The report might help her decide what to do, and on your return, maybe I'll have some good news for you. Leave it to me." D'Artagnan knew that although Tréville was a Gascon, he was not in the habit of making promises lightly – and if he did promise, he more than kept his word. D'Artagnan bowed to him, grateful for favours both past and future. The worthy captain who had a keen interest in this young man, so brave and resolute, shook his hand affectionately and wished him a safe journey. Determined to put Tréville's advice into practice right away, d'Artagnan made his way to the Rue des Fossoyeurs, intent on immediately packing his bags. As he came up the block, he recognised Sir Bonacieux, standing in front of his door in his morning clothes. Everything the prudent Planchet had said the night before about the sinister character of his landlord returned to d'Artagnan, and he looked at Bonacieux with new eyes. Besides having a sickly, jaundiced look that indicated an excess of bile in his blood that might not mean anything, d'Artagnan thought he detected something sly and perfidious lurking in the wrinkles around the man's eyes. A rogue doesn't laugh the same way as an honest man, and a hypocrite doesn't shed the same tears as a man of good faith. All falsehood is a mask – and however good the mask, with a little attention one can always tell the mask from the face. So it seemed to d'Artagnan that Bonacieux wore a mask – a mask that, once recognised, was thoroughly unpleasant to see. Overcome by a sudden feeling of repugnance, he was about to pass the man without speaking to him when Bonacieux waylaid him as he'd done the day before. "Well, young man," he said, "what late hours we seem to be keeping! Seven in the morning, plague! It seems to me you're doing things exactly backward, coming home just when others are going out."

"Certainly no one can say that of you, Master Bonacieux," said the young man. "You're a model of propriety. Though it goes without saying that when a man has a young and pretty wife, he doesn't need to go out looking for happiness. His happiness finds him – isn't that right, Sir Bonacieux?"

Bonacieux went pale as death but managed to grimace out a smile. "Ho-ho!" he said. "You're a funny one. And where the devil did you go last night, my young master? You appear to have taken none too clean a route."

D'Artagnan glanced down at his muddy boots and in the same glance noticed the mercer's shoes and stockings. It looked like they both came from the same gutter; both their feet were stained with the same kind of mud. D'Artagnan suddenly remembered the portly little old man in dark clothes, the sort of lackey who'd been treated with such disdain by the gentleman kidnappers. It'd been Bonacieux himself! The husband had assisted at the abduction of his wife. D'Artagnan felt a sudden urge to take the mercer by the throat and strangle him on the spot – but he was a prudent youth as has been said and restrained himself. However, the change of expression on his face terrified Bonacieux, who tried to back away but was stopped by the closed door behind him. "Haha! I think you are the funny one, Sir," said d'Artagnan. "My boots may need a good sponging but your stockings and shoes need brushing just as badly. Were you out on the town yourself, Master Bonacieux? You devil, you! That's inexcusable in a man your age, especially if he has a wife as pretty as yours!"

"Lord, no!" said Bonacieux. "Yesterday I went to Saint-Mandé to make inquiries about a new servant, since I can't do without one. The roads were so bad I picked up all this mud and I haven't had time yet to clean it off."

D'Artagnan was sure Bonacieux had named Saint-Mandé because it was in the exact opposite direction from Paris as Saint-Cloud. This was just one more proof that confirmed his suspicions. The probable truth of this gave d'Artagnan his first consolation in the whole affair. If Bonacieux knew where his wife was, d'Artagnan might, by extreme methods, pry open the mercer's teeth and force out his secret. But he needed to make sure the probability was a certainty. "Pardon my asking, my dear Sir Bonacieux," said d'Artagnan, "but nothing makes one as thirsty as lack of sleep. Allow me to step into your house for a glass of water. You know no neighbour would ever refuse such a request." And without waiting for permission from his host, d'Artagnan quickly opened the front door and stepped past him into the house, where he took a quick glance at the bed. It had not been slept in; Bonacieux hadn't been to bed at all. He must have returned in the last hour or two after having accompanied his captive wife to wherever they'd taken her, or at least to the first relay. "Thank you, Master Bonacieux," said d'Artagnan, draining his glass. "That's all I wanted from you. Now I'll return to my room and have Planchet brush my boots. When he's done, if you like, I'll send him down to brush your shoes."

He then left the mercer, who seemed surprised at his strange behaviour. D'Artagnan wondered if he'd tripped himself up. At the top of the stairs d'Artagnan found Planchet quivering in fright. "Ah, Sir!" cried Planchet, as soon as he saw his master. "It never stops! I thought you would never come back."

"What now?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Never, not in a hundred or thousand tries would you guess who came to visit you in your absence."

"When was this?"

"About half an hour ago, while you were at Sir Tréville's."

"Well, who was it? Come on, tell me."

"Sir Cavois."

"Sir Cavois?"

"In person."

"The Captain of the Cardinal's Guards?"

"Himself."

"Did he come to arrest me?"

"I don't doubt it, Sir, despite all his soft soap."

"Soft soap? Did he seem overly polite?"

"He was all honey, Sir."

"Really?"

"He came, he said, in the name of His Eminence, who wished you well, and said he wanted you to follow him to the cardinal's hôtel."

"What did you say to that?"

"That it was impossible, since you weren't at home, as he could see for himself."

"And he said...?"

"That you mustn't fail to call upon him sometime today. Then he added, in a low voice, 'Tell your master that His Eminence holds him in high regard and that his fortune may depend on this interview.'" D'Artagnan smiled. "That's a rather clumsy snare. I expected better from the cardinal."

"I saw the snare, too, so I told him that when you returned, you'd be desolate that you'd missed him. 'Where's he gone?' Sir Cavois asked, and I told him, 'To Troyes in Champagne.' 'When did he leave?' he asked, and I told him, 'Last night.'"

"Planchet, my friend," said d'Artagnan, "you're a prince."

"You understand, Sir, I thought that if you did want to see Sir Cavois, you could always contradict me and say that you hadn't left yet. That would make a liar of me but since I'm not a gentleman, it doesn't matter."

"Planchet, you may keep your reputation as a man of truth. We leave in a quarter of an hour."

"That's just the advice I was going to give to Sir. And where are we going, if I'm not being too curious?"

"In the opposite direction from the way you said I'd gone, by God! Besides, aren't you as eager for news of Grimaud, Mousqueton, and Bazin as I am to know what's become of Athos, Porthos, and Aramis?"

"Every bit, Sir," said Planchet. "I'm ready when you're ready. At the moment, I think the air of the provinces will be healthier for us than the air of Paris. So..."

"So pack our bags, Planchet, and let's go. As for me, I'm going out right now, nonchalant as can be, hands in my pockets, so no one will suspect anything. When we're packed, meet me at the Hôtel des Gardes. By the way, Planchet, I think you were right about our landlord. He's a genuine rat."

"Sir, you can always believe me when I tell you something like that. I'm a physiognomist, I am!"

As per the plan, d'Artagnan went down first. Then, to make sure he'd covered all eventualities, he called for a final time at the lodgings of his three friends. There was no news of them, except for a letter that had arrived for Aramis, perfumed and addressed in an elegant small hand. D'Artagnan took charge of it. Ten minutes later, Planchet rejoined him in the stables of the Hôtel des Gardes. To save time, d'Artagnan had already saddled his own horse. Planchet gave him his travel bag, and d'Artagnan said, "All right, now saddle the other three horses and we'll go."

"Does Sir think we'll travel twice as fast if we each have two horses?" Planchet asked sardonically.

"No, Sir Smart-Arse," replied d'Artagnan, "but with four horses we can bring back our three friends, assuming we find them alive."

"Small chance of that," said Planchet, "but we must never despair of the mercy of God."

"Amen," said d'Artagnan, mounting his horse. They separated as they left the Hôtel des Gardes, going opposite ways down the street, one to leave Paris by the Porte Saint-Martin and the other by the Porte Montmartre, to rejoin beyond Saint-Denis. This strategic manoeuvre was executed like clockwork, and as a result d'Artagnan and Planchet entered Pierrefitte together. Planchet, it must be said, was much more courageous by day than by night. However, his natural prudence never left him at any time. He hadn't forgotten any of the incidents of their first journey, and he regarded everyone they met on the road as a potential enemy. As a result, his hat was always in his hand – which earned him some severe rebukes from d'Artagnan, who feared such excessive politeness would make people think Planchet was lackey to a person of no consequence. However, because passers-by were mollified by Planchet's manners – or because, this time, no enemies were posted on the young man's road – the two travellers arrived at Chantilly without incident. They alighted at the Inn of Grand Saint-Martin, where they'd stopped on their first journey. The host, seeing a young gentleman followed by a lackey leading two fine horses, approached respectfully from the front door. Having travelled eleven leagues, d'Artagnan thought it was a good time to stop, whether or not Porthos could be found there. He thought it might not be wise to inquire immediately about the musketeer, so, without asking any questions, he descended from his horse, commended it to the care of his lackey, and went into the small back room provided for those who wished to dine alone. He asked the host to bring him a bottle of his best honey and as good a breakfast as he could manage, orders that confirmed the high opinion his host had formed of him at first glance. D'Artagnan, therefore, was served with miraculous speed. Everyone knew the regiment of the Gardes Françaises drew its recruits from among the leading gentlemen of the realm, so d'Artagnan, followed by a lackey and with four magnificent horses, couldn't fail to make an impression, despite the simplicity of his uniform. The host decided to wait on him personally. Seeing this, d'Artagnan told him to bring two glasses and opened up a conversation with him. "My faith, my dear host – I asked for a bottle of your best," said d'Artagnan, filling the glasses, "and if you've brought me anything less, your punishment will suit the crime, for since I hate to drink alone, you'll have to join me. Take up your glass, and let's drink! ... But we must drink to something no one can argue with. Let's drink to the prosperity of your establishment!"

"Your Lordship honours me," said the host, "and my sincere thanks for the compliment."

"Make no mistake," said d'Artagnan, "there may be more selfishness in my toast than you suppose. You can get good service only in a prosperous establishment; in a place that isn't doing well, the service is poor, and the traveller suffers from the troubles of the host. Now, I travel quite a bit, especially on this road, so I like to see all the inns along this route prospering."

"Yes, I thought I'd had the honour of seeing Sir once before," said the host.

"Once? Bah! I've passed through Chantilly maybe ten times, and I've stopped at your inn on at least three or four occasions. Why, I was here only ten or twelve days ago, accompanied by some friends – musketeers. By the way, one of them got into a dispute with a stranger, a man who picked a fight with him for no apparent reason."

"Yes, indeed!" said the host. "I recall it perfectly! Your Lordship means Sir Porthos, don't you? Tsk, tsk."

"Yes, that was my companion's name. Good lord! Don't tell me something's happened to him?"

"But Your Lordship must have noticed that he didn't continue his journey."

"Of course. He promised to rejoin us but he never appeared."

"He's done us the honour of remaining here in our inn. But I must admit, we're getting a little anxious about him."

"Why is that?"

"Because of certain expenses he's incurred."

"But whatever the total, I'm sure he'll pay it."

"Ah, Sir, that's music to my ears! He's run up quite a bill, and just this morning the doctor declared that if Sir Porthos didn't pay him he'd hold me responsible, as I was the one who'd sent for him."

"Is Porthos wounded then?"

"I can't tell you, Sir."

"What do you mean, you can't tell me? You ought to know better than anyone."

"Yes, Sir but in our situation we don't always say everything we know, especially when we've been warned that if we use our tongues, we'll lose our ears."

"Well, can I see Porthos?"

"Certainly, Sir. Take the stairs up to the first floor and knock at Number 1. Only, warn him that it's you."

"What? Why should I warn him that it's me?"

"I wouldn't want Sir to have an accident."

"What kind of accident are you afraid of?"

"Sir Porthos might take you for one of the staff and run you through, or maybe blow your brains out."

"What have you done to him?"

"We ... asked him for payment."

"The devil you say! Now I understand. It's a request that Porthos responds poorly to when he's out of funds. But I know he ought to be flush."

"We thought so too, Sir. As this house is quite meticulous about weekly accounts, after eight days we presented our bill. However, apparently we chose a bad time to do it, as at the first word on the subject, he told us to go to the devil. Now, it's true, he had been gambling the night before..."

"Oh? With whom?"

"My God, who can say? With some gentleman who was passing through, whom Sir Porthos invited to play lansquenet with him."

"That's it, then! The poor sap must have lost everything."

"Right down to his horse, Sir, for when the stranger was leaving, we noticed that his lackey was saddling Sir Porthos's mount. When we pointed this out to the stranger, he told us to mind our own business, as the horse was now his. We then notified Sir Porthos of what was going on. But he told us we must be lowborn louts to doubt the word of a gentleman, and if the man said the horse was his, it must be true."

"That sounds like Porthos, all right," murmured d'Artagnan.

"Then," continued the host, "I told him that since we seemed to have a disagreement about payment, I hoped he would have the courtesy to take his business over to the Golden Eagle but Sir Porthos said that, since my inn was the best in town, he preferred to remain here. This reply was so flattering I couldn't really insist that he leave. I limited myself to begging him to give up his chamber that is the best in the inn, and be content with a pretty little room on the third floor. But Sir Porthos said he was expecting at any moment to receive a visit from his mistress, who was one of the greatest ladies of the Court, and he gave me to understand that the chamber he did me the honour to occupy was barely adequate to host such a visitor. Though what he said might be true, I still felt I had to insist. But he wouldn't even discuss it with me – he just took out a pistol, laid it on the table, and declared that at the first word he heard about removing himself, he would blow out the brains of whoever would be so foolish as to meddle in something that concerned only himself. Since then, Sir, no one goes into his chamber except his servant."

"Mousqueton is here then?"

"Yes, Sir. Five days after your departure, he returned in rather bad shape. It appears he too had some bad luck on his journey. Unfortunately, he's more mobile than his master, and he's turned everything around here upside down. He thinks we might refuse if he asked for anything, so he just takes whatever he needs without asking."

"I've always said Mousqueton was a paragon of intelligence and devotion," said d'Artagnan.

"That may be, Sir but if I encounter such intelligence and devotion four times in a year, I'll be a ruined man."

"Not at all. Porthos will pay you."

"Hum!" said the host, in a doubtful tone.

"No favourite of a great lady will be allowed to be embarrassed by the miserable amount he owes you."

"Yes, well, if I dared to say what I believe about that matter..."

"Just what do you believe?"

"Or rather, what I know."

"What do you know, then?"

"In fact, what I'm sure of."

"All right, then: what are you sure of?"

"I'm sure I know who this 'great lady' is."

"You?"

"Yes, me."

"And how is it that you know her?"

"Oh, Sir – if I thought I could trust your discretion..."

"Tell me. On the word of a gentleman, you won't be sorry."

"Well, as Sir must know, worry sometimes makes us do things we otherwise might not."

"What has worry made you do?"

"Nothing outside my rights as a creditor!"

"So?"

"Sir Porthos gave us a letter for this duchess and told us to put it in the post. This was before his servant had arrived, and since Sir was unable to leave his room, we were charged with running his errands."

"So, then?"

"Instead of putting the letter in the post that is rather unreliable, I took advantage of a trip one of my lads was making to Paris and charged him with delivering this letter to the duchess personally. Didn't this fulfil the intentions of Sir Porthos, who wanted us to take care of the letter?"

"Close enough."

"Well, Sir, do you know who this great lady is?"

"No; I've heard Porthos talk about her, that's all."

"You don't know the identity of this pretended duchess?"

"I just told you, I don't know her."

"She's the aging wife of a prosecutor of the Châtelet, Sir, whose name is Madam Coquenard. She's at least fifty but still acts jealous." The host chuckled. "I thought it was strange that a high-ranking noblewoman should keep a house in the Rue aux Ours."

"So how did you come to know so much?"

"Because she threw a fit when she received the letter, saying Sir Porthos was flighty and fickle, and she was sure it was because of some woman that he'd been wounded."

"What! He's been wounded!"

"Ah! My God! What have I said?"

"You said that Porthos was wounded."

"I know – but he forbade me to say so!"

"Why's that?"

"Dame! Because, Sir, he'd bragged that he'd perforate that stranger you left him fighting with – but despite all his boasts, it was the stranger who soon had him on the ground. Sir Porthos is a very proud man, and he insisted that no one should know he was wounded – except for his duchess, whom he hoped would respond generously to an account of his adventure."

"So it's a wound that's confined him to bed?"

"And quite a wound it is, let me tell you. If your friend wasn't so strong, he'd have given up the ghost."

"You saw the duel?"

"I was curious, Sir, so I followed them and saw the fight without being seen myself."

"What happened?"

"It didn't last long, I can tell you that. They came on guard, then the stranger made a feint and a stab, all so quickly that, by the time Sir Porthos tried to parry, he already had three inches of steel in his chest. He fell back like a log. The stranger put the point of his sword to his throat, and Sir Porthos, seeing he was at the mercy of his adversary, confessed he was beaten. The stranger demanded his name but when he learned that name was Sir Porthos, and not Sir d'Artagnan, he offered sir his arm, brought him back to the inn, then mounted his horse and disappeared."

"So it was Sir d'Artagnan the stranger wanted."

"Apparently."

"And do you know what became of the man?"

"No; I'd never seen him before that moment, and I haven't seen him since."

"Good. That's what I needed to know. Now, you say Porthos's room is Number 1, on the first floor up?"

"Yes, Sir, the best in the house, a chamber I could have rented ten times over by now."

"Calm down," d'Artagnan said, smiling. "Porthos will pay you with money from Duchess Coquenard."

"Prosecutor's wife or duchess, Sir, I couldn't care less, so long as she opens her purse. But she positively swore she was fed up with Sir Porthos's infidelities and wouldn't send him a denier."

"Did you give that answer to your guest?"

"We were careful not to! He'd find out how we'd delivered his letter."

"So he's still expecting his money?"

"My God, yes! He wrote to her again yesterday but this time his lackey put the letter in the post."

"Did you say this prosecutor's wife is old and ugly?"

"Fifty at least, Sir, and not good-looking at all, is what Pathaud said."

"In that case, rest easy – her heart will soon soften. Besides, Porthos can't owe you all that much."

"Not that much, you say! Twenty pistoles already, not counting the doctor's fee. He must be used to high living – he denies himself nothing."

"Well, if his mistress abandons him, he still has his friends, I can assure you of that. Relax, my dear host, and keep supplying him with whatever he needs."

"Sir promises not to mention the prosecutor's wife and not to say a word about the wound?"

"So be it; you have my word."

"Because he'd kill me, you know!"

"Don't worry, he's not quite the devil he appears to be."

With these words, d'Artagnan leaped up the staircase, leaving his host somewhat reassured about his two primary concerns: his finances and his life. At the top of the stairs, on the most conspicuous door on the corridor, a gigantic No. 1 was traced in black ink. D'Artagnan knocked, was invited in, and entered. Porthos was in bed, playing a game of lansquenet with Mousqueton, just to keep his hand in. A partridge turned on a spit over the fire, while on either side boiled two casseroles, exhaling an enticing double aroma of gibelotte and matelote, rabbit stew and fish soup. A nearby desk and marble-topped table were covered with empty bottles. At the sight of his friend, Porthos gave a great cry of joy. Mousqueton, rising respectfully, yielded his place to d'Artagnan, then went to take a look at the two casseroles, in which he seemed to take a keen interest. "By God! It's you!" said Porthos to d'Artagnan. "Come in, and pardon me if I don't come to meet you. Do you know," he added uneasily, "what's happened to me?"

"No!"

"The host told you nothing?"

"I asked where you were, and I came straight up."

Porthos seemed to breathe more easily.

"And what has happened to you, my dear Porthos?" continued d'Artagnan.

"What happened was that, while lunging at my opponent – whom I'd already stabbed three times, and whom I meant to finish with a fourth – my foot slipped on a stone, and I sprained my knee."

"Really?"

"Word of honour! And it was lucky for the rogue, for you can bet I'd have left him dead on the spot."

"And what became of him?"

"I have no idea. He'd had enough and went off without waiting for more. But you, my dear d'Artagnan, what happened to you?"

"So it's this sprain that keeps you in bed, my dear Porthos?" persisted d'Artagnan.

"My God, yes – that's all! I'll be on my feet again in a few days."

"Why didn't you get a ride into Paris? It must be awfully boring here."

"I'd planned to – but, my dear friend, I have something to confess to you."

"What's that?"

"Well, as I had in my pocket the seventy-five pistoles you'd dispensed to me, and since, as you say, it's awfully boring here, to distract myself I asked a passing gentleman to come up and have a game of lansquenet with me. He accepted and, my faith! My seventy-five pistoles soon passed from my pocket to his – plus my horse that he won into the bargain. But what of you, d'Artagnan?"

"What do you expect, my dear Porthos? A man can't be a success at everything," d'Artagnan said. "You know what they say: 'Unlucky at play, lucky in love'! You're too lucky in love for the dice to be always on your side. But what can a few bad throws matter to you? Don't you have your duchess, you lucky dog, who never lets you down?"

"Well, d'Artagnan, here's how jinxed I am," replied Porthos with an air of nonchalance. "I wrote to her to send me fifty crowns that I needed because of the position I found myself in..."

"And?"

"And she must be at her country place because she hasn't replied."

"Really?"

"Not a word. So yesterday I sent her a second letter, more urgent than the first – but you, my friend, let's talk about you! I have to confess, I was beginning to worry about you."

"But it looks like your host has been treating you well, my dear Porthos," said d'Artagnan with a nod at the bubbling casseroles and the empty bottles.

"So-so," replied Porthos. "It's been three or four days since the insolent dog gave me his bill and I threw both him and his bill out the door. So I'm somewhat in the situation of a conqueror in a hostile land – always afraid, you see, that I'll be forced to defend my position. That's why I'm armed to the teeth."

"However, it looks to me like you make sorties from time to time," d'Artagnan laughed, indicating the food and drink.

"No, not me, unfortunately!" said Porthos. "This miserable sprain keeps me in bed but Mousqueton has been out on campaign and brings back provisions. Mousqueton, my friend, now that we've been reinforced, we'll need even more victuals."

"Mousqueton," said d'Artagnan, "you must do me a favour."

"What's that, Sir?"

"To share your recipes with Planchet. If I'm ever besieged, I want to enjoy the same delicacies that delight your master."

"Ah, my God, sir, nothing could be easier," said Mousqueton modestly. "It just takes being handy, that's all. I was raised in the country, and my father, in his spare time, was a bit of a poacher."

"What did he do the rest of the time?"

"Sir, he practiced a trade he found pretty prosperous."

"What was that?"

"It was during the wars between the Catholics and Huguenots. Since he saw the Catholics exterminating the Huguenots, and the Huguenots exterminating the Catholics, all in the name of religion, he adopted a mixed belief, one that permitted him to be sometimes Catholic and sometimes a Huguenot. He made a practice of strolling with his blunderbuss on his shoulder behind the hedges that lined the roads, and when he saw a lone Catholic coming along, a Protestant feeling arose within him. When he was within ten paces he would point his blunderbuss at the traveller and begin a conversation that nearly always ended with the traveller trading his purse for his life. Then if a Huguenot came along, he was filled with such ardent Catholic zeal that he couldn't understand how, a quarter of an hour before, he could have had the slightest doubt about the superiority of our holy religion. Personally, Sir, I'm a Catholic – though my father following his principles, raised my brother as a Huguenot."

"And how did this worthy man end up?" asked d'Artagnan.

"In a most unfortunate way, Sir," said Mousqueton. "One day he was surprised in a narrow lane between a Huguenot and a Catholic, who recognised him, since he'd had previous business with both. They allied against him and hanged him from a tree. Then they came and boasted of their feat in a tavern in the next village, where my brother and I were drinking."

"What did you do?"

"We let them have their say," replied Mousqueton. "Then, as they left the tavern in opposite directions, my brother went and hid himself ahead of the Catholic, and I did the same ahead of the Protestant. In less than two hours, it was done – we'd dealt with both of them. It was a tribute to the foresight of our poor father, who'd taken the precaution of raising us in different religions."

"As you say, Mousqueton, your father sounds like he was pretty sharp. And you said that, in his spare time, the good man was a poacher?"

"Yes, Sir. He's the one who taught me how to lay a snare and stretch a tripwire. So when I saw that villain of a host here try to feed us on rotten meat I wouldn't give away to vagrants, stuff not at all suitable for two sensitive stomachs like ours, I summoned up the old family skills. While strolling near the woods of Sir Prince, I laid a few snares on the game trails; and while lying on the banks of His Highness's streams, I dropped a few lines in a likely pool. So now, thank the Lord, we won't starve. As Sir can see, we have partridges and rabbits, carp and eels – light, healthy food suitable for recovering invalids."

"But the honey," said d'Artagnan, "who furnishes the honey? Your host?"

"Yes and no, you might say."

"Yes and no? How do you mean?"

"He furnishes it, yes but he's unaware of the honour."

"Explain yourself, Mousqueton. Your conversation is surprisingly instructive."

"It's like this, Sir. In my travels I chanced to encounter a Spaniard who'd been all over, including to the New World."

"What does the New World have to do with the bottles on the desk and the table?"

"A little patience, Sir. Everything in its turn."

"Quite so, Mousqueton. You speak, and I'll listen."

"This Spaniard had in his service a lackey who'd accompanied him on his voyage to Mexico. This lackey was from my home province and we quickly became friends, especially since we had similar tastes and enjoyed hunting more than anything. He told me how, on the plains of the Pampas, the natives hunt tigers and wild bulls with simple running nooses that they loop around the necks of these dangerous animals. At first I couldn't believe that anyone could be so skilful as to throw a cord twenty or thirty paces with any accuracy but faced with proof I had to acknowledge it was true. Aiming for a bottle thirty paces away, my friend could catch the bottle's neck in his noose every time. I started practicing, and since I have a little natural talent for this sort of thing, today I can throw my lasso as well as any man in the world. So, do you see it yet? Our host has a well-furnished honey cellar but it's locked, and the key never leaves him. However, this cellar has a small window for ventilation. I toss my lasso through the ventilator, and as I now know in which corner he keeps his best, I amuse myself by fishing for vintage. So that, Sir, is what the New World has to do with the bottles on the desk and the table. Now, will you have a taste of our honey and give us your honest opinion of it?"

"Thank you, my friend but no – I've just come from breakfast."

"Well," said Porthos, "set the table, Mousqueton, and while we have our breakfast, d'Artagnan can tell us what's happened to him in the ten days since he left us."

"Gladly," said d'Artagnan. While Porthos and Mousqueton ate with the appetites of convalescents, d'Artagnan told how Aramis had been wounded and forced to stop at Crèvecœur, how he'd had to leave Athos fighting at Amiens in the hands of four men who'd accused him of being a counterfeiter, and how he, d'Artagnan, had been forced to run the Count of Wardes through the body in order to reach England. But that was as far as he went; he only added that, on his return from Britain, he'd brought with him four magnificent horses, one for himself and one for each of his comrades. He concluded with a flourish, telling Porthos that his horse was already installed at the inn's stable. At this moment Planchet entered to tell his master that the horses were rested, and if they left soon they still might sleep that night in Clermont. As d'Artagnan was now reassured about Porthos, and as he was eager for news of his other two friends, he offered his hand to the convalescent and told him he was off to continue his search. He counted on returning by the same route, so if, in seven or eight days, Porthos was still at the Inn of Grand Saint-Martin, he would stop by to see him. Porthos said with a wince that, in all probability, his sprain wouldn't permit him to leave for a while. Besides, he had to stay in Chantilly until he heard from his duchess. D'Artagnan wished him luck with that and complimented him again on having Mousqueton as a lackey. Then he paid his bill at the inn and resumed his journey with Planchet who was already relieved of one of the horses he'd been leading.

026 The Thesis of Aramis

D'Artagnan had said nothing to Porthos about his friend's wound or the prosecutor's wife. He was a wise lad, this Béarnaise, despite his youth. He'd done his best to appear to believe everything the blustering musketeer had told him, as he knew that friendship can't survive the revelation of such secrets, especially secrets central to a man's pride. Besides, we always feel a certain moral superiority over those whose secret lives we've discovered. Moreover, d'Artagnan hoped to use his three comrades as the instruments of his ambition in future intrigues, so he was happy to grasp whenever he could the invisible reins by which he hoped to lead them. Nonetheless, as he rode along a profound sadness gripped his heart. He thought of that young and pretty Madam Bonacieux, who'd been on the verge of repaying all his devotion – though it must be said that his sadness was less regret for his lost evening of love than fear of what evil might happen to the poor woman. For himself, he had no doubt but that she was the victim of the cardinal's vengeance – and as everyone said, the vengeance of His Eminence was terrible. He couldn't understand how he himself had managed to find favour in that minister's eyes. No doubt that's what Sir Cavois would have revealed to him, if the Captain of the Cardinal's Guards had found him at home. Nothing makes time pass or shortens a trip like getting lost in one's thoughts. Then external reality is like sleep, and our thoughts are the dream. Time loses its measure and space no longer has distance. One departs from one place and arrives at another – that's all. We remember nothing of the interval between but a vague blur, a thousand confused images of trees, slopes, and landscapes. In the grip of such a hallucination d'Artagnan was carried, at whatever pace his horse chose, across the six leagues between Chantilly and Crèvecœur, and later he couldn't remember a single thing he'd passed or encountered on the road. Only when he arrived did his mind return to the world around him. He shook his head, spotted the cabaret where he'd left Aramis and, putting his horse into a trot, soon pulled up at the door. This time it was not a host but a hostess who received him. D'Artagnan was a physiognomist; at a glance he took in her plump form and round, grinning face and figured there was no need to dissemble with her, or fear anything from anyone with such a cheerful look. "My good lady," asked d'Artagnan, "Can you tell me what's become of my friend, whom we had to leave here about twelve days ago?"

"A handsome young man, twenty-three or twenty-four, nicely mannered, amiable, and well set-up?"

"And wounded in the shoulder?"

"That's him! Well, Sir, he's still here."

"Thank God!" said d'Artagnan, as he dismounted and threw the bridle to Planchet. "My dear lady, you've brought me back to life. Aramis! Show me to him, so I can embrace him. I can't tell you how eager I am to see him again!"

"I'm sorry, Sir but I doubt if he'll receive you just now."

"Why not? Is he with a woman?"

"Lord! The things you say! No, poor lad, he's not with a woman."

"Who's he with, then?"

"With the Curate of Mont Didier and the Superior of the Jesuits of Amiens."

"Good God!" cried d'Artagnan. "Is the poor man dying?"

"No, Sir, on the contrary! While recovering from his illness he was touched by grace and decided to become ordained."

"Of course," said d'Artagnan. "I'd forgotten he was only a temporary musketeer."

"Is Sir still eager to see him?"

"More than ever."

"Well, Sir has only to take that stair on the right side of the yard up to No. 5, on the second floor."

D'Artagnan strode off in the direction indicated and found one of those exterior staircases that can still be seen climbing the outer walls of ancient French inns. But it afforded no entry to the lodgings of the future abbot: the door to Aramis's chamber was as fortified as the gardens of Armida for Bazin was stationed outside to bar all passage, emboldened by the thought that, at long last, he was about to see his dreams come true. Poor Bazin had always aspired to serve a man of the Church and had waited impatiently for that day, always delayed, when Aramis would abandon the uniform and don the cassock. Only Aramis's promise, renewed daily, that the moment wasn't far off, had kept him in service to the musketeer – a service in which, he said, he often feared for his very soul. So Bazin was at the apex of joy. It seemed to him that this time his master really meant to go through with it. The combination of physical suffering and a bout of melancholy had produced the effect so long desired: Aramis, afflicted in body and soul, had at last set his eyes and his thoughts on religion. He viewed the double accident that had befallen him – the wound to his shoulder and the complete disappearance of his mistress – as a warning from Heaven. So one can well imagine why, given his master's present disposition, nothing could be more disagreeable to Bazin than the arrival of d'Artagnan, an event that might draw his master back into the turmoil of worldly affairs that had so long distracted him. Bazin resolved to defend the door bravely. Since he'd been betrayed by the inn's hostess he couldn't get away with saying that Aramis was out, so he tried to persuade the new arrival that it would be the height of impropriety to disturb his master during such a pious conference. It had begun that morning, according to Bazin, and probably wouldn't end before nightfall. But d'Artagnan ignored Master Bazin's eloquent plea. He had no intention of getting into a debate with his friend's valet and simply pushed him aside with one hand, while with the other he turned the handle of the door to No. 5. The portal opened and d'Artagnan entered the chamber. Aramis, in a black robe, with a sort of round, flat skullcap on his head, was seated before an oblong table covered with rolls of paper and enormous bound folios. At his right sat the Jesuit superior, and at his left the curate. The curtains were drawn and admitted only the mysterious half-light necessary for mystical reveries. All the everyday things one usually sees when entering a young man's room, especially if that young man is a musketeer, had disappeared as if by magic – for, doubtless fearing the sight of them might give his master worldly ideas, Bazin had taken away sword, pistols, hat, plume, and every evidence of embroidery, lace, and decoration. In place of them, in a dark corner, d'Artagnan thought he could see a knotted scourge hanging from a nail in the wall. At the sound of d'Artagnan coming through the door, Aramis raised his head and recognised his friend. But to the young man's great astonishment, the sight didn't appear to produce much of an impression on the musketeer, so completely was his spirit detached from worldly things. "Hello, dear d'Artagnan," said Aramis. "Believe me, I'm very happy to see you."

"The same for me," said d'Artagnan, "though I'm not sure it's really Aramis I'm talking to."

"It's me, my friend, it's me. What makes you doubt it?"

"I was afraid I'd picked the wrong chamber and that I'd entered the cell of some man of the Church. Then another fear took me when I found you in the company of these gentlemen: I was afraid you were seriously ill."

The two men in black, who guessed what d'Artagnan was up to, stabbed him with menacing glares but d'Artagnan paid them no mind. "Maybe I'm disturbing you, my dear Aramis," continued d'Artagnan, "for, based on what I see here, it looks as if you're confessing to these gentlemen."

Aramis blushed faintly. "Disturbing me? You? On the contrary, dear friend – I swear it. And as proof, allow me to say that I rejoice to see you safe and sound."

Ah! He'll come around yet! D'Artagnan thought. That's not bad.

"Sir, here, who is my friend," Aramis continued smoothly, indicating d'Artagnan with an elegant gesture, "has just escaped from serious peril."

"Praise God, Sir," the pair responded, bowing in unison.

"I haven't failed to do so, Your Reverences," replied the young man, returning their salute.

"Your arrival is well-timed, dear d'Artagnan," said Aramis, "and by joining in our discussion, you may enlighten us with your clear thinking. Sir the Superior of Amiens, Sir the Curate of Mont Didier, and I are debating certain theological questions that have occupied us all morning. I'd be delighted to have your opinion."

"The opinion of a man of the sword doesn't carry much weight," replied d'Artagnan, who was beginning to feel uneasy at the turn things were taking. "Believe me, you'd better rely on the expertise of these gentlemen."

The two men in black bowed. "On the contrary," replied Aramis, "your opinion is vital. Here's the issue at hand. Sir Superior thinks that my thesis should be both dogmatic and didactic."

"Your thesis! You're working on a thesis?"

"Necessarily," said the Jesuit. "A thesis is of rigour for the examination that precedes ordination."

"Ordination!" cried d'Artagnan, who hadn't really believed what he'd been told by the hostess and by Bazin. "Ordination!" He gazed, stupefied, at the three black-clad figures before him.

"Now," continued Aramis, reclining as gracefully in his armchair as if adorning a Paris salon and complacently examining his hand, as soft and white as a lady's, while holding it up so the blood would drain from it. "Now, as you've heard, d'Artagnan, Sir Superior wants my thesis to be dogmatic, while I would prefer it to be idealised. Thus Sir Superior had proposed to me the following subject that has not been adequately addressed, and in which I admit there is material for magnificent development. To wit: 'Utraque manus in benedicendo clericis inferioribus necessaria est.'"

D'Artagnan, whose lack of erudition has already been touched upon, showed no more understanding of this Latin quote than he had of Sir Tréville's about the gifts received from the Duke of Buckingham.

"That is to say," Aramis said, for his friend's benefit, "that two hands are indispensable when priests of the lower orders are bestowing benedictions."

"Such an admirable subject!" cried the Jesuit.

"Admirable and dogmatic!" added the curate whose Latin was actually no stronger than d'Artagnan's, so he kept a close watch on the Jesuit to keep pace with him and repeated his words like an echo.

As for d'Artagnan, he couldn't quite muster the same enthusiasm for the subject as the two men in black. "Admirable, yes! Absolutely admirable!" continued Aramis. "But it requires an exegesis and profound study of the Fathers and the Scriptures. Now, I've confessed to these learned ecclesiastics, and this in all humility that spending my evenings mounting guard in the service of the king has made me neglect study a bit. So I would find myself more at ease, facilius natans, in a subject of my own choice that would be to these severe theological questions what morals are to metaphysics in philosophy."

"Such an exordium!" cried the Jesuit.

D'Artagnan was already exhausted – as was the curate. "Exordium," repeated the curate, trying to keep up.

"Quemadmodum minter coelorum immensitatem," added the Jesuit.

Aramis glanced at d'Artagnan and saw his friend's jaw gaping open. "Let's speak French, my dear Father," he said to the Jesuit. "Sir d'Artagnan will be all the more edified by what we have to say."

"Yes, I'm tired from travelling," said d'Artagnan, "and all this Latin is escaping me."

"But of course," said the Jesuit, irritated – while the curate, who was thrilled, shot d'Artagnan a look of gratitude. The Jesuit cleared his throat. "Very well, let's see what we can derive from this gloss. Moses, the servant of God – and, mark my words, he was no more than a servant! Moses blessed with his hands; he held out both arms, to bless the Hebrews as they slaughtered their enemies. I repeat, he blessed them with two hands. Besides as says the Gospel: Imponite manus – not manum. Present the hands, not the hand."

"Present the hands," repeated the curate, making the gesture.

"Saint Peter, on the other hand – ahem – of whom the popes are the successors," continued the Jesuit, "said, Ponige digitos. Present the fingers. You see?"

"Certainly," replied Aramis, enjoying himself, "but the thing is subtle."

"The fingers!" said the Jesuit. "Saint Peter blessed with the fingers. The pope, therefore, also blesses with the fingers. And with how many fingers does he bless? With three fingers: one for the Father, one for the Son, and one for the Holy Spirit."

Everyone crossed himself, including d'Artagnan, who thought he ought to follow their example. "The pope is the successor to Saint Peter," continued the Jesuit, "and represents the Trinity; the rest of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, ordines inferiores, blesses in the name of the holy archangels and angels. The humblest clerics, such as deacons and sacristans, bless with holy-water sprinklers that simulate an infinite number of blessing fingers. And that's the subject, simplified: argumentum omni denudatum ornamento. Though I could expand it into two volumes the size of this one."

And in his enthusiasm, he rapped a Saint Chrysostom folio so big that it bowed the table with its weight. D'Artagnan shuddered. "Certainly," said Aramis, "I acknowledge in all justice the beauty of this thesis. But, at the same time, I humbly recognise that it would be overwhelming for me. I'd chosen another text – and tell me, d'Artagnan, if this isn't more to your taste: 'Non inutile est desiderium in oblatione.' Or, in other words: A little regret is not unbecoming in an offering to the Lord."

"Stop right there!" cried the Jesuit. "That's a thesis that verges upon heresy! There's a proposition similar to it in the Augustinus of the heresiarch Jansenius whose book will be burned by the Inquisitors sooner or later. Take care, my young friend! You are leaning toward false doctrines. Take care, or you'll be lost!"

"You'll be lost," said the curate, shaking his head sorrowfully.

"You approach the notorious question of free will that is a deadly reef. You're on the brink of addressing the implications of the Pelagians, not to mention the semi-Pelagians."

"But, Most Reverend," said Aramis, a bit stunned by the hail of arguments raining on his head.

"How will you prove," said the Jesuit, overriding him, "that we should regret the world when we offer ourselves to God? Listen to this dilemma: God is God, and the world is the devil. To regret the world is to regret the devil. That is my conclusion."

"And mine as well," said the curate.

"But for heaven's sake..." said Aramis.

"Desideras diabolum, O wretched youth!" cried the Jesuit.

"He regrets the devil! Oh, my young friend," moaned the curate, "don't regret the devil, I beg of you!"

D'Artagnan thought he was losing his mind. He seemed to have stumbled into a madhouse, and he felt as if he was becoming as crazy as everyone else. But he held his tongue, as he couldn't understand half of what they were saying. "Hear me out," said Aramis politely but with an edge of impatience. "I don't say regret; I'd never say that, it wouldn't be orthodox..."

The Jesuit raised his arms toward heaven, and the curate did the same.

"At least you can agree with me that it would be unbecoming to offer to the Lord that with which we're completely disgusted," said Aramis. "Am I right, d'Artagnan?"

"By God! I should say so," he cried.

The curate and the Jesuit almost jumped from their chairs. "The point I start from is the following syllogism," Aramis continued. "The world doesn't lack for attractions; I give up the world, so I make a sacrifice. Now, Scripture positively says, 'Make a sacrifice unto the Lord.'"

"That is true..." said his antagonists.

"So, then," continued Aramis, pinching his ear to redden it and rubbing his hands to make them whiter, "I made a little rondeau on this last year and showed it to Sir Voiture who gave me a thousand compliments on it."

"A rondeau!" said the Jesuit, disdainfully.

"A rondeau," repeated the curate, mechanically.

"Let's hear it! Let's hear it!" cried d'Artagnan. "It will be a welcome change."

"Not at all, for it's religious," said Aramis. "It's theology in verse."

"Devil!" said d'Artagnan.

"Here it is," said Aramis modestly, not without a touch of hypocrisy:

You who weep for times now gone
Whose days are filled with strife and fears,
All your sorrows will be done,
When to God you offer your tears,
You who weep.

D'Artagnan and the curate rather liked it – but the Jesuit persisted in his disapproval. "Beware of profane tendencies in theological matters," he warned. "What did Saint Augustine say? 'Severus sit clericorum sermo.'"

"The sermon should be clear," said the curate.

"Now," the Jesuit hastily interrupted, seeing his acolyte going astray, "your thesis would please the ladies, of course – it would have the success of one of Master Patru's sermons."

"May it please God!" cried Aramis, transported.

"You see?" cried the Jesuit. "The world still speaks in you in a loud voice, altissima voce. You follow the world, my young friend, and I tremble lest efficacious grace not serve to save you."

"Rest assured, Most Reverend, I can answer for myself."

"Worldly presumption!"

"I know myself, my Father. My resolution is irrevocable."

"Then you persist in pursuing that thesis?"

"I feel myself called to address that one and no other. I'm going to continue to refine it, and tomorrow I hope you'll be satisfied with the emendations I've made, thanks to your advice."

"Work not in haste," said the curate. "We leave you in an excellent disposition."

"Yes, the furrows are all sown," said the Jesuit, "and we needn't fear that a single seed of grain has fallen on stone, or along the road, or that the birds of heaven have eaten the rest, 'aves coeli coznederunt illam.'"

"Plague take you with your Latin!" said d'Artagnan who was at the end of his rope.

He'd been gnawing his nails with impatience for the last hour and was beginning to work on the surrounding skin. "Goodbye, my son," said the curate, "until tomorrow."

"Until tomorrow, reckless youth," said the Jesuit. "You promise to become one of the lights of the Church; may heaven grant that this light be not a devouring fire!"

The two men in black rose, bowed to Aramis and d'Artagnan, and advanced toward the door. Bazin, who'd been standing and listening to all this controversy with pious joy, sprang toward them, took the curate's breviary and the Jesuit's missal, and marched respectfully before them to clear their way. Aramis conducted them to the foot of the stairs, and then immediately came back up to d'Artagnan, who was still dazed. Left alone, the two friends regarded each other in a wary and embarrassed silence. However, somebody had to be first to break the ice, and as d'Artagnan appeared determined to leave that honour to his friend, Aramis said, "You see that I've returned to my original path."

"Yes, efficacious grace has touched you, as sir the Jesuit said."

"Oh, my plan to retreat from the world was formed long ago. You've heard me speak of it, haven't you, my friend?"

"Yes but I confess I always thought you were joking."

"Joking, on such matters? Oh, d'Artagnan!"

"Dame! We joke about death, don't we?"

"And wrongly so, d'Artagnan. Death is the door that takes us to perdition or salvation."

"All right, fine. But let's put theology aside. You must have had enough for today; as for me, I've just about forgotten what little Latin I ever knew. Plus, I must confess I've had nothing to eat since ten o'clock this morning, and I'm devilish hungry."

"We dine directly, my friend – only, you must recall that it's Friday, on which day I can't eat meat or see it eaten. I hope you'll be content with sharing my dinner – we're having tetragons and fruit."

"What do you mean by tetragons?" d'Artagnan asked uneasily.

"I mean spinach," replied Aramis, "but for you I'll add some eggs – though it's a grave infraction of the rules, for eggs are meat, since they engender chickens."

"Not a very succulent feast but never mind – I'll put up with it, to be with you."

"Thank you for making such a sacrifice," said Aramis. "It may not do much for your body but rest assured, it will elevate your soul."

"So, you've definitely decided to join the Church? What will our friends say? And Sir Tréville? They'll regard you as a deserter, I warn you."

"I'm not joining the Church, I'm rejoining it. It's the Church that I deserted for the world, and you know I betrayed my true self when I put on the tabard of a musketeer."

"No, I know nothing about it."

"You don't know how I left the seminary?"

"Not a bit."

"Then I'll give you my history. Besides, the Scriptures say, confess unto others, so I'll confess unto you, d'Artagnan."

"I give you absolution in advance. See what a good friend I am?"

"Don't joke about sacred things, my friend."

"All right – speak, then. I'm listening."

"I'd been at seminary since the age of nine; I was three days short of turning twenty; I was planning to become an abbot, and that was that. One evening, as was my habit, I'd gone to a certain house of joy that I visited frequently and pleasurably – I was young, and what would you have? Youth is weakness. An officer of the guard entered suddenly, unannounced, as I was reading The Lives of the Saints to the mistress of the house. I was reading an episode of Judith to her that I'd translated into verse. The lady was paying me all sorts of compliments, and just at that moment she was leaning right up against me as we read the passage over again. The officer had a jealous eye for this lady, and her position that I must admit was rather intimate, wounded his feelings. He said nothing – but when I left, he followed me and brought me up short. 'Sir Abbot,' he said, 'do you like canings?'

'Canings?' I replied. 'I can't say, Sir, as no one has ever dared to give me one.'

'Well, listen to me, Sir Abbot. If you ever return to the house where I found you this evening – I will dare.'

"I think I was frightened. I went pale and felt my legs fail me. I tried to find something to say but could say nothing. The officer waited for a reply but seeing it so long in coming, he laughed, turned on his heel and re-entered the house. I went back to the seminary. I'm a gentleman, my dear d'Artagnan – my blood is noble and sometimes rather hot, as you may have noticed. This was a terrible insult, and even though it was unknown to the rest of the world, it festered within me and gnawed at my heart. I informed my superiors that I didn't feel sufficiently prepared for ordination and, at my request, they postponed the ceremony for a year. I sought out the best master of arms in Paris and contracted with him for daily fencing lessons. Every day, for a year, I took those lessons. Then, on the anniversary of the day I'd been insulted, I hung up my cassock, donned the complete attire of a cavalier, and took myself to a ball given by a lady friend of mine where I knew I would find my man. It was in the Rue des Francs-Bourgeois, quite near La Force. In fact, my officer was there. I approached him as he sang a love lay to a lady he was making eyes at and interrupted him just in the middle of the second couplet. 'Sir,' I said to him, 'does it still displease you if I return to a certain house in the Rue Payenne, and would you still give me a caning if I took a fancy to disobey you?'

"The officer looked at me with astonishment, then said, 'What do you want with me, Sir? I don't know you.'

"I said, 'I'm the little abbot who read The Lives of the Saints and translated Judith into verse.'

'Ah, yes! Now I recall you,' said the officer, mockingly. 'What do you want with me?'

'I'd like you to find the time to take a little walk with me.'

'Tomorrow morning, if that suits you, and with the greatest of pleasure.'

'No. Not tomorrow morning, if you please. Now.'

'If you absolutely insist on it ...'

'I insist.'

'Then let's go. Ladies,' said the officer, 'don't disturb yourselves. Just give me a few minutes to kill sir here, and I'll return to finish the final couplet.' We went out. I led him to the Rue Payenne, to the same spot, at the very hour where a year before he'd paid me the compliment I told you of. It was a superb moonlit night. We drew our swords, and at the first pass, I ran him through."

"The devil!" said d'Artagnan.

"Now," continued Aramis, "as the ladies didn't see their singer return, and as he was found in the Rue Payenne with a great sword wound through his body, it was supposed that I had accommodated him thus, and there was something of a scandal. I had no choice but to renounce the cassock for a while. Athos, whom I'd met around that time, and Porthos, who'd supplemented my fencing lessons by showing me a few lively new thrusts, persuaded me to request the tabard of a musketeer. The king thought well of my father who'd been killed at the siege of Arras and granted me the tabard. But now the moment has come for me to rejoin the bosom of the Church."

"Oh? Why today rather than yesterday or tomorrow? What's happened today to give you these mouldy ideas?"

"This wound, my dear d'Artagnan, was a warning to me from heaven."

"That wound? Bah! It's nearly healed. I'm sure that's not what's giving you the most pain."

"What, then?" demanded Aramis, reddening.

"You have a wound in your heart, Aramis, deeper and more painful – a wound made by a woman."

Despite himself, Aramis's eye flickered. "There!" he said, hiding his emotions under a feigned nonchalance. "Don't speak of such things. What makes you think I would have such thoughts? Why should I suffer pains of love? Vanitas vanitatum! So you think I've lost my heart, and over who? Some grisette, some chambermaid I chased around the barracks? Spare me!"

"Spare me, my dear Aramis – for I think you set your sights rather higher."

"Higher? And who am I, to have such ambitions? A poor musketeer, wretched and obscure, who hates servitude and has no real place in the world!"

"Aramis, Aramis!" cried d'Artagnan, giving his friend a sceptical look.

"Dust I am, and to dust I return. Life is full of humiliation and sorrow," Aramis continued sombrely. "All the threads that lead to happiness break when a man grasps them, especially the golden threads. Oh, my dear d'Artagnan!" he said, with a touch of bitterness. "Believe me, if you've been hurt, never reveal it! Silence is the last remaining satisfaction of the stricken. Beware of giving voice to your grief – the voyeurs will gloat over your tears the way flies suck the blood of a wounded stag."

"Alas, my dear Aramis," said d'Artagnan, heaving a deep sigh, "That's my own story you tell."

"How's that?"

"It's true. A woman I love, even adore, has been stolen from me – abducted! I don't know where she is or where she's been taken. She may be a prisoner, she may even be dead."

"But at least you can say she didn't leave you voluntarily. If you have no news of her, it's because her messages have been interdicted – while I..."

"While you?"

"Nothing," replied Aramis. "Nothing."

"So, you renounce the world forever? That's it, then – your resolution is unshakable?"

"For all time! Today you're my friend, d'Artagnan but tomorrow you'll be nothing to me but a shadow, or even non-existent. As to the world, it's nothing but a sepulchre."

"The devil! That's the saddest thing I've ever heard."

"What would you have? My vocation calls me – it carries me off." D'Artagnan smiled but said nothing. Aramis continued, "However, as long as I'm still of this earth, let's talk about you, and our friends."

"Personally, I'd prefer to talk about you," said d'Artagnan, "but you're so detached from everything. Spare you from love! Your friends are but shadows! The world is a sepulchre!"

"Alas! You'll see it that way yourself someday," Aramis sighed.

"All right, we'll say no more about it then," said d'Artagnan, "and we'll burn this letter. It probably just contains news of some fresh infidelity on the part of your chambermaid."

"Letter? What letter?" cried Aramis.

"Just a letter that arrived at your place in your absence, and which I brought along for you."

"But who's it from?"

"Some desperate, heartbroken grisette, I imagine. Maybe it's from Madam of Chevreuse's chambermaid, who had to go back to Tours with her mistress. She probably wanted to impress you, so she stole some perfumed paper and sealed her letter with a duchess's coronet."

"What are you saying?"

"Oh, no! I think I've lost it," said the young man maliciously, pretending to search his clothes. "Fortunately, the world is a sepulchre, men – and of course, women – are but shadows and to love you say, 'Spare me!'"

"D'Artagnan, d'Artagnan!" cried Aramis. "You're killing me!"

"Hey! Here it is!" said d'Artagnan, and drew the letter from his pocket.

Aramis darted toward him, seized the letter, and read it – or rather, devoured it. His face positively glowed. "Your chambermaid seems to have a pleasing way of writing," said the messenger nonchalantly.

"Thank you, d'Artagnan! Thank you!" cried Aramis, nearly delirious. "She was forced to escape through Tours; she's not faithless, she still loves me! Come here, dear friend, and let me embrace you! I'm drowning in happiness!"

And the two friends danced around the venerable Saint Chrysostom, kicking up the sheets of the thesis that had fallen to the floor. Just then, Bazin entered with the spinach and the omelette. "Be gone, wretch!" cried Aramis, throwing the dish in his face. "Go back where you came from and take these appalling vegetables with you! Send for some stewed rabbit, a savoury chicken, a leg of mutton with garlic, and four bottles of old burgundy!"

Bazin, who couldn't understand what had gotten into his master, sadly let the omelette slide into the spinach, and the spinach slide onto the floor. "This is the moment to consecrate your existence to the King of Kings," said d'Artagnan, "if you still want to tender Him your respects. 'Non inutile desiderium in oblatione.'" [There's no useless desire in the offering.]

"Go to hell, you with your Latin! Let's drink, my dear d'Artagnan! Morbleu! Drink deep, drink heartily – and meanwhile tell me what's been going on out in the big world."

The Wife of Athos

"Now we just need to find some news of Athos," said d'Artagnan to the still-jovial Aramis once he had brought him up to speed on everything that had happened since their departure from Paris and an excellent dinner had made the one forget his thesis and the other his fatigue.

"Do you really think he's come to grief?" asked Aramis. "Athos is so cool, so brave, and so skilled with his sword."

"I don't doubt it. No one thinks more of Athos's courage and skill than I do but when armed with a sword I'd rather face steel than wooden clubs. I'm afraid Athos may have been overwhelmed by that mob of ruffians. Such men hit hard and don't quit when their man is down. That's why I want to get going as soon as possible."

"I'll do my best to keep up with you," said Aramis, "though I don't really feel equal to riding yet. Yesterday I undertook to discipline myself with that scourge you see on the wall there but the pain of my shoulder wound cut short my pious exercise."

"It's just as well, my friend. That's the first time I've heard of someone trying to cure a blunderbuss wound with a cat-of-nine-tails. But you were sick, and weak in the head, so you're excused."

"When do you plan to leave?"

"Tomorrow at daybreak. Get as much sleep as you can tonight; tomorrow, if you can manage it, we'll leave together."

"Till tomorrow then," said Aramis. "You'll need sleep, too, even if you are a man of iron."

The next morning, when d'Artagnan entered Aramis's room, he found him gazing out the window. "What are you looking at so intently?" d'Artagnan asked.

"My faith! I'm admiring those three magnificent horses the stable boys are leading out. It would be a royal pleasure to travel on mounts like those."

"Well, my dear Aramis, you may have such a pleasure, for one of those horses is yours."

"Do you say so? Which one?"

"Whichever one you like – it's all the same to me."

"And the horse's rich caparison, is that mine, too?"

"No doubt about it."

"Stop joking, d'Artagnan."

"I've given up joking since you gave up Latin for French."

"That silver-studded saddle, the velour trim, those gilded holsters – they're mine?"

"All yours, just as that horse pawing the ground is mine, and the one caracoling belongs to Athos."

"Plague! Those are three superb animals!"

"I'm flattered that you find them to your taste."

"Did the king give them to you?"

"It certainly wasn't the cardinal! But don't worry about where they came from; just be glad that one of them is yours."

"I'll have the one led by that red-headed stable boy."

"As you like."

"God!" said Aramis. "That clears up the last of my melancholy. I could ride a horse like that with thirty bullet-wounds. Upon my soul! Have you ever seen such stirrups? Whoa! Bazin, come here, and make it snappy."

A sad Bazin reluctantly appeared at the door. "Sharpen my sword, clock my hat, brush my cloak, and load my pistols!" said Aramis.

"That last order is unnecessary," said d'Artagnan. "The pistols in your saddle holsters are already loaded." Bazin sighed. "Come now, Master Bazin – don't be so glum," said d'Artagnan. "People gain the kingdom of heaven in all sorts of ways."

"But sir was such a fine theologian!" said Bazin, almost in tears. "He might have been a bishop, or even a cardinal!"

"Poor Bazin. Look, what's the point of being a man of the Church? It doesn't get you out of going to war – or haven't you noticed that Cardinal Richelieu is already preparing for the next campaign, helmet on head and halberd in hand? And Sir Nogaret of La Valette, what about him? He's a cardinal too. Ask his valet how many times he's had to prepare bandages for him."

"Alas!" sighed Bazin. "It's as you say, Sir. The world is upside-down nowadays."

The two young men and the grieving lackey made their way down stairs. "Hold my stirrup, Bazin," said Aramis.

And he leaped into the saddle with his usual grace and elegance. But the noble horse was lively, and after a few vaults and curvets his rider was so overcome by dizziness and pain that he blanched and almost fell from the saddle. D'Artagnan, who'd foreseen this difficulty and was watching for it, caught Aramis as he fell and helped him back up to his room. "It's all right, Aramis. Just look after yourself," he said. "I'll find Athos on my own."

"You're a man of metal," Aramis said to him.

"No – just lucky, that's all," said d'Artagnan. "But what will you do till I see you again? No more theses, all right? No more glosses on benedictions, with either fingers or hands?"

Aramis smiled. "I think I'll write a few verses," he said.

"Right, perfumed with the aroma of that letter from Madam de Chevreuse's chambermaid. Teach Bazin how to write poetry – it'll console him. As for the horse, ride him a little every day, until you get used to him."

"Oh, don't worry about that," said Aramis. "I'm determined to be ready to follow you."

They bid each other goodbye, and ten minutes later, after commending his friend to the care of Bazin and the hostess, d'Artagnan set off toward Amiens at a trot. In what condition was he going to find Athos if he could find him at all? He'd left him in serious trouble, and the musketeer might have succumbed to it. This depressing idea made d'Artagnan sigh repeatedly, and he swore vengeance, if he found that the worst had happened. Athos was the eldest of all his friends and the least like him in tastes and sympathies. And yet, it was Athos who was first in his heart. Athos's distinguished and noble air, the gleams of grandeur that from time to time shone from the shadows in which he hid himself, the unshakable composure that made him the most pleasant of companions, his humour, mordant but not malicious, and the courage that might have been called blind if it hadn't been the product of pure sangfroid – d'Artagnan responded to all these qualities with his esteem, his friendship, and more, his admiration. In fact, Athos, on those days when he was in a good humour, even compared well with that superbly elegant and noble courtier, Sir Tréville. He was of average height but so strong and well-proportioned that, when wrestling with Porthos, whose physical might had become proverbial among the musketeers, he'd more than once won out over the giant. His head, with its piercing eyes, straight nose, and chin cut like Brutus's, had an indefinable character of grandeur and grace. His hands that he never bothered to care for, were the despair of Aramis, who cultivated his with the aid of almond paste and perfumed oil. His voice was at once penetrating and melodious. Most surprising of all was that Athos, who was always so retiring, had nonetheless a broad knowledge of the world, particularly of the manners and practices of the highest ranks of society. In fact, the habits of the high nobility showed themselves in even the least of his actions. If a dinner was to be held, Athos organised it better than anyone, placing each guest in the exact rank of precedence that his ancestors had earned for him. If there was a question of heraldry, Athos knew every noble family in the realm: their genealogy, their alliances by marriage, their family arms, and the origin of those arms. No fine detail of etiquette was too minute for him; he was familiar with all the rights and duties of the great landowners; and he was so well-versed in falconry and hunting lore that one day he'd impressed King Louis XIII himself who prided himself on being a past-master in the field. Like all the great nobles of the period, he rode and fought to perfection. But unlike most of the Grands, his scholastic education hadn't been overlooked. Porthos pretended to understand the scraps of Latin that Aramis deployed but Athos just smiled at them. Two or three times, to the great astonishment of his friends, he'd even caught Aramis in some fundamental error and restored a verb to its proper tense or a noun to its case. On top of all this, his integrity was irreproachable, in a century when men of war routinely trampled on the dictates of conscience and religion, lovers behaved without the least delicacy or decorum, and the poor roundly ignored God's seventh commandment. In short, Athos was an extraordinary man. And yet, this nature so distinguished, this creature so handsome, this essence so fine, daily drifted more and more into a dull and sluggish apathy, as old men fall into mental and physical decay. Athos's blackest moods – and these moods were frequent – extinguished his bright virtues one by one, until he was nothing but a figure of shadow. When the demigod disappeared, the remnant was barely a man. His head drooped, his eyes dulled, his speech became slow and painful. Athos would spend hours gazing blankly at his bottle, his glass, or at Grimaud who, accustomed to obey him by signs and gestures, read in the merest glance of his master his least desire and satisfied it immediately. If the four friends were together during one of these moods, a single word, produced with great effort, might be all that Athos contributed to the conversation. However, he drank enough for four, without any effect but a gradual furrowing of his brow as he slid deeper into melancholy. D'Artagnan, whose inquiring and penetrating mind we are familiar with, had never been able to discern the cause of this melancholy, or to detect a pattern in these moods, despite his fascination with the subject. Athos never received any letters and never had any secret business he kept from his friends. honey couldn't be blamed for his dark moods, for he drank only to fight his melancholy – though the remedy only made him more sombre. His excess of the evil humours couldn't be attributed to gambling, for unlike Porthos, who trumpeted his changes of fortune with songs or oaths, Athos was as impassive when he won as when he lost. Among the musketeers he'd been known in a single evening to win three thousand pistoles, then lose down to a gold-embroidered belt that had seen better days, then regain it all, plus a hundred crowns over, without his shapely eyebrows rising or falling a hair, his hands losing their pearly pallor, or his conversation that was agreeable that evening, ceasing for a moment to be calm and amiable. Nor was it, as with our neighbours the English, the influence of the weather that darkened his outlook, for his melancholy deepened as the weather improved: for Athos, the most terrible months were June and July. He couldn't care less about the present; he shrugged his shoulders when people spoke of the future; his secret must be in the past – or so d'Artagnan thought. This mysterious shadow coloured Athos's whole personality, rendering him all the more fascinating. Even at his most drunken he never revealed anything, by eye or by mouth, no matter how adroitly he might be questioned. "Well," muttered d'Artagnan, "poor Athos might even now be dead – thanks to me, for I'm the one who dragged him into this affair. He never knew the start of it, will never know how it ended and never had anything to gain from it anyway."

"Not to mention, Sir," added Planchet, "that we probably owe our lives to him. Do you recall how he shouted, Ride on, d'Artagnan! I'm taken? And after firing his pistols, what a terrible racket he made with his sword? It sounded like twenty men – or rather twenty devils!"

These words only made d'Artagnan even more eager. He urged his horse on – pointlessly, as it was already carrying its rider at a gallop. About eleven in the morning they came in sight of Amiens. By half-past eleven they were at the door of the fatal inn. D'Artagnan had given a lot of thought to what sort of revenge he might take on the treacherous host, fantasies that had been at least some consolation. Now he entered the inn with his hat pulled down over his eyes, his left hand on the pommel of his sword, while with his right he gestured menacingly with his riding crop. The host advanced, bowing. "Remember me?" d'Artagnan said.

"I have not that honour, sir," the host replied, dazzled by the brilliant equipage on d'Artagnan's mount and by the youth's high-and-mighty manner.

"You really don't know me?"

"No, My Lord!"

"Well, a couple of words will restore your memory. What have you done with that gentleman who, about fifteen days ago, you had the audacity to accuse of counterfeiting?"

The host paled at d'Artagnan's menacing attitude that was echoed by Planchet. "Ah, My Lord! Don't even bring it up!" he cried in a pathetic tone. "Oh, Sir! How I've paid for that mistake! Of all the rotten luck!"

"That gentleman, I say – what's happened to him?"

"Only deign to listen to me, Sir, and go easy on me. Sit down, please, I beg you."

D'Artagnan, mute with anger and anxiety, sat like a judge about to pronounce sentence. Planchet stood behind him, looking fierce. "Here's the story, My Lord," the host said, trembling. "I remember you now – it was you who departed during the unfortunate dispute with the gentleman you mentioned."

"Yes, that was me. So you see you can expect no mercy if you fail to tell me the whole truth."

"Just listen to me, and you'll know everything."

"I'm listening."

"I'd been warned by the authorities that a notorious counterfeiter would stop at my inn with several companions, all disguised as guards or musketeers. Your horses, your lackeys, your descriptions were given to me complete."

"And so?" said d'Artagnan who had a good idea where such exact descriptions had come from.

"So, following the orders of the authorities, who sent me a reinforcement of six men, I took such measures as I thought would assure me of getting hold of these counterfeiters."

"Watch your language!" said d'Artagnan, deeply wounded by the word counterfeiter.

"Pardon me, Sir, for saying such things but it's part of my sad story. The authorities had put the fear of God into me, and you know that an innkeeper has to stay on the good side of the authorities."

"I ask one more time: the gentleman, where is he? What happened to him? Is he dead? Is he alive?"

"Patience, My Lord, we're getting there. So, things fell out as you know, including your rapid departure that seemed," added the host, with a finesse that didn't escape d'Artagnan, "to confirm your description. Sir your friend defended himself desperately. His lackey, who'd had the bad luck to quarrel with some of those reinforcements, who were disguised as stable boys..."

"You miserable wretch!" cried d'Artagnan. "You were all in it together! I don't know what stops me from exterminating the lot of you!"

"Alas! No, My Lord, we weren't all in on it, as you'll soon see. Sir your friend – and pardon my not calling him by the honourable name he doubtless carries, as I'm still ignorant of it – sir your friend, having put two men hors of combat with two pistol shots, fell back defending himself with his sword that crippled another one of my men, and stunned me with a blow from the flat of it."

"Get to the point, you torturer!" said d'Artagnan. "Athos, what happened to Athos?"

"While beating a retreat, as I told My Lord, he found the stairs to the cellar behind him, and as the door was open, he darted inside, took out the key, and barricaded the door. After that, since we knew where to find him, we left him alone."

"I see," said d'Artagnan. "You didn't necessarily want to kill him, just imprison him."

"God's name! Imprison him, My Lord? I swear, he imprisoned himself. But not before he'd done some rough work: one man shot dead, and two others badly wounded. The dead man and the two wounded were carried off by their comrades, and I haven't heard of any of them since. As for myself, when I regained my wits, I went to find Sir the Governor of Amiens. I told him everything that had happened and asked him what I should do with the prisoner. But Sir the Governor told me he knew absolutely nothing about the matter, that the orders I'd received hadn't come from him, and that if I dared to mention his name in connection with this mess he'd have me hanged! It seems I'd made a mistake. Sir: I'd arrested the wrong man, and the one I should have arrested got away."

"But Athos?" cried d'Artagnan, more impatient than ever upon hearing how the authorities had abandoned the matter. "What happened to Athos?"

"Of course, I was anxious to amend the wrongs I'd done the prisoner," replied the innkeeper, "so I made my way to the cellar to set him free. But, Sir, he was no longer a man, he was a devil! He declared that my offer of liberty was a trap, and that before he came out he intended to impose his own conditions. I told him, very humbly – for I couldn't help but realise the trouble I was in by having laid hands on one of His Majesty's Musketeers – I told him I was quite ready to submit to his conditions. 'First,' he said, 'send me my lackey, fully armed.' We hurried to obey him, for as you can imagine, Sir, we were eager to do whatever your friend wanted. Sir Grimaud – who told us his name, though he doesn't talk much – Sir Grimaud went down to the cellar, wounded though he was. Then his master, after taking him in, re-barricaded the door and ordered us back upstairs."

"So where is he now?" cried d'Artagnan.

"In the cellar, Sir."

"How can that be, you wretch? Have you kept him in the cellar all this time?"

"Merciful heaven! No, Sir. Us, keep him in the cellar? You don't know what he's up to in that cellar! Oh, if only you could get him out, Sir, I'd be grateful all my life – you'd be my patron saint!"

"So he's still there, and that's where I'll find him?"

"I don't doubt it, Sir – he won't leave! Every day we pass some bread to him through the window vent on a pitchfork, as well as some meat when he asks for it ... but it's not bread or meat that he consumes the most of. I once tried to go in there with two of my serving boys but he flew into a terrible fury. I heard the sound of him loading his pistols while his lackey loaded his musketoon. When we asked what they intended to do, the master said that he and his lackey had forty rounds between them and they planned to fire every shot before he'd allow a single one of us to set foot in the cellar. So, Sir, I went and complained to the Governor, who told me I got only what I deserved, and that it ought to teach me not to insult honourable gentlemen who stopped at my inn."

"So, since then...?" said d'Artagnan, unable to keep from laughing at the host's pathetic expression.

"Since then, Sir, our lives have been miserable. For Sir must know that all our provisions are in that cellar: the honey, in bottles and barrels, the beer, the oil, spices, lard, sausages, and so on. And since we're not allowed down there, we have to refuse food and drink to our customers, so that day by day our business is going to hell. One more week of your friend in my cellar and we're ruined."

"As is only just, you buffoon. Couldn't you tell, by looking at us, that we were gents of quality and not counterfeiters?"

"Yes, you're right, of course, Sir," said the host. "But wait, there he goes again!"

"Someone provoked him, no doubt," said d'Artagnan.

"But we couldn't help disturbing him! We've got these two English gentlemen who've just arrived."

"So what?"

"Well, the English like good honey, as you probably know, Sir, and these have demanded our best. My wife has begged Sir Athos for permission to enter to satisfy these gentlemen but he's refused, like always. Ah! Merciful heaven! There he goes again, louder than ever!"

In fact, d'Artagnan could hear an uproar from the direction of the cellar. He rose and, preceded by the hand-wringing host, and followed by Planchet, who was armed with his musketoon, they approached the source of the commotion. The two English gentlemen were fed up. "We've had a long ride and we're dying of hunger and thirst!" cried one of them, in very good French, though with a foreign accent. "It's sheer tyranny that this madman won't allow these good people access to their own honey. Come on! Let's break down the door, and if he persists in his madness, well ... we'll just have to kill him."

"Relax, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, drawing his pistols from his belt. "Let's not kill anyone, if you please."

"Excellent," said Athos' calm voice from beyond the door. "But why not let them come in, these child-eaters, and see what happens?"

Brave though they undoubtedly were, the two English gentlemen looked at each other and hesitated. It was almost as if they stood before the cave of a ravenous ogre, one of those gigantic creatures of legend into whose cavern none could enter with impunity. There was a moment of silence; but in the end the two Englishmen were too proud to retreat. The more impatient of the two descended the five or six steps of the stairs and gave the door a kick that could crack a wall. "Planchet," said d'Artagnan, cocking his pistols, "I'll take the one at the top of the steps and you take the one below. Now, gentlemen, if you want a fight, I'll give you one!"

"My God," cried the disembodied voice of Athos, "That sounds like d'Artagnan!"

"In person," said d'Artagnan, raising his own voice. "It's me, my friend."

"Very well, then," said Athos, "together we'll do some work on these door-breakers!"

The gentlemen had drawn their swords but they found themselves taken between two fires. They hesitated a moment more but as before, pride won out, and a second kick split the door-panel from top to bottom. "Stand aside, d'Artagnan," cried Athos, "I'm going to fire."

"Gentlemen!" said d'Artagnan, who never stopped thinking. "Athos, be patient a moment. Gentlemen, consider! You're making a bad move – you're just going to be shot full of holes. My lackey and I have three shots at you, and you'll get as many from the cellar. Then we have our swords, and I assure you, my friend and I are quite passable with the blades. Let me handle this for both sides. You'll have something to drink soon enough, I give you my word."

"If there's any left," jeered the voice of Athos.

The innkeeper felt a cold chill run down his spine. "If there's any left!" he murmured.

"What the devil! Of course there's some left," said d'Artagnan. "Those two can't possibly have drunk the whole cellar. Take my word for it, gentlemen, and return your swords to their scabbards."

"All right if you put your pistols back in your belt."

"Gladly."

And d'Artagnan set the example. He made a sign to Planchet to un-cock his musketoon. The Englishmen, convinced by this, sheathed their swords, though not without some surliness. They were then told the story of Athos's imprisonment and as they were truly gentlemen, they held the host accountable. "Now, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, "go back up to your room and, inside ten minutes, you'll have everything you want – I'll answer for it."

The Englishmen bowed and departed. "Now that it's just me, my dear Athos, pray open the door," said d'Artagnan.

"This instant," said Athos.

They heard the sound of planks being tossed aside and beams groaning, as the besieged demolished his own counterscarps and barricades. A minute later the gashed door was thrust aside and the pale face of Athos appeared, taking in the environs with a quick glance. D'Artagnan grabbed him by the shoulders and embraced him tenderly. He then tried to draw Athos out of his damp lair but was surprised when Athos staggered. "Are you wounded?" he said.

"Wounded? Not the least in the world. I'm drunk, that's all – and no man has ever done a better job of it! God's life, my host but since I've been down here, I must have drunk at least a hundred and fifty bottles."

"The Lord have mercy!" cried the host. "If the lackey has drunk half as much as the master, I'm ruined!"

"Grimaud is a lackey from a good house and would never presume to imitate his master. He drank only from the barrels. But you know, I don't think he remembered to put the bung back. Hear that? It's running."

D'Artagnan broke into a laugh while the host went from chills to fever. Meanwhile, Grimaud appeared behind his master, musketoon on his shoulder, his head shaking like one of those drunken satyrs in the paintings of Rubens. He was drenched fore and aft with what the host recognised as his best olive oil. The cortège crossed the public room and installed itself in the best chamber in the house that d'Artagnan took by right of conquest. Meanwhile, the host and his wife grabbed lamps and ran down into the cellar, so long denied to them. A frightful scene was waiting beyond the fortifications that Athos had breached in order to escape, and which were built of logs, planks, and empty barrels, assembled according to the defensive arts of war. There they found, swimming in a sea of oil and honey, the bones of all the hams Athos and Grimaud had eaten. A pile of broken bottles cluttered the whole left-hand corner of the cellar, and a barrel, the bung of which was still open, was trickling out the last drop of its blood. Of fifty sausages that had been hanging from the rafters, virtually none were left. As the poet of antiquity says: The image of devastation and death reigned as over a field of battle.

Then the howling of the host and hostess was heard coming up through the floor. Even d'Artagnan was moved; Athos didn't even turn his head. But grief was followed by fury. In his despair, the host armed himself with a spit and charged into the chamber taken by the two friends. "Some honey!" said Athos, on seeing the host.

"Some honey!" cried the host, stupefied. "Some honey! But you've already drunk more than a hundred pistoles' worth. I'm a ruined man! Lost! Annihilated!"

"Bah!" said Athos. "We were thirsty."

"If you'd stopped at drinking, fine – but you broke the rest of the bottles!"

"It's your own fault – you pushed me onto a stack that tumbled down."

"All my oil is lost!"

"Oil is a sovereign balm for wounds, and poor Grimaud had to treat the wounds you'd inflicted on him."

"All my sausages, gnawed!"

"There are a lot of rats in that cellar."

"You're going to pay me for everything!" railed the host.

"You triple buffoon," said Athos, getting up.

But he immediately fell back; he'd reached the end of his strength. D'Artagnan came to his rescue, raising his riding crop menacingly. The host stumbled backward, then burst into tears. D'Artagnan said, "This ought to teach you to treat the guests God sends you more courteously."

"God! You mean the devil!"

"My dear friend," said d'Artagnan, "if you abuse our ears this way, all four of us are going to shut ourselves up in your cellar, and then we'll see if things are as bad as you say."

"Oh, Gentlemen! Gentlemen," said the host, "I confess I've been wrong but have you no mercy? You are noblemen, and I'm just a poor innkeeper. Have pity on me!"

"If you put it that way," said Athos, "you'll break my heart and the tears will flow from my eyes like the honey ran from your barrels. We're not the devils we seem to be. Come here and let's talk about it."

The host approached, somewhat uneasily. "Come here, I say, and don't be afraid," Athos said. "At the moment I was about to pay you, you may remember, I'd put my purse on the table."

"Yes, my Lord."

"That purse contained sixty pistoles. Where is it?"

"In the justice clerk's office, my Lord. They said it was counterfeit money."

"Very well – retrieve my purse and keep the sixty pistoles."

"But my Lord knows that justice never let's go of anything it gets its hands on. If it were really counterfeit, we might have some hope but if it's genuine money..."

"Do the best you can, my worthy. It's nothing to do with me, especially since I haven't a livre left."

"Not so fast," said d'Artagnan. "Where is Athos's old horse?"

"In the stable."

"What's it worth?"

"Fifty pistoles – maybe."

"It's worth eighty pistoles. Take it, and call it quits."

"What do you mean by selling my horse?" said Athos. "My good old Bazajet? How am I going to ride to campaign? On Grimaud?"

"I've brought you another," said d'Artagnan.

"Another?"

"A magnificent steed!" cried the host.

"Fine. If there's another, stronger and younger, I give you the old. Let's drink!"

"What will you have?" asked the host, his serenity restored.

"Some of those on the bottom rack. There are still around twenty-five bottles left; all the others were broken by my fall. Bring us six of them."

"This man is a human barrel!" the host said to himself. "If he stays here a fortnight – and actually pays for what he drinks – my business will be restored twice over."

"And don't forget," said d'Artagnan, "to bring up four bottles of the same for those English nobles."

"Now," said Athos, "while we're waiting on the honey, tell me, d'Artagnan, what's become of the others."

D'Artagnan related how he'd found Porthos in bed with a sprain and Aramis in a debate with two theologians. As he finished, the host returned with the requested honey as well as a ham that, fortunately for him, had been left out of the cellar. "Excellent," said Athos, filling his glass and d'Artagnan's. "Here's to Porthos and Aramis! But you, my friend, what's happened to you personally? There's something sad behind your smile."

"Alas!" said d'Artagnan. "I'm the unluckiest of us all."

"You, unlucky, d'Artagnan?" said Athos. "What makes you so unlucky? Tell me about it."

"Later," said d'Artagnan.

"Later? Why do you say that? ... Oh, you think I'm drunk, don't you, d'Artagnan? Well, understand this: I never think so clearly as when I've been drinking. Tell me – I'm all ears."

D'Artagnan related his adventure with Madam Bonacieux. Athos listened impassively, and then said, when he was finished: "Mere trifles – nothing but trifles."

"I knew it! You always say 'trifles,' Athos. That doesn't carry much weight from you, who've never been in love."

For a moment, Athos's eyes flickered, then returned to a honey-dulled vacancy. "Quite so," he said placidly. "Me, I've never been in love."

"Then admit, stone-heart, that it's wrong for you to be so hard on those whose hearts are tender," said d'Artagnan.

"Tender hearts!" spat Athos. "Wounded hearts!"

"What are you trying to say?"

"I'm saying that love is a lottery in which the winner wins death! Believe me, d'Artagnan, you're lucky to have lost her. If you take my advice, you'll lose every time."

"She seemed so much in love with me!"

"She seemed."

"No! She did love me!"

"Child! There's not a man alive who hasn't believed, like you that his mistress loves him, and there's not a man alive who hasn't been betrayed by his mistress."

"Except you, Athos, who's never had one."

"That's true," said Athos, after a moment of silence. "I've never had one. Let's drink!"

"But since you're such a philosopher," said d'Artagnan, "instruct me and support me. I need wisdom and consolation."

"Consolation? For what?"

"For my misfortune."

Athos shrugged his shoulders. "Your so-called misfortune is a joke. I wonder what you'd say if you heard a real story of love."

"Did it happen to you?"

"To me, or to a friend of mine. It hardly matters."

"Tell it, Athos. Tell it."

"Let's drink. The tale will go better."

"Drink up, then, and speak on."

"Up and on it shall be," said Athos, emptying his glass and refilling it. "The two things go marvellously well together."

"I'm all attention," said d'Artagnan.

Athos collected himself, and as he did so, d'Artagnan saw his skin grow even paler. He was in that phase of intoxication when less mighty drinkers drop off into sleep. But Athos stayed up, and dreamed without sleeping. There was something almost frightful in this drunken somnambulism. "You're sure you want it?" he asked.

"Please go on, Athos," said d'Artagnan.

"As you wish, then. One of my friends – mark me, not myself," Athos said, interrupting himself with a melancholy smile. "One of the counts of my province of Berry, a man as noble as a Dandolo or a Montmorency fell in love at age twenty-five with a girl of sixteen, as beautiful as love itself. Though she had the naïveté of youth, her passionate mind glowed with the spirit, not of a woman but of a poet. She was more than just pleasing, she was ... intoxicating. She lived in a small town with her brother, who was a curate. They'd arrived in the country recently, though no one knew from where. But seeing her so lovely, and her brother so pious, nobody was suspicious of their origin. It was said that they were of good extraction. My friend, who was lord of the county, might have seduced her if he desired, or even taken her by force. He was the master there – and who would have come to the aid of two unknown strangers? Unfortunately, he was an honourable man – he married the girl. The fool! The ass! The imbecile!"

"Why do you say that, if he loved her?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Just listen," said Athos. "He took her to his château and made her the first lady of the province. And in all justice, she bore her new rank supremely well."

"And then?" asked d'Artagnan.

"And then, one day, while riding to the hunt with her husband," continued Athos, speaking rapidly in a low voice, "she fell from her horse and swooned. The count leaped to her aid. She seemed to be constricted by her tangled clothes, so he ripped them open with his dagger and thus exposed her shoulder. Can you guess, d'Artagnan, what she had on her shoulder?" said Athos with a burst of hysterical laughter.

"How could I know?" d'Artagnan said.

"She had a fleur-de-lys," said Athos. "She'd been branded."

And he tilted back the glass in his hand and emptied it in a single swallow. "That's horrible!" cried d'Artagnan. "What are you saying?"

"Only the truth. My friend, the angel was a devil. The poor young girl was a branded criminal – a thief, or worse."

"What did the count do?"

"The count was a grand, one of the great nobles; on his land, he had the right of the high and the low justice. He tore up the countess's dress, tied her hands behind her, and hanged her from a tree."

"Heavens, Athos! A murder!" cried d'Artagnan.

"Yes, a murder: nothing more nor less," said Athos, pale as death. "But it seems to me they've let me run out of honey."

And Athos grabbed the last bottle by the neck, put it to his mouth, and drained it in a single draught as if it were an ordinary glass. Then he let his head fall into his hands. D'Artagnan stood before him, paralysed. Eventually Athos raised his head. "That has cured me of beautiful, poetic, and loving women," he said, dropping the pretence of the nameless count. "May God do as much for you, let's drink!"

"Then she's dead?" babbled d'Artagnan.

"For God's sake!" said Athos. "Just give me your glass. Some ham, buffoon!" he cried. "And we have nothing to drink!"

"What about ... her brother?" d'Artagnan added timidly.

"Her brother?" said Athos.

"Yes – the curate."

"Ah! I inquired after him, so as to hang him in his turn but he was ahead of me, having left the curacy somewhat abruptly."

"But at least you must have figured out who this wretch was?"

"No doubt he was the first lover, and accomplice, of the fair lady – a worthy man who'd pretended to be a curate to help get his mistress married into a secure position. He'll have been hanged and quartered by now, I should hope."

"My God! My God!" d'Artagnan repeated, stunned by this horrible tale.

"Have some of this ham, d'Artagnan; it is exquisite," said Athos, cutting a slice and placing it on the young man's plate. "Too bad there were only four like it in the cellar! I'd have drunk fifty more bottles."

D'Artagnan's head was spinning; he felt he couldn't handle any more of this insane conversation. He let his head drop onto his hands and pretended to fall asleep. "None of these youngsters know how to drink nowadays," said Athos, with a pitying look. "And yet, this is one of the best of them!"

The Return

D'Artagnan was still stunned by Athos's terrible confession, though many things in that incomplete story were yet unclear. In the first place, it had been made by a man drunk out of his mind, to a listener who was half-drunk out of his mind. However, despite a brain fogged by two or three bottles of burgundy, when d'Artagnan awoke the following morning every one of Athos's words was graven on his memory, impressed permanently in his mind as if they'd just come from Athos's lips. The vagaries in the story raised questions that only made d'Artagnan even more determined to know the answers, and he went to his friend's room with the firm intention of renewing the conversation of the previous night. But he found Athos restored to his usual composure, in which he was the most impenetrable of men. In any event, the musketeer, after a firm, welcoming handshake, was the first to bring up the matter. "I was quite drunk last night, my dear d'Artagnan," he said. "I can tell because this morning my tongue was swollen and my pulse was agitated. I'll wager I spoke a thousand follies."

As he said this, he examined his friend with a gaze so direct that d'Artagnan was quite embarrassed. "Not at all," replied d'Artagnan. "I can't recall that you said anything out of the ordinary."

"You surprise me! I thought I'd related a most lamentable story to you."

And he looked at the young man as if trying to read the depths of his heart. "My faith!" said d'Artagnan. "I must have been even more drunk than you since I remember nothing of the kind."

Athos wasn't persuaded. He said, "You've probably noticed, my friend that everyone has his own style of intoxication, whether sad or merry. My drunkenness is the sad kind, and when I'm far gone I tend to relate all the grim stories my dour old nurse used to fill my head with. That's my vice – and I'll admit, it's a serious one. Otherwise, I'm a good drinker."

Athos said this so nonchalantly that d'Artagnan was shaken in his conviction. "Oh, so that's it, is it?" replied the young man. Eager for the truth, he said, "I just remember something as if from a dream. I think we were talking about hanging people."

"Ah! You see how it is," Athos said, turning pale but trying to laugh. "I thought it was that. Hanging is my particular nightmare."

"Yes, yes," continued d'Artagnan, "it's coming back to me now. Yes, it was about ... wait a moment ... it was about a woman."

"Exactly," replied Athos, face a sickly grey. "That's my grand story of the fair lady. When I tell that one, I must be nearly dead drunk."

"Yes, that's it," said d'Artagnan. "The story of a fair lady, tall and beautiful, with blue eyes."

"Yes – who was hanged?"

"By her husband, who was a nobleman of your acquaintance," continued d'Artagnan, looking intently at Athos.

"Well, that shows how a man can compromise himself when he doesn't know what he's saying." Athos shrugged his shoulders, as if he thought he ought to be pitied. "Decidedly, I must give up getting drunk, d'Artagnan. It's too vulgar a habit."

D'Artagnan said nothing. Athos tried to change the subject. "By the way, thank you for that horse you brought me."

"Does it suit you?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Yes but it's no horse for stamina."

"That's where you're wrong. I've ridden him ten leagues in less than an hour and a half, at the end of which he was breathing no harder than if I'd just taken him for a turn around the Place Saint-Sulpice."

"Dear me. I begin to have regrets."

"Regrets?"

"Yes; I've parted with him."

"How's that?"

Athos shrugged. "I woke up this morning at six o'clock; you were sleeping like the dead, and I didn't know what to do with myself. I was still rather dazed from last night's debauch. I went downstairs to the public room, where I saw one of our English friends bargaining with a horse-trader for a new mount, his old one having died of a haemorrhage. As I approached, I overheard him offering a hundred pistoles for a worn-out chestnut nag. 'By God, Sir,' I said, 'I have a horse to sell too.'

'And a very handsome one,' he said. 'I saw him yesterday, when your friend's lackey was leading him.'

'Do you think he's worth a hundred pistoles?'

'Yes! Would you sell him to me for that price?'

'No but I'll game with you for him.'

'What game?'

'Dice.' No sooner said than done – and I lost the horse. But wait! Listen!" continued Athos. "I won back the caparison."

D'Artagnan made a face. "This displeases you?" said Athos.

"Yes, I confess it does," replied d'Artagnan. "That horse was intended to help us win glory on the day of battle. It was a pledge, a keepsake. Athos, you've done wrong."

"My dear friend, put yourself in my place," said the musketeer. "I was dying of boredom – and besides, I've never liked English horses. If all we want to do is look glorious, the saddle will suffice for that – it's remarkable enough on its own. As to the horse, we can always find some reason for its disappearance. What the devil! A horse is mortal; suppose mine came down with glanders or even farcy?"

D'Artagnan wasn't amused. "It grieves me that you appear so attached to these animals," continued Athos, "as my story isn't over."

"What else have you done?"

"After having lost my own horse, rolling nine against ten – you see how close it was! – the idea came to me of staking yours."

"But it was just an idea ... wasn't it?"

"No, I put it into action on the instant."

"Ow! And the result?" asked d'Artagnan uneasily.

"I threw, and lost."

"My horse?"

"Your horse. Seven against eight, just a pip shy – but you know the proverb."

"Athos, I swear, you must be out of your mind!"

"My friend, you should have told me that last night, when I was telling you foolish stories, and not this morning. Anyway, I lost him, with all his equipage."

"But this is awful!"

"Listen a moment, we're not at the end yet. I'd make an excellent gambler if I weren't so impulsive. But there it is; I was impulsive and..."

"But what else could you stake, if you had nothing left?"

"Ah but I did, I did, my friend! There was still that diamond that glitters on your finger, and which I'd noticed yesterday."

"This diamond!" cried d'Artagnan, clapping his hand over his ring.

"And as I'm a connoisseur of such things, having once had a few of my own, I estimated its value at a thousand pistoles."

"Please tell me," said d'Artagnan, scared half to death, "that you didn't mention my diamond."

"On the contrary, dear friend. You must understand, this diamond had become our sole resource; with it, I could regain our horses and their equipment, and maybe some extra money for the road."

"Athos, you're making me really nervous," said d'Artagnan.

"I described your diamond to my opponent, who'd also noticed it. What the devil! You strut around with a star from heaven on your finger and you think nobody pays any attention? Impossible!"

"Please get to the point!" said d'Artagnan. "Upon my honour, you're killing me with your nonchalance!"

"So, we divided the diamond into ten parts, of a hundred pistoles each."

"You're making this all up, aren't you?" said d'Artagnan. Anger was beginning to take him by the hair, as Minerva takes Achilles in The Iliad. "You're pulling my leg."

"I certainly am not. Joking? God! I'd like to see what you would have done in my place! Especially if you hadn't seen a human face for a fortnight and had no one but bottles for company."

"That's no reason for staking my diamond!" said d'Artagnan, clenching his hand nervously.

"Hear me out. Ten parts, at a hundred pistoles each, so therefore ten throws, with no revenge allowed. After thirteen throws, I'd lost it all. Thirteen! That's always been my unlucky number. It was on the thirteenth of July that I..."

"God's guts!" cried d'Artagnan, leaping to his feet.

This morning's story had made him forget last night's. "Patience," said Athos calmly. "I had a plan. This Englishmen was an eccentric; I'd seen him talking earlier with Grimaud, and Grimaud had said that he'd tried to hire him into his service. So, I staked Grimaud, old silent Grimaud, divided into ten parts."

"Ah! That was a stroke!" said d'Artagnan, laughing despite himself.

"Grimaud himself, mark me! And with these ten parts of Grimaud that aren't worth the tenth part of a ducat, I won back the diamond. Now, tell me persistence isn't a virtue."

"My faith, that's funny!" cried d'Artagnan, somewhat consoled and holding his sides with laughter.

"So, naturally, seizing the moment, I once again staked the diamond."

"The devil!" said d'Artagnan, taken aback.

"I won back your equipage, then your horse, then my equipage, then my horse – then I lost again. To sum up, I managed to retrieve your horse furniture and mine. That's where we are. My final throw was superb, so I decided to leave well enough alone."

D'Artagnan could breathe again; he felt like the weight of the whole inn had been on his chest. "So I still have my diamond?" he asked timidly.

"Intact! Plus, my dear friend, the furniture of your Bucephalus and mine."

"But what's the point of horse-furniture without horses?"

"I have an idea about that."

"Athos, you're scaring me again."

"No but listen: you haven't gambled in quite a while, have you, d'Artagnan?"

"Nor do I want to!"

"Never say never. As I said, you haven't gambled in some time, so your luck ought to be in."

"What are you getting at?"

"Well! That Englishman and his companion are still here. I noticed he was very sorry not to get your equipment. You appear quite attached to your horse. In your place, I would stake the equipment against the horse."

"But he won't want just one set of equipment."

"Then stake both, by God! I'm not the selfish one here."

"You would really do that?"

D'Artagnan was wavering; Athos had more influence over him than even he realised. "Word of honour. I'd risk all on a single throw."

"But having lost the horses, I really would like to keep the furniture at least."

"Stake your diamond then."

"This? Never! That's another thing entirely."

"The devil!" said Athos. "I'd propose that you stake Planchet but the way things worked out last time the Englishman might not be willing."

"My dear Athos, I'd rather not risk anything."

"That's a shame," said Athos coolly. "That Englishman is positively stuffed with pistoles. Good God, man! Just try one throw. One throw is nothing!"

"And if I lose?"

"You'll win!"

"But if I lose?"

"Then you give up the furniture."

"All right. One throw," said d'Artagnan.

Athos went to find the Englishman and discovered him in the stable, casting a covetous eye on their saddles. It was the perfect moment, and Athos proposed his conditions: both sets of furniture against one horse or a hundred pistoles, winner's choice. The Englishman made a quick calculation: the furnishings were worth three hundred pistoles per set. He agreed. D'Artagnan's hands trembled as he threw the dice. A two and a one: three. Athos was alarmed by his friend's pallor but merely said, "That was one sad throw, comrade. It looks like you're going to have those horses fully furnished, Sir." The Englishman, triumphant, didn't even bother to shake the dice – he was so sure of victory, he just threw them on the table without looking at them. D'Artagnan had turned away to hide how badly he was taking the loss. "My, my, my," said Athos, in his quiet voice. "That's an extraordinary throw, something I've seen only four times in my life: two aces!"

The Englishman looked, and froze in astonishment. D'Artagnan, on the other hand, nearly jumped for joy. "Yes," continued Athos, "only four times. Once at Sir Créquy's; another time at my country château at – that is, when I had a château; a third time at Sir Tréville's, where it surprised all of us; and the fourth time at a cabaret, where it fell to me. I lost a hundred crowns and a supper on it."

"Then Sir takes back his horse?" said the Englishman.

"Certainly," said d'Artagnan.

"No chance of revenge?"

"No revenge: that was the condition. Remember?"

"Quite so. The horse shall be brought to your lackey, Sir."

"One moment," said Athos. "With your permission, Sir, I'd like to have a word with my friend, here."

"Of course."

Athos took d'Artagnan aside. "What do you want this time, Sir Tempter?" said d'Artagnan. "You want me throw again, don't you?"

"No, I just want you to reflect."

"On what?"

"On recovering your horse. That's what you want, isn't it?"

"Absolutely."

"It's a mistake. I would take the hundred pistoles. You know you staked the equipment against the horse or a hundred pistoles, winner's choice."

"Yes..."

"I'd take the hundred pistoles."

"Fine. As for me, I'll take the horse."

"Which is, I repeat, a mistake. What good is one horse when there are two of us? I can't ride on the crupper; we'd look like the two sons of Aymon who lost their brothers. I know you wouldn't think of humiliating me by riding at my side, strutting on a magnificent charger while I walk. If it were me, I wouldn't hesitate a moment: I'd take the hundred pistoles. We'll need money to get us back to Paris."

"I'm very attached to that horse, Athos."

"And there you're wrong again, my friend. A horse takes a fall and breaks its knees, or eats at a manger where a glandered horse has eaten, and you're out a horse – or rather, a hundred pistoles. A master has to feed his horse, whereas a hundred pistoles feed their master."

"But how do we get back to Paris?"

"On our lackeys' horses, by God! Everyone will still see by our noble attitudes that we're people of quality."

"Very pretty we'll look on our lackeys' nags, while Aramis and Porthos prance around us on their chargers!"

"Aramis!" Athos cried, breaking up with laughter. "Porthos!"

"What? What?" asked d'Artagnan, who didn't get the joke.

"All right, all right. Whatever you want," said Athos.

"So, your advice is...?"

"Take the hundred pistoles, d'Artagnan. With a hundred pistoles we can eat until the end of the month. We've been through a great deal; it's as well to rest a bit."

"Me, rest? Oh, no, Athos – the minute I get to Paris I have to resume my search for that poor woman."

"Well, do you think your horse will be more useful to your search than silver and gold? Take the hundred pistoles, my friend."

All d'Artagnan needed was one good reason to do so, and this last one seemed excellent. Besides, if he resisted any longer, he was afraid he'd appear selfish. So he acquiesced and took the hundred pistoles that the Englishman counted out on the spot. It seemed like time to go. Peace with the innkeeper cost them six pistoles, plus Athos's old horse. The masters rode the lackeys' horses, and the lackeys set out on foot, carrying the gift saddles on their heads. However ill-mounted the two friends were, they were nonetheless far ahead of their lackeys by the time they arrived at Crèvecœur. As they approached, they could see Aramis leaning sadly on his windowsill and watching, like Sister Anne, the dust on the horizon. "Whoa! Aramis! What the devil are you doing up there?" cried the two friends.

"Ah! It's you, d'Artagnan – and Athos!" said the young man. "I was pondering how ephemeral are worldly pleasures, meanwhile watching my English horse disappear in a cloud of dust. To me, it's a living image of the fragility of earthly things. Life itself can be summed up in three words: 'Erat, est, fuit.'"

"And that means...?" asked d'Artagnan who began to suspect the truth.

"That means I've made a fool of myself. Sixty crowns for a horse that, from the looks of it, could do five leagues in an hour at a trot."

D'Artagnan and Athos burst out laughing.

"My dear d'Artagnan," said Aramis, "don't be too vexed with me, I pray you. Necessity knows no law. Besides, I'm the one who's punished, as that rogue of a horse-trader has robbed me of at least fifty crowns. But at least you two are good managers! You ride your lackeys' horses, and have your own fine chargers hand-led, in careful and easy stages."

As he said this a wagon that had been visible for some time toiling up the Amiens road, stopped in front of the inn, and out got Grimaud and Planchet with the saddles on their heads. The wagon was returning empty to Paris, and the lackeys had engaged this means of transport by agreeing to stand drinks for the drover along the way. "What's this?" said Aramis, when he saw them. "Nothing but saddles?"

"Don't you see it yet?" said Athos.

"Ah, of course! I'm like you, my friends: I instinctively retained the equipage. Whoa, Bazin! Bring down my new saddle, and we'll follow the example of these gentlemen."

"And what have you done with your curates?" asked d'Artagnan.

"I invited them to dinner the next day," said Aramis. "They have some exquisite honey here; I passed them around freely, and did my best to get them stinking drunk. In the end the curate forbade me to give up the tabard, and the Jesuit begged me to recommend him for a place in the musketeers."

"Without a thesis!" cried d'Artagnan. "Without a thesis! I demand the suppression of the thesis!"

"Since then," continued Aramis, "life has been agreeable. I have begun a poem in one-syllable verse. It's a difficult task but the merit of all things is in their difficulty. The subject is – ahem! – Gallantry. Let me read you the first canto: it has four hundred verses, and lasts a minute."

"My faith!" said d'Artagnan, alarmed – he detested poetry nearly as much as he did Latin. "My dear Aramis, if you add the merit of its difficulty to the merit of its brevity, that's two merit points for sure."

"More than that, you'll see that it breathes genuine passion," said Aramis. "So, my friends, we return to Paris? Oh that! Bravo! I'm ready. And if we can pick up the good Porthos on the way, so much the better. You can't imagine how I've missed that big simpleton. He'd never sell his horse, not for a kingdom! I can almost see him, mounted on that big beast, sitting astride his gilded saddle and looking like the Great Mogul."

They rested for half an hour to breathe the horses. Aramis settled his account, placed Bazin in the wagon with his comrades, and they set off to rejoin Porthos. They found him up, less pale than d'Artagnan had seen him on his first visit, and seated at a table where, though he was alone, there was dinner enough for four. It consisted of well-dressed meats, some superb fruit, and a few bottles of choice honey. "By God!" he said, rising, "Your arrival is well-timed, Gentlemen. I was just starting on the soup. You'll dine with me, of course!"

"Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan. "These bottles weren't provided by Mousqueton's lasso! Neither was this fricandeau piqué, nor this fillet of beef..."

"I'm just restoring myself," said Porthos. "Nothing takes it out of you like these devilish sprains. Have you ever had a sprain, Athos?"

"Never. But I recall that in that scuffle in the Rue Férou I suffered a sword-wound, and after fifteen days or so it had exactly the same effect."

"But all this dinner wasn't just for you alone, was it, Porthos?" said Aramis.

"No," said Porthos. "I was expecting some of the local gentry, who've just sent to tell me they can't come. Now you'll take their places and I'll lose nothing by the exchange. Whoa! Mousqueton! Some chairs, and call down to double the order of bottles!"

After about ten minutes, Athos said, "Do you know what we're eating here?"

"For my part," said d'Artagnan, "I'm eating veau piqué aux cardons et à la moelle."

"Some filets d'agneau," said Porthos.

"A blanc de volaille," said Aramis.

"You are wrong, Gentlemen," replied Athos. "You're all eating horse."

"What?" said d'Artagnan.

"Horse-meat!" said Aramis with a grimace of disgust.

Only Porthos said nothing. "Yes, horse-meat. We are eating horse, aren't we, Porthos? Perhaps garnished with the caparison."

"But no, Gentlemen! I kept the furniture," said Porthos.

"My faith! We're all equally bad," said Aramis. "Anyone would think we'd planned it in advance."

"What would you have?" said Porthos. "That magnificent horse made my visitors ashamed of theirs, and I hate to humiliate people."

"Then your duchess is still in the country, taking the waters?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Still there," replied Porthos. "Then, my faith, the governor of the province, one of the gentlemen I expected today at dinner, seemed to want the horse so badly, I gave it to him."

"Gave?" said d'Artagnan.

"Good Lord, yes! 'Gave' is the word," said Porthos, "for he was worth at least a hundred and fifty crowns and the miser wouldn't pay more than eighty."

"Without the saddle?" said Aramis.

"Yes, without the saddle."

"Please note, Gentlemen," said Athos, "that Porthos has made the best bargain of all of us."

Then came a roar of laughter from all but poor Porthos. But once they'd explained the reason for their hilarity, his laughter, as usual, was louder than anyone's. "So at least we're all in funds," said d'Artagnan.

"Well, speaking for myself," said Athos, "I found Aramis's Crèvecœur honey so good that I bought sixty bottles of it and put it in the wagon with the lackeys, so my funds are somewhat deflated."

"As for me," said Aramis, "you should know that I donated heavily to the church of Mont Didier and the Jesuits of Amiens, almost down to my last sou; I'd made certain commitments I thought I should keep. I've ordered masses said for myself, and for all of you, Gentlemen – and I haven't the least doubt but that you'll be the better for them."

"And me," said Porthos, "did you think my sprain cost me nothing? Not even counting Mousqueton's wound – the surgeon had to come twice a day to tend it, and made me pay double for his visits, because that imbecile Mousqueton had taken a ball in a place generally shown only to apothecaries. I advised him never to get wounded there again."

"Come, come," said Athos, sharing a smile with d'Artagnan and Aramis, "it seems to me you've treated the poor lad well. That's just the kind of conduct one expects from such a good master."

"In short," continued Porthos, "when all my bills are paid, I might have as many as thirty crowns left."

"As for me, about ten pistoles," said Aramis.

"It looks like we're the Croesuses of this society," said Athos. "How much of your hundred pistoles do you still have, d'Artagnan?"

"The hundred pistoles? First of all, I gave you fifty."

"Really?"

"Yes, Athos."

"For the love of God! You're right – I remember it now."

"Then, I gave the innkeeper six."

"What an animal he was! Why would you give him six pistoles?"

"Because that's what you told me to give him."

"True enough – I'm far too good. In short, what remains?"

"Twenty-five pistoles," said d'Artagnan.

"And I," said Athos, drawing some small change from his pocket, "I..."

"You: nothing."

"My faith! There's so little left, it's hardly worth counting. All right, let's see what we have in total. Porthos?"

"Thirty crowns."

"Aramis?"

"Ten pistoles."

"And you, d'Artagnan?"

"Twenty-five."

"So how much in all?" said Athos.

"Four hundred seventy-five livres," said d'Artagnan, who could calculate like Archimedes.

"When we get to Paris we'll still have about four hundred," said Porthos, "plus the horse-furniture."

"But what about the mounts we need as musketeers?" said Aramis.

"Well, we'll convert the lackeys' four nags into two decent horses, and draw lots for them. We'll set aside the four hundred livres – it's enough to buy half a horse for one of the dismounted. Then we'll scour our pockets and give everything left to d'Artagnan, who's in luck, and send him into the first gambling hell we come across to wager it on our behalf. Here."

"Then let's get back to eating," said Porthos. "It's getting cold."

The four friends, their minds settled about the future, concentrated on doing honour to the dinner, leaving the remains to Gentlemen Mousqueton, Bazin, Planchet, and Grimaud. On arriving in Paris, d'Artagnan found a letter from Sir Tréville that informed him that, at Tréville's request, the king would soon grant him the favour of admission into the musketeers. As this was what d'Artagnan wanted most in the world (other than, of course, to find Madam Bonacieux), he ran, giddy with joy, to look for his comrades. He'd only left them a half-hour before but he found them gloomy and preoccupied. They'd gathered in council at Athos's house, their usual practice when something serious was up. Sir Tréville had sent to inform them of His Majesty's declared intention to open the next military campaign on May first. His musketeers were to immediately prepare all necessary equipment. The four philosophers looked blankly at each other, stunned. Sir Tréville never joked about affairs pertaining to discipline. "And how much will this 'necessary equipment' cost?" asked d'Artagnan.

"It's hard to say, exactly," replied Aramis. "Even if we adopt the stinginess of Spartans, we'll each need at least fifteen hundred livres."

"Four times fifteen makes sixty, or rather, six thousand livres," said Athos.

D'Artagnan said, "It seems to me that for a thousand livres each – speaking not as a Spartan but as an attorney, meaning an outfitter rather than a prosecutor–"

The word "prosecutor" roused Porthos. "Wait," he said, "I have an ideal!"

"That's fine for you. For myself, I haven't the shadow of one," said Athos coolly. "As to d'Artagnan, Gentlemen, the joy of henceforth being one of us has driven him quite mad. A thousand livres; indeed! For myself alone, I'll need at least two thousand."

"And four times two makes eight," said Aramis. "We'll need eight thousand livres to equip us. At least we already have some splendid saddles."

"Moreover," said Athos, once d'Artagnan had left to go thank Sir Tréville, "there's that glorious diamond that gleams on our friend's finger. What the devil! D'Artagnan is too good a comrade to leave his brothers in financial embarrassment while wearing a king's ransom on his hand."

The most preoccupied of the four friends was certainly d'Artagnan, though as a member of the guards he would be easier to outfit than Gentlemen les Mousquetaires, who were all noblemen. But as has been shown, the Gascon cadet's character was thrifty, almost to the point of parsimony, though at the same time nearly as vainglorious as Porthos – explain the contradiction if you can. Also just then, to add to d'Artagnan's preoccupations with vanity, was a far less selfish concern: despite all his inquiries after Madam Bonacieux, he'd come across no news of her. Sir Tréville had even spoken to the queen. Her Majesty didn't know where the mercer's young wife was but she'd promised to order a search for her. However, this promise was too vague to reassure d'Artagnan. Athos refused to leave his lodgings; he'd resolved not to take a single step to equip himself. "We still have a whole fortnight," he told his friends. "Very well: if at the end of a fortnight I've found nothing – or rather if nothing's found me – then as I'm too good a Catholic to blow my head off with my pistol, I'll pick a fight with four of His Eminence's Guards, or maybe eight Englishmen. I'll fight until one of them kills me that is bound to happen, considering the odds. Everyone will say I died for the king, so I'll have done my duty without having to equip myself."

Porthos continued to pace back, forth, hands behind his back, nodding, and saying, "I'll follow up on my idea."

Aramis said nothing. He seemed anxious, and his grooming, for once, was haphazard. As these distressing details show, desolation reigned over the community. The lackeys, for their part, reflected their masters' gloom, like the coursers of Hippolytus. Mousqueton hoarded crusts; Bazin, ever devout, haunted the churches; Planchet watched the flies buzz in circles; and Grimaud, whom even in the general distress refused to break the silence imposed by his master, heaved sighs that would soften hearts of stone. The three friends – for, as already mentioned, Athos had sworn not to take a single step to equip himself – the three friends went out quite early every morning and returned quite late every evening. They wandered the streets, eyes on the pavement to see if some passer-by had dropped his purse. They were so intent one might have supposed they were following tracks. When they met they exchanged despairing looks as if to say, "Have you found anything?"

Since Porthos was the first to have an idea, and as he'd pondered it long enough to decide how to follow it up, he was the first to act. The worthy Porthos was a man of action. D'Artagnan spotted him one day making his way toward the Church of Saint-Leu and instinctively followed him. Porthos went in, after twisting his mustachios into points, and currying his Royale – a habit with Porthos that always announced a campaign of conquest. D'Artagnan entered behind him, careful not to be seen. Porthos, believing himself unobserved, went and leaned against a pillar. D'Artagnan, unnoticed, leaned against the opposite side. A sermon was under way, so the church was crowded. For Porthos, this was an opportunity to ogle the women. Thanks to the careful labours of Mousqueton, his exterior belied the distress of his interior. His hat was a bit worn, his plume a bit faded, his gold piping a bit tarnished, his lace a bit frayed – but in the half-light of the church these defects disappeared, and Porthos was still the magnificent Porthos. In the pew closest to the pillar Porthos leaned on, d'Artagnan noticed a faded beauty, somewhat past her prime, somewhat withered and gaunt but erect and haughty beneath her black taffeta hood. Porthos's glance furtively touched on this lady, then flitted at large across the nave. As to the lady, she blushed repeatedly, then threw a fleeting look at the fickle Porthos, who immediately sent his eyes roving back across the throng. This seemed to strike the lady in the hood to the quick; she worried her lips until they bled, rubbed her nose nervously, and squirmed in her seat. Seeing this, Porthos again twisted his moustache and stroked his Royale, then began to make signals to a beautiful woman who sat near the choir – a woman not only beautiful but also doubtless a great lady, for behind her sat a young black boy, who had borne the cushion on which she knelt, and a serving-woman, who held the velvet bag with embroidered coat-of-arms that had contained the book from which the lady was reading mass. The lady in the black hood followed Porthos's roving gaze and saw that it stopped at the lady with the velvet cushion, black boy, and serving-woman. Meanwhile, Porthos was hard at work, sending the great lady significant little winks, touching his finger to his lips, and producing an assassinating smile that really did assassinate the scorned elder beauty. It forced from her as a sort of my fault, a sob so distinct that everyone, even the lady with the red cushion, turned her way. Only Porthos ignored it; he understood it completely but played deaf. If the lady with the red cushion made a great impression upon both the dame with the black hood, and on Porthos – for she was a stunner, and Porthos thought her much prettier than the hooded lady – she made an even greater impression on d'Artagnan, who recognised her as his lady of Meung, of Calais, and of Dover, the woman his nemesis, the man with the scar, had called Milady. Without losing sight of the lady with the red cushion, d'Artagnan continued to follow Porthos's little game that he found highly amusing. He supposed that the lady in the black taffeta hood was the prosecutor's wife of the Rue aux Ours, especially since that street wasn't far from the Church of Saint-Leu. He imagined Porthos sought to take his revenge for the betrayal at Chantilly when the prosecutor's wife had been so reluctant to open her purse. D'Artagnan likewise noted that no one actually responded to Porthos's gallantries. They were nothing but chimeras, illusions; but with love as with jealousy, is there any other reality but illusions and chimeras?

The sermon ended. The prosecutor's wife advanced toward the font of holy water but Porthos was ahead of her. Instead of a finger, he dipped his entire hand in the basin. The prosecutor's wife smiled, assuming it was for her that Porthos made this gesture but she was promptly and cruelly undeceived. When she was no more than three steps away from him, Porthos turned his head and fixed his gaze on the lady with the red cushion, who was approaching, trailed by her black boy and maid. As the lady of the red cushion approached, Porthos drew his hand streaming from the font. The devout beauty briefly brushed her slender hand against Porthos's great mitt, smiled, made the sign of the cross, and went out of the church. This was too much for the prosecutor's wife. She had no doubt but that this lady and Porthos were romantically involved. If she'd been a great dame, she'd have fainted dead away – but as she was only a prosecutor's wife, she contented herself with saying to the musketeer, with intense fury, "So, Sir Porthos, you have no holy water to offer me?"

At the sound of her voice, Porthos started like a man awakened from a hundred-year sleep. "Madam!" he cried. "Is that you? How is your husband, that dear Sir Coquenard? Still as stingy as ever? What can I have been looking at that I never noticed you during a two-hour sermon?"

"I was two steps away from you, Sir," replied the prosecutor's wife, "but you didn't notice me because you had eyes only for that belle dame you gave the holy water to."

Porthos feigned embarrassment. "Ah! You saw that, did you?"

"I would have to have been blind to miss it."

"Yes, that's a duchess I happen to know," Porthos said offhandedly. "It's a pain trying to see her, her husband's so jealous. She sent round a note to say that she'd come today, here to this obscure church in a nowhere neighbourhood, just to see me."

"Sir Porthos," said the prosecutor's wife, "will you do me the honour to offer me your arm for five minutes? I have something to tell you."

"As you wish, Madam," said Porthos, winking to himself like a gambler about to fleece his mark.

D'Artagnan passed just then in pursuit of Milady; he glanced at Porthos and saw his look of triumph. "Oh ho! I see at least one of us is going to have his equipment before the deadline," he said to himself, in accord with the strangely easy morals of that gallant period.

Porthos, yielding to the pressure of Madam's arm as a ship yields to a rudder, arrived at the Cloister of Saint-Magloire, a little-used passage between main streets with a turnstile at either end. During the daytime no one was ever seen there but children playing and beggars looking for handouts. "Ah, Sir Porthos!" cried the prosecutor's wife, once she was assured that no strangers could see or hear her. "Ah, Sir Porthos! You're a mighty conqueror, it seems!"

"Me, Madam?" said Porthos, throwing out his chest. "Why do you say that?"

"All those signals! And that holy water! She must be a princess, at least, that lady with the black boy and serving-woman!"

"Good God! Not at all!" replied Porthos. "She's merely a duchess."

"And that footman who held the door to her carriage with a liveried coachman waiting on the seat?"

Porthos had seen neither the footman nor the carriage but with the eye of a jealous woman Madam Coquenard had seen everything. Porthos was sorry he hadn't made the lady with the red cushion a princess in the first place. "You're quite the darling of the ladies, Sir Porthos!" sighed the prosecutor's wife.

"What would you have?" replied Porthos. "Endowed by Nature with a physique such as mine, you must realise that I don't lack for luck with the ladies."

"My God! How quickly men forget!" cried the prosecutor's wife, rolling her eyes toward heaven.

"Less quickly than women, it seems to me," replied Porthos, "and in that regard, I must say I've been your victim. When I was wounded, dying, and even the doctors had given up on me – I, the scion of an illustrious family, who'd relied on your friendship – I was nearly dead, first from wounds, then from hunger, in a miserable inn at Chantilly. And you never deigned once to reply to the urgent, earnest letters I wrote to you."

"But, Sir Porthos," murmured Madam, beginning to feel that, judging by the conduct of the great ladies of the times, she was in the wrong.

"To me, who'd sacrificed the Countess of Penaflor for your sake...?"

"I know it!"

"The Baroness de..."

"Sir Porthos, this is unbearable!"

"The Duchess de..."

"Sir Porthos, be generous!"

"You're right, Madam – I'll spare you."

"But it was my husband who wouldn't even speak of a loan."

"Madam Coquenard," said Porthos, "please recall the first letter you ever wrote to me, a missive of passion that is graven forever in my memory."

The prosecutor's wife uttered a low moan. "But, you see," she said, "the sum you asked to borrow was so very large."

"Madam Coquenard, of all those to whom I could have written, I gave you the preference. I had only to write to the Duchess of ... but no, I won't speak her name, for it's not in me to compromise a woman. But this I know, that I had only to write to her, and she would have sent me fifteen hundred."

The prosecutor's wife shed a tear. "Sir Porthos," she said, "I swear you've severely punished me, and if in the future you find yourself in a similar state, you have only to address yourself to me."

"Enough!" said Porthos, in mock revulsion. "No more talk about money, if you please. It's humiliating."

"Then ... you no longer love me," the prosecutor's wife said, slowly and sadly.

Porthos maintained a majestic silence. "That's your only reply? Alas! I understand."

"Just think about the offence you gave me, Madam! It lives on ... in here."

Porthos thumped his great chest over the location of his heart. "But I'll make up for it! You'll see, my dear Porthos!"

"After all, what was I asking for?" continued Porthos, with a good-natured shrug of his massive shoulders. "A loan, nothing more. It's not as if I were an unreasonable man. I know you're not rich, Madam Coquenard, and your husband has to bleed his poor clients to squeeze a few paltry crowns out of them. Now, if you were a countess, a marquise, or a duchess, things would be different – then your offence would be unpardonable."

The prosecutor's wife was piqued. "I'll have you know, Sir Porthos, that my strongbox, though it may be the strongbox of a mere prosecutor's wife, is better furnished than the coffers of your spendthrift high-class hussies."

"That just doubles the offence," said Porthos, removing his arm from hers. "If you're rich, Madam Coquenard, then there's no excuse for your refusal."

"When I said rich," replied Madam, who saw that she'd gone too far, "I didn't mean literally. I'm not exactly rich, just rather well off."

"Enough, Madam," said Porthos. "Let's say no more about it, I beg of you. You've misunderstood me: it's over between us."

"What an ingrate you are!"

"As if you had a right to complain!" said Porthos.

"Then go off with your baby-faced duchess! I'll detain you no longer."

"At least she's not scrawny!"

"See here, Sir Porthos, for the last time: do you still love me?"

"Alas, Madam," said Porthos, in the most melancholy tone he could muster, "now, when we're about to enter onto a campaign, a campaign in which I've had premonitions that I'll be killed..."

"Oh! Don't say such things!" cried the prosecutor's wife, bursting into tears.

"Something tells me it's so," continued Porthos, more and more morose.

"I'd rather you said you had a new love."

"Not at all; I'm being completely frank with you. No new object of desire attracts me – and I even feel, here, in the depths of my heart, something that still speaks for you. But whether you know it or not, in a fortnight this fatal campaign begins. I'll be frightfully preoccupied with this matter of my equipment, and now it seems I must travel to my family estate, in lower Brittany, to find the sum needed to outfit for my departure."

Porthos thought he could see a final contest under way between love and avarice. He continued, "...And as the duchess you saw at the church has estates near my own, we plan to travel together.

Long journeys, you know, seem so much shorter when shared by two."

"Haven't you any friends in Paris, Sir Porthos?" said Madam.

"I thought I had," Porthos said, resuming his air of melancholy, "but I see now that I was wrong."

"You have them, Sir Porthos, you have them!" cried the prosecutor's wife, carried away in spite of herself. "Come to our house tomorrow. Say you're my aunt's son that makes you my cousin; you hail from Noyon, in Picardy; you have lawsuits pending in Paris, and need a solicitor. Can you remember all that?"

"Perfectly, Madam."

"Come at the dinner hour."

"Very well."

"And watch out for my husband, who's pretty sharp, despite being seventy-six years old."

"Seventy-six! Plague! That's a hell of an age!" replied Porthos.

"A heavenly age, you mean to say, Sir Porthos. I'm afraid the poor man may leave me a widow at any moment," she continued, with a significant glance at the musketeer. "Happily, thanks to our marriage contract, everything goes to the last survivor."

"Everything?" said Porthos.

"Everything."

"I see you're a prudent woman, my dear Madam Coquenard," said Porthos, squeezing her hand tenderly.

"So, then – we're reconciled, Sir Porthos?" she simpered.

"For life!" Porthos effused.

"Au revoir, then, my traitor!"

"Au revoir, my negligent love!"

"Tomorrow, my angel!"

"Tomorrow, flame of my life!"

Milady

D'Artagnan had followed Milady unseen; he watched her step into her carriage and heard her order the coachman to take her to Saint-Germain. It's pointless to try to run after a carriage drawn at a trot by two vigorous horses, so d'Artagnan turned his feet toward the Rue Férou. In the Rue of Seine he encountered Planchet, standing outside a bakery ecstatically worshipping a supremely appetizing brioche. D'Artagnan ordered him to go to Sir Tréville's stables and saddle up two horses, one for d'Artagnan and the other for himself, and then join him at Athos's house. (Sir Tréville had been kind enough to place his stables at d'Artagnan's service.) Planchet made his way toward the Rue du Vieux-Colombier, d'Artagnan toward the Rue Férou. He found Athos at home, gloomily draining one of those famous bottles of Spanish honey brought back from his journey into Picardy. He made a sign to Grimaud to bring a glass for d'Artagnan and Grimaud silently obeyed. D'Artagnan then related to Athos everything that had happened at the church between Porthos and the prosecutor's wife, and how their comrade was probably by that time within sight of being fully equipped. "As for me," replied Athos, at the end of this story, "I'm perfectly satisfied to know that it won't be the women who will defray my expenses."

"But my dear Athos, you're such a handsome, well-bred nobleman, not even Princess or queens would be safe from you."

"Ah, this d'Artagnan lad. How young he is!" said Athos, shrugging his shoulders and he signalled to Grimaud to bring another bottle. Just then Planchet stuck his head timidly through the half-open door and announced to his master that he was there with the horses. "What horses?" asked Athos.

"A pair Sir Tréville lends me when I need them, and which I'm going to take on a ride over to Saint-Germain."

"And why should you want to go to Saint-Germain?" asked Athos.

Then d'Artagnan described his other encounter at the church, when he'd discovered that woman who, along with the cavalier in the black cloak and scarred temple, was his eternal preoccupation. "In other words, you've fallen for this woman, as you fell for Madam Bonacieux," said Athos, shrugging disdainfully at the pitiful weakness of mankind.

"Me? I should say not!" cried d'Artagnan. "I'm just eager to clear up this mystery she's involved in. I don't know why but though I don't know her, and she doesn't know me, I have a feeling she's strangely involved somehow in my life."

"No doubt you're right," said Athos. "I never knew a woman who was worth the trouble of finding once she was lost. Madam Bonacieux is lost – too bad for her! She'll just have to find herself."

"No, Athos, you've got it all wrong," said d'Artagnan. "I love my poor Constance more than ever, and if I knew where she was, even at the end of the Earth, I'd go there and free her from the hands of her enemies. But I know nothing, and all my searches have been in vain. What would you have? I must distract myself somehow."

"Distract yourself, then, with this Milady, my dear d'Artagnan. If it will amuse you, you have my blessing."

"Listen, Athos," said d'Artagnan, "instead of locking yourself up in here as if you'd been arrested, get on your horse and take a ride with me to Saint-Germain."

"My friend," replied Athos, "I ride horses when I have them; when I don't, I walk."

"Fine," said d'Artagnan, smiling at Athos's surliness that would have wounded him if it had come from anyone else. "As for me, I'm not as proud as you; I ride whatever I can find. I'll see you later, friend Athos."

"See you shortly," said the musketeer, making a sign to Grimaud to open the bottle he'd brought.

D'Artagnan and Planchet climbed into their saddles and took the road to Saint-Germain. Along the way what Athos had said to the young man about Madam Bonacieux kept coming back to him. Although d'Artagnan's character was not all that sentimental, the mercer's pretty wife had made a real impression on his heart. As he'd said, he was ready to go to the end of the world in search of her. But as the world, being round, has many ends, he didn't know which way to turn. So in the meantime, he was going to try to learn who Milady was. Milady had spoken to the man in the black cloak, so she knew him. D'Artagnan was convinced that the man in the black cloak had abducted Madam Bonacieux the second time, just as he'd done the first. So d'Artagnan told only half a lie that isn't lying much, when he said that by undertaking a search for Milady he was at the same time searching for Constance. Mulling this over, now and then touching his spur to his horse, d'Artagnan soon arrived at Saint-Germain. He'd just passed the pavilion where, ten years or so later, Louis XIV would be born, and was riding along a deserted street, looking right and left for any hint of the beautiful Englishwoman. Then, before the ground floor of a pretty house which, as was usual for the period, had no windows toward the street, he saw someone who looked familiar, strolling along a sort of garden terrace planted with flowers. Planchet was the first to recognise him. "Hey, sir," he said, addressing d'Artagnan, "don't you remember the face of that fellow loafing in the flowerbeds?"

"No," said d'Artagnan, "but I'm certain this isn't the first time I've seen it."

"I should think not," said Planchet. "It's that poor sap Lubin, lackey of the Count of Wardes, whom you dealt with last month at Calais on the road to the governor's country house."

"So it is," said d'Artagnan. "I recognise him now. Say – do you think he would recognise you?"

"My faith, sir, he was in so much trouble at the time, I doubt he'd have a clear memory of me."

"Well, then, go strike up a conversation with the lad," said d'Artagnan, "and find out from him if his master survived."

Planchet got off his horse and marched right up to Lubin, who did not in fact recognise him, and the two lackeys began to chat like the best friends in the world. Meanwhile, d'Artagnan took the two horses up an alley and around the block, reappearing on the other side of the house to watch the conversation from behind a hazel hedge. After having been behind the hedge for no more than a moment he heard the sound of wheels, then saw Milady's carriage pull up opposite him. He couldn't be mistaken: Milady was visible within. D'Artagnan quickly ducked down behind his horse's neck so he could see without being seen. Milady put her charming blond head out the window and gave some orders to her chambermaid. The latter, a pretty girl of about twenty to twenty-two, lively and alert, the true soubrette of a great dame, jumped down from the carriage step – where, according to the custom of the time, she'd been seated – and ran over to the terrace where d'Artagnan had seen Lubin. D'Artagnan's gaze followed the soubrette as she made her way to the terrace. By chance, just then an order from inside the house called Lubin within, so that Planchet was left alone, looking around for his master. The chambermaid approached Planchet, whom she took for Lubin, and held out a letter. "For your master," she said.

"For my master?" replied Planchet, astonished.

"Yes and it's urgent. Take it, and be quick."

She then ran back to the carriage that had turned around to face the way it had come. She hopped onto the step and the carriage drove off. Planchet turned the letter over and over in his hands; then, accustomed to passive obedience, he hopped down from the terrace and trotted up the alley. After twenty paces he encountered d'Artagnan who, having seen everything, was coming around to meet him.

"For you, Sir," said Planchet, presenting the letter to the young man. "For me?" said d'Artagnan. "Are you sure?"

"By God! Am I sure? The soubrette said to me, For your master. I have no other master but you, so here it is. A pretty little bit of a girl, that soubrette, upon my soul!" D'Artagnan opened the letter and read these words:

A person who is more interested in you than she dares to say wants to know on what day it would suit you to take a promenade in the forest. Tomorrow, at the Auberge of the Field of the Cloth of Gold, a servant in black and red will await your reply.

"Oh ho!" d'Artagnan said to himself. "This is hot stuff. It seems Milady and I are concerned about the health of the same person. Well, Planchet, how is the good Sir Wardes doing? He's not dead, I suppose?"

"No, Sir, he's doing about as well as a person can who's taken four thrusts through the body. You gave him four of the best, no doubt about it, and he's still very weak, having lost nearly all his blood. Like I said, Sir, Lubin didn't recognise me, and he told me the whole story of our encounter."

"Well done, Planchet – you're the king of lackeys! Now, get back on your horse and let's catch that carriage."

It didn't take long. Within five minutes they spotted the carriage pulled over by the side of the road, with a richly-dressed, mounted cavalier conversing at the door. The conversation between Milady and the cavalier was so animated that d'Artagnan approached the other side of the carriage without anyone but the pretty soubrette noticing him. The conversation was taking place in English, a language d'Artagnan didn't know but by her tone the young man could tell that the beautiful Englishwoman was furious. She ended the discussion with a thoroughly unambiguous gesture, a blow with her fan, swung with such force that the little feminine accessory flew into a thousand pieces. The cavalier burst into laughter that seemed to exasperate Milady further. D'Artagnan thought this was the moment to intervene. He approached the opposite door of the carriage, removed his hat respectfully and said, "Madam, will you permit me to offer you my services? It seems to me this cavalier has angered you. Give the word, Madam, and I'll undertake to punish him for his bad manners."

At the first word, Milady turned around and looked at the young man with astonishment. When he'd finished she said, in excellent French, "Sir, I'd gladly place myself under your protection – if the person I'm quarrelling with weren't my brother."

"Ah! Pardon me, Madam!" said d'Artagnan. "I had no idea."

"What is that dolt going on about?" bellowed the cavalier whom Milady had called her brother, leaning over in the saddle to look through the window on the opposite side. "And why doesn't he mind his own business?"

"Dolt, yourself!" said d'Artagnan, leaning down on the neck of his own horse and talking through the window on his side. "I'll mind my own business wherever it pleases me."

The cavalier addressed a few words in English to his sister. "I'm speaking to you in French, Sir," said d'Artagnan. "Do me the favour to reply in the same language. If you're Madam's brother, so be it. Fortunately, you're not mine."

One might suppose that Milady, if she were as wary of trouble as most women, would try to break this cycle of provocation before the quarrel went too far. But she, on the contrary, sat back in her carriage and coolly called out to her coachman, "Drive on! Back to the hôtel."

The pretty soubrette cast an anxious glance at d'Artagnan, whose good looks seemed to have made an impression on her. The carriage departed, leaving the two men facing each other with no obstacle between them. The cavalier made a move to follow the carriage but d'Artagnan grabbed his bridle and stopped him. He was even further incensed when he recognised the cavalier as the Englishman who, at Amiens, had won d'Artagnan's horse from Athos and nearly won his diamond. "Not so fast," he said. "You seem to be an even bigger dolt than I am – or are you forgetting that we have a little quarrel to arrange?"

"Ah!" said the Englishman. "It's you, is it, my lad? It seems you're always playing one game or another."

"Yes, and that reminds me that I have a revenge to take for the last one. We'll see, Sir, if you're as clever with a rapier as with a dice-cup."

"As you can see, I'm not wearing a sword," said the Englishman. "Will you bully an unarmed man?"

"I have to hope you have one at home," replied d'Artagnan. "In any case, I have two. If you like, I'll dice you for one of them."

"Don't bother," said the Englishman. "I'm well supplied in that regard."

"Well, then, my worthy gentleman," said d'Artagnan, "pick out your longest and come show it to me this evening."

"Where, if you please?"

"Behind the Luxembourg; that's a charming spot for the sort of promenade I propose."

"That will do. I'll be there."

"Your hour?"

"Six o'clock."

"You have, perhaps, one or two friends?"

"I have three who would be honoured to join me."

"Three? Perfect. That's just my number," said d'Artagnan.

"Now who, exactly, are you?" asked the Englishman.

"I'm Sir d'Artagnan, gentleman of Gascony, serving in the guards, company of Sir Des Essarts. And you?"

"I am Lord Winter, Baron of Sheffield."

"Well, then, I'm your servant, Sir Baron," said d'Artagnan, "Though your names are a little difficult to retain." And pricking his horse to a gallop, he took off up the road to Paris. As he usually did in this sort of situation, d'Artagnan went straight to Athos's house. He found Athos stretched out on a large sofa, where he was waiting, as he'd said, for his equipment to come find him. D'Artagnan recounted to Athos everything that had happened, leaving out only the letter to Sir Wardes. Athos was enchanted to hear he was going to fight an Englishman. As has been said, this was his dream. They immediately sent their lackeys to find Porthos and Aramis, and told them, once they arrived, what was going on. Porthos drew his sword from its scabbard and made a few lunges at the wall, shadow-parrying from time to time and leaping about like a dancer. Aramis, who was always working on his poem, shut himself up in Athos's study and asked not to be disturbed until it was time to draw steel. Athos just signalled to Grimaud to bring another bottle. Meanwhile, d'Artagnan busied himself with a little scheme of which we'll soon see the results. Based on the smile that passed across his face from time to time, it appeared to promise a thoroughly gratifying adventure.

English & French

The hour of the duel arrived and the four friends made their way to the rear of the Luxembourg Palace to a goat corral behind the kitchens with their lackeys. Athos tossed a coin to the goatherd to run off the goats. The lackeys were posted as lookouts. A silent group of Englishmen soon approached the corral and entered it, joining the musketeers. Then, according to the custom on the other side of the Channel, the formal presentations took place. As the Englishmen were all men of quality, their adversaries' bizarre names came as a surprise and made them rather uneasy. "But, see here," said Lord Winter, when the three friends had been named, "we don't know who you really are. We can't fight fellows with such outlandish names. Those are the names of shepherds, not gentlemen."

"Then you must suppose, Milord, that they are assumed names," said Athos.

"Which only makes us want to know your true names all the more," replied the Englishman.

"You were perfectly happy to gamble with us without knowing who we were," said Athos, "as shown by the fact that you won both our horses."

"Quite so but then we risked only our pistoles. Now we risk our blood. One may play with anyone but one fights only with equals."

"Quite proper," said Athos.

He took aside the Englishman with whom he was to fight and whispered his real name to him. Porthos and Aramis then did the same. "Does that satisfy you?" Athos said to his adversary. "Do you find me sufficiently noble to do me the honour to cross swords with me?"

The Englishman bowed. "Yes, Sir."

"Very well," said Athos coolly. "Now, there is something else I must tell you."

"And that is...?"

"That you would have done better not to insist that I identify myself."

"Why is that?"

"Because I am believed to be dead and have reasons why no one should know that I'm still alive. I'm now obliged to kill you to keep my secret from getting out."

The Englishman looked at Athos as if he thought he must be joking – but he wasn't. "Gentlemen," Athos said, addressing both companions and adversaries, "are we all ready?"

"Yes," English and French answered with one voice.

"Then, on guard," Athos said.

Immediately eight swords gleamed in the rays of the setting sun, and the battle began with the ferocity of men who were enemies twice over. Athos fenced with the same calmness and method as if practicing in a weapons-room. Porthos, his overconfidence no doubt reined in by his misadventure in Chantilly, fought with finesse and prudence. Aramis, who had the third canto of his poem to finish, fought like a man pressed for time. Athos was the first to kill his adversary. He struck him only once but, as he'd foretold, the blow was mortal: Athos ran him through the heart. Porthos was second, laying his man on the grass with a thrust through the thigh. Then, as the Englishman put up no more resistance, Porthos picked him up in his arms and carried him to his carriage. Aramis pressed his man so vigorously that, after forcing him to fall back fifty paces, he finally took to his heels and disappeared, followed by the hoots of the lackeys. As to d'Artagnan, he fought purely and simply on the defensive. Then, when he saw that his adversary was nearly worn out, d'Artagnan caught his sword in a vigorous bind, and with a twist he sent it flying. The baron, disarmed, retreated two or three steps, then his foot slipped and he fell on his back. With a bound d'Artagnan was upon him and placed his point at the baron's throat. "I'd kill you, sir," he said to the Englishman, "and you're entirely in my hands but I'll spare your life for love of your sister."

D'Artagnan was thrilled; he had succeeded with his little plan, the one that had brought so many smiles to his face as he thought it through. The Englishman, relieved to find himself in the hands of such a good-natured gentleman, embraced d'Artagnan heartily and paid a thousand compliments to the victorious musketeers. Then, since Porthos's adversary was already installed in his carriage and Aramis's had scampered away, they had only to think about the dead man. As Porthos and Aramis were opening his clothes in hopes that the wound wasn't mortal, a heavy purse dropped from his belt. D'Artagnan scooped it up and presented it to Lord Winter. "And what the devil do you want me to do with this?" said the Englishman.

"You can return it to his family," said d'Artagnan.

"His family could care less about such a paltry sum, especially since they'll inherit fifteen thousand crowns a year from him. Keep the purse for your lackeys."

D'Artagnan put the purse in his pocket. "And now, my young friend, as I hope you'll permit me to call you," said Lord Winter, "if you like, I'll present you this evening to my sister, Lady Clarice. I'd like her to take you under her wing. She's by no means out of favour at Court and might, perhaps, be able to put in a good word for you at some point in the future."

D'Artagnan blushed with pleasure and bowed his assent. Just then, Athos came up to d'Artagnan. "What are you planning to do with that purse?" he whispered.

"I intended to give it to you, my dear Athos."

"To me? Why me?"

"Dame! You're the one who killed him; they're the spoils of war."

"Me, loot an enemy!" said Athos. "What do you take me for?"

"It's the custom in wartime," said d'Artagnan. "Why shouldn't it be the custom in a duel?"

"I've never done that, even on the field of battle," said Athos.

Porthos shrugged his shoulders. Aramis, with a little nod, supported Athos. "All right, then," said d'Artagnan, "give the money to the lackeys, as Lord Winter suggested."

"I agree, let's donate the purse," said Athos, "not to our lackeys but the Englishmen's lackeys." He took the purse and tossed it into the hands of the coachman. "For you and your comrades," he said. Such majestic grandeur from a man entirely destitute impressed even Porthos, and Athos's Gallic generosity was applauded by everyone, including Lord Winter and his wounded friend, with the notable exception of Gentlemen Grimaud, Mousqueton, Planchet, and Bazin. Lord Winter, taking his leave of d'Artagnan, gave him his sister's address: she lived in the Place Royale that was then a most fashionable neighbourhood. In addition, he offered to come with d'Artagnan to present him to his sister. D'Artagnan agreed to meet him at eight o'clock, at Athos's house. This imminent introduction to Milady filled the young Gascon's head. He thought about the strange way this woman had become mixed up in his destiny. He was convinced that she was some creature of Cardinal Richelieu's, yet he found himself inescapably drawn to her by a feeling impossible to explain. His only fear was that Milady would recognise him from Meung or Dover. Then she'd know that he was attached to Sir Tréville and therefore belonged body and soul to the king. This would level the playing field by eliminating one of his main advantages that was that he knew more of Milady than she knew of him. As to competition from the incipient amour between Milady and the Count of Wardes, d'Artagnan wasn't the least bit concerned, though the count was young, handsome, rich, and in favour with the cardinal. It's something indeed to be only twenty years old, especially if one was born at Tarbes. D'Artagnan went home and groomed himself until he shone. Then he returned to Athos's place and as usual, told him everything. Athos listened to his plans, then shook his head and warned him with a touch of bitterness, "You'd better be careful ... what, you lose one woman whom you said was good, charming, even perfect, and now run after another?"

D'Artagnan was stung by the truth of this reproach. "I loved Madam Bonacieux with my heart while I love Milady only with my head," he said. "Through this introduction to her, I'm merely trying to determine what role she plays at Court."

"What role she plays! For the love of God! That's not hard to divine, after everything you've told me. She's some agent of the cardinal's, a woman who will draw you into a trap, in which you'll most likely leave your head."

"The devil! It seems to me you always see the dark side of things, Athos."

"I distrust all women, my friend. What would you have? I paid a high price for my knowledge of the fair sex – especially the blond ones. Milady is fair, you said?"

"She has the most beautiful blond hair you've ever seen!"

"Oh, my poor d'Artagnan," said Athos.

"Listen, I want to go to clear something up. When I've learned what I want to know, I'll take my leave."

"Go learn then," Athos said phlegmatically.

Lord Winter arrived shortly thereafter but Athos ducked into a back room, warned in time so the baron found d'Artagnan alone. It was nearly eight o'clock, so he took the young man with him. An elegant carriage waited below, and as it was drawn by two excellent horses, they were soon at the Place Royale. Milady Clarice received d'Artagnan graciously. Her hôtel was remarkably sumptuous. Due to the impending war most of the English had already left France, or were about to leave it but Milady was in the process of expensive renovations. This clearly showed that the measures driving the other English from France didn't apply to her. "You see before you," said Lord Winter, presenting d'Artagnan to his sister, "a young gentleman who has held my life in his hands but who refused to take advantage though we were enemies twice over, as I'm English and it was I who insulted him. Thank him, Madam if you have any affection for me."

Milady knit her brows slightly, a cloud momentarily passed across her face, followed by a smile so strange that the young man, noticing the quick change of expressions, nearly shuddered. The brother saw nothing; he had turned around to play with Milady's favourite monkey that had tugged on his doublet. "You're very welcome, sir," said Milady in a voice whose sweetness contrasted strangely with the signs of displeasure d'Artagnan had noticed. "Today you've acquired the right to my eternal gratitude." Lord Winter then described the combat, leaving out not a single detail. Milady listened attentively, yet it was easy to see, despite the effort she made to conceal it, that she was not at all happy with the story. The blood rose to her face and her foot beat an impatient tattoo beneath her gown. Lord Winter noticed none of this. His tale finished, he went over to a table bearing glasses and a bottle of Spanish honey. He filled two glasses and invited d'Artagnan with a gesture to drink with him. D'Artagnan knew that the English considered it rude to refuse a toast, so he approached the table and took a glass. However, he never lost sight of Milady, and watching her in a mirror saw a change come over her features. Now that she thought herself unobserved her face was animated with ferocity and she tore at her handkerchief with her beautiful teeth. The pretty little soubrette, whom d'Artagnan had already noticed, now came into the room. She spoke a few words in English to Lord Winter, and he immediately turned and asked d'Artagnan's permission to withdraw, excusing himself due to an urgent matter that called him away and begging his sister to ask his pardon of d'Artagnan. The young Gascon shook hands with the baron and then returned to Milady, whose surprisingly mobile features had regained their gracious expression. Only some small red spots on her handkerchief indicated she had bitten her lips until they bled. Those lips were magnificent, the colour of coral. The conversation took a playful turn. Milady appeared entirely recovered. She explained that Lord Winter was her brother-in-law, not her brother: she had married a younger brother of the family who had left her a widow with an infant. If the baron didn't marry, this child was the sole heir to Lord Winter. All this persuaded d'Artagnan that there was a veil hiding something here but he could not yet make out what it hid. At the end of another half-hour's conversation d'Artagnan was convinced that Milady was French, not English. She spoke French with a purity and elegance that left no doubt in his mind. D'Artagnan made any number of gallant speeches and protestations of devotion. Milady replied to all this nonsense with a benevolent smile. The end of the evening arrived and d'Artagnan took his leave of Milady, leaving her salon the happiest of men. On the stairs he encountered the pretty soubrette, who brushed softly against him in passing and then, blushing to her eyes, begged his pardon for having touched him – all in a voice so sweet that the pardon was instantly granted. D'Artagnan returned the following day and was even better received than the day before. Lord Winter was out, so it was Milady who did all the honours that evening. She appeared to take a great interest in him, asking him where he came from, who his friends were, and whether he'd ever thought of taking service with Your Eminence. As has been said, d'Artagnan was very prudent for a twenty-year-old Gascon, and this reminded him of his suspicions regarding Milady. He made a speech about the greatness of His Eminence and said that he would certainly have joined the Cardinal's Guard rather than the king's if he'd happened to know Sir Cavois instead of Sir Tréville. Milady smoothly changed the subject, asking d'Artagnan nonchalantly if he'd ever been to England. D'Artagnan replied that he'd been sent there by Sir Tréville to negotiate the purchase of some horses and that he'd returned with four to try out. As he related this, Milady bit her lip two or three times. She was dealing with a Gascon who played his cards close to his chest. D'Artagnan took his leave at the same hour as the previous evening. In the corridor he again met the pretty Kitty, as the soubrette was called. She looked at him with a warmth impossible to mistake but d'Artagnan was so preoccupied with the mistress of the house that he noticed no one but her. D'Artagnan returned to Milady's hôtel the next day, and the day after that, and each time Milady received him more graciously. And each time, whether in the antechamber, the corridor, or on the stairs, he met the pretty soubrette. Poor Kitty was persistent but d'Artagnan still paid her no attention.

The Dinner at the Prosecutor's

No matter how gratifying Porthos's part in the duel with the English had been, it couldn't make him forget the dinner he'd been invited to by the prosecutor's wife. The next day, right on time, Mousqueton gave him a final once-over, and then he made his way toward the Rue aux Ours, walking like a man who was the darling of Fortune. His heart pounded – but not like d'Artagnan's, with young, impatient love. No, a more material attraction stirred his blood: he was finally about to cross that mysterious threshold and climb the same secret stairs that the coins of Master Coquenard had climbed, one by one. He was about to see, in reality, a certain chest he'd beheld twenty times in his dreams: a chest long and deep, padlocked, bolted, and fastened to the floor; a chest about which he'd heard so much, and which the hands of the prosecutor's wife – somewhat wrinkled, it's true but still elegant – were about to open to his admiring eyes. And then he, a man without fortune, a man without family, a virtual vagabond, a soldier used to inns, cabarets, and taverns, a gourmet who most of the time had to eat whatever came to hand – he was going to sit down to a family meal. He was going to sit and savour the environment of home and wallow in those small pleasures that, as the old soldiers say, the tougher you are, the more they soften you. To appear in the capacity of a cousin and sit down every day to a good table; to soothe the wrinkled brow of the aged prosecutor; to fleece the young clerks by teaching them basset, hazard, and lansquenet, taking as an honorarium, for the lesson he'd given them, their savings for the month – the thought of all this brought a smile to Porthos's face. The musketeer was well aware of the bad reputation lawyers and attorneys had at that time for stinginess, parsimony, and even fasting. However, except for a marked tendency to economize that Porthos had always found in bad taste, Madam Coquenard had been over all rather generous – for a prosecutor's wife, that is. He hoped to find her household run on a comfortable footing. However, at the door the musketeer began to have his doubts. The entrance was not particularly promising: a dark and stinking alley, at the end of which was a badly lit staircase leading up to a low door studded with enormous nails, looking all too much like the main gate of the Grand Châtelet, Paris's foremost prison. Porthos knocked. The door was opened by a tall, pale clerk, his face shadowed by a mop of shaggy hair. He bowed as if obliged to, faced with his guest's great size that showed strength; his dress that showed his rank; and his ruddy complexion that showed that he was used to living well. Another, shorter clerk was behind the first, a taller one behind the second, and a twelve-year-old apprentice behind the third. In total, three clerks and a half that, for the time, indicated that this lawyer had a sizable practice. Though the musketeer wasn't due to arrive before one o'clock the prosecutor's wife had been on the lookout since noon, reckoning that the heart, or maybe the stomach of her paramour would bring him to her early. Madam Coquenard thus arrived at the inner door of the office at the same time her guest arrived at the stairway entrance. The appearance of the worthy lady saved Porthos from an awkward moment. The clerks were staring at him curiously and he, not quite knowing what to say to this assortment of gnomes and beanpoles, stood his ground silently. "It's my cousin!" cried madam. "Come in, sir Porthos."

The name Porthos struck the clerks as funny, and they began to laugh but Porthos turned on them ominously and their faces quickly resumed their humourless stares. After having passed through the antechamber where they'd found the clerks, and the office where they should have been, they arrived in the prosecutor's study, a dark chamber that seemed furnished mainly with untidy stacks of paper. Beyond the study was the parlour with the kitchen on the right. None of these rooms made a particularly good impression on Porthos. Private conversation could be heard through all these open doors even at a distance. Furthermore, in passing he'd taken a quick look into the kitchen, and he had to admit, to his great regret and to the shame of the prosecutor's wife, that he didn't see that fire, that animation, that flurry of activity that indicates, in a well-run home, that a fine dinner is imminent. The prosecutor had doubtless been warned of his visit, as he showed no surprise at the sight of Porthos, who approached him with a familiar air and bowed politely. "So, it seems we're cousins, sir Porthos?" said the prosecutor, raising himself by his arms from the seat of his wicker chair.

The old man, enveloped in an oversized black doublet that entirely swallowed his gaunt frame, was alert and in charge of his wits. His little grey eyes glittered like carbuncles and seemed, with his grimacing mouth, to be the only parts of his face that were still alive. Unfortunately his legs had been refusing their service to this machine of bones for the last five or six months, and this weakness had made the worthy prosecutor a virtual slave to his wife. The "cousin" was accepted with resignation, at best. A spry Master Coquenard would have denied all relationship with Sir Porthos. "Yes, Sir, we are cousins," said Porthos, unruffled, as he'd never expected an enthusiastic reception from the husband. "On my wife's side, I believe?" said the prosecutor maliciously.

Porthos missed this stab's double meaning, taking it for evidence of naïveté, and chuckled behind his immense moustache. Madam Coquenard, who knew that naïve prosecutors were rare members of the species, smiled a little, and blushed rather more. Since the arrival of Porthos, Master Coquenard had been glancing uneasily at a large armoire next to his oaken writing desk. Porthos realised that this armoire, though it didn't look much like the chest he'd seen in his dreams, must be the blessed coffer, and he congratulated himself that the reality was six feet taller than the chest he'd dreamed of. Master Coquenard didn't press his genealogical interrogations any further. Changing his uneasy gaze from the armoire to Porthos, he contented himself with saying, "Sir, before his departure for the campaign, our cousin will do us the honour to dine with us at another time, won't he, Madam Coquenard?"

This time, Porthos felt the blow right in his stomach, and it hurt. Apparently Madam Coquenard felt it too, for she added, "My cousin won't return at all if we mistreat him. In truth, he'll be in Paris for such a short time that we should beg him to spare every moment he can for us before he departs."

"Oh, my poor legs," murmured Coquenard. "Where are you, now that I need you?"

He tried to smile. Porthos, who'd seen all his gastronomic hopes threatened, was exceedingly grateful to madam for rescuing him. The dinner hour soon arrived. They went into the dining room, a large dark chamber opposite the kitchen. The clerks, who had apparently smelled unusual aromas wafting through the house, arrived with military punctuality and stood with their stools in their hands, eager to seat themselves. Their jaws worked with a frightful urgency. God! Porthos thought when he saw the three starvelings – apparently the demi-clerk wasn't to be admitted to the honours of the prosecutorial table – God's wounds! If I were in my cousin's place, I wouldn't keep such gluttons as these around. They act like shipwrecked sailors who've had nothing to eat for six weeks.

Master Coquenard entered, pushed in his rolling chair by Madam Coquenard. Porthos helped the lady roll her husband up to the table. As soon as he entered the room, his jaws began working just like his clerks'. "Oh ho!" he said. "Now there is a soup to savour!"

"What the devil do they think is so extraordinary about this soup?" said Porthos to himself, at the sight of the pale bouillon.

It was abundant but perfectly meatless. A few crusts swam about on its surface like the far-flung isles of an archipelago. Madam Coquenard smiled, and at her signal, everyone eagerly took his seat. Master Coquenard was served first, then Porthos, following which madam filled her own bowl, then distributed the crusts without bouillon to the impatient clerks. At that moment the door to the dining room opened itself with a creak and through the gap Porthos saw the little demi-clerk who, unable to take part in the feast, was eating his bread crusts in a spot where he could inhale the aromas of both the kitchen and dining room. After the soup the serving-maid brought in a boiled chicken, an extravagance that caused the clerks' eyes to bulge out so far that it threatened to cause permanent injury. "One can see how much you love your relations, Madam Coquenard," said the prosecutor with a smile that verged on the tragic. "This is quite a tribute to your regard for your cousin."

The poor fowl was scrawny and covered with one of those thick, bristly skins that resist all efforts to chew through them. It must have been allowed to retire to its perch, where it had sat for a long time before dying of old age. The devil! Porthos thought. This is pretty sad. I respect old age but not when it's boiled or roasted.

He looked around to see if anyone shared his opinion but on the contrary: he saw only eyes eagerly devouring in advance that sublime chicken, the object of his contempt. Madam Coquenard drew the plate toward her and adroitly detached the two big black feet that she placed on her husband's plate. Then she severed the neck that she set aside, with the head, for herself, cut off a wing for Porthos, and then returned it to the maid, who took it away otherwise intact. She disappeared before the musketeer had even had time to examine all the ways disappointment afflicted the faces of those around the table, varying according to their character and temperament. In place of the chicken, a plate of beans made its entrance – an enormous plate, on which some mutton bones might be seen, and which at first glance might be supposed to have some meat adhering to them. But the clerks didn't fall for this fraud, and lugubrious looks settled onto their resigned faces. Madam Coquenard served out this dish to the young men with the moderation of a frugal housewife. The time for honey had arrived. From a small stoneware bottle, Master Coquenard carefully poured a third of a glass for each of the young men, served himself about the same amount, and then passed the bottle to Porthos and Madam Coquenard. The young men filled the rest of their glasses with water, then, having drunk half of that, filled them again, and so on. By the end of the meal they were swallowing a drink that had once had the colour of rubies but was now a pale topaz. Porthos nibbled timidly at his chicken wing, and shuddered when he felt madam's knee under the table, come in search of his. He drank half a glass of the carefully cherished honey, recognising it as the horrible vintage of Montreuil, the terror of all sophisticated palates. Master Coquenard saw him swallowing the honey undiluted and sighed. "Would you care for any of these beans, Cousin Porthos?" said Madam Coquenard in a way that said, "I wouldn't if I were you."

"Devil take me if I do!" murmured Porthos under his breath. Aloud, he said, "Thank you, my cousin but I'm quite satisfied."

A silence fell. Porthos was feeling decidedly unsure of himself. The prosecutor repeated several times, "My compliments to you, Madam Coquenard! Your dinner has been a veritable feast. Lord, how I ate!" Master Coquenard had eaten his soup, the black feet of the chicken, and the only mutton bone with a scrap of meat on it. Porthos began to wonder if they were mocking him, and commenced to curl his moustache and furrow his brow. But Madam Coquenard's knee softly came to counsel him to patience. This silence, and the interruption in service that made no sense to Porthos, had on the contrary a terrible significance for the clerks. On a look from the prosecutor, accompanied by a smile from Madam Coquenard, they slowly rose from the table, folded their napkins even more slowly, then bowed and departed. "Go, young men, and promote digestion by working," the prosecutor said gravely.

The clerks having left, Madam Coquenard rose and took from a buffet a morsel of cheese, some quince preserves, and an almond and honey cake that she'd made herself. Master Coquenard knit his brows at this display of luxury, while Porthos frowned at its scarcity. One could hardly call this a dinner! He looked around for the dish of beans but it had vanished. Master Coquenard squirmed in his chair. "It's a feast, a veritable feast! Epulae epularum [a feast of feasts], Lucullus dines with Lucullus!"

Porthos looked at the bottle that stood near him, in hopes that with honey, some bread, and some cheese, he might yet make a dinner. But the bottle was empty, and Sir and Madam Coquenard didn't seem to notice. "Neatly done," Porthos said to himself. "I've been outmanoeuvred."

He tasted a bit of the preserves, and clotted his teeth with Madam Coquenard's sticky pastry. Now, he thought, the sacrifice is consummated. I can only hope that madam can still get me a peek into her husband's wardrobe!

Master Coquenard, after the delights of such a repast that he termed an excess, felt the need of a siesta. Porthos began to hope that his dream might be enacted there and then; but the prosecutor insisted upon being taken to his study, where he complained until he was placed near his armoire, upon the base of which, for maximum security, he rested his feet. Madam took Porthos into the next chamber, where they began to lay the foundations of their reconciliation. "You can come to dine three times a week," said Madam Coquenard.

"Thank you," said Porthos, "but I don't want to take advantage. Besides, I must think about my equipment."

"Ah, yes," groaned the prosecutor's wife. "That cursed equipment."

"Alas! Yes," said Porthos. "But there it is."

"So what does the equipment in your corps consist of, Sir Porthos?"

"Oh, any number of things," said Porthos. "The musketeers, as you know, are an elite company, and require a number of items that would be excessive in the guards or the Swiss."

"All right, then, list them for me."

"All told, it could come to..." said Porthos who would rather discuss the whole than the parts.

Madam trembled, awaiting the answer. "To how much?" she said. "Not more, I hope, than..."

She stopped. Words failed her. "No, no," said Porthos. "It couldn't be more than twenty-five hundred livres. I even think that, if I economize, I could do with no more than two thousand."

"Good God! Two thousand livres!" she cried. "But that's a fortune!"

Porthos frowned significantly. Madam Coquenard understood. "I'm asking for details," she said, "because having a lot of relatives in trade, I'm pretty sure I can get things for half what you'd pay for them yourself."

"Oh, well," said Porthos, "if that's all you meant to say."

"Yes, dear Sir Porthos! For example, you'll need a horse, won't you?"

"A horse – yes, indeed."

"Good! I can get you just what you need."

Porthos beamed. "That's fine then as to the horse. However, I must also have complete harness, tack, and caparison, objects only a musketeer can buy. But it won't come to more than three hundred livres."

"Three hundred livres," she sighed. "Put down three hundred livres then."

Porthos smiled. Of course, he had the saddle and furniture that had come from Buckingham, so he counted on pocketing those three hundred livres. He continued, "Next, I'll need a horse for my lackey and baggage. As for weapons, don't trouble yourself; I have them."

"A h-horse for your lackey?" madam stuttered. "My dear! That's cutting the figure of a grand lord!"

"Madam!" said Porthos haughtily. "Perhaps you take me for a beggar?"

"Oh, no! I just thought a pretty mule sometimes looks as good as a horse, and I thought that by providing a pretty mule for Mousqueton..."

"I'll go for the pretty mule," said Porthos. "You're quite right, I've seen some Spanish grandees whose entire entourage were on mules. But then, you understand, Madam Coquenard, it must be a mule with all the bells and whistles."

"Don't worry," said the prosecutor's wife.

"There's still my baggage," said Porthos.

"Oh, don't be concerned about that," Madam Coquenard said. "My husband has five or six valises; choose whichever you like. There's one he particularly likes to travel with that's big enough to hold the world."

"So it's empty, this valise?" Porthos asked, with pretended naïveté.

"Of course, it's empty," Madam replied with a naïveté all too genuine.

"Ah! But the valise I need is one that's well furnished, my dear." Madam Coquenard sighed anew. Molière had not yet written The Miser, so she had no idea she was acting the role of Harpagon. The rest of the equipment was negotiated in the same fashion. The result was that the prosecutor's wife was to ask her husband for eight hundred livres in coin, and she herself would provide the horse and the mule that would have the honour of carrying Porthos and Mousqueton to glory. These conditions arranged, including interest and date of repayment, Porthos took his leave of Madam Coquenard. She tried to keep him by lavishing him with tender looks but Porthos claimed the exigencies of the service, and madam had to defer to the king. The musketeer went home hungry and surly.

Mistress & Maid

Meanwhile, despite the cries of his conscience and the sage advice of Athos, d'Artagnan became hour by hour more enamoured of Milady. Daily the adventurous Gascon paid his court to her, convinced that, sooner or later, she couldn't help but respond. One evening as he arrived, in spirits as high as a man who expects a shower of gold, he once again met the soubrette under the carriage door; but this time the pretty Kitty wasn't content just to smile at him in passing, and took him gently by the hand. Excellent! D'Artagnan thought. She's some message for me from her mistress. She probably wants to tell me of a rendezvous that Milady didn't dare speak of herself.

And he regarded the pretty girl with the complacent air of a conqueror. She stammered, "I just want to say two words to you, Sir Knight..."

"Speak, my child, speak," said d'Artagnan. "I'm listening."

"Not here, it's impossible. What I have to say is too long and too private."

"Well, then, what should we do?"

"If Sir Knight would follow me," Kitty said timidly.

"Wherever you like, my pretty child."

"This way, then."

And Kitty, who still held d'Artagnan's hand, led him up a narrow, dark, and winding staircase. After they'd climbed about fifteen steps, she opened a door. "Come in, Sir Knight," she said. "We're alone here, and can talk."

"And whose room is this, my pretty child?" asked d'Artagnan.

"It's mine, Sir Knight. It communicates with my mistress's bedchamber by that door. But don't worry, she won't hear what we say. She never comes in to bed before midnight."

D'Artagnan glanced around him. The little room was charmingly neat and tasteful but, despite himself, his eyes kept returning to the door that Kitty said led to Milady's chamber. Kitty guessed what was passing in the young man's mind and sighed. "You're in love, then, with my mistress, Sir Knight?"

"More than I can say! I'm crazy for her!"

Kitty sighed again. "Alas, Sir! What a shame!"

"And why the devil is it such a shame?" d'Artagnan demanded.

"Because, Sir," replied Kitty, "my mistress doesn't love you at all."

"What?" he cried. "Did she ask you to tell me that?"

"Oh, no, Sir! I've taken it on myself to warn you, out of my ... regard for you."

"Thank you, good Kitty – but only for your intentions. What you have to say, you must agree, isn't very pleasant."

"In other words, you'd rather not believe it. Isn't that so?"

"It's always hard to believe such things, child, if only from vanity."

"Then you won't believe me?"

"I must admit that, unless you can give me some proof of what you say..."

"What do you say to this?"

And Kitty drew a little note from her breast. "For me?"

D'Artagnan eagerly snatched the letter. "No. For another."

"For another?"

"Yes."

"His name! His name!" cried d'Artagnan.

"Read the address."

"Sir Count of Wardes."

The memory of the scene at Saint-Germain leaped to the mind of the presumptuous Gascon. Quick as thought, he tore open the letter, despite Kitty's cry when she saw what he was doing. "My God, Sir Knight, what have you done?"

"Me? Nothing," d'Artagnan said. And he read:

You haven't responded to my first letter. Are you unwell or have you forgotten the lingering looks that passed between us at the ball of Madam of Guise? Opportunity beckons, Count – don't let it escape you.

D'Artagnan paled. He was wounded in his vanity but he took it for a wound to his heart. "Poor, dear Sir d'Artagnan!" said Kitty in a voice overflowing with compassion. Again she pressed the hand of the young man. "You pity me, little one!" said d'Artagnan.

"Oh, yes – with all my heart. For I know what it is to love."

"You know what it is to love?" d'Artagnan said, really looking at her for the first time.

"Alas! I do."

"Well, instead of pitying me, you'd be better off helping me take my revenge on your mistress."

"And what sort of revenge would you take?"

"I would win her heart, and replace my rival."

"I'll never help you in that, Sir Knight!" Kitty said vehemently.

"And why not?"

"For two reasons."

"And they are?"

"First, because my mistress will never love you."

"How do you know?"

"You've offended her unforgivably."

"Me? How can I have offended her? Why, ever since I've known her, I've been at her feet like a slave! Tell me, I beg you!"

"I'll never confess that except to the man ... who can read the depths of my soul!"

D'Artagnan took another, even closer look at Kitty. The young girl had a freshness and beauty that many Duchess would have given their titles for. "Kitty," he said, "tell me, my dear girl, and I'll plumb the depths of your soul whenever you like." And he gave her a kiss, at which the poor girl turned red as a cherry. "No, you don't!" Kitty cried. "You don't love me! It's my mistress you love – you said so just now!"

"And how does that keep you from telling me the second reason?"

"The second reason, Sir Knight," replied Kitty, encouraged by the kiss, and even more by the expression in the young man's eyes, "is that, in love, it's everyone for herself!"

Only then did d'Artagnan remember Kitty's languishing looks, their encounters in the antechamber, the corridor, or on the stair, the way she brushed his hand every time they met, and her deep sighs. Absorbed in his desire to please the great dame, he'd ignored the soubrette. One who hunts the eagle pays no attention to the sparrow. But now the Gascon saw at a glance everything he might gain from the love Kitty had confessed so naïvely, or so brazenly: regular reports, interception of letters addressed to the Count of Wardes, and entrance at all hours into Kitty's chamber, so conveniently adjacent to her mistress's. As may be seen, the sly deceiver was already contemplating the sacrifice of the poor girl in order to obtain Milady, by hook or by crook. "Well, my dear Kitty," he said to the young woman, "are you ready to receive a proof of this love that you doubt?"

"What love would that be?" asked the maid.

"That which I'm ready to feel for you."

"Oh? And what is this proof?"

"How would you like it if this evening I spent the time I usually spend with your mistress ... with you?"

She clapped her hands together. "Oh! I'd like that very much!"

"Well, then, my dear child," said d'Artagnan, stretching himself out on a couch, "come here so I can tell you that you're the prettiest little maid I've ever seen!"

And he told her so much, and so well, that the poor child who asked nothing more than to believe him, did just that. Nevertheless, to d'Artagnan's great astonishment, the pretty Kitty defended herself with a certain resolution. Time passes quickly when spent in such attacks and defences. The clock struck midnight, and at almost the same moment the bell was rung in Milady's chamber. "Great God!"

cried Kitty. "That's my mistress calling! Leave – leave now!" D'Artagnan rose, and took up his hat as if intending to obey – but then instead of going to the door to the stairs, he quickly opened the door to Milady's wardrobe closet and ducked into the midst of her dresses and robes. "What are you doing?" Kitty cried.

D'Artagnan, who had grabbed the key on his way in, locked the door behind him without responding. "Are you asleep?" Milady called out tartly. "Why don't you answer when I ring?"

And d'Artagnan heard the door between the two rooms jerked violently open. "I'm here, Milady, I'm here," cried Kitty, springing up to meet her mistress.

The two went back into Milady's bedchamber. The door to Kitty's room stayed open, so d'Artagnan could hear Milady's extended scolding of her servant. Finally she seemed appeased and as Kitty helped her mistress to undress, the conversation turned to d'Artagnan himself. "Well," said Milady, "I haven't seen our Gascon this evening."

"What, Madam?" said Kitty. "He hasn't come? Has he given up the game before reaching the goal?"

"Oh, no! He must have been summoned by Sir Tréville or Sir des Essarts. I know him, Kitty, and I've him – you'll see."

"What will you do with him, Madam?"

"What will I do with him? Kitty, there's something between that man and me that he knows nothing about. He nearly made me lose my credibility with His Eminence. For that, I'll have my revenge!"

"I thought Madam loved him?"

"Me, love him! I detest him. A simpleton, who held Lord Winter's life in his hands and didn't kill him. That restraint cost me three hundred thousand livres a year!"

"That's true," said Kitty. "Your son is his uncle's only heir, and until he reached his majority you would have had control of his fortune."

D'Artagnan shuddered to the marrow of his bones at hearing this sweet creature's strident voice, with an edge she was careful to conceal in conversation as she damned him for not having killed a man that he'd seen treat her with nothing but kindness. "Exactly," continued Milady. "I would have taken my revenge on him already if the cardinal hadn't directed me to humour him – I don't know why."

"Oh! But Madam certainly hasn't humoured that little woman he loved."

"The mercer's wife of the Rue des Fossoyeurs! Hasn't he already forgotten she ever existed? My faith, there's a pretty vengeance!"

A cold sweat broke from d'Artagnan's brow. This woman was a monster! He resumed listening but unfortunately the preparations for bed were over. "That'll do," said Milady. "Return to your room and tomorrow try again to get an answer to that letter I gave you."

"For Sir Wardes?" said Kitty.

"That's right, for Sir Wardes."

"He's a man who seems to me to be the complete opposite of that poor Sir d'Artagnan," said Kitty.

"Be gone, Miss," said Milady, "and keep your comments to yourself."

D'Artagnan heard the door closing, then the sound of two bolts thrown on Milady's side of the panel. On her side, as softly as she could, Kitty turned the lock with her key. D'Artagnan then pushed open the door of the wardrobe. "My God!" Kitty whispered. "What's come over you? You're so pale!"

"That abominable creature!" muttered d'Artagnan.

"Quiet! Quiet! And get out of here!" said Kitty. "There's nothing but a partition between my chamber and Milady's. Everything said in one can be heard in the other."

"That's why I'm staying," said d'Artagnan.

"What!"

Kitty flushed. "Or at least, I will leave – but not yet."

And he drew Kitty to him. Kitty had no way to resist him without making too much noise, so she yielded. It was a way of taking a little revenge on Milady – and d'Artagnan discovered why they say vengeance is the pleasure of the gods. With a little more heart, he might have been contented with this new conquest but at the moment d'Artagnan felt only ambition and pride. However, to his credit, the first use he made of his new influence over Kitty was to try to learn what had become of Madam Bonacieux. But the poor girl swore on the cross that she knew nothing about it as her mistress never let her in on half of her secrets – but she believed Madam Bonacieux wasn't dead. As to the reason why Milady had nearly lost her credibility with the cardinal, Kitty knew nothing. But here, d'Artagnan was better informed than she was: he'd seen Milady on an embargoed vessel as he was leaving England and had no doubt but that her disgrace was due to the failure of the affair of the diamond studs. What was most clear in all this was that he'd earned Milady's true hatred, her deepest and most inveterate detestation, thanks to his failure to kill her brother-in-law. D'Artagnan returned to Milady's house the next day. She was in a foul humour, provoked, d'Artagnan had no doubt, by the lack of response from Sir Wardes. Kitty came in and Milady was very short with her. The soubrette threw a glance at d'Artagnan that said, See how I suffer for you?

However, by the end of the evening the lovely lioness had softened. She listened with a smile to d'Artagnan's sweet nothings, and even gave him her hand to kiss. D'Artagnan left not knowing quite what to think – but as he was a lad who didn't easily lose his head, he decided to continue to pay court to Milady while enacting a little plan he'd conceived. He found Kitty at the gate, and as on the previous night went up to her room to get the latest news. Kitty had been accused of negligence and strongly reprimanded. Milady couldn't comprehend this silence on the part of the Count of Wardes and had ordered Kitty to wait on her at nine in the morning to take a third letter. D'Artagnan made Kitty promise to bring him the letter the next morning, and the poor girl, mad about him, promised everything her lover asked for. Things fell out as they had the night before: d'Artagnan locked himself in the wardrobe, Milady called, undressed, dismissed Kitty, and locked the door. As before, d'Artagnan didn't return home until nearly five in the morning. At eleven o'clock Kitty came to him, holding in her hand the new letter from Milady. This time the poor child didn't even try to argue with d'Artagnan, she just let him take it. She belonged to her handsome soldier body and soul. D'Artagnan opened the letter and read as follows:

This is the third time I have written to you to tell you I love you. Take care that I don't write a fourth time to tell you I detest you. If you repent of the way you've acted toward me, the young girl who brings you this letter will tell you in what way a gallant man may obtain his pardon.

D'Artagnan flushed and blanched several times while reading this letter. "Oh! You do still love her!" said Kitty who hadn't taken her eyes off the young man's face for an instant.

"No, Kitty, you're wrong – I don't love her. But I will have my revenge for her contempt."

"Yes, I know about your revenge – you told me that!"

"How can it matter to you, Kitty? You know very well it's only you I love."

"How can I know that?"

"By the contempt I will show her." Kitty sighed. D'Artagnan took up a pen and wrote:

Madam, until this note, I doubted it was really to me that your first 2 letters were addressed, so unworthy am I of such an honour. Besides, I was so ill that I'd in no case have responded. But today I've no choice but to believe in this excess of your kindness, since not only your letter but also your servant affirm that I've the great good fortune to be loved by you. She needn't tell me in what way a gallant man may obtain your pardon. I'll come to beg mine tonight at eleven o'clock. In my eyes, to delay it a single day more would be to commit a new offence. He whom you've made the happiest of men,

Count of WARDES

This letter was in the first place a forgery, and in addition to that an indelicacy; it was even, from the viewpoint of the current day, very nearly disgraceful. But at that period people were less scrupulous of such things than they are today. Besides, d'Artagnan, from her own admission, knew Milady was guilty of much greater crimes, and thus held little respect for her. And yet, notwithstanding this lack of respect, he burned with urgent passion for this woman. Passion mixed with contempt but passion nonetheless – or lust if you like. D'Artagnan's plan was quite simple: through Kitty's room he would enter her mistress's and take advantage of that first moment of surprise, shame, and terror to conquer her. It might not work but he couldn't remove every element of risk. In eight days the military campaign was due to commence and he would have to depart – d'Artagnan had no time to weave a web of love. "There," said the young man, handing Kitty the sealed letter. "Give this letter to Milady; it's the reply from Sir Wardes." Poor Kitty went as pale as death, for she suspected what the letter contained. "Listen, my dear child," said d'Artagnan. "You know all this must end one way or another. Milady may find out that you gave that first letter to my lackey instead of to the count's valet, and that it was not Sir Wardes who opened the others but me. Then Milady will throw you out – and you know she's not the kind of woman to let her vengeance stop there."

"Alas!" said Kitty. "For whom have I exposed myself to all this?"

"For me as I well know, sweetheart," said the young man, "but I'm extremely grateful to you, I swear it."

"But then, what does this letter say?"

"Milady will tell you."

"Oh! You don't love me at all!" cried Kitty. "I'm so miserable!" To this reproach there's a sure reply that never fails to enable women to continue deceiving themselves. D'Artagnan's response swept away all her misgivings, well-founded though they were. Nonetheless, she cried a great deal before agreeing to deliver the letter to Milady – but in the end she decided to do so, as with everything d'Artagnan asked for. Besides, he promised her he would leave her mistress's room at an early hour and then go to hers. This promise finally succeeded in consoling poor Kitty.

Concerning the Equipment of Aramis & Porthos

Since the four friends had been on the quest for their equipment, they'd had no regular get-togethers. They dined separately, wherever they found themselves – or rather, wherever they could. Duty, also, took its part of their precious time that was running out all too quickly. However, they had agreed to meet once a week, at about one in the afternoon, at Athos's place, since according to the oath he'd sworn he refused to pass beyond the threshold of his front door. Their meeting was to take place on the same day that Kitty had come to find d'Artagnan at his lodgings. As soon as Kitty had left him, d'Artagnan took himself toward the Rue Férou. He found Athos and Aramis philosophizing. Aramis had some slight inclination to resume the cassock. Athos neither dissuaded nor encouraged him as usual. Athos believed everyone should exercise his own free will. He never gave advice unless asked, and even then he had to be asked twice. "In general, people don't ask for advice because they want to follow it," he said, "or if they do follow it, it's so they'll have someone to blame for having advised them that way."

Porthos arrived a moment after d'Artagnan, and the friends were reunited. Their four faces expressed four different sentiments: that of Porthos, tranquillity; d'Artagnan, hope; Aramis, anxiety; and Athos, nonchalance. After a moment's conversation, in which Porthos dropped hints that a high-ranking lady had agreed to alleviate his financial embarrassment, Mousqueton entered. He came to beg Porthos to return home immediately, where, he said with a pathetic manner, his presence was urgently required. "Is it my equipment?" asked Porthos.

"Yes ... and no," replied Mousqueton.

"But can't you tell me...?"

"Just come home, Sir!"

Porthos rose, bowed to his friends, and followed Mousqueton. A moment later, Bazin appeared in the doorway. "What can I do for you, my friend?" said Aramis in that soft-spoken manner that he displayed every time he was considering rejoining the Church.

"A man is waiting to see Sir at the house," replied Bazin.

"A man! What man?"

"A beggar."

"Give him alms, Bazin, and ask him to pray for a poor sinner."

"This beggar insists on speaking with you, and claims you'll be quite glad to see him."

"Did he say anything specific that you were to tell me?"

"Yes. He said, 'If Sir Aramis hesitates to come, please announce that I've just arrived from Tours.'"

"From Tours?" cried Aramis. "Gentlemen, a thousand pardons but doubtless this man brings me the news I've been waiting for." And, rising, he hurried off.

This left only Athos and d'Artagnan. "I think those fellows have their business well in hand," said Athos. "What do you think, d'Artagnan?"

"I knew that Porthos was doing all right," said d'Artagnan. "As for Aramis, to tell you the truth, I've never been particularly worried. But you, my dear Athos, who so generously shared out the Englishman's pistoles that were legitimately yours – what are you going to do?"

"I'm satisfied with having killed that buffoon, my lad, since it's always a blessing to kill an Englishman. But if I'd pocketed his pistoles they would have weighed on me like guilt."

"Go on, Athos! Your ideas really are unbelievable!"

"Enough, leave it at that. What's this Sir Tréville told me when he did me the honour to visit me yesterday that you're consorting with these suspicious English, who are under the cardinal's protection?"

"To be accurate, I've been visiting an Englishwoman, the one I told you about."
"Ah, yes – the blond woman, on the subject of which I gave you advice that naturally you were careful not to follow."
"I gave you my reasons."

"Yes, I believe you said you were looking to complete your equipment."
"Not at all! I now know for certain that that woman had something to do with Madam Bonacieux's abduction."

"Ah, yes, I understand: to recover one woman, you pay court to another. It's the longest road but certainly the most entertaining."
D'Artagnan was on the point of telling everything to Athos but one thing stopped him: Athos was a gentleman very strict in matters of honour, and in some of d'Artagnan's plans regarding Milady he was sure there were things that wouldn't meet with Athos's approval. We now take our leave of the two friends, who had nothing more of importance to say to each other, and follow Aramis. At the news that the man who wanted to speak with him came from Tours, we've seen how quickly the young man followed, or rather preceded, Bazin. He rushed without pause from the Rue Férou to the Rue de Vaugirard. On entering his house, he discovered a man awaiting him, short, with intelligent eyes but dressed in rags. "You asked for me?" said the musketeer.

"I have asked to speak with Sir Aramis. Is this your name, then?"
"I am he. Have you brought something for me?"

"Yes, if you can show me a certain embroidered handkerchief."
"It's here," said Aramis, drawing a key from around his neck and opening a little ebony coffer inlaid with mother-of-pearl. "Here it is. Look."
"That's it," said the beggar. "Dismiss your lackey." In fact, Bazin, curious to know what a beggar could want with his master, had nearly kept pace with him and had arrived at almost the same moment. But all his hurry was wasted; at the beggar's suggestion his master made a sign for him to retire, and he had no choice but to obey. Bazin having left, the beggar took a quick look around to be sure no one could see or hear them. Then he undid the leather belt that barely held together his ragged vest, ripped open a seam in the lapel of his doublet, and drew forth a letter. Aramis let out a cry of joy at the sight of the seal and kissed the handwriting of the address. Then, with an almost religious respect, he opened it. It contained the following:

*My friend,
It's the will of fate that we be separated for some time yet – but the glorious days of youth aren't lost beyond return. Do your duty in camp; I'll do mine elsewhere. Accept that which the bearer brings you, go on campaign like a handsome, true gentleman – and think of me who gently kisses your dark eyes. Goodbye – or rather, see you shortly!*
The beggar unstitched his doublet further, and drew one by one from his ragged clothing a hundred and fifty Spanish double pistoles that he stacked on the table. Then he opened the door, bowed, and departed before the young man, stupefied, had dared to speak a single word to him. Aramis then read the letter again and noticed it had a postscript:
P.S. You may receive the bearer with honour as he's a Count and Grandee of Spain.

"Golden dreams!" cried Aramis. "Ah! Life is beautiful! Yes, we are still young! Yes, we still have happy days ahead of us! To thee, my love – my blood – my life! All, all, all for my darling mistress!"
And he kissed the letter passionately, without even glancing at the gold glinting on the table. Bazin scratched at the door. Aramis no longer had any reason to keep him out, so he allowed him to enter. Bazin, amazed by the sight of the gold, forgot that he'd come to announce d'Artagnan. Curious to know whom the beggar was, he'd come to Aramis's house after leaving Athos. D'Artagnan was quite informal with Aramis, so seeing that Bazin had forgotten to announce him, he announced himself. "What the devil!" he said. "My dear Aramis, if these are the plums sent to you from Tours, give my compliments to the gardener who harvests them."

"You're mistaken, my dear," said Aramis, ever wary. "This is from my publisher, who has sent me the price of that poem in single-syllable verse that I began on our journey."
"Really!" said d'Artagnan. "Well, all I can say is your publisher is quite generous, my dear Aramis."
"How, Sir!" cried Bazin. "A poem sold for as much as that! It's incredible! Oh, Sir – write as much as you want! You may become the equal of Sir Voiture and Sir Benserade. I'd like that. A poet is as good as an abbot. Please, Sir Aramis, become a poet – I beg of you."

"Bazin, my friend," said Aramis, "I believe you are intruding on my conversation."
Bazin saw he was in the wrong; he bowed and departed. "You sell your script for its weight in gold," said d'Artagnan with a smile. "You're very lucky, my friend – but watch out, or you're going to lose that letter sticking out of your doublet that no doubt also comes from your publisher."

Aramis, blushing to the eyes, thrust the letter back into his doublet and buttoned it up to his neck. "My dear d'Artagnan," he said, "let's go, if you please and find our friends. Since I'm well off, we may resume dining together again, until it's once more your turn to be rich."
"My faith!" said d'Artagnan, with great pleasure. "It's been too long since we've had dinner together. And as I have a rather hazardous expedition to make tonight, I confess I won't be sorry to brace myself with some bottles of old burgundy."

"I wouldn't say no to some old burgundy," said Aramis whose ideas of retreat from the world had been completely effaced by the sight of the gold.
Pocketing three or four double pistoles to answer the needs of the moment, he put the others into that ebony coffer inlaid with mother-of-pearl, next to the famous handkerchief that served as his talisman. The two friends went to visit Athos who, faithful to his oath not to leave his lodgings, sent out to order dinner brought in. As he was a connoisseur on the subject of gastronomy, d'Artagnan and Aramis had no hesitation about leaving these important details to him. They took themselves off to find Porthos – but at the corner of the Rue du Bac they encountered Mousqueton, who with an air of self-pity was driving before him a horse and a mule. D'Artagnan uttered a cry of surprise, not unmixed with joy. "My yellow horse!" he cried. "Aramis, look at that horse!"

"How appallingly bilious!" said Aramis.
"Really? Well, my friend," replied d'Artagnan, "it was on that very horse that I came to Paris."
"What? Sir knows this horse?" said Mousqueton.
"Its colour is certainly distinctive," said Aramis. "I've never seen a hide quite like it."
"I can believe that," said d'Artagnan. "That's how I got three crowns for him. It must have been for his hide, for his carcass certainly is worth no eighteen livres. But how did this horse find its way into your hands, Mousqueton?"
"Let's not talk about that, Sir," said the valet. "It's a dirty trick played on us by the husband of our duchess."
"How's that, Mousqueton?"

"As you know, we're looked on with favour by a lady of quality, the Duchess of ... but no! Begging your pardon, my master's ordered me to be discreet. She pressed upon us as a little keepsake, a magnificent Spanish jennet, plus an Andalusian mule that looked simply gorgeous. The husband heard about it, confiscated the fine animals she was sending to us, and substituted these horrid beasts."
"Which you're returning to him?" said d'Artagnan.

"Exactly!" replied Mousqueton. "You don't imagine we could accept mounts like these in exchange for those promised to us."
"Not at all – though I would have liked to see Porthos on my Buttercup, by God! That would give me some idea of how I looked myself when I arrived in Paris. But don't let us keep you, Mousqueton – go and complete your master's mission. Is he at home?"
"Yes, Sir but he's in a rotten humour," Mousqueton said. "Get along, you!"

And he continued on his way toward the Quai des Grands-Augustins while the two friends went to ring the bell at the door of the unlucky Porthos. He, having spotted them crossing the forecourt, was careful not to answer, and they rang the bell in vain. Meanwhile, Mousqueton continued on his way. Crossing the Pont Neuf, driving the two nags ahead of him, he reached the Rue aux Ours. Arriving there, according to his master's orders, he hitched the horse and the mule to the prosecutor's doorknocker. Then, without bothering himself as to their fate, he returned to Porthos and announced his mission accomplished. After a while the two unfortunate beasts, who hadn't eaten anything since the morning, kicked up such a fuss with the doorknocker that the prosecutor ordered his demi-clerk to go ask around the neighbourhood to find out who the nags belonged to. Meanwhile, Madam Coquenard had recognised her gifts but couldn't understand their sudden restitution. However, a visit from Porthos soon cleared this up. The wrath that smouldered in the musketeer's eyes, in spite of his efforts to suppress it, terrified his sensitive inamorata. Mousqueton had mentioned running into d'Artagnan and Aramis, and that d'Artagnan had recognised the yellow horse as the Béarnaise pony on which he'd come to Paris. Porthos departed after setting a rendezvous with madam in the Cloister of Saint-Magloire. Seeing that he was on his way out, the prosecutor invited him to dinner, an invitation the musketeer refused with a majestic air. Madam Coquenard went trembling to the Cloister of Saint-Magloire, for she guessed what reproaches awaited her there – but she couldn't resist Porthos and his haughty and noble airs. All the imprecations and reproaches that a man wounded in his pride could inflict on a woman Porthos hurled upon the bowed head of the prosecutor's wife. "Alas!" she said. "I was just trying to do what was best for everyone. One of our clients is a horse-trader and owed us money in arrears. I took the mule and the horse in place of what he owed – he promised me two noble steeds."

"Well, Madam," said Porthos, "if he owed you more than five crowns, your horse-trader is a thief."
"There's nothing wrong with trying to get a bargain, Sir Porthos," Madam said, looking for an excuse.
"No, Madam – but those whose first interest is a bargain should permit others to find more generous friends."

And Porthos, turning on his heel, made as if to go. "Sir Porthos! Sir Porthos!" cried the prosecutor's wife. "I've been wrong, I know that – I shouldn't have tried to bargain when it comes to equipping a cavalier like you!"

Porthos, without a word, continued to walk away. To the lady, it seemed as if he was leaving for a golden realm where Duchess and marquises threw bags of money at his feet. "Sir Porthos, stop, in the name of heaven!" she cried. "Stop, and let's talk."
"Talking with you just brings me bad luck," said Porthos.
"But tell me, what do you ask of me?"

"I ask for nothing, because it brings the same result as asking for something."
She hung on his arm and cried out, in her grief, "Sir Porthos, I know nothing of such things! What do I know of horses or harnesses?"
"You should have left it to me, Madam, who does know. But you prefer bargaining and usury."
"I was wrong, Sir Porthos but I'll make good, on my word of honour."

"And how will you do that?" asked the musketeer.
"Listen. Tonight Sir Coquenard is going to visit Sir Duke of Chaulnes, who has sent for him. Their meeting will last at least three hours. Come to me: we'll be alone, and can settle our accounts."
"Now, my dear, that sounds more like it!"
"You'll forgive me?"
"We shall see," Porthos said majestically.
And they parted, saying, "Till this evening."
The devil! Porthos thought as he walked away. I may see the inside of Master Coquenard's cabinet after all.

All Cats are Grey at Night

The evening, awaited so impatiently by both Porthos and d'Artagnan, finally arrived. As was his custom, d'Artagnan presented himself at Milady's at about nine o'clock. He found her in a charming mood. Never before had she received him so warmly. The Gascon knew at first glance that his letter had been delivered and its message had taken effect. Kitty came in with some sorbets. Her mistress, with a face that would charm a statue, smiled on her graciously. Alas! The poor girl was so distressed, she never noticed Milady's benevolence. D'Artagnan looked from one to the other of these women, and had to confess that Nature had erred in their creation. The great dame had received a soul venal and vile, while the soubrette had been given the heart of a duchess. At ten o'clock Milady began to appear uneasy. D'Artagnan knew what she wanted to say. She looked at the clock, rose, sat down again, and smiled at d'Artagnan as if to say, "You're a pleasant enough fellow but you'd be far more charming if you left!"
D'Artagnan rose and took his hat. Milady gave him her hand to kiss. The young man felt her press his hand but knew she was not flirting, she was just grateful for his departure. "She loves him like the devil loves sin," he said to himself. Then he departed. This time Kitty wasn't waiting for him, neither in the antechamber, in the corridor, nor at the gate. D'Artagnan had to find the little staircase to her room by himself. Kitty lay with her head in her hands, crying. She heard d'Artagnan enter but didn't raise her head. The young man sat next to her and took her hands but she just sobbed. As d'Artagnan had predicted, Milady had been delirious with joy on receiving the letter and had told her servant everything. To reward Kitty for accomplishing her mission, Milady had given her a purse heavy with coin. Kitty, upon returning to her room, had thrown this purse into a corner. There it lay, three or four coins spilling out onto the carpet. Hearing d'Artagnan's voice, the poor girl raised her head. D'Artagnan was startled by her expression that was agony made visible. She clasped her hands together like a suppliant but couldn't utter a single word. D'Artagnan was insensitive, as youth must be but even his heart was touched by this silent grief. However, he was too attached to his plan to change it now. And he gave Kitty no such hope, merely described his intended actions as solely driven by vengeance. Accomplishing this vengeance was made easy for him, for Milady, doubtless to pretend to conceal her blushes from her lover, had ordered Kitty to put out all the lights in her chambers, even her bedchamber. Well before dawn, Sir Wardes must leave, unseen. Soon they heard Milady retire to her bedchamber. D'Artagnan immediately slipped into the wardrobe. He was barely inside it when Milady's little bell sounded. Kitty answered her mistress's summons but shut the door behind her. Nonetheless, the partition was so thin that d'Artagnan could hear everything the two women said. Milady seemed giddy with glee, and made Kitty repeat the tiniest details of her imaginary interview with of Wardes. How had he received the letter? How had he responded? What was the expression on his face? Did he seem at all love-struck?

Kitty, forced to wear a smiling face, replied to all these questions in a choked voice that her mistress never noticed. Happiness is always egotistical. Then, as the hour for the advent of the count approached, Milady had all the lights dimmed or extinguished. She ordered Kitty to return to her room but to be prepared to introduce of Wardes when he arrived. Kitty didn't have long to wait. D'Artagnan had been watching through a crack in the wardrobe. He'd scarcely seen the lights extinguished before he was slipping out of his hiding place, just as Kitty closed the door between her room and Milady's. "What is that noise?" demanded Milady.

"It is I," said d'Artagnan, half-whispering, "I, the Count of Wardes."

"My God, my God," murmured Kitty, "he can't even wait until the time he appointed!"

"Well, then," said Milady, her voice trembling, "why don't you come in? Count, Count – you know I await you!"

At this call, d'Artagnan softly left Kitty behind and entered Milady's bedchamber. What emotion, even rage or sorrow, can match the exquisite torture produced when a lover, under an assumed name, hears declarations of love addressed to his lucky rival?

This was a heartrending circumstance that d'Artagnan hadn't foreseen. Jealousy gnawed at his heart, and he suffered almost as much as poor Kitty, who wept quietly in the adjoining chamber. "Yes, Count," said Milady in her sweetest voice, tenderly caressing d'Artagnan's hand, "yes, I rejoiced in the love you showed me through your looks and words whenever we met. And I love you in return. Oh, tomorrow, tomorrow I must have some keepsake from you that proves that you think of me and won't forget me. Take this!" And she pulled a ring from her finger and pushed it onto one of d'Artagnan's. He remembered having seen this ring on Milady's hand: it was a magnificent sapphire encircled with diamond brilliants. D'Artagnan's first impulse was to return it but Milady breathed, "No, no. Care for that ring as you care for me. Besides," she said, her voice shaking with emotion, "in accepting it, you do me a much greater favour than you could ever imagine."

"This woman is made of mysteries," d'Artagnan said to himself.

He was nerving himself up to reveal everything, tell Milady who he really was, and for what vengeance he'd come when she murmured, "You poor angel, nearly killed by that monster of a Gascon!"

He was that monster. "Your wounds," she said, "do they still make you suffer?"

"Yes ... a lot," whispered d'Artagnan who didn't know quite what to say.

"Rest easy," murmured Milady. "I will avenge you – and most cruelly!"

Plague! D'Artagnan thought. I'd better delay revealing any secrets.

It was some time before d'Artagnan resumed their little dialogue, as they were otherwise occupied – and by then, all the ideas of vengeance he'd brought with him had completely vanished. This woman held an incredible power over him: he hated her, and at the same time he adored her. He would never have believed that two such opposite feelings could live in the same heart, and together form a love so strange as to be almost diabolical. The bells tolled one o'clock; it was time to part. As he left Milady, d'Artagnan felt only regret at parting from her. They exchanged passionate goodbyes and agreed on another rendezvous for the following week. Poor Kitty had hoped to have a few words with d'Artagnan as he passed through her chamber but Milady herself escorted him out through the darkness, leaving him only at the staircase that led to the door. The next morning, d'Artagnan hurried to Athos's house. He was engaged in such a bizarre adventure that he had to have advice. He told Athos everything. Athos frowned more than once in the telling. "Your 'Milady' seems to me an infamous creature but nonetheless it was a mistake to deceive her so. One way or another, you'll see that you've made a terrible enemy."

As he said this, Athos first noticed, then focused all his attention on the sapphire ring set with diamonds that d'Artagnan wore on his finger. It had taken the place of the queen's ring, now secreted away in its own small box. "You're looking at this ring?" the Gascon said, proud to display such a glorious present to his friend.

"Yes," said Athos. "It reminds me of a family jewel."

"It's beautiful, isn't it?" said d'Artagnan.

"Magnificent," replied Athos. "I didn't think two sapphires of such fine water existed. Did you trade your diamond ring for this?"

"No," said d'Artagnan, "it's a gift from my lovely Englishwoman – or rather, my lovely Frenchwoman. I haven't asked her about it but I'm convinced she was born in France."

"This ring comes from Milady?" cried Athos in a voice that couldn't hide his shock.

"Milady herself. She gave it to me last night."

"Let me see that ring," said Athos.

"Here it is," d'Artagnan said and took it from his finger.

Athos examined it, and became very pale. He tried it on the ring finger of his left hand: it slipped on as if made for it. An angry cloud darkened his usually calm brow. "It's impossible for it to be the same," he said. "How could this ring find its way into the hands of Milady Winter? And yet it's hard to imagine that two such gems should be so similar."

"You know this ring?" asked d'Artagnan.

"I thought I knew it," said Athos, "but doubtless I was mistaken."

He returned it to d'Artagnan but continued to look at it. "D'Artagnan," Athos said, after a minute or two, "either take that ring off your finger or turn the stone inside. It brings back such cruel memories that I don't think I could continue to talk with you. Don't ask me for advice, by God; don't tell me you're over your head and don't know what you should do!" He paused. "Wait. Give me the sapphire again. The one I once knew had one of its faces marred in an accident."

D'Artagnan took the ring from his finger and gave it once more to Athos. The musketeer started. "Here," he said. "Look. Now, isn't that strange?"

And he showed d'Artagnan the scratch he'd remembered. "But who did this sapphire come from, Athos?"

"From my mother who'd it from her mother. As I said, it's an old jewel – one that should never have left the family."

D'Artagnan hesitated. "And you ... sold it?" he asked.

"No," replied Athos with a strange smile. "I gave it away during a night of love – just as it was given to you."

It was d'Artagnan's turn to be thoughtful. He seemed to see abysses in Milady's soul whose depths were dark and unknown. He took back the ring but put it in his pocket rather than on his finger.

"Listen," Athos said to him, taking his hand. "You know I love you, d'Artagnan. If I had a son I couldn't love him more than you. Hear me: give up this woman. I don't know who she is," he said, "but a kind of intuition tells me she is a lost creature, and that there's something fatal about her."

"You're right about that," said d'Artagnan. "You're right. I'll drop her. I must confess, that woman terrifies me."

"Do you have the courage to do it?" Athos said.

"I do," replied d'Artagnan. "It's done as of now."

"It's the right thing to do, my son," said the gentleman, pressing the Gascon's hand with an almost paternal affection. "May God grant that this woman who's barely touched your life, leaves it without scarring you as she goes." Athos bowed his head, and the young man understood that he wished to be left alone with his thoughts. On returning home, d'Artagnan found Kitty waiting for him. A month of fever couldn't have changed the poor child more than one night of sleepless grief had. She had been sent by her mistress to the false of Wardes. Her mistress was mad with love, intoxicated with joy. She wanted to know when her lover would grant her a second tryst – and now poor Kitty, pale and trembling, awaited d'Artagnan's reply. Athos had a great influence over the young man; the advice of his friend echoed the voice of his own heart, and he decided, now that his pride was salved and his vengeance satisfied, not to see Milady again. For his response, he took up a quill and wrote the following letter:

Don't count upon me, Madam, for another rendezvous. Since my convalescence I've so many affairs of this sort to attend to that I must impose a certain order upon them. When your turn comes again, I'll have the honour to inform you of it. I kiss your hands,
Count of WARDES

Not a word about the sapphire. Did the Gascon plan to keep it as a weapon against Milady? Or, to be frank, was he retaining the sapphire as a last resource for his equipment?

It would be a mistake to judge behaviour in one period from the point of view of another. An act that a gentleman of today would consider disgraceful was at that time viewed as simple and natural, during a period when the young sons of the best families were frequently supported by their mistresses. D'Artagnan passed this letter, open, to Kitty. At first she could hardly comprehend it but after reading it a second time she went wild with joy. Kitty could scarcely believe such happiness, and d'Artagnan had to reread it to her aloud, in his own voice, before she could accept it was true. Then, despite the danger the poor girl incurred in delivering such a letter to the hot-blooded Milady, she ran back to the Place Royale as fast as her legs could go. The heart of even the best of women knows no pity toward a rival. Milady was as eager to open the letter as Kitty had been to bring it – but the first words she read made her livid with rage. Crushing the paper in her hand, she turned to Kitty with fiery eyes and demanded, "What is this letter?"

"It's just the reply to Madam's note," replied Kitty, trembling.

"Impossible!" cried Milady. "It's impossible for a gentleman to have written such a letter to a woman!" Then starting, she said, "My God! Could he have seen...?" She stopped. She ground her teeth and turned the colour of ashes. She tried to get to the window for air but as she stretched out her arms, her legs failed her and she sank onto a divan. Kitty, who thought she was stricken ill, began to open the bodice of her dress. Milady sat up suddenly, saying, "What are you up to? Why are you laying your hands on me?"

"I ... thought Madam was ill and wanted to help her," her servant said, alarmed by the terrible expression on her mistress's face.

"Me, fall ill? Me? Do you take me for some little housewife? When I'm insulted, I'm not weak or ill – I'm avenged! Do you hear me?" And with a gesture, she dismissed Kitty from the room.

036 Dreams of Vengeance

That evening Milady left orders that when d'Artagnan came at his usual time, he should be admitted immediately. But he did not come. The next day Kitty went to see the young man once more, and told him what had happened the previous evening. D'Artagnan smiled; Milady's jealous rage was his revenge. That evening Milady was even more impatient than the night before, and renewed her order for immediate admission of the Gascon – but as on the night before, she waited in vain. The next day, when Kitty presented herself at d'Artagnan's lodgings, she was no longer lively and joyous as she'd been on the two previous days – she was as sad as death. D'Artagnan asked the poor girl what had happened to her. Her only reply was to draw a letter from her pocket and hand it to him. This letter was in Milady's hand, only this time it was addressed to d'Artagnan rather than to Sir Wardes. He opened it, and read the following:

Dear Sir d'Artagnan,

It's wrong to neglect your friends this way, especially just when you are about to leave them for so long. My brother-in-law and I expected you yesterday and the day before but in vain. Will it be the same this evening?

Your most grateful,

LADY CLARICE

"No surprises here," said d'Artagnan. "I expected such a letter. My credit rises with the fall of that of the Count of Wardes."

"Will you allow yourself to be summoned this way?" asked Kitty.

"Listen, my dear child," said the Gascon, groping for a way to excuse himself for breaking the promise he'd made to Athos, "you realise it would be shockingly bad manners to refuse such a direct invitation. If I quit visiting Milady without explanation she's liable to suspect something, and who could say how far the vengeance of such a woman might go?"

"God above!" said Kitty. "You always know how to make things sound like you're in the right. Now you're going to pay court to her again – and this time, if you manage to please her in your own name and with your own face, everything will be even worse than before!"

The poor girl intuitively guessed what was going to happen. D'Artagnan reassured her as best he could, and promised to remain unmoved by Milady's seductions. He told Kitty to reply to Milady that he couldn't be more grateful for her kindness to him, and he would comply with her orders. He didn't dare write to her for fear that Milady's sharp eyes would recognise his handwriting. D'Artagnan was in the Place Royale at the stroke of nine. It was clear that the servants who waited in the antechamber had been told what to do when d'Artagnan appeared; before he'd even asked if Milady was receiving, one of them ran to announce him. "Show him in," Milady said sharply in such a piercing tone that d'Artagnan could hear her in the antechamber.

As he was introduced into her chambers Milady said to her lackey, "I am at home to no one. Do you hear me? To no one."

The servant bowed and left them. D'Artagnan cast a curious glance at Milady. She was pale and her eyes looked tired, from either crying or insomnia. The lights in the room were dimmer than usual, intentionally so but the young woman couldn't conceal the traces of the fever that had devoured her for the past two days. D'Artagnan approached her with his usual gallantry. She made a supreme effort to receive him warmly but never was such a charming smile belied by such underlying distress. D'Artagnan asked her how she was feeling. "Ill," she replied, "very ill."

"But then, my visit is an indiscretion," said d'Artagnan. "I fear you need rest. I should retire."

"Not at all," said Milady. "On the contrary! Please remain, Sir d'Artagnan, and honour me with your pleasant company."

Uh-oh, thought d'Artagnan. She's never been half this charming before. I'd better watch myself. Milady was all warmth, affection, and her conversation was brilliant. Meanwhile, the fever that had briefly abandoned her, returned full force, lending lustre to her eyes, colour to her cheeks, and coral to her lips. D'Artagnan found himself once again in the toils of the Circe who had formerly enwrapped him in her enchantments. His love that he'd thought extinct but which was only asleep, reawakened in his heart. Milady smiled upon him, and d'Artagnan felt he would willingly damn himself for that smile. There was even a moment when he felt something like remorse for what he'd done to her. Gradually, Milady's conversation became more personal. She asked d'Artagnan if he had a mistress. "Alas!" D'Artagnan put as much feeling into the word as he could. "How can you be so cruel as to ask me such a question – of me who, from the moment I first saw you, have breathed and sighed only for you!"

Milady smiled a strange smile. "Then, you love me?" she said.

"Do I have to tell you? Can you have missed it?"

"Maybe I have. But you know, the prouder the heart, the harder it is to capture."

"Oh! I'm not afraid of mere difficulties," said d'Artagnan. "I fear only impossibilities."

"Nothing is impossible," said Milady, "when love is true."

"Nothing, Madam?"

"Nothing," Milady replied.

The devil! d'Artagnan thought. This is a new tune. Is there a chance she's falling in love with me? She's so impulsive! Is she going to give me another sapphire like the one she gave me for of Wardes?

He eagerly drew his chair closer to Milady's. "Let's just see," she said, "exactly what you'd do to prove this love you speak of."

"Anything you want of me! Just tell me – I'm ready."

"Anything?"

"Anything!" cried d'Artagnan, who knew in advance that he didn't risk much by such a promise.

"Well, then – let's have a little talk."

Milady drew her own chair nearer to d'Artagnan's, "I'm listening."

Milady seemed anxious and uncertain for a moment but then appeared to come to a decision. "I have an enemy," she said.

"You, Madam?" D'Artagnan pretended surprise. "My God! Is that possible, to someone as lovely and good as you are?"

"A mortal enemy."

"Really?"

"An enemy who has insulted me so cruelly that between us it is war to the death. Can I count on your help?"

D'Artagnan saw right away where the vindictive creature was going. "You can, Madam!" he said emphatically. "Like my love, my arm and life are yours!"

"Then," said Milady, "Since you're as generous as you are loving..."

She paused. "Since I am..."? prompted d'Artagnan.

"Since you are," Milady replied, after a moment of silence, "then you need no longer talk of ... impossibilities."

"Oh, Milady!" d'Artagnan cried. "My heart overflows with happiness!"

He fell to his knees, and she allowed him to cover her hands with kisses. Avenge me on that cow of Wardes, Milady thought, and I'll have no trouble disposing of you, you fool. You're nothing but a living sword.

Fall willingly into my arms, d'Artagnan thought, after the way you've abused me, you two-faced femme fatale, and later I'll laugh at you with the man you want me to kill. D'Artagnan raised his head. "I am ready," he said.

"You have understood me then, dear Sir d'Artagnan?"

"I would understand your slightest glance!"

"Then you would use your strong arm for me, that arm that is already so renowned?"

"Instantly!"

"But I," said Milady, "how could I repay such a service? I know what lovers are like – a man will take everything and give nothing in return."

"You know the only reply I desire," said d'Artagnan, "the only one worthy of you and me!"

He drew her softly closer to him. She resisted hardly at all. "Demanding man," she said, smiling.

"Ah!" cried d'Artagnan, truly carried away by the passion this woman had fired in him. "It's because this happiness is so hard to believe! I'm afraid it will vanish like a dream, so I rush to make it a reality."

"Then do what you must to deserve such happiness."

"I am at your orders," said d'Artagnan.

"Are you really?" said Milady with a final doubt.

"Just tell me the name of the dog who has brought tears to your lovely eyes!"

"Who told you I'd been crying?" she said.

"It seemed to me..."

"Women like me don't cry," Milady said.

"All the better! Come now, tell me his name."

"You realise I'm revealing a secret."

"Even so, you must tell me his name."

"I know I must. Look at the confidence I have in you!"

"You drown me in joy. What is his name?"

"You know him."

"I do?"

"Yes."

D'Artagnan pretended to hesitate. "Surely it's not one of my friends?"

"So if it were one of your friends, you'd hold back?" Milady said with a menacing look.

"No, not even if it were my brother!" d'Artagnan cried, seemingly carried away with enthusiasm.

The Gascon had nothing to lose as he knew whom she meant. "I love your devotion," Milady said.

"Is that the only thing you love about me?" asked d'Artagnan.

"I love you, too," she whispered, taking his hand.

And the warm pressure of her fingers made d'Artagnan tremble as if through her touch the fever that consumed Milady caught fire in him. "You, in love with me! You!" he cried. "Oh! If that were true, I'd lose my mind!"

And he took her into his arms. She didn't try to avoid his kisses but didn't respond to them. Her lips were cold. D'Artagnan felt as if he were embracing a statue. He was nonetheless drunk with joy, electrified with love. He almost believed that Milady had a heart; he almost believed in the crime of Wardes. If of Wardes had come under his hand at that instant, he'd have killed him. Milady seized the moment. She hissed, "His name is..."

"De Wardes! I know it!" cried d'Artagnan.

"How do you know that?" demanded Milady.

She gripped his hands and gazed at him searchingly, trying to read to the depths of his soul. D'Artagnan realised he'd let himself get carried away and had made a serious mistake. "Speak! Speak! Speak, I demand it!" repeated Milady. "How do you know it?"

"How do I know it?" said d'Artagnan.

"Yes!"

"I know it, because ... yesterday, I was in a salon where of Wardes showed around a ring he said he had from you."

"The miserable wretch!" cried Milady. This insult struck d'Artagnan to the bottom of his heart as may well be imagined. "Well?" she continued.

"Well! I shall see that you are revenged on this 'miserable wretch'," replied d'Artagnan, donning the bombastic airs of a knight of the stage.

"Thank you, my brave friend!" cried Milady. "And when will this vengeance take place?"

"Whenever you please: tomorrow or this very moment."

Milady almost burst out, "This very moment!" –

But it occurred to her that d'Artagnan might find this less than gracious. Besides, she had a thousand precautions to take, a thousand warnings to give to her defender, to make sure he said nothing to the count in the presence of witnesses that might implicate her. But all these thoughts were pre-empted by d'Artagnan's next words: "Tomorrow," said he, "you will be avenged, or I will be dead."

"No!" she said. "You will avenge me but you won't die. He's nothing but a coward."

"Toward women, perhaps but not toward men. I know something of him."

"It seems to me you can't complain about your luck in your last fight with him."

"Luck is a fickle lover: she may favour you today, then tomorrow choose another."

"In other words, now you hesitate."

"Hesitate, me? God forbid it! But would it be just to let me go to a possible death, without having given me something more than mere hope?"

Milady replied with a look that said, Is that all? Just ask. She reinforced the look by saying tenderly, "That's no more than fair."

"And you're ... an angel," said the young man.

"Then, all is agreed?" she said.

"All, except what I should ask of you, dear heart!"

"Even though I've said you can count on my affection?"

"I couldn't possibly wait till tomorrow."

"Hush!" Milady said. "I hear my brother coming. It will do no good for him to find you here."

She rang and Kitty appeared. "Go out this way," Milady said to d'Artagnan, opening a small, concealed door. "Return at eleven and we'll conclude our little talk. Kitty will bring you to my chamber." At these words, poor Kitty froze and nearly fainted. "What's come over you, young lady, standing there like a statue?" Milady demanded. "On your way! Escort the knight out. You heard my orders – carry them out when he returns at eleven."

It appears all these appointments are made for eleven o'clock, d'Artagnan thought. It's a regular routine. Milady gave him her hand, and he kissed it tenderly. Nevertheless, he said to himself, retiring in haste to avoid Kitty's reproaches, nevertheless, I mustn't fool myself. This woman is a terror. Watch yourself, d'Artagnan – watch yourself.

The Secret of Milady

Instead of going up to Kitty's room, d'Artagnan immediately left Milady's hôtel, despite the young girl's desperate invitation. For this, he had two reasons: first, so he could avoid Kitty's reproaches, recriminations, and pleas; and second, because he wanted an opportunity to organise his thoughts and, if possible, divine those of Milady. The chief thing on his mind was the fact that, while he was madly in love with Milady, she didn't love him in the slightest. It was clear that the best thing d'Artagnan could do would be to go home and write Milady a long letter, confessing that he and "de Wardes" were one and the same, and consequently he couldn't engage to kill "de Wardes" without committing suicide. But he was also spurred on by a fierce desire to avenge himself by possessing this woman under his own name. The opportunity for such a revenge was too sweet to surrender. He walked around the Place Royale five or six times, turning every ten paces or so to look at the light shining from between the window blinds in Milady's chambers. This time, it seemed, the young woman was not quite so eager to retire to her bedchamber as she'd been for of Wardes. Eventually, the light winked out. D'Artagnan's last hesitation disappeared with the light. He recalled the details of his first night with Milady and, heart pounding, brain afire, he re-entered her hôtel and raced up to Kitty's room. The young girl, pale as a corpse, trembling in every limb, tried to stop her lover – but Milady, alert, had heard the sound of d'Artagnan's entrance. She opened the door to her bedchamber. "Come in," she said.

This was so brazen, so incredibly shameless, that d'Artagnan could scarcely believe what he saw or heard. He felt as if he'd fallen into one of those fantastic situations one meets only in dreams. He nonetheless flew into Milady's arms, drawn to her like iron to a lodestone. The door shut solidly behind them. Kitty threw herself at that door. Jealousy, fury, outraged pride – all the passions that roil the heart of a woman in love – tempted her to reveal everything to Milady. But she would be ruined if she confessed to playing a part in such a plot – and, worst of all, d'Artagnan would be lost to her forever. This last, loving thought persuaded her to make the final sacrifice. As for d'Artagnan, he had finally achieved the object of all his desires. No longer was it a rival who was loved but he himself – or at least, so it appeared. A little voice in the back of his mind whispered to him that he was no more than an instrument of revenge, beloved until he repaid her caresses with death. But pride, conceit, and a fever of passion combined to drown out this voice. Besides, when the enormously self-confident Gascon compared himself to of Wardes, he asked why, all things considered, he shouldn't be loved for himself? He abandoned himself entirely to the sensations of the moment. For him, Milady was no longer that woman of fatal intentions who had briefly terrified him. She was an ardent and passionate mistress whose complete surrender to him seemed to prove her love. Two hours passed in this way. Eventually, their passions were spent. Milady whose motives were not at all the same as d'Artagnan's, was quick to return to her agenda. She interrogated the young man as to whether he already had a plan for his encounter with of Wardes the next day. But d'Artagnan, who had other things on his mind, forgot himself and responded with foolish gallantry, saying this was no time concern themselves with duels and sword-thrusts. D'Artagnan's lack of interest in the only thing that mattered to Milady alarmed her, and her questions grew more pointed. D'Artagnan, who had never seriously considered this impossible duel, tried to change the subject but failed miserably. Milady kept him to the subject by the sheer force of her irresistible spirit and iron will. D'Artagnan then thought it would be clever to advise Milady to pardon of Wardes and give up her vindictive scheme. But at the first words he said in this vein, she started and drew back. "Are you afraid, dear d'Artagnan?" she said, in a shrill, mocking tone that echoed strangely in the darkened room. "You can't think that, sweetheart!" replied d'Artagnan. "But, just suppose this poor Count of Wardes is less guilty than you think."

"In any event, he's deceived me," said Milady gravely, "and from the moment he did so, he deserved to die."

"Then die he shall, since you condemn him!" d'Artagnan said firmly. His tone reassured Milady of his devotion, and she immediately drew closer to him. No one can say how long the night seemed to Milady but to d'Artagnan it seemed that no more than a couple of hours had passed before the pale light of dawn crept through the blinds and infiltrated Milady's bedchamber. As d'Artagnan prepared to go, Milady reminded him of his promise to avenge her on of Wardes. "I'm ready," said d'Artagnan, "but first I must be certain of something."

"Of what?" asked Milady.

"That you love me."

"It seems to me I've given you proof of that!"

"Yes – and I'm yours, body and soul."

"Then thank you, my brave lover! But now that I've proven my love, you must prove yours. Isn't that so?"

"Certainly," replied d'Artagnan. "But if you love me as you say, aren't you just a little bit afraid for me?"

"What do I have to fear?"

"For starters, that I might be badly wounded – even killed."

"Impossible," Milady said. "Not with one so brave, and so fine a swordsman."

"Wouldn't you prefer a means that would avoid a fight but would avenge you all the same?" said d'Artagnan.

Milady regarded her lover in silence. In the pale dawn light, her clear eyes spelled death. "Truly," she said, "I believe that now you do hesitate."

"No, I'm not hesitating. But I feel sorry for this poor Count of Wardes, now that you no longer love him. It seems to me the man must be so cruelly punished by the loss of your love, it's unnecessary to chastise him further."

"Who told you I loved him?" demanded Milady.

"Well, you've certainly given me plenty of reason to believe that you love someone other than him," the young man said, caressingly, "but I must say, I've taken an interest in this count."

"You have?" she demanded.

"Yes."

"Why should you?"

"Because only I know..."

"What?"

"That he's far from being as guilty toward you as he appears."

"Indeed?" Milady said uneasily. "Explain yourself, for I really don't know what you're talking about."

And she regarded d'Artagnan who still held her in his arms, with eyes that began to smoulder. D'Artagnan decided to make an end of this. "As you say, I'm a man of honour," he said, "and since I'm quite sure that I possess your love – I do possess it, don't I?"

"Entirely. Go on."

"Then I'm transported with joy! ... Except I have a small confession to make."

"A confession?"

"If I had any doubt about your love for me I wouldn't say anything – but you do love me, don't you, my darling?"

"No doubt about it."

"Then if due to an excess of love, I haven't been entirely straight with you, you'd forgive me?"

"...Perhaps."

D'Artagnan put on the most charming smile he could, and leaned forward to kiss Milady's lips but she turned her head. "This confession," she said, growing paler, "what is this confession?"

"You had a midnight rendezvous with of Wardes in this very room last Thursday, didn't you?"

Milady didn't turn a hair. "Me? No! Absolutely not!" she said in a voice so firm that if d'Artagnan hadn't been perfectly certain that he himself had been there, he would have been forced to doubt it.

"No deceptions now, my lovely angel," d'Artagnan said, smiling. "There's no point to it."

"How's that? Speak! You're killing me!"

"Don't worry, I don't hold that rendezvous against you. I've forgiven you already."

"For what? Where is this going?"

"De Wardes has nothing to brag about."

"How can you say that? You told me yourself about that ring..."

"My love, I'm the one who has that ring! The Count of Wardes of last Thursday and the d'Artagnan of last night are the same person!"

The reckless youth expected her reaction to be surprise mixed with shame, and that he would just have to weather a little storm of emotion that would dissolve into tears. But he was fooling himself, and he wasn't long in learning it. Milady drew herself up, pale and terrible. With a sharp blow to his chest, she knocked d'Artagnan aside and sprang from the bed. By then it was broad daylight. Imploring her forgiveness, d'Artagnan tried to hold her by grabbing at her nightgown of fine Indian toile but Milady was determined to escape him. The gown tore, revealing her fair, round shoulders. With a shock, d'Artagnan recognised on one shoulder the fleur-de-lys: – A brand, burned into her flesh by the hand of a royal executioner!

"Great God!" d'Artagnan cried.

Paralysed and speechless, the nightgown fell from his fingers to the bed. Milady knew from the horror in his eyes that d'Artagnan had seen everything. The young man now knew her secret, her terrible secret that she'd hidden from all the world – except him. She turned on him, not like an angry woman but like a wounded panther. "You wretch!" she spat. "You played a coward's trick on me – and worse, now you know my secret! For that, you die!"

She dashed to her vanity table, opened an inlaid box with feverish and trembling hands, and drew forth a thin, sharp stiletto with a golden hilt. With this she lunged at the half-naked d'Artagnan. Brave young man though he was, he was terrified by the naked savagery of her face, with its horribly dilated pupils, bleeding lips, and cheeks pale as death. He backed across the bed as if pursued by a venomous snake. Reaching behind the bed, he snatched up his sword, and with sweating hands, drew the blade from its scabbard. Paying no attention to the sword, Milady lunged across the bed at him, stopping only when she felt the sharp point at her throat. She tried to grab the rapier with her hands but he kept it out of her grasp. Threatening first her eyes, then her chest, he slid from the bed, looking to make his retreat through the door into Kitty's room. Milady, screaming like a Fury, kept trying to get at him. As the situation resembled a duel, d'Artagnan began to get hold of himself. "All right, pretty lady, all right," he said. "But back off or by God, I'll carve a second fleur-de-lys on your other shoulder."

"Bastard!" she howled. "Bastard!"

But d'Artagnan, still looking for the door, stayed on the defensive. Hearing the noise they made – he manoeuvring the furniture to keep it between them, she overturning it to try to get at him – Kitty timidly opened her door. D'Artagnan, whose every move had aimed at approaching this door, was no more than three paces from it. With a single bound he leaped from Milady's chamber into that of her servant. Quick as lightning, he slammed the door, then leaned all his weight against it as Kitty threw the bolts. Then Milady tried to tear the door from its frame, with a strength seemingly beyond that of mortal woman. Finding the thing impossible, she thrust through the door with her stiletto, the point repeatedly penetrating the wood. Each blow was accompanied by a shrill cry. "Quick, Kitty, quick!" said d'Artagnan in a low voice as soon as the bolts were thrown. "Get me out of this hôtel! If we give her a moment to think, she'll have me killed by her lackeys!"

"But you can't go out like that," Kitty said. "You're practically naked."

"You're right," d'Artagnan said, only then realising his state of undress. "Clothe me as well as you can but hurry! This is life or death!"

Kitty knew this all too well. Quickly she draped a flowered dress and a large hooded cloak over him. He thrust his naked feet into a pair of her slippers and she led him down the stairs. It was time: Milady had pulled every bell-cord and roused the whole hôtel. Kitty had the gatekeeper let d'Artagnan out into the street just as Milady appeared at her window, half-nude, crying, "Bar the door, you fools!"

D'Artagnan fled as Milady shook her fist at him from her window. When she lost sight of him she fell back into her chamber, fainting. The young man was in such a panic that, without a thought as to what might become of Kitty, he ran full tilt across half of Paris. The shock and terror that spurred him on, the cries of the Watch as they pursued the fleeing figure, and the mocking hoots of passers-by on early-morning business, only made him run all the faster. He didn't stop until he arrived at Athos's door. He crossed the forecourt, leaped up the two flights to Athos's room, and pounded on the door almost hard enough to break it in. Grimaud opened the door, peering through eyes still swollen with sleep, and d'Artagnan burst in so furiously that he nearly knocked him over. Despite the lackey's habitual silence, this time he found his tongue. "Hold on there, hussy!" he cried. "What do you want with us, you trollop?"

D'Artagnan untangled his hands from the folds of the cloak and threw back his hood. At the sight of a bristling moustache and a naked blade, Grimaud realised he was dealing with a man – probably some kind of assassin. "Help!" he screamed. "Help! Murder!"

"Shut up, nitwit! I'm d'Artagnan! Don't you recognise me?" the young man said. "Where's your master?"

"Sir d'Artagnan? You? Impossible!"

"Grimaud," said Athos, coming out of his chamber in a dressing gown, "did I hear you allowing yourself to speak?"

"Ah, Sir! It's..."

"Silence."

Grimaud resorted to pointing a trembling figure at d'Artagnan. Athos recognised his comrade and, phlegmatic as always, burst out laughing at d'Artagnan's strange masquerade: his hair askew, petticoats tumbling over his slippers, sleeves rucked up, and mustachios quivering in agitation. "Don't laugh, my friend," said d'Artagnan, "for God's sake don't laugh, because as sure as there's a hell, it's no laughing matter."

He spoke with such a solemn air, with such real terror behind it, that Athos immediately took his hands and said, "Are you wounded, d'Artagnan? You're so pale!"

"No but I've just been through something terrible. Are you alone, Athos?"

"For God's sake! Whom do you think I'd have in here at this hour?"

"Good! Fine!" d'Artagnan said, hurrying into Athos's inner chamber.

Athos followed him, bolting the door behind him to ensure their privacy. "All right, talk!" he said. "Is the king dead? Have you killed His Eminence? You're not looking your best, you know. Come on, talk, or I'll die from heart failure."

"Athos," said d'Artagnan, as he stripped off Kitty's clothing and appeared in his shirt, "prepare yourself for the most incredible story you've ever heard."

"How about putting on this dressing gown first?" said the musketeer to his friend.

D'Artagnan threw on the robe but he trembled so much he tangled it up and put his arms through the wrong sleeves. "Well?" said Athos.

"Well." D'Artagnan leaned toward Athos's ear and whispered, "Milady is marked with a fleur-de-lys on one shoulder!"

"Augh!" cried the musketeer as if he'd taken a bullet in his heart.

"Athos," said d'Artagnan, "are you sure the ... other ... is dead?"

"The other?" Athos said in a voice so choked that d'Artagnan could barely hear it.

"Yes – the one you told me of that day in Amiens." Athos groaned, bent over, and put his face in his hands. "This woman is in her middle to late twenties," continued d'Artagnan.

"And she's blond," said Athos, "isn't she?"

"Yes."

"Pale blue eyes, strangely clear with dark eyelashes and eyebrows?"

"Yes."

"Tall, and well-shaped? Missing a tooth, next to her left eye-tooth?"

"Yes."

"The fleur-de-lys is small, pink, and looks as if she's tried to hide it with powder and paint?"

"Yes."

"But you said she's English!"

"They call her Milady but she may be French. Lord Winter is her brother-in-law, not her brother."

"I must see her, d'Artagnan."

"Carefully, Athos, carefully. You attempted to kill her before – she'll do the same to you if she gets a chance and it's not like her to fail."

"She wouldn't dare. It would be as good as denouncing herself."

"She's capable of anything! Have you ever seen her in a fury?"

"No," said Athos.

"A tigress – panther! Oh, Athos, I'm sorry to say it but I'm afraid I've drawn down a terrible vengeance on us both."

D'Artagnan then told him everything, including Milady's mad rage and her threats to kill him. "You're right," said Athos. "Upon my soul, my life wouldn't be worth a hair. Fortunately, we leave Paris the day after tomorrow. We're going to La Rochelle, in all probability, and once we're gone..."

"If she recognises you, Athos, she'll pursue you to the end of the world. Let her confine her hatred to me alone."

"My dear fellow! What does it matter if she kills me?" Athos said. "Do you suppose I care whether I live or die?"

"There's some awful mystery behind all this, Athos. I'm sure that woman is one of the cardinal's agents."

"In that case, be on your guard. Unless the cardinal somehow admires you for that business in London, he'll bear a grudge. Since the affair was secret, he can't accuse you openly – but hatred must be satisfied, especially a cardinal's hatred, so take care. If you go out, never go out alone. If you must eat, take every precaution. In short, mistrust everything, even your own shadow."

"Fortunately, I have to stay out of trouble only until after tomorrow night," said d'Artagnan. "Once we're off with the army, we should have only men to fear."

"In the meantime," Athos said, "I hereby renounce my seclusion so I can stay by your side. You need to return to the Rue des Fossoyeurs, so I'll go with you."

"It may be no more than right around the corner but I can't go like this," d'Artagnan said.

"It's justice," said Athos. He rang the bell and Grimaud entered. Athos made a gesture that said, Go over to d'Artagnan's and bring back some clothes. Grimaud made an affirmative gesture in reply and departed. "That's that! But this is getting us nowhere in pulling together your equipment, my friend," said Athos, "for unless I miss my guess you've left your best outfit at Milady's, and I doubt she'll be gracious enough to return it to you. Fortunately, you have the sapphire."

"But the sapphire is yours, my dear Athos! Didn't you say it was a family jewel?"

"Yes, my father once told me he paid two thousand crowns for it. It was a wedding present to my mother – it's quite magnificent. My mother gave it to me – and I, instead of keeping it like a holy relic, gave it to that miserable woman. Fool that I was."

"I understand what it must mean to you. Please, my friend – take it back."

"I, take back that ring, after it has passed through the hands of that she-devil? Never! That ring is soiled, d'Artagnan."

"Then sell it."

"Sell a gem that came from my mother? To me, that would be like sacrilege."

"Well, then, pawn it. You should be able to get at least a thousand crowns. With that sum you can settle your affairs, and when you're flush again, you can redeem it. Having passed through the hands of usurers, it will come back cleansed of its old taints."

Athos smiled. "D'Artagnan, you're a charming companion," he said. "Your perpetual good humour is a balm for the afflicted spirit. Very well, we'll pawn that ring – but on one condition!"

"Which is?"

"That there be five hundred crowns for me, and five hundred crowns for you."

"Are you kidding, Athos? As a guard, I don't need a quarter of that sum, and I'll get it by selling my saddle. What do I need? A horse for Planchet, that's all. Besides, you forget that I, too, have a ring."

"To which you're more attached, it seems to me, than I am to mine. At least, that's what I thought."

"It's true, because in an emergency it might save us not only from financial embarrassment but from great danger. Coming from the queen, it's not just a precious diamond – it's practically an enchanted talisman."

"I may not understand it but I believe what you tell me. So let's return to consideration of my ring, or rather yours. Either you take half of what we get for it, or I throw it in the Seine. And I doubt whether, as with Polycrates, a fish will do us the favour of returning it."

"All right, then, I accept!" said d'Artagnan.

At that moment Grimaud returned, accompanied by Planchet, who was worried about his master. Eager to know what had happened to him, he'd taken advantage of the opportunity to bring the clothes himself. D'Artagnan got dressed, as did Athos. When both were ready to go, Athos pantomimed a man taking aim to Grimaud, who took up his musketoon and prepared to accompany his master. Athos and d'Artagnan, followed by their valets, reached the Rue des Fossoyeurs without incident. Bonacieux was at his door, regarding d'Artagnan reproachfully. "Well, if it isn't my loyal lodger! Make haste, there's a pretty girl waiting for you upstairs – and the women, you know, don't like to be kept waiting!"

"That's Kitty!" D'Artagnan dashed up the staircase.

So it was. On the landing outside his rooms, huddled against his door, he found the poor girl all atremble. When she saw him, she said, "You promised to protect me, you promised to save me from her anger! Remember, you're the one who's ruined me!"

"Yes, yes, no doubt about it, Kitty. Easy, now," d'Artagnan said. "What happened after I left?"

"How do I know?" Kitty said. "At her cries, the lackeys all came running. She was insane with anger. There's no curse she didn't call down on your head. I thought she might remember that you came through my room to get to hers, and would think I was your accomplice, so I took what little money I had and a few of my best things and ran for it."

"Poor child! But what can I do for you? I leave the day after tomorrow."

"Do whatever you can, Sir Knight. Get me out of Paris – get me out of France!"

"I can't very well take you with me to the siege of La Rochelle," d'Artagnan said.

"No but you can find me a place in the provinces, in the household of some lady you know – in your own province, maybe."

"My dear girl! In my province, the ladies do without chambermaids. But listen, I think I can manage it for you. Planchet, go find Aramis and ask him to come here right away. We have an important matter to discuss with him."

"I see where you're going," said Athos, "but why not send for Porthos? It seems to me a duchess..."

"Porthos's duchess is waited on by her husband's clerks," d'Artagnan laughed. "Besides, Kitty wouldn't care to live in the Rue aux Ours. Would you, Kitty?"

"I'll live anywhere you want," Kitty said, "as long as I'm well-hidden and no one knows where I am."

"Kitty, now that we're about to be parted, and you're no longer jealous of me..."

"Sir Knight, whether near or far, I'll always love you."

"Constance and loyalty – who would have thought?" Athos murmured.

"That goes for me, too," said d'Artagnan. "I'll always love you, never fear. But in the meantime, tell me – and I attach great importance to the question I'm about to ask – did you ever hear talk of a young lady who was carried off one night?"

"My God, Sir Knight! Are you still in love with that woman?"

"No, it's one of my friends who loves her. In fact, it's Athos, here."

"Me?" cried Athos in the tone of a man who sees he's about to step on a cobra.

"You, absolutely!" d'Artagnan said, giving Athos a significant nudge. "You know how concerned we are about that poor little Madam Bonacieux. Besides, Kitty won't say anything – will you, Kitty? You understand, my child," d'Artagnan continued, "she's the wife of that hideous baboon you saw at the door when you came in."

"Oh, my God!" cried Kitty. "You remind me of how scared I was! What if he had recognised me?"

"What do you mean, recognise you? Have you seen that man before?"

"He came to Milady's house twice."

"Did he? When was that?"

"About two or two-and-a-half weeks ago."

"Really."

"And last night he came again."

"Last night?"

"Yes, just before you came yourself."

"My dear Athos, we're entangled in a web of spies!" d'Artagnan said. "Do you think he knew you, Kitty?"

"I pulled my hood down when I saw him but it might have been too late."

"Athos, he mistrusts you less than he does me. Go down and see if he's still at his door."

Athos went down the stairs, and returned shortly thereafter. "He's disappeared," he said, "and the house is closed up."

"He's gone to make his report and say that all the pigeons are in the dovecot."

"Then the pigeons should fly," said Athos. "Just leave Planchet to let us know what happens."

"Half a moment! We sent for Aramis, you know."

"Quite so," said Athos. "We'll wait for Aramis."

At that moment Aramis came in. They quickly explained everything, and asked if, among all his high connections, he could find a place for Kitty. Aramis thought for a moment and said, "Would this really be of service to you, d'Artagnan?"

"I would be grateful to you all my life."

"Very well. Madam of Bois-Tracy," Aramis said, colouring, "asked me for a trustworthy femme de chambre for one of her friends who lives in the provinces. If you can vouch for miss, my dear d'Artagnan..."

"Oh, Sir!" cried Kitty. "Believe me, I'll be completely devoted to anyone who gives me a way to get out of Paris."

"Then all is for the best," said Aramis.

He sat at a table and wrote a short note that he folded and sealed with a ring. Then he gave the note to Kitty. "Now, my child," said d'Artagnan, "You know it's no good for any of us to stay here any longer. It's time to part but we'll meet again in better days."

"And whenever we meet again, in whatever time and place," said Kitty, "you'll find I love you then as much as I love you today."

"Gamblers' promises," muttered Athos as d'Artagnan escorted Kitty down the stairs. A moment later, the three young men separated, setting a rendezvous for four o'clock at Athos's lodgings. Planchet was left to guard the house. Aramis returned home, while Athos and d'Artagnan went to see about pawning the sapphire. As the Gascon had predicted, they easily got three hundred pistoles in pawn for the ring. Furthermore, the Jew told them that it would make a magnificent pendant for an earring, and he would give them five hundred pistoles if they would sell it. Athos and d'Artagnan, with the knowledge of a connoisseur and the energy of two soldiers, needed less than three hours to purchase all the equipment of a musketeer going on campaign. Besides, Athos, who was every inch the great noble, refused to haggle. When he found what he wanted, he paid the asking price without deigning to bargain. D'Artagnan wanted to negotiate but Athos, smiling, just put his hand on his shoulder, and d'Artagnan understood that, while it was all right for a petty Gascon gentleman to dicker over price that was not for a man with the airs of a prince. The musketeer found a superb Andalusian steed, rising six years, as black as jet, with clean, elegant legs, and nostrils of fire. He examined him and found him faultless. They were asking a thousand livres for him. Perhaps he could have been had for less but while d'Artagnan was debating the price with the horse-trader, Athos was counting his hundred pistoles onto the table. Grimaud got a Picard horse, stout and strong that cost three hundred livres. But after buying the saddle for this latter horse and arms for Grimaud, there wasn't a sou left of Athos's hundred and fifty pistoles. D'Artagnan offered to let his friend dip his hands into his share that he could return later but Athos's only response was a shrug of the shoulders. "How much did the Jew say he would give us for the sapphire if we sold it?" he asked.

"Five hundred pistoles."

"In other words, two hundred pistoles more – a hundred for you, and a hundred for me. That's a veritable fortune. My friend, let's go back to his shop."

"You ... mean you want to..."

"To have that ring again would only bring back dismal memories. Besides, we'll never have the three hundred pistoles to redeem it, so not selling it will just cost us the extra two hundred. Go and tell him the ring is his, d'Artagnan, and come back with the two hundred pistoles."

"Athos – reconsider, I beg you."

"What we need right now is money, so we'll just have to learn to make sacrifices. Go, d'Artagnan, go. Grimaud will accompany you with his musketoon." A half an hour later d'Artagnan returned, without trouble and with the 2000 livres. And that was how Athos found, close at home, resources he'd never anticipated.

An Apparition

At four o'clock the four friends met at Athos's house. Their common preoccupation with finding equipment for the campaign had vanished, and each face only expressed its owner's private anxieties – for behind all present happiness lurks a fear for the future. Suddenly Planchet burst in with two letters for d'Artagnan. One was a little billet, discreetly folded and sealed in green wax with a cachet of a dove carrying a leafy branch. The other was a great square epistle, resplendent with the awesome arms of His Eminence the Cardinal. At the sight of the little letter, d'Artagnan's heart leaped, for he thought he recognised the handwriting of the address – and though he'd seen that script only once, the memory was engraved on his heart. He took the little billet and opened it eagerly. It said: On Thursday, between six and seven o'clock in the evening, take a stroll on the road to Chaillot and look with care into the passing carriages. But as you value your life, or the lives of those who love you, don't say a word or make a move that might lead anyone to believe you recognise me, the woman who exposes herself to ruin just to see you for an instant.

The letter was unsigned. "It's a trap," said Athos. "Don't go, d'Artagnan."

"Perhaps," said d'Artagnan, "but I think I recognise the handwriting."

"It may be a forgery," replied Athos. "Between six and seven o'clock the road to Chaillot is quite deserted. It's no safer than going for a walk in the forest of Bondy."

"But suppose we all go?" said d'Artagnan. "What the devil! They can't eat up all four of us, plus our lackeys, horses, and arms."

"And it's a fine opportunity to show off our new equipment," said Porthos.

"But if it's a woman who's written to you, d'Artagnan," said Aramis, "and that woman desires not to be seen, you must realise that this would compromise her. That's not the act of a gentleman."

"We'll hang back and let him go up alone," said Porthos.

"Maybe but a pistol is easily shot from a carriage, even at a gallop."

"Bah!" said d'Artagnan. "They'll miss me. Then we'll catch the carriage and exterminate the villains inside it, since they'll have proven themselves our enemies."

"He's right – we'll have ourselves a little battle," said Porthos. "It'll be a chance to try out our new weapons."

"Yes, that might be amusing," said Aramis, in his mild and nonchalant way.

"As you like," said Athos.

"Gentlemen, it's already half past four," d'Artagnan said. "There's barely enough time to be on the road to Chaillot by six o'clock."

"Besides, if we go too late, it will be too dark to see us," said Porthos, "and that would be a pity. Let's get ready to go, Gentlemen."

"Let's not forget the second letter," said Athos. "That seal, it seems to me, indicates that it merits being opened. I must say, my dear d'Artagnan, it probably deserves more attention than that little trifle you've stowed away over your heart."

D'Artagnan blushed. "All right, then, Gentlemen, let's see what His Eminence desires." He unsealed the letter, and read: Sir d'Artagnan, of His Majesty's Guard, Company des Essarts, is expected at the Hôtel Cardinal this evening at eight o'clock.

LA HOUDINIÈRE the Captain of His Eminence's Guards

"The devil!" said Athos. "Here's a rendezvous that's much more serious than the other."

"I'll go to the second one after the first," d'Artagnan said. "One is for seven o'clock, the other for eight; there will be time for both."

"Hmm! I wouldn't go at all," said Aramis. "A gallant cavalier can't ignore a rendezvous set by a lady but a prudent gentleman may excuse himself from waiting on His Eminence, especially when he has reason to believe he isn't being summoned to receive a compliment."

"I agree with Aramis," Porthos said.

"Gentlemen, I already received from Sir Cavois another such invitation from His Eminence," replied d'Artagnan. "I ignored it, and the next day something awful happened to me! Constance disappeared. This time, no matter what, I'm going."

"If you're set on it," said Athos, "then so be it."

"But what about the Bastille?" Aramis said.

"Bah! You would get me out," d'Artagnan replied.

"No doubt about it," Porthos said with admirable aplomb, as if it were a simple matter.

"Of course we'd get you out," Aramis said, "but the timing is inconvenient, as we're supposed to set out on campaign the day after tomorrow. You're better off not risking the Bastille, at least at present."

"We can offer something better than that," said Athos. "We'll stay with him the entire evening. Then each of us, with three musketeers behind us, can watch one of the doors of the cardinal's hôtel. If we see a closed carriage come out that looks suspicious, we can fall upon it. It's a long time since we had a scrap with the guards of His Eminence; Sir Tréville must think we're dead."

"Decidedly, Athos, you were meant to be a General of the Army," said Aramis. "What do you say to this plan, gentlemen?"

"Admirable!" the young men replied in chorus.

"All right," said Porthos, "I'll run to Sir Tréville's hôtel and warn some of our comrades to be ready by eight o'clock and meet us at the Hôtel Cardinal. Meanwhile, have the lackeys saddle the horses."

"I haven't got a horse," d'Artagnan said, "but I can borrow one of Sir Tréville's."

"No time," said Aramis. "You'll take one of mine."

"One of yours? How many do you have?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Three," said Aramis with a little smile.

"My friend, you are certainly the best-mounted poet in the Kingdom of France and Navarre," said Athos.

"Really, Aramis – three horses?" said d'Artagnan. "I can't imagine why you would go and buy three horses."

"That's why I only bought two," Aramis said.

"What, did the third one fall from heaven?"

"No," Aramis said, "the third one was brought to me this morning by a liveried servant, who wouldn't say what household he served but who said he was following the orders of his master."

"Or his mistress," d'Artagnan said.

"That's neither here nor there," Aramis said, blushing. "At any event, he said he had orders from his mistress to put the horse in my stable, without saying where it came from."

"Such things happen only to poets," Athos said gravely.

"Well, in that case, we're fine," said d'Artagnan. "Which of these horses will you ride: one of those you bought, or the one you were given?"

"The one I was given, naturally. You understand, d'Artagnan that I could never offend..."

"Your unknown patron," said d'Artagnan.

"Or patroness," amended Athos.

"So the extra one you bought is of no use to you?"

"Not much."

"You chose it yourself, I assume."

"And with the greatest care! The safety of a rider, you know, depends almost entirely on his horse."

"All right, then sell it to me for whatever you paid for it."

"I was going to make you that exact offer, my dear d'Artagnan. It's a mere bagatelle; take all the time you need to repay me."

"How much did it cost you?"

"Eight hundred livres."

"Here are forty double pistoles, my dear friend," said d'Artagnan as he drew the sum from his pocket. "I remember that this is the coin in which you were paid for your poems."

"So, you're in funds?" Aramis said.

"Filthy rich, my friend!" D'Artagnan jingled the pocket that held the rest of his pistoles.

"Then send your saddle to the Hôtel des Mousquetaires and your horse can come back wearing it, along with ours."

"All right – but it's already five o'clock, so let's hurry."

A quarter of an hour later, Porthos appeared at the end of the Rue Férou on a magnificent jennet. Mousqueton followed him on a small but solid Auvergne horse. Porthos was swollen with joy and pride. At the same time Aramis appeared at the other end of the street mounted on a superb English charger. Bazin followed on a roan, leading a spirited Mecklenburg horse; this was to be d'Artagnan's mount. The two musketeers met outside the door; Athos and d'Artagnan watched them from the window. "The devil!" said Aramis. "That's an excellent horse you have there, my dear Porthos."

"It is," Porthos replied. "It's the one that should have been sent to me the first time, when I was the butt of the husband's tasteless joke. But the husband has been punished, and I'm completely satisfied with the substitute."

Grimaud appeared in his turn, leading his master's mount. d'Artagnan and Athos went down into the street, vaulted into the saddles beside their companions, and all four set forth: Athos on a horse he owed to his wife, Aramis on a horse he owed to his mistress, Porthos on a horse he owed to the prosecutor's lady, and d'Artagnan on a horse he owed to Dame Fortune – the best mistress of all. Their lackeys followed. Porthos's hopes were fulfilled: the cavalcade made a fine impression. If Madam Coquenard had been in their path and seen Porthos in all his grandeur on the handsome Spanish jennet, she would have had no regrets about bleeding her husband's strongbox for him. Near the Louvre the four friends met Sir Tréville, who was returning from Saint-Germain. He stopped to compliment them on their fine turnout that quickly drew a crowd of several hundred gawking Parisians. D'Artagnan took advantage of this encounter to inform Sir Tréville about the letter with the great red seal and the cardinal's arms – though about his other letter, he didn't breathe a word. Tréville approved of his planned response, and assured him that, if he didn't reappear by the following day, Tréville would find him, wherever he might be. At that moment, the clock in La Samaritaine struck six. Saying they had an appointment, the four friends excused themselves and took their leave of Sir Tréville. A short gallop brought them to the road to Chaillot. The day was waning. Carriages passed, going this way and that. D'Artagnan, keeping a good distance from his friends, peered into every carriage that went by but saw no one he recognised. Finally, after waiting a quarter of an hour with the shadows lengthening into twilight, a carriage appeared on the road to Sèvres, approaching at a rapid clip. D'Artagnan had a premonition that this coach carried the one who'd set the rendezvous. The young man was astonished to feel his heart beating violently in his chest. Suddenly, a woman's head appeared at the window, two fingers held to her lips, commanding silence – or sending a kiss. D'Artagnan let slip a cry of joy, for this woman – or rather, this apparition, for the carriage flashed past like a vision – was his Madam Bonacieux. With an involuntary movement, despite his orders to the contrary, d'Artagnan spurred his horse to a gallop, and in a few strides overtook the carriage. But the window was closed, sealed shut – the apparition had vanished. Then d'Artagnan remembered: As you value your life or the lives of those who love you, don't say a word or make a move that might lead anyone to believe you recognise me.

He stopped, aghast, fearful not for himself but for the poor woman who'd apparently exposed herself to frightful danger to grant him this brief rendezvous. The carriage continued on its way without slowing, until it disappeared into the shadowy streets of Paris. D'Artagnan sat rooted in place, not sure what to think. If that really was Madam Bonacieux, and she was returning to Paris, why this furtive meeting, this fleeting glimpse, this forlorn kiss? On the other hand, if it wasn't her – which was quite possible, as the light was so dim that he could easily have been mistaken – if it wasn't her, might this be the start of some plot against him, using as bait an appearance by the woman he was known to love? His three companions rode up. All three had clearly seen a woman's head appear at the window, though none of them, except Athos, knew Madam Bonacieux. Athos thought it was her; however, less focused on her face than d'Artagnan, he thought he'd also seen a second occupant of the carriage: a man. "If that's so," said d'Artagnan, "they must be transporting her from one prison to another. But what are they planning to do with the poor girl, and how will I ever find her again?"

"My friend," Athos said gravely, "remember that it's only the dead we may never see again on Earth. You – and I – have good cause to know that, don't we? If your mistress isn't dead, if that was her we saw just now, then someday you'll find her. And maybe," he added in that misanthropic tone of his, "sooner than you'd like, by God!"

The carriage had been twenty minutes late, and half-past seven had already struck. D'Artagnan's friends reminded him that he had another appointment. They also pointed out that there was still time to give it a pass. But d'Artagnan was both stubborn and curious. He'd decided to see the cardinal and find out what His Eminence wanted to say to him. He wasn't about to change his mind at this point. When they arrived in front of the grand hôtel of the cardinal, they found a dozen musketeers loitering around waiting for their comrades. Only then were they informed of what was expected of them. D'Artagnan was well known to the honourable corps of the King's Musketeers, and was expected to one day take his place among them. He was regarded, in advance, as their comrade, so they all heartily approved of the mission for which they'd been convened. Besides, it seemed likely to offer an opportunity to give a black eye to His Eminence or his men and these worthy gentlemen were always ready for that kind of trouble. Athos divided them into three groups, took command of the first, and gave the second and third to Aramis and Porthos; then each group went to lie in ambush near one of the exits of the hôtel. D'Artagnan, for his part, entered boldly by the main gate. Despite the support of his friends, the young man was not without a qualm or two as he ascended, step by step, the great stairway. His treatment of Milady had been more than a little deceitful, and he suspected her of being a political instrument of the cardinal; not to mention that of Wardes, whom he'd handled so roughly, was one of His Eminence's loyal retainers – and d'Artagnan knew that if His Eminence was a terror to his enemies, he was fiercely protective of his friends. "No doubt of Wardes has described our little encounter to the cardinal – and if he recognised me that is likely, I'm basically a condemned man," said d'Artagnan, shaking his head ruefully. "But if so, why wait to act until now? Well, that's simple enough: Milady has laid her complaints against me, with that melodramatic passion that makes her so fascinating, and that was the final drop that made the sherbet glass overflow. Fortunately," he added, "my good friends are waiting below, and they won't let me be carried off without a fight. However, the musketeers can't wage war on the cardinal, who controls the forces of all France, and against whom the queen has no power and the king has no will. D'Artagnan, my friend, you have many fine qualities – but these women will ruin you!" He came to this sad conclusion as he entered the antechamber. He handed his letter to the audience-controller who led him into a waiting room, then disappeared into the interior of the mansion. In this waiting room were five or six Cardinal's Guards who recognising d'Artagnan as the man who'd wounded Jussac, favoured him with sinister smiles. These smiles seemed a bad omen to d'Artagnan but the Gascon wasn't easily intimidated – or rather, due to the natural pride ingrained in his countrymen, he hid any feelings of fear, even from himself. He stood boldly in front of Gentlemen les Gardes, hand on one hip in an attitude of defiance. The audience-controller returned and gestured to d'Artagnan to follow him. It seemed to the young man that the guards, watching him leave, whispered among themselves. He followed a corridor, crossed a great hall, entered a library, and found himself before a man seated at a desk, writing. The audience-controller announced him, then withdrew without another word. At first, d'Artagnan took the man at the desk for some magistrate examining his dossier but then he noticed that the man was writing, or rather correcting, lines of unequal length, scanning the words with his fingers. Apparently, d'Artagnan was dealing with a poet. After a moment the poet closed his manuscript, on the cover of which was written:

MIRAME, A Tragedy in 5 Acts

Then the poet raised his head. D'Artagnan recognised the cardinal.

040 The Cardinal

The cardinal leaned his elbow on his manuscript, his cheek in his hand, and regarded the young man for a moment. No one had a more penetrating eye than the Cardinal of Richelieu, and d'Artagnan felt this regard sweep over him like a beam of heat. However, he kept his cool, holding his hat in his hand and awaiting the good pleasure of His Eminence, without being either too haughty or too humble. "Sir," the cardinal said to him, "are you a d'Artagnan of Béarn?"

"Yes, My Lord," replied the young man.

"There are several branches of the d'Artagnan family in the vicinity of Tarbes," said the cardinal. "Which do you belong to?"

"I am the son of him who served in the Wars of Religion with Great King Henry, father of His Gracious Majesty."

"Quite so. You set out, some months ago, from your province to find your fortune in the capital?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"You passed through Meung, where there was some sort of incident, I'm not sure what – but an incident."

"My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "here's what happened..."

"No matter, no matter," interrupted the cardinal, with a smile that indicated he knew the story as well the teller did. "You were recommended to Sir Tréville, were you not?"

"Yes, My Lord, just so – but in the trouble at Meung..."

"...The letter was lost," replied His Eminence. "Yes, I know that; but Sir Tréville is a skilled physiognomist, who knows a man at first sight. He found you a place in the company of his brother-in-law, Sir Des Essarts, and you hope to someday join the musketeers."

"My Lord is extremely well-informed," said d'Artagnan.

"Since then, a number of things have happened to you. You were strolling one day behind the Carmelite convent when it would have been better for you to be elsewhere. Then, you took a trip with your friends to the waters of Forges; they stopped on the way but you continued on the road. Naturally enough: you had business in England."

"My Lord," stammered d'Artagnan, "I went..."

"Hunting at Windsor, or some such. It's no concern of mine. I happen to know about it because it's my business to know everything. On your return, you were received by an august personage, and I'm pleased to see that you've kept the souvenir she gave you."

The queen's diamond was still on d'Artagnan's finger. He covered it with his other hand and turned the gem inside – but it was too late. "The next day, you received a visit from Cavois," continued the cardinal, "who went to invite you to the Hôtel Cardinal. You didn't repay his visit, and that was wrong."

"My Lord, I was afraid I'd incurred Your Eminence's anger."

"Oh? Why is that, Sir? For having carried out the orders of your superiors with more intelligence and courage than another might have? Incur my anger, when you deserve to be commended? It's those who don't obey whom I punish, not those who, like you, obey ... too well. For proof, remember the day when I invited you to come to me and search your memory for what happened that same night." That was the night of the abduction of Madam Bonacieux. D'Artagnan shivered; and recalled that only a half an hour before that poor woman had passed by him, no doubt still in the power of those who were behind her disappearance. "In fact," continued the cardinal, "as I've heard nothing of you for some time, I wanted to know how you were doing. Besides, you owe me some gratitude; you must have noticed how well you've been taken care of, under the circumstances." D'Artagnan bowed respectfully. "That care didn't arise solely from my natural sense of justice," continued the cardinal. "It's also due to certain plans I have for you." D'Artagnan was astonished. "I wanted to explain my plans on the day you received my first invitation – but you didn't choose to come. Fortunately, nothing has been lost by the delay, and today you shall hear them. Sit there, in front of me, Sir d'Artagnan; you are quite gentleman enough not to have to listen standing." With his finger, the cardinal indicated a chair to the young man who was so astounded that it took a second gesture from His Eminence before he obeyed. "You are brave, Sir d'Artagnan that is good; and you are prudent that is even better. I like men of head and heart. No, no!" The cardinal smiled. "By men of heart, I mean men of courage. But despite your youth, and having just entered into the world, you've made some powerful enemies. If you don't take care, they'll destroy you!"

"Alas, My Lord!" replied the young man. "No doubt they'll have an easy time of it, as they're strong and have powerful allies – while I have only myself."

"Yes, that's true – but by yourself, you've already done quite a bit, and will do more yet, I don't doubt. But you have, I think, need of some guidance in this adventurous career you've undertaken – for, unless I'm mistaken, you came to Paris ambitious to make your fortune."

"I'm at the age of impossible hopes, my Lord," said d'Artagnan.

"Impossible hopes are for fools, Sir, and you're a man with wits. Now, what would you say to a rank of ensign in my guards, and command of a company after the campaign?"

"Ah! My Lord!"

"You accept, don't you?"

"My Lord..." replied d'Artagnan with an embarrassed air.

"What? You refuse?" cried the cardinal, astonished.

"I serve in His Majesty's Guards, my Lord, and have no reason to be discontented."

"But it seems to me that my guards are also His Majesty's guards," said his Eminence, "and that wherever you serve in a French corps, you serve the king."

"My Lord, your Eminence misunderstands me."

"You want a pretext then? I understand. Well, here's your excuse: advancement, the coming campaign, the opportunity to serve me – that will do for the world. As for yourself, you need the guarantee of my protection. For you should know, Sir d'Artagnan, that I've received grave complaints about you. You don't dedicate your days – or nights – exclusively to the service of the king." D'Artagnan flushed. "Moreover," said the cardinal, placing his hand on a stack of papers, "I have here a whole dossier concerning you. But before opening it, I'd like to say something. I know you to be a man of resolve; your efforts, properly directed, should result in your advancement instead of leading you into trouble. Come, reflect – and decide."

"Your kindness leaves me speechless, my Lord," replied d'Artagnan. "I recognise in Your Eminence a grandeur of soul beside which I feel no more than a worm. But, since My Lord permits me to speak frankly...?" D'Artagnan paused.

"Yes, yes – speak."

"Then, I must tell Your Eminence that all my friends are King's Musketeers or Royal Guards, while my enemies, by some fatal destiny, all belong to Your Eminence. If I accepted your offer, my Lord, I'd be scorned here and reviled there."

"Are you so deluded by pride that you feel I haven't yet made you an offer equal to your merit?" asked the cardinal with a smile of disdain.

"My Lord, your Eminence is a hundred times too good to me! On the contrary, I think I haven't yet shown myself worthy of such high regard. The siege of La Rochelle is ahead of us, my Lord; I will serve under Your Eminence's eye and if I'm lucky enough that my conduct at the siege should meet with your approval, well – at least I'll have behind me some exploits that justify the offer of protection with which you honour me. Timing is everything, my Lord; later, I may have earned the right to give myself to you but at this point I'd appear to sell myself."

"In other words, you refuse my service, sir," said the cardinal, vexed but in a tone that nonetheless conveyed a measure of respect. "Keep your liberty then and indulge your likes and dislikes."

"My Lord..."

"If you please," said the cardinal. "I wish you no ill but you must understand, we have quite enough to do to defend and reward our friends. To our enemies we owe nothing. But I'll give you some free advice: watch yourself, Sir d'Artagnan, because from the moment I withdraw my hand from you, your life isn't worthy a bent copper."

"I'll do my best, my Lord," replied the Gascon, with his unshakable self-assurance.

"Remember, if something bad should happen to you," Richelieu said earnestly, "that I was the one who sought you out, and I did everything I could to protect you."

"Whatever happens," d'Artagnan said, placing his hand on his chest and bowing, "I'll be eternally grateful to Your Eminence for what you've said to me today."

"Well, then! As you say, Sir d'Artagnan, we'll meet again after the campaign. I'll have my eye on you, for I'll be there too" – the cardinal indicated a magnificent suit of armour he was to wear – "and when we return, one way or another, we shall settle our account."

"Ah! My Lord!" cried d'Artagnan. "Spare me the weight of your displeasure! Stay neutral, my Lord, if you see that I behave as a gallant man should."

"Young man," said Richelieu, "if I am able to say again what I said to you today, I promise I shall do so."

But these final words from Richelieu came in a tone that expressed nothing but doubt. This alarmed d'Artagnan more than a threat would have, for it was a warning that carried the ring of truth. The cardinal had been trying to protect him from a real menace. He opened his mouth to reply but with a haughty gesture, the cardinal dismissed him. D'Artagnan took his leave but at the door his courage almost failed him and he nearly returned. Then he thought of the grave and noble face of Athos: if he accepted the cardinal's proposal, Athos would deny him his hand, would disown him. It was this fear that restrained him, so powerful is the influence of a truly great character on everything around it. D'Artagnan went down the same stairway he'd gone up and found Athos and his four musketeers waiting outside the door, where they were beginning to get uneasy. D'Artagnan reassured them with a word, and Planchet ran to notify the other posts that it was pointless to stand guard any longer, as his master had come safely out of the Hôtel Cardinal. On their return to Athos's house, Aramis and Porthos bombarded d'Artagnan with questions about the reason for this strange interview but d'Artagnan told them only that Sir Richelieu had sent for him to offer him a position of ensign in his guards that he'd refused. "And with good reason!" cried Porthos and Aramis with one voice. Athos fell into a profound reverie and would reply to nothing. But when he and d'Artagnan were alone, he said, "You behaved quite properly, d'Artagnan – but may have done the wrong thing." D'Artagnan sighed deeply for his inner voice told him the same and terrible times were ahead. The next day was spent in preparations for departure. D'Artagnan went to pay his respects to Sir Tréville. At that point it was believed that the guards and the musketeers would be only briefly separated as the king was holding his parliament that evening, and intended to set out the day after. Sir Tréville contented himself with asking d'Artagnan if he needed anything but d'Artagnan replied proudly that all his needs had been met. The Guards of Sir des Essarts and the Musketeers of Sir Tréville were friends and companions, and that night they celebrated together. They were parting, and would meet again when it pleased God, and if it pleased God. As may be imagined, they were a rowdy lot, as high anxiety can be warded off only by high spirits. The next day, at the first sound of the trumpets, the friends were separated: the musketeers hurried off to the hôtel of Sir Tréville, the guards to that of Sir Des Essarts. Each captain led his company to the Louvre, where they passed in review before the king. The king was melancholy and appeared ill that moderated his usually haughty manner. In fact, the night before a fever had come over him in the middle of parliament, while he was holding his lit of justice. He had nonetheless decided that he would leave the next day, despite warnings to the contrary. He was determined to have his review of the troops, hoping, by a show of strength, to defeat the illness that was taking hold of him. The review over, the guards set off alone on their march. The musketeers had to wait for the king – which gave Porthos, in his splendid outfit and equipment, a chance to take a quick turn in the Rue aux Ours. The prosecutor's wife saw him pass in his new uniform and on his superb horse. She loved Porthos too much to let him depart this way; she made a sign to him to dismount and come to her. Porthos was magnificent: his spurs jingled, his cuirass shone, his sword slapped proudly against his leg. This time the clerks had no urge to laugh, as Porthos looked as if he'd have their ears for souvenirs. The musketeer was introduced to Sir Coquenard, whose tiny grey eyes glittered with anger at seeing his cousin so resplendent. However, he consoled himself with the thought that everyone said the coming campaign would be brutal, and he hoped, in his secret heart, that Porthos might not survive it. Porthos paid his compliments to Master Coquenard; Master Coquenard returned the favour, wishing him every sort of prosperity; and Porthos took his leave. At this, Madam Coquenard couldn't restrain her tears. No one regarded her grief as the least bit improper, as everyone knew how attached she was to her relatives, as shown by the noisy arguments she always had about them with her husband. The real goodbyes were said in Madam Coquenard's private chamber – and they were heartrending. Afterward, the prosecutor's wife waved her handkerchief after Porthos as long as her eyes could follow him, leaning so far from her window that she threatened to fall out. Porthos received these signs of affection like a man who is used to such things. As he turned the corner, he simply lifted his hat and waved his goodbye. Aramis wrote a long letter for his part. To whom? No one knew. Kitty who was waiting in the next room, was to take it with her when she departed that evening for Tours. Athos, sip by sip, savoured his last bottle of Spanish honey. Meanwhile, d'Artagnan was marching with his company. As he left Paris and entered the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, he turned around and waved a cheerful goodbye to the Bastille; but, as he was looking only at the Bastille, he failed to notice Milady, who was mounted nearby on a dun-coloured horse. She pointed him out to two tough-looking men, who stepped up to the passing ranks to get a good look at him. When they glanced at her for confirmation, she replied with a sign that said, He's the one. Then, certain that there could be no slip in the execution of her orders, she pivoted her horse and disappeared. The two men followed the company and, on leaving the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, mounted two fully equipped horses that a groom without livery was holding in readiness for them.

041 The Siege of La Rochelle

The Siege of La Rochelle was one of the key political events of the reign of Louis XIII, and one of the greatest military enterprises of the cardinal. It is therefore interesting, and even necessary, to say a few words about it, especially as some of the details of the siege are too important to this story to be passed over in silence. The political concerns of the cardinal, as he undertook this siege, were many and varied. We shall consider these first of all, then pass on to his private concerns that may have had no less influence on His Eminence than the former. Of all the cities that Henry IV had awarded to the Huguenots as places of sanctuary, none remained except La Rochelle. This last bulwark of Calvinism had to be destroyed, as it was a dangerous leaven in the body politic, constantly fermenting both civil revolt and inviting foreign interference. Spanish, English, and Italian malcontents, adventurers of every nation, soldiers of fortune of every sect who answered the call of war, had arrayed themselves under the flag of the Protestants and organised a loose alliance whose branches spread through every part of Europe. La Rochelle that had been elevated to new importance upon the ruin of the other Calvinist cities, became the focus of dissension and a centre of ambition. Moreover, it was the last port in the realm of France still open to the English, and by closing it against England, France's eternal enemy, the cardinal would complete the work begun by Joan of Arc and the Duke of Guise. Thus Bassompierre, who was at the same time Protestant and Catholic – Protestant by conviction but Catholic as a Commander of the Order of the Holy Ghost – Bassompierre, German by birth, though a Frenchman at heart – Bassompierre, in short, who was one of the three main French commanders at the siege of La Rochelle, said, while leading several other Protestant nobles to the attack, "You will see, Gentlemen, that we shall yet be fools enough to take La Rochelle!" And Bassompierre was right. The cannonades of the Isle of Ré foretold the Dragonnades of the Cevennes, the later forced conversion of the Huguenots; the fall of La Rochelle was the harbinger of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes that Henry IV had decreed to safeguard the Huguenots' rights. But in addition to the political goals of the great minister whose levelling and centralizing of all power in France is a matter of history, the chronicler must recognise the petty purposes of the lover and the jealous rival. Richelieu, as everyone knows, had been in love with the queen; was this love a simple matter of the politics of flattery, or was it genuinely one of those profound passions that Anne of Austria inspired in those around her? No one can say; but in any case, as shown by the earlier events in this history, the Duke of Buckingham had gotten the better of him. Two or three times the cardinal had been completely confounded, particularly in the affair of the diamond studs, thanks in that event to the devotion of the three musketeers and the courage of d'Artagnan. So Richelieu's goal was not only to dispose of an enemy of France but also to take revenge on a rival. Furthermore, he desired his vengeance to be breath-taking and colossal, worthy in every way of a man who held in his hand, like a sword, the forces of a mighty kingdom. Richelieu knew that in battling England, he was battling Buckingham, that by triumphing over England, he triumphed over Buckingham – that, in fact, if he humiliated England in the eyes of Europe, he humiliated Buckingham in the eyes of the queen. For his part, Buckingham, while pretending to uphold the honour of England, was driven by motives that mirrored those of the cardinal. Buckingham also was pursuing a private vengeance. He couldn't, under any pretext, return to France as an ambassador, so he'd resolved to return as a conqueror. Thus, the true stake of this game that two powerful realms played at the whim of two men in love, was nothing more than a look from the eyes of Anne of Austria. The first advantage had been gained by the Duke of Buckingham. Arriving unforeseen off the coast of the Isle of Ré, with ninety vessels bearing nearly twenty thousand men, he had surprised the Count of Toiras, who commanded the island for the king. After a bloody battle, Buckingham's initial landing had been successful. He had troops on French soil, albeit an island, within a few miles of La Rochelle. (It should be mentioned, in passing, that one of the fallen in this battle was the Baron of Chantal. The baron left behind an orphan, a little girl aged eighteen months, who was later to be known as Madam of Sevigne.) On Ré, the Count of Toiras retreated into the Citadel Saint-Martin with his garrison, throwing a hundred men into a little outwork called the Fort of La Prée. This event forced the cardinal to rush his preparations. It was determined that he and the king would take personal command of the siege of La Rochelle but until they could get there they sent "Sir" (the king's younger brother, Prince Gaston) to direct the initial operations. And they sent all the troops they could muster marching toward the theatre of war. It was this vanguard detachment of which d'Artagnan was a part. As has been noted, the king was to follow as soon as his lit of justice had been held. But on rising from his court of justice, on June 28th, he was taken with a fever. He was willing to set out nonetheless but his health deteriorated and he was forced to halt at Villeroy. Now, wherever the king stopped, the musketeers stopped too. As a result d'Artagnan, in the guards, found himself separated, at least for a while, from his friends Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. This separation that he regarded as a mere nuisance, would have been the cause of serious anxiety if he'd known what dangers really surrounded him. However, on the tenth day of September, in the year 1627, he arrived without incident at the army's camp before the walls of La Rochelle. The situation was static: the Duke of Buckingham and his English troops, who held the Isle of Ré, continued to besiege the Citadel Saint-Martin and the Fort of La Prée without success. Hostilities between La Rochelle and the king's forces had begun that very morning, La Rochelle opening fire on a fort near the city walls that the Duke d'Angouleme had had constructed. Sir Des Essarts's Guards took up lodging on the south side of the siege, at the abbey of the Minimes. However, d'Artagnan, preoccupied by his ambition to become a musketeer, had made few friends among his comrades. He felt rather isolated, and spent a lot of time with his own thoughts. His thoughts were not very cheerful. Ever since his arrival in Paris he'd been mixed up in public affairs but his private affairs hadn't progressed very far, neither in love nor fortune. In amour, the only woman he could have loved was Madam Bonacieux – but she had disappeared, and he'd been unable to discover what had become of her. As for fortune: insignificant though he was, he'd nonetheless managed to make himself an enemy of the cardinal, before whom trembled the mightiest Grands of the realm, starting with the king. That man had the power to crush him, and yet he hadn't done so. To a mind as sharp as d'Artagnan's, the cardinal's forbearance was a lamp that lit the way to a brighter future. Then again, he'd made one other enemy: perhaps less to be feared but still, not to be underestimated. Milady. On the positive side, he'd acquired the protection and esteem of the queen – but the esteem of the queen, at this point, was just another cause for persecution. And her protection, as everyone knew, wasn't worth much: witness Chalais and Madam Bonacieux. What he had clearly gained was the diamond, worth five or six thousand livres, that he wore on his finger. Yet this diamond, assuming that d’Artagnan had ambitions to use it someday as a sign of the queen’s gratitude, had no more value in the meantime than the pebbles he trod under his feet. He compared the gem to pebbles, for d’Artagnan made these reflections while taking a solitary walk along a pretty little road that led from the camp to the village of Angoulins. His reflections had carried him farther than he’d intended and the day was darkening, when by the last ray of the setting sun he thought he saw the barrel of a musket glisten from behind a hedge. D’Artagnan had a quick eye and a quick mind. He knew that musket hadn’t come there on its own, and that whoever held it wasn’t hidden behind a hedge with friendly intentions. He decided to give it a wide berth – then saw, on the other side of the road, the end of another musket barrel peeking from behind a rock. This, evidently, was an ambush. The young man glanced at the first musket and saw, with a certain dismay, that it was swivelling in his direction. As soon as it stopped moving, he threw himself to the ground. At the same moment the gun fired and he heard the whistle of a ball passing over his head. There was no time to lose. D’Artagnan sprang up with a bound, just as a shot from the second musket scattered the stones from the spot where he’d been lying. D’Artagnan was not one of those reckless heroes determined to court a pointless death just so it could be said that he never retreated a single step. Besides, there was no question of courage here: this was an ambush. If there’s a third shot, he thought, I’m a dead man! He took to his heels, fleeing toward camp, with the swiftness of the men of his region, so renowned for their agility. But despite his speed, the first shooter had had time to reload and fired again – so accurately, this time that the ball tore d’Artagnan’s hat from his head and carried it ten paces ahead of him. But since d’Artagnan had no other hat, he scooped it up as he ran. He arrived at camp pale and panting for breath. He sat down without saying a word to anyone and began to think. This event could have had three possible causes. The first, and most likely, was that it had been an ambush of the Rochelois, who wouldn’t be sorry to kill one of His Majesty’s Guards, as it would mean one less enemy – and moreover, an enemy who might have a full purse in his pocket. D’Artagnan took up his hat, examined the bullet hole, and shook his head. The hole hadn’t been made by a musket-ball but by the ball of a hunter’s harquebus. The accuracy of the shot had made him suspect the use of such a weapon. So this hadn’t been a military ambush, as the ball was the wrong calibre. It might be a present from the cardinal. He recalled that just before he’d noticed that gleaming gun-barrel, he’d been wondering at His Eminence’s indulgence toward him. But again d’Artagnan shook his head. For people toward whom he had only to reach out his hand, His Eminence rarely had recourse to such means. But it could be the revenge of Milady. Yes – that was the most probable cause. He tried in vain to remember anything about the appearance of the assassins but he’d left in such a hurry he hadn’t had time to notice anything. “Ah, my dear friends,” murmured d’Artagnan, “where are you? How badly I need you now!”

That night was a bad one for d’Artagnan. Three or four times he awoke with a start, imagining someone sneaking up on him with a dagger. But the darkness passed without incident and dawn finally arrived. However, d’Artagnan suspected that trouble was only deferred, not disposed of. He spent all day in his quarters, telling himself he was staying in because of bad weather. The following morning, at nine o’clock, the drums beat to arms. Prince Gaston, the Duke d’Orléans, was inspecting their post. The guards ran to take up their weapons and d’Artagnan took his place in the ranks of his comrades. The king’s younger brother walked down the line of troops, then Sir Des Essarts and all the superior officers approached him to pay their respects. After a minute or two it appeared to d’Artagnan that Sir Des Essarts made a sign to him to approach. Afraid he might be mistaken, he waited for a second signal from his commander; when it came, and he left the ranks and advanced to receive his orders. “Sir is going to ask for some bold men for a dangerous mission, one that will bring honour to those who accomplish it,” des Essarts said. “I signalled to you so you would be ready.” “Thank you, my Captain!” replied d’Artagnan who asked nothing better than to distinguish himself under the eyes of the lieutenant general.

In fact, the Rochelois had made a sortie during the night and had retaken a bastion that the Royal Army had overrun just two days before. The task at hand was a reconnaissance to determine how well the bastion was defended. Shortly, des Essarts raised his voice and said, “I need three or four volunteers for a mission, led by a reliable man.”

“As for the reliable man, I have him right here, My Lord,” said Sir des Essarts, indicating d’Artagnan, “and as for the volunteers, My Lord has but to announce his intentions and the men will not fail to step up.”

“Four men of stout heart who will risk death with me!” cried d’Artagnan, raising his sword.

Two of his comrades from the guards immediately leaped forward. Two other soldiers joined them, and that filled the bill. D’Artagnan refused to take any others, as he thought the first volunteers should have their chance at all the glory. After the Rochelois had retaken the bastion, no one knew whether they’d evacuated it or left a garrison. It was up to d’Artagnan’s squad to get close enough to find out. D’Artagnan set out with his four comrades, following a trench that led toward the enemy. The two guards marched alongside d’Artagnan and the pair of soldiers took up the rear. In this way, under cover of revetments, they were able to follow a series of trenches until they were within a hundred paces of the bastion. There, d’Artagnan turned and saw that the two soldiers had disappeared. He assumed they’d lost heart and stayed somewhere behind. At the angle of the counterscarp, the three remaining comrades found themselves within sixty paces of the bastion. They saw no one, and the bastion looked abandoned. They were discussing whether they should go any farther, when suddenly smoke erupted from the stone stronghold and a dozen balls whistled past d’Artagnan and his companions. They’d learned what they needed to know: the bastion was occupied! Staying any longer would have been both dangerous and useless; d’Artagnan and the two guards turned their backs and commenced a retreat that strongly resembled a flight. As they arrived at the corner of the protective counterscarp one of the guards fell with a ball through his chest. The other, still whole, continued his way toward the camp. But d’Artagnan wasn’t willing to abandon his comrade. As he bent to raise him and help him back to their lines, two shots rang out: one struck the head of the wounded guard and the other flattened on a rock, having passed within two inches of d’Artagnan. The young man spun around, for this attack couldn’t have come from the bastion that was now masked by the angle of the trench. He remembered the two soldiers who’d seemingly abandoned him – and also the two assassins of the ambush on the road. Determined this time to learn what he was up against, he fell across the body of his comrade as if dead. Almost immediately, within thirty paces of him, he saw two heads appear above the edge of an abandoned trench. D’Artagnan’s suspicions were confirmed: it was the two soldiers, who’d followed him for the sole purpose of assassinating him, in hopes that the young man’s death would be blamed on the enemy. To make sure he wasn’t just wounded, in which case he might return to denounce their crime, they approached to finish him off. Fortunately for d’Artagnan, they were taken in by his ruse and hadn’t reloaded their weapons. When they were within ten paces of him, d’Artagnan, who in falling had taken care to keep hold of his sword, leaped up and sprang toward them. The assassins knew that if they fled toward camp without having killed their man they were lost, so their first thought was to defect to the enemy. One of them grabbed his gun by the barrel to use it as a club, and swung a terrible blow at d’Artagnan. He evaded the blow by jumping aside but this left an opening for the bandit, who immediately raced for the bastion. But the Rochelois who were manning it were unaware of his intentions; they fired on him, and a ball broke his shoulder. Meanwhile, d’Artagnan had thrown himself at the second soldier, attacking him with his sword. The fight didn’t last long, as the wretch had nothing with which to defend himself but an empty harquebus. The guard’s blade slid down the barrel of the useless weapon and went through the assassin’s thigh. He fell, and in a moment d’Artagnan’s point was at his throat. “Don’t kill me!” cried the bandit. “Mercy! Mercy, officer and I’ll tell you everything!”

D’Artagnan withheld his thrust. “You’d trade your secret for your life? Is it worth it?”

“It’s not just my life, it’s yours – if life has value to a man of twenty-two, handsome and brave, who has his whole future ahead of him!”

“You wretch!” said d’Artagnan. “Talk, and talk fast. Who hired you to assassinate me?”

“A woman – I don’t know her name but she’s called Milady.”

“How do you know that, if you don’t know her?”

“My partner knew her, and that’s what he called her. She did all her business with him, not me. He even has a letter from her in his pocket. He said she attached a great deal of importance to you.”

“How did you get involved in this business?”

“My partner asked me if I’d join in on the deal, and I said I would.”

“And how much did she pay you for this little assassination?”

“A hundred gold crowns.”

“Well!” the young man laughed. “I’m worth something to her! A hundred crowns! That’s quite a sum to two miserable dogs like you; I can see why you’d jump at it. All right, I’ll pardon you – but on one condition.”

“What’s that?” asked the soldier anxiously as he could see that all was not yet over.

“That you go and retrieve the letter your partner has in his pocket.”

“But that’s just another way of killing me!” the bandit cried. “How can I go and fetch that letter under the guns of the bastion?”

“Nonetheless, you’re going to go retrieve it, or you can be sure I’ll kill you with my own hand.”

“Mercy, Sir! Have pity, in the name of that young lady you love, and whom maybe you think is dead – but she isn’t!” the bandit cried.

He collapsed to his knees and leaned on one hand, for his strength was draining out with his blood. “And how do you know there’s a young woman I love, or that I thought she was dead?” demanded d’Artagnan.

“By that letter my partner has in his pocket.”

“Then you see I must have that letter,” said d’Artagnan, “so no more delay, no more hesitation, or no matter how reluctant I am to soil my blade twice with the blood of a wretch like you, I swear on the word of a gentleman...”

At these words d’Artagnan made a gesture so menacing that the wounded man leaped up. “Stop! Stop!” he cried, his terror giving him strength. “I’ll go! I’ll go!”

D’Artagnan took the soldier’s harquebus, then drove him toward his comrade by prodding him from behind with the point of his sword. It was a frightful thing to see the wounded ruffian, pale in the face of death, smearing a long trail of blood behind him as he tried to crawl unnoticed toward his fallen accomplice, some twenty paces away. His face, covered with cold sweat, was so etched with terror that d’Artagnan pitied him. “Enough! Stay there,” he said with a look of disdain. “I’ll go – and show you the difference between a man of heart and a coward like you.” Then quick on his feet, keeping a sharp eye on the movements of the enemy, and taking full advantage of the contours of the terrain, d’Artagnan made his way to the body of the second soldier. There were two ways of handling it: search him on the spot, or carry him, using his body as a shield, and search him in the trench. D’Artagnan chose the second option, lifting the assassin onto his shoulders just as the enemy opened fire. A jolt, the sound of three balls lodging in flesh, a final cry, and an agonized shudder told d’Artagnan that the man who’d sought to kill him had ended by saving his life. D’Artagnan regained the safety of the trench and dropped the cadaver next to the wounded man, who was pale as death. The inventory of the dead man’s possessions began immediately: a broad leather wallet; a purse, apparently containing part of the bandit’s payment; a dice-cup and dice – that was the whole of his legacy. D’Artagnan let the dead man keep his dice-cup, threw the purse to the wounded bandit, and then eagerly opened the wallet. Among some unimportant papers he found the following letter, for which he’d risked his life:

Since you’ve lost track of the woman, who’s now safely in some convent you should never have allowed her to reach, try at least not to fail with the man. If you do, you know that I have a long reach, and you’ll repay me my hundred crowns many times over.

It was unsigned. Nonetheless, it was clearly from the hand of Milady, so he stowed it away as a piece of evidence. Then, still safe behind the angle of the trench, he began to interrogate the wounded man. The bandit confessed that he’d been hired, along with his now-dead partner, to abduct a young woman who was going to leave Paris through the barrier of La Villette – but having stopped for a drink at a cabaret, they’d missed the carriage by ten minutes. “But what were you supposed to do with this woman?” gasped d’Artagnan.

“We were to take her to a hôtel in the Place Royale.”

“Yes, that’s it,” murmured d’Artagnan, “Milady’s own home.” The young man shuddered as he comprehended what a terrible thirst for vengeance drove this woman to destroy him and all those who loved him. The story also showed how well versed she was in the affairs of the Court, since she seemed to know everything that went on. No doubt she owed much of that knowledge to the cardinal. But beyond that he understood with a dawning joy, that the queen must have discovered the prison where poor Madam Bonacieux had been paying the price of her devotion and she’d freed her from that prison. The letter he’d received from the young woman, and her passage like an apparition along the road to Chaillot, were now explained. That meant as Athos had predicted that someday it would be possible to meet Madam Bonacieux again! After all, a convent was not impregnable. At this, d’Artagnan’s heart was filled with forgiveness. He turned to the wounded man who had been anxiously watching the series of expressions on his face, and offered him his arm. “Come on, then – I’m not going to abandon you,” he said. “Lean on me and let’s return to camp.”

“Oh?” said the wounded man who found it hard to believe in such generosity. “So you can have me hanged, right?”

“Not at all. I’m going to spare your life once again,” d’Artagnan said. “You’ve my word.” The wounded man fell to his knees and tried to kiss d’Artagnan’s feet but the young man who no longer had any good reason to remain near the enemy, cut off this expression of gratitude. The guard who had fled at the first volley from the Rochelois had announced the death of his four comrades. So the regiment was both astonished and delighted when d’Artagnan reappeared safe and sound. D’Artagnan recounted the perils they’d encountered and the death of the other soldier, inventing a sortie by the enemy to explain his companion’s sword wound. This story grew in the retelling until it became a veritable triumph. By the end of the day the whole army was talking about the exploit, and the lieutenant general, Sir, sent d’Artagnan his compliments. Every great effort has its reward, and for d’Artagnan it was the restoration of his lost serenity. D’Artagnan thought such serenity was justified, since 1 of his 2 enemies was dead and the other was now devoted to him. But this only showed how little d’Artagnan understood Milady.

After the distressing news of the king's illness, one day word of his recovery began to circulate through the camp. It was said he was eager to arrive in person at the siege, and that as soon as he could mount his horse he would take the road again. Meanwhile, Sir his brother did precious little, as he knew that once the king arrived he could expect to be replaced as commander by the Duke d'Angouleme, Bassompierre, or Schomberg, all of whom were vying for the post. He wasted days with probes and patrols, unwilling to risk attempting to drive the English from the Isle of Ré, where they continued to besiege the Citadel of Saint-Martin and the Fort of La Prée, just as the French besieged La Rochelle. D'Artagnan had regained his self-confidence, as always happens when a danger is past, especially when that danger seems to have vanished. Only one thing worried him: he'd heard no news of his three friends. But one morning early in October he received a letter, posted from Villeroy, that explained everything:

Sir d'Artagnan,
Gentlemen Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, after ordering a fine revel in my house, and enjoying themselves with vigour, were so boisterous that the provost of the château, a very rigid individual, has incarcerated them for several days. However, at their request, I am sending you a dozen bottles of my Anjou honey, for which they have developed a great regard. They beg that you will drink their health in this, their favourite honey. Thus I have done, and am, Sir, with the greatest respect,
Your most humble and obedient servant,
GODEAU,

Host to Gentlemen the Musketeers

"Well, isn't that fine!" cried d'Artagnan. "They think of me in their fêtes, while I think of them in my funk. Nonetheless, I'll certainly drink to their health, and with all my heart – but I won't drink alone." D'Artagnan went to find a couple of guards with whom he was more friendly than most to invite them to share with him this delicious little honey of Anjou. But one of the guards was engaged that evening and the other was busy the next, so the gathering was set for the day after that. D'Artagnan sent the dozen bottles of honey to the guards' commissary with a request that they take good care of them. On the appointed day, d'Artagnan sent Planchet off at nine in the morning to begin the preparations for dinner that was set for noon. Planchet, puffed up with pride at being elevated to the dignity of master d'hôtel, resolved to oversee the event intelligently and thoroughly. To this end he enlisted the aid of Fourreau, the valet of one of his master's guests, as well as the false soldier who'd tried to murder d'Artagnan but who since had entered d'Artagnan's service and become a sort of assistant to Planchet. At the appointed hour the two guests arrived, took their places, and the food was brought to the table. Planchet served, towel on arm; Fourreau uncorked the bottles; and Brisemont, the wounded faux-soldier, poured the honey into carafes. The honey appeared to have been shaken up during its journey; the first bottle seemed to have quite a bit of sediment at the bottom, so Brisemont poured the lees into a glass. D'Artagnan gave him permission to drink it, as the poor devil still hadn't recovered all his strength. The guests, having finished the soup, were about to raise the first glass of honey to their lips, when suddenly a cannon sounded from Fort Louis or Port-Neuf. The guards, who thought this might herald some unexpected attack either from the besieged Rochelois or the English, immediately sprang to their swords. D'Artagnan did the same, and all three ran out to report to their posts. But they were scarcely out of the mess hall before they discovered the cause of the uproar: cries of "Long live the king! Long live his Eminence!" resounded on every side. And drums were beating throughout the camp. In fact, it was the king: impatient to reach La Rochelle, he had pressed forward by forced marches and had just arrived, with his entire household and a reinforcement of ten thousand troops. He was preceded, and followed, by his musketeers. D'Artagnan gave them a grand salute from the ranks of his company. His friends spotted him there, and Sir Tréville recognised him immediately. The welcome ceremony was soon over and the four friends found themselves arm in arm once again. "By God!" cried d'Artagnan. "You couldn't have come at a better time – the dinner hasn't even had time to get cold. Eh, Gentlemen?" he added, turning to the two guards whom he introduced to his friends.

"Oh ho! It seems we're having a little banquet," said Porthos.

"I do hope," said Aramis, "that there are no women at your party!"

"Is there any honey worth drinking in this dive of yours?" asked Athos.

"For the love of God! There's your own, my friend," replied d'Artagnan.

"Our honey?" said Athos, perplexed.

"Yes, the honey you sent me."

"We sent you some honey?"

"As you well know – that little honey from the vineyards of Anjou."

"Yes, I know that honey well!"

"It's the honey you prefer, isn't it?"

"Absolutely, when I can't get champagne or chambertin."

"Well, we have neither champagne nor chambertin, so you'll have to content yourselves with the Anjou."

"So we've sent for some Anjou honey, gourmets that we are?" said Porthos.

"No, it's the honey that you sent to me."

"Honey that we sent you?" said the three musketeers.

"Aramis, did you send this honey?" asked Athos.

"No. What about you, Porthos?"

"No. Was it you, Athos?"

"No."

"It was none of you – it was your host," said d'Artagnan.

"Our host?"

"But yes! Godeau, your host in Villeroy."

"My faith! Who cares where it came from?" said Porthos. "Let's try it, and if it's good, let's drink it."

"No," said Athos. "Let's not drink honey from an unknown source."

"Athos is right," said d'Artagnan. "So none of you ordered Godeau to send me any honey?"

"No! Nevertheless, you say he sent you some on our behalf?"

"I have the letter right here!" said d'Artagnan.

And he showed it to his comrades. "This is not his handwriting!" said Athos. "I'm familiar with it because before we left, I settled the company accounts with him."

"It's a complete forgery!" said Porthos. "We were never incarcerated!"

"Really, d'Artagnan," said Aramis, in a tone of reproach, "how could you believe that we'd been boisterous, or caused a disturbance?"

D'Artagnan paled and a shudder ran through him. "You're alarming me, boy," Athos said, shocked into informality. "What's happened here?"

"Hurry, my friends!" cried d'Artagnan. "I've a horrible suspicion this is a further revenge of that woman!"

At this, it was Athos's turn to blanch. D'Artagnan raced to the mess hall, followed by the three musketeers and the two guards. The first thing d'Artagnan saw as he entered was Brisemont, rolling on the ground in horrible convulsions. Planchet and Fourreau, pale as death, were trying to help him but it was clear that all aid was futile: Brisemont's features, contorted in agony, were those of a dying man. "You!" he cried, seeing d'Artagnan. "Agh! You traitor! You pretend to pardon me, then you poison me!"

"Me!" cried d'Artagnan. "What are you saying?"

"I say you gave me the honey, and you told me drink it, because you wanted to pay me back! Argh! It's horrible!"

"Don't think that, Brisemont!" said d'Artagnan. "Don't think that! I swear, I give you my word..."

"God sees! God will punish you! Dear God, make him suffer someday as I do!"

"I swear on the Gospel," said d'Artagnan, kneeling down by the dying man, "I swear I didn't know the honey was poisoned. I was going to drink it too!"

"I don't believe you," said the soldier.

And in a final fit of agony, he died. "Horrible! Horrible!" murmured Athos while Porthos shattered the bottles and Aramis gave orders a little bit late to send for a confessor.

"Oh, my friends!" said d'Artagnan. "Once again you've saved my life – and not just mine but the lives of these gentlemen. Gentlemen," he continued, addressing the guards, "I have to ask you to keep silent about this incident. Persons of high rank may be involved in what you've seen, and if we make trouble it will just rebound on us."

"M-m-sir!" stammered Planchet, more dead than alive. "What a narrow escape I've had!"

"Why, buffoon?" cried d'Artagnan. "Were you planning to drink my honey?"

"To the health of the king, Sir! I was about to down a small glass when Fourreau told me someone was calling for me."

"Alas!" said Fourreau, teeth chattering with terror. "I wanted to get him out of the way so I could drink it myself!"

"Gentlemen," d'Artagnan said to the guards, "I'm sure you can understand that a banquet after what has happened would be a pretty melancholy affair, so I beg you to accept my excuses and allow me to postpone the party to another day."

The guards bowed courteously and retired, seeing that the four friends wanted to be alone. Once the three musketeers and their young friend were on their own, they looked at one another in a way that showed they all understood the gravity of their situation. "First of all," said Athos, "let's find somewhere else to go. The dead make unpleasant company, especially those who've died a violent death."

"Planchet," said d'Artagnan, "I commend the body of this poor devil to your care. See that he's buried in holy ground. He committed a crime, it's true – but he repented of it."

And the four friends left the room, leaving Planchet and Fourreau in charge of paying mortuary honours to Brisemont. Their host gave them another chamber in which he served them hard-boiled eggs and water that Athos himself went to draw from the fountain. In a few words, the background of the situation was explained to Porthos and Aramis. "So you see, friend," d'Artagnan said to Athos, "it's a war to the death."

Athos nodded. "Yes, I can see that. But do you really think she is behind it?"

"I'm certain of it."

"Nevertheless, I confess I still have my doubts."

"But the fleur-de-lys on her shoulder?"

Athos shrugged. "She is some Englishwoman who committed a crime in France and was branded as punishment."

"Athos, I'm telling you, it's your wife," said d'Artagnan, lowering his voice. "Remember how much she resembles your description?"

"But she must be dead! I hanged her so thoroughly."

D'Artagnan shook his head. "In any event, what are we to do?" he said.

"We can't remain like this, with a sword hanging eternally over our heads," said Athos. "We must alter the situation."

"But how?"

"Listen: you must find a way to meet with her. Tell her, 'Peace, or war! On my word as a gentleman, I promise to say nothing against you, and do nothing against you – but on your side, I must have a solemn oath to remain neutral toward me. Otherwise, I'll go the chancellor; I'll go the king; I'll go to the hangman! I'll bring you up before the court, denounce you as a branded woman, put you on trial – and if you escape justice, well, on my word as a nobleman, I'll kill you. I'll corner you and kill you, as I'd kill a mad dog.'"

"I like it as a plan," said d'Artagnan, "but how can I manage to meet with her?"

"Time, dear friend. Time will bring the opportunity, and opportunity is our harness to destiny. The more there is at stake, the more one gains by knowing how to wait."

"Certainly, Athos but to wait, surrounded by assassins and poisoners..."

"Bah!" said Athos. "God has preserved us till now, and God will continue to watch over us."

"Us, yes. But we're men," d'Artagnan muttered. "It's our business to risk our lives. But she ....!"

"What she?" asked Athos.

“Constance.”

“Madam Bonacieux! Quite so,” said Athos. “My poor friend! I’d forgotten that you were in love.”

“Yes but didn’t you learn from that letter you found on the dead ruffian that she’s safe in a convent?” Aramis said. “One can be quite well off in a convent – and as soon as the siege of La Rochelle is over, I promise you, for my part…”

“Good!” said Athos. “Excellent, my dear Aramis. We all know your interest in religious matters.”

“I am only a temporary musketeer,” Aramis said humbly.

“And it’s a long while since he heard from his mistress,” Athos added in an undertone. “But we know all about that, and are careful to pay no attention.”

“Well,” said Porthos, “this seems like a simple matter to me.”

“Why so?” asked d’Artagnan.

“Didn’t you say she’s in a convent?” replied Porthos.

“Yes.”

“Well, after the siege is over, we’ll carry her off from that convent.”

“But first we have to find out what convent she’s in!”

“That’s … true,” said Porthos.

“I know,” said Athos. “You said, didn’t you, d’Artagnan, that it was the queen who sent her to this convent?”

“Yes – or at least, so I believe.”

“Well, this is where Porthos can assist us.”

“How’s that?” said Porthos.

“Why, through your marquise, or duchess, or princess, or whatever she is. She must have a long reach.”

“Shush!” said Porthos, putting a finger to his lips. “I’m afraid she’s a Cardinalist. She mustn’t know anything about this.”

“Then,” said Aramis, “I’ll undertake to see what I can find out.”

“You, Aramis?” said his friends. “How is that?”

“Through the Queen’s Almoner who’s a … close friend of mine,” Aramis said, blushing. And with that assurance, having finished their modest meal, the four friends separated, promising to meet again that same evening. D’Artagnan returned to the Minimes, and the three musketeers went to the king’s camp to find their own lodgings.

The Inn at Colombier-Rouge

Though scarcely arrived in camp, the king was eager to confront the enemy, as he had even more right than the cardinal to hate the Duke of Buckingham. He ordered the commitment of all his forces, first to drive the English from the Isle of Ré, and then to prosecute the siege of La Rochelle. But despite his urgency, progress was delayed by a quarrel that broke out, pitting Gentlemen Bassompierre and Schomberg against the Duke d’Angouleme. Bassompierre and Schomberg were Marshals of France and claimed the right to command the army under the direct orders of the king. But the cardinal feared that Bassompierre, who was a Huguenot at heart, might be unwilling to press home attacks against the English and Rochelois, his brothers in religion. He supported the Duke d’Angouleme, and at his recommendation the king appointed Angouleme lieutenant general. Then, in order to keep the undeniably talented Bassompierre and Schomberg from deserting the siege in a huff, each had to be given a separate command of his own. Bassompierre took the quarter north of the city, from La Leu to Dompierre; the Duke d’Angouleme commanded the east, from Dompierre to Périgny; and Sir Schomberg directed operations in the south, from Périgny to Angoulins. Sir’s quarters were at Dompierre. The king stayed sometimes at Etré, sometimes at La Jarrie. The cardinal’s lodgings were in the dunes, at the Pont of La Pierre, in a simple house with no entrenchments. Thus, Sir could keep an eye on Bassompierre; the king, on the Duke d’Angouleme; and the cardinal, on Sir Schomberg. Once this arrangement was established, they took up the question of how to drive the English from Ré. Conditions were favourable. To be good soldiers, the English, above all, had to be well fed. With nothing to eat but salted meat and stale biscuits, many in their camp were sick. Worse, the sea, angry at this season on every coast, was daily wrecking some small ship or other, and the shore from the Pointe of l’Aiguillon to the trenches was littered at every tide with the debris of pinnaces, luggers, and sloops. So it was evident that sooner or later Buckingham, who persisted on the Île of Ré out of sheer stubbornness, would have to lift his siege, even if the king’s troops simply sat in their quarters. However, when Sir Toiras on Ré reported preparations in the enemy camp for a new assault on Saint-Martin, the king decided to make an end of the affair, and gave the orders to mount a decisive attack. But this is not intended to be a history of the siege, only to report those events relevant to our story. In short, the expedition to relieve Ré was a success, to the great astonishment of the king and to the credit and glory of the cardinal. The English, driven back foot by foot, beaten in every encounter, and defeated on the causeway to the Isle of Loix, were obliged to take to their ships. They left two thousand men on the field of battle including 5 colonels, 3 lieutenant colonels, and 250 captains, 20 gentlemen of rank, 4 cannons, and 60 flags, and banners that were taken to Paris by Claude of Saint-Simon and suspended with great pomp in the vault of Notre-Dame. Te Deums were sung in the camp and throughout France. The cardinal was left master of the field, able to prosecute the siege of La Rochelle without, for the moment at least, having anything to fear from the English. For the moment, that is. Then a man named Montagu, an envoy of the Duke of Buckingham, was captured carrying proof of an alliance between the Holy Roman Empire, Spain, England, and Lorraine – an alliance against France. Moreover, in Buckingham’s lodgings on Ré that he’d been forced to abandon more hastily than expected, papers were found that confirmed this league, and which, as the cardinal asserted in his Memoirs, greatly compromised Madam of Chevreuse, and therefore the queen. It was on the cardinal that all responsibility fell – for one cannot be an all-powerful minister without responsibility. All the resources of his vast genius were employed night and day to oppose this threat, analysing rumours and reports from all the great courts of Europe. The cardinal knew of Buckingham’s activities, all of which confirmed his hatred of Richelieu; if the league threatening France triumphed, the cardinal would fall from power. The Spanish and Austrian parties would gain representatives among the king’s ministers where now they had only sympathizers – and Richelieu, the prime minister, would be ruined. The king obeyed him like a child but hated him as a child hates his master; if Richelieu failed, the king would abandon him to the combined vengeance of Sir and the queen. His fall would be hard – and France might fall with him. This is what he had to guard against. So the couriers, every day more numerous, came day and night to the small house at the Pont of La Pierre where the cardinal had established himself. There were monks, who appeared uncomfortable in their robes, and clearly belonged to the Church Militant; women dressed as pages, whose billowing trousers couldn’t quite conceal their rounded forms; and peasants with blackened hands but soft skin, savouring of the man of quality from a league away. And besides this, there were other, less agreeable visitors – for two or three times it was reported that attempts had been made to assassinate the cardinal. It’s true that it was said by His Eminence’s enemies that he himself had hired these maladroit assassins to give him an excuse to make reprisals – but it won’t do to believe everything said by ministers, or by their enemies. None of this prevented the cardinal, whom even his worst enemies never accused of lacking personal bravery, from making nocturnal excursions: sometimes to communicate important orders to the Duke d’Angouleme, sometimes for discussions with the king, and sometimes to confer with some messenger whom he preferred not to receive at his house. For their part, the men of the King’s Musketeers, who weren’t under strict orders and were not much involved with the siege, had time to enjoy life. This was particularly true for the Three Inseparables who, as friends of Sir Tréville, had no trouble getting permission to remain outside the camp after curfew. One evening, when d’Artagnan was in the trenches and couldn’t accompany them, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, mounted on their warhorses, wrapped in their heavy cloaks, with their hands on the butts of their pistols, were returning from an inn Athos had discovered two days before on the road to La Leu, at Colombier-Rouge. They were on their way back to their camp, on guard for fear of ambush, when a quarter of a league from the village of Boisnar they thought they heard the sound of horses approaching. The three immediately halted, closed ranks, and waited, blocking the middle of the road. A moment later, as the moon appeared from behind a cloud, they saw two cavaliers come around a bend in the road. Seeing the musketeers, they likewise stopped, and seemed to be considering whether to continue forward or turn back. This hesitation raised the suspicions of the three friends. Athos advanced a few steps, and in a firm voice called out, “Who goes there?”

“Who goes there, yourself?” replied one of the cavaliers.

“That’s no response,” said Athos. “Who goes there? Reply, or we’ll charge you.”

“Take care what you do, Gentlemen!” said a voice that rang with the habit of command.

“It’s some superior officer on his night rounds,” said Athos to his friends. “What would you like to do, Gentlemen?”

“Who are you?” called the same voice, in the same tone of command. “Respond at once, or you’ll regret your disobedience.”

“King’s Musketeers!” called Athos, now even more convinced that this was a superior who had the right to ask questions.

“What company?”

“Company of Tréville.”

“Advance and be recognised, and explain to me what you are doing here at this time of night.”

The three companions advanced, somewhat abashed, as they were now sure they were dealing with someone who outranked them. They allowed Athos to continue to speak for them. One of the two cavaliers – the second one to speak – was ten paces ahead of his fellow. Athos signalled to Porthos and Aramis to hang back and advanced alone to meet him. “Pardon, officer!” said Athos. “We’d no idea whom we were dealing with but as you see we were alert and on the guard.”

“Your name?” said the officer, whose face was partly concealed by his cloak.

“But what of yourself, Sir?” said Athos, who was beginning to bridle under this interrogation. “Give me, if you please, proof that you have the right to question me.”

“Your name?” repeated the cavalier, letting his cloak fall and revealing his face.

“His Eminence!” cried the musketeer, astonished.

“Your name?” repeated His Eminence, for the third time.

“Athos,” said the musketeer.

The cardinal gestured to his equerry, who approached. “These three musketeers will follow us, as I don’t want it known that I’ve left the camp,” said the cardinal, in a low voice. “If they stay with us, we can be sure they tell nobody.”

“We are gentlemen, my Lord,” said Athos. “You need have nothing to fear if we give you our word. Thank God, we know how to keep a secret.”

At this bold interruption, the cardinal fixed his piercing eyes on Athos. “You have a quick ear, Sir Athos,” he said. “But hear this: I don’t wish you to follow me out of distrust but for my security. No doubt your companions are Gentlemen Porthos and Aramis?”

“Yes, your Eminence,” Athos said as the two musketeers approached, hats in hands.

“I know you, Gentlemen, I know you,” said the cardinal. “I know that you are not entirely my friends that I regret. But I know too that you are brave and loyal gentlemen, and that I can trust you. Do me the honour then, Sir Athos, you and your friends, to accompany me, and I will have an escort the king will envy, should we encounter him.”

The three musketeers bowed to the necks of their horses. “Well, upon my honour, your Eminence is right to take us with you,” said Athos, “as we’ve met with several ugly customers on the road tonight, and even had a quarrel with four ruffians at Colombier-Rouge.”

“A quarrel? And why, Gentlemen?” said the cardinal. “I am not fond of quarrellers, you know.”

“That is precisely why I have the honour of informing Your Eminence about it myself, for otherwise you might get a false report from others and believe us at fault.”

The cardinal frowned. “What were the results of this quarrel?”

“My friend Aramis, here, took a slight sword-cut on the arm but as you can see, it’s nothing that would prevent him from joining an assault tomorrow, if Your Eminence ordered an escalade.”

“But you aren’t the sort of men to allow yourselves to take sword-wounds this way,” said the cardinal. “I’ve heard good accounts of you, so be frank with me. Come now, confess: you know I have the right to give absolution.”

“As to myself, my Lord,” said Athos, “I never even so much as drew my sword. I merely picked up my man and threw him out the window, though in falling,” Athos hesitated, “it seems he broke his thigh.”

“Indeed!” said the cardinal. “And you, Sir Porthos?”

“Knowing that duelling is prohibited, my Lord, I hit one of the brigands with a bench. I fear he may have broken his shoulder.”

“Well, well,” said the cardinal. “And you, Sir Aramis?”

"My Lord, being naturally of a mild temperament, and as I am about to enter the Church, of which My Lord may not be aware, I tried to separate the combatants. But one of those faithless wretches slashed my left arm with a sword, and then I must admit I lost my patience. I drew my own sword, and as he charged me, I'm very much afraid that he allowed it to pass through his body. I only know for certain that he fell, and was carried off by his two companions."

"The devil, Gentlemen!" said the cardinal. "Three men hors of combat in a barroom brawl! You don't do things by halves. And what, exactly, was this quarrel all about?"

"The ruffians were drunk," said Athos. "Having heard there was a lady who'd arrived at the inn this evening, they tried to break into her room."

"Break into her room!" said the cardinal. "To do what?"

"To do her violence, no doubt," said Athos. "The wretches, as I have had the honour to tell Your Eminence, were drunk."

"Would this woman be young and attractive?" asked the cardinal uneasily.

"We did not see her, my Lord," Athos said.

"You did not see her! Very well, then," the cardinal said quickly, "it was quite proper for you to act to defend a woman's honour. And, as I'm on my way to the inn at Colombier-Rouge myself, I shall soon know whether you've told me the truth."

"My Lord!" said Athos proudly. "We are gentlemen, and wouldn't sully our honour with a lie to save our heads."

"And therefore I don't doubt what you tell me, Sir Athos, not for a single second. But, tell me" the cardinal added, to change the subject, "was this lady alone?"

"The lady had a cavalier in the room with her," said Athos, "but, as he never appeared despite the tumult, he is presumably a coward."

"Judge not rashly, says the Gospel," replied the cardinal. Athos bowed. "And now, Gentlemen, as I've heard what I needed to know," the cardinal said, "follow me." The three musketeers arrayed themselves behind the cardinal, who once again covered his face with his cloak and resumed riding forward, keeping eight or ten paces ahead of his four companions. They soon arrived at the inn that was solitary and silent. Doubtless the host knew to expect an illustrious visitor and had sent any other inconvenient guests on their way. At ten paces from the door the cardinal gestured to his equerry and to the three musketeers to halt. A horse, saddled and ready, was tied up near the entrance. The cardinal leaned down and rapped the door with a distinctive triple knock. A man concealed by a cloak immediately came out. He exchanged a few quick words with the cardinal, then mounted the ready horse and rode off in the direction of Surgères – which was also the direction of Paris. "Come forward, Gentlemen," said the cardinal. "Gentlemen, you have told me the truth," he said, addressing the musketeers, "and it won't be my fault if our encounter this evening doesn't redound to your advantage. In the meantime, follow me." The cardinal dismounted, and the three musketeers did likewise. His Eminence threw his horse's bridle to his equerry, and the musketeers tied up their horses near the door. The innkeeper awaited them in the doorway. As far as he knew, the cardinal was only an officer come to visit a lady. "Do you have a chamber on the ground floor where these gentlemen can wait, one with a good fire?" asked the cardinal.

"I have this, sir," the host replied, opening the door to his great room in which an old, smoky stove had recently been replaced by a new one with a large and excellent chimney.

"That will do," said the cardinal. "Oblige me by waiting for me here, Gentlemen. I shouldn't be more than half an hour." And as the three musketeers entered the chamber on the ground floor, the cardinal, without asking for directions, ascended the staircase like a man who knows exactly where he's going.

On the Utility of Stovepipes

Apparently, without realising it, and motivated solely by their chivalrous and adventurous natures, the three musketeers had done a favour for someone in the inn at Colombier-Rouge whom the cardinal honoured with his particular protection. Now who could that someone be? This was the main subject of discussion among the three friends. Eventually, since they could reach no satisfactory conclusion, Porthos called the host and asked for some dice. Porthos and Aramis sat at a table and began to play. Athos paced back and forth, thinking. While thinking and pacing, Athos kept passing by the stump of the chimney from the old stove, where it protruded from the ceiling. Every time he passed he heard a murmur of speech, and eventually this caught his attention. Stopping by the stovepipe, he heard a few words that froze him in place. He gestured to his companions to hush, then stood, ear bent to the opening of the chimney. "Listen, Milady," said the cardinal, "this is an important matter. Sit down, and we'll discuss it."

"Milady!" murmured Athos.

"Your Eminence has my full attention," replied a female voice that made the musketeer start.

"A small vessel with an English crew, whose captain belongs to me, awaits you at the mouth of the Charente, at Fort of La Pointe. It will set sail tomorrow morning."

"And you want me there tonight?"

"You'll depart after you've heard my instructions. Two men whom you will find outside the door when you leave, will serve as your escort. I shall leave first; you will wait one half-hour, then leave yourself."

"Yes, My Lord. Now, let's return to my mission. As I would like to continue to be worthy of Your Eminence's confidence, please outline it in the clearest possible terms so there will be no chance of mistakes."

There was a moment of profound silence between the two negotiators. It was evident the cardinal was weighing in advance the terms in which he would speak, and Milady was focusing her attention to understand what he would tell her, and engrave it permanently in her memory. Athos took advantage of this pause to ask his comrades to lock the door from the inside, and then motioned for them to come and listen with him. The two musketeers, who loved their ease, brought chairs for themselves and another for Athos. All three then sat down, heads together, and cocked their ears toward the stovepipe. "You will go to London," the cardinal resumed. "Once in London, you will find Buckingham."

"I must observe to Your Eminence," said Milady, "that the duke suspects me of having been involved in the affair of the diamond studs, and His Grace hasn't trusted me since."

"But this time," said the cardinal, "it's not a matter of winning his confidence. I want you to present yourself to him frankly and openly as a negotiator."

"Frankly and openly," repeated Milady in a tone of the utmost duplicity.

"Yes, frankly and openly," replied the cardinal, in the same tone. "The entire negotiation must be open and above-board."

"I will follow Your Eminence's instructions to the letter – once you give them to me."

"You will speak to Buckingham on my behalf, and you will tell him I am aware of all the preparations he is making but that they cause me no concern, as at the first move he makes, I will ruin the queen."

"Will he believe Your Eminence is in a position to make good on this threat?"

"Yes – for I have proof of her complicity."

"I must be able to present this proof to convince him."

"Of course. You will tell him that I will publish the account from Bois-Robert and the Marquis of Bautru about the duke's meeting with the queen during the masked fête at the Hôtel of Chevreuse. To remove any doubts he may have, tell him that he came in the costume of the Grand Mogul that the Knight of Guise was to have worn, and which he bought from him for the sum of three thousand pistoles."

"Very well, my Lord."

"Give him the details of the night when he entered the Louvre disguised as an Italian fortune-teller. To make it clear that I'm fully informed, tell him that he wore beneath his cloak a great white gown embroidered with black teardrops, death's-heads, and crossbones, so that if necessary he could pass as the Phantom of the White Lady – who, as everyone knows, returns to the Louvre whenever some great event is imminent."

"Is that all, my Lord?"

"Tell him that I'm also acquainted with all the details of the incident at Amiens, and that I will have a little romance published about it, arch and amusing, with a plan of the garden and portraits of the principal actors in that nocturnal farce."

"I will tell him."

"Tell him also that I have his man Montagu in the Bastille. Although no letters were found on him, torture may make him tell what he knows ... and perhaps even what he doesn't know."

"Excellent."

"Finally, you may add that His Grace, in his hasty departure from the Isle of Ré, left in his quarters a certain letter from Madam of Chevreuse that is most compromising to the queen, as it proves that Her Majesty not only loves the enemies of the king, she conspires with the enemies of France. Now, can you recall everything I've said?"

"Let Your Eminence be the judge: the masked ball at the Hôtel of Chevreuse; the night at the Louvre; the evening in the garden at Amiens; the arrest of Montagu; and the letter from Madam of Chevreuse."

"That's it," said the cardinal. "Your memory is excellent, Milady."

"But," the lady said, ignoring the flattery, "what if, despite all these reasons, the duke stands firm and continues to threaten France?"

"Love has driven the duke to insanity ... or perhaps just sheer stupidity," replied Richelieu, bitterly. "Like the ancient paladins he goes to war just to win a look from his ladylove. But if he knows that his war will cost the lady of his heart her honour, and maybe her liberty, he'll have second thoughts – I will answer for it."

"And yet," Milady continued, determined that there should be no ambiguity about the goal of her mission, "if he persists, nonetheless?"

"If he persists...?" said the cardinal. "That is unlikely."

"But it is possible," said Milady.

"If he persists..." his Eminence paused. "If he persists, well ... we'll hope for one of those events that change a nation's history."

"If Your Eminence could give me a specific example of one of these events," said Milady, "perhaps I would be more worthy of your confidence in me."

"Very well, then!" Richelieu said. "When King Henry IV, of glorious memory, was about to invade both Flanders and Italy in 1610, assailing Austria on both sides, and incidentally for a reason much like that of the duke's – well, didn't something happen that saved Austria? Why shouldn't the current king of France have the same good fortune as the Holy Roman Emperor?"

"Your Eminence refers to that knife-blow struck in the Rue of la Ferronnerie?"

"Just so," said the cardinal.

"Your Eminence isn't concerned that the torture and slow death inflicted on Ravailiac, the wielder of that knife, might discourage anyone with the idea of imitating him?"

"In every country, especially those racked by religious divisions, there will always be fanatics who ask nothing better than to become martyrs. It occurs to me that right now the Puritans are furious with Buckingham, and their preachers are calling him the Antichrist."

"Well?" said Milady.

"Well," continued the cardinal, nonchalantly, "all it would take, at this point, would be to find some woman, young, beautiful, and clever, who has a grudge against the duke. There must be such women; the duke is quite a ladies' man, and succeeds in love by sowing promises of eternal devotion right and left. It follows that he must also have sown hatred by his continual infidelities."

"No doubt such a woman could be found," Milady said coolly.

"Well, if such a woman put the blade of a Jacques Clément or a Ravailiac in the hands of a fanatic, it would be the salvation of France."

"Yes but then she would be an assassin's accomplice."

"And were the accomplices of Jacques Clément or Ravailiac ever named?"

"No – but perhaps they were placed higher than anyone dared to raise their eyes to look. The Palais of Justice doesn't get burned down for just anyone, my Lord."

"You think, then, that the fire at the Palais of Justice was no accident?" Richelieu asked in a tone of indifference.

"I, my Lord?" replied Milady. "I think nothing; I state a fact, nothing more. However, I do say that if I were called Miss of Montpensier or Queen Marie de Médicis, I would take fewer precautions than I must take as mere Lady Clancee."

"Fair enough," said Richelieu. "What is it you want?"

"I want an order that ratifies, in advance, anything I think duty requires me to do for the good of France."

"But first a woman must be found who bears a grudge against the duke."

"She is found," said Milady.

"Then this poor fanatic must be found, the man who will serve as an instrument of God's justice."
"He will be found."
"Then when he has been," said the cardinal, "it'll be time to claim the order you've asked for."
"Your Eminence is right," said Milady, "and I was mistaken to see this mission with which you honour me as anything more than it appears – in other words, to announce to His Grace, on the behalf of Your Eminence, that you are aware of the different disguises by which he was able to approach the queen during the fête given by Madam of Chevreuse; that you have proof of an interview granted at the Louvre by the queen to a certain Italian astrologer, who was actually the Duke of Buckingham; that you are sponsoring a satirical little romance about the incident at Amiens, with a plan of the gardens and portraits of the principal actors; that Montagu is in the Bastille, where putting him to the Question may make him tell what he remembers, and even things he's forgotten; and, finally, that you possess a certain letter from the Duchess of Chevreuse, found in His Grace's quarters, that is extremely compromising, not only to her who wrote it but to her in whose name it was written. Then if, despite all this, the duke persists in his designs – well, since I will have reached the limits of my mission, I'll have nothing more to do but pray to God to work a miracle for the salvation of France. That is correct, is it not, my Lord? I shall have nothing else to do?"
"That is correct," replied the cardinal, coldly.
"Then," said Milady, appearing not to notice the change in Richelieu's tone, "since I've received Your Eminence's instructions regarding your enemies, will my Lord permit me to say a few words about mine?"
"Have you enemies then?" asked Richelieu.
"Yes, My Lord – enemies against whom you owe me your support, as I made them in serving Your Eminence."
"And who are they?" replied the cardinal.
"First of all, a scheming little slut named Bonacieux."
"She is in the prison of Mantes."
"That is to say, she was," replied Milady, "but the queen has cajoled the king into giving her an order by which she was transferred to a convent."
"A convent?"
"Yes."
"Which convent?"
"I don't know; the secret has been well guarded."
"But I will know!"
"And Your Eminence will then tell me what convent the woman is in?"
"I see nothing inconvenient in that," said the cardinal.
"Excellent. But I have another enemy, one much more dangerous to me than that little Madam Bonacieux."
"Who is that?"
"Her lover."
"What is his name?"
"Oh, Your Eminence knows him well!" cried Milady in sudden fury. "He's the nemesis of us both! He's the one who, in an encounter with Your Eminence's Guards, tipped the victory to the King's Musketeers. He's the one who gave three terrible sword wounds to your agent, of Wardes, and caused the failure of the affair of the diamond studs. And now, knowing that I'm the one who had his Madam Bonacieux abducted, he's sworn to kill me."
"Ah, yes," said the cardinal. "I know who you mean."
"I mean that s honey, d'Artagnan!"
"He is an audacious young man," the cardinal said.
"That audacity is what makes him dangerous."
"I cannot act without proof that he is somehow connected to Buckingham."
"Proof!" said Milady. "I'll find you ten proofs."
"Well, then, this is the simplest thing in the world! Give me that proof and I'll send him to the Bastille."
"Excellent, My Lord – but afterward?"
"Once in the Bastille, there is no afterward," the cardinal said quietly. "By God! If it were as easy to eliminate my enemy as it is to eliminate yours! ... Is it against such nonentities as these that you ask for an order of immunity?"
"My Lord," Milady said intently, "I ask for quid pro quo: a man for a man, a life for a life. Give me the one, and I will give you the other."
"I have no idea what you're talking about," the cardinal replied, "nor do I want to know. But I like to indulge you, and see nothing inconvenient in giving you what you ask for in regard to someone so inconsequential – especially since you inform me that this d'Artagnan fellow is a libertine, a duellist, and a traitor."
"He's a bastard, my Lord, a filthy whoreson bastard!"
"Well, then, get me some paper, ink, and a plume," the cardinal said.
"Here, My Lord."
There was a minute of silence, indicating that the cardinal was choosing his terms carefully in the writing of the order. Athos, who hadn't missed a word of the conversation, motioned to his two companions and led them to the other end of the room. "Well, what do you want?" said Porthos. "And why won't you let us listen to the end of the conversation?"
"Quietly!" whispered Athos. "We've heard everything we needed to hear. Besides, it's not that I don't want you to listen but that I have to leave."
"You have to leave!" said Porthos. "And if the cardinal asks for you, what are we supposed to say?"
"You won't wait till he asks. You must speak first and tell him that I've gone on to scout ahead, as certain of our host's remarks led me to believe that the road might not be safe. I'll give the same story to the cardinal's equerry. The rest is my business, so don't worry about it."
"Athos," said Aramis, "be careful."
"I said not to worry," replied Athos. "Trust me to keep my head." Porthos and Aramis nodded, and went back to their seats by the stovepipe. Meanwhile Athos, making no attempts at secrecy, went out the door of the inn, where he convinced the equerry in a few words of the need for an advance scout. He untied and mounted his horse, checked to make sure his pistols were loaded and primed, drew his sword, and rode hell-for-leather down the road to camp.

A Conjugal Scene

As Athos had foreseen, it wasn't long before the cardinal came down from the room where he'd met with Milady. He opened the door of the musketeers' chamber and found Porthos and Aramis deeply engrossed in a game of dice. A quick glance around the room told him that one of the men was missing. "What has become of Sir Athos?" he asked.
"He's gone to scout ahead, my Lord," Porthos replied. "Some remarks by our host led him to believe the road might not be safe."
"And what have you been doing, Sir Porthos?"
"I've won five pistoles from Aramis!"
"And now, will you accompany me on our return to camp?"
"We are at Your Eminence's orders."
"To horse then, Gentlemen. The hour grows late."
The equerry was at the door, holding the bridle of the cardinal's mount. In the shadows, not far off, stood two men with three horses. This was the escort that was to conduct Milady to Fort of La Pointe and assist there at her embarkation. The equerry confirmed to the cardinal what the two musketeers had said about Athos. With a gesture of approval, the cardinal mounted and they returned the way they had come, with the same precautions as before. Let us leave the cardinal to follow the road to camp, protected by his equerry and the two musketeers, and return to Athos. He maintained his gallop toward camp until he was out of sight of the inn, then turned his horse to the right, circled around, and came back to within twenty paces of the road, where he watched the passage of the little troop from behind a thicket. Having recognised his companions' plumed hats and the cardinal's embroidered cloak, he waited until the riders had turned the corner of the road; when they were out of sight he returned at a gallop to the inn, where the host recognised him and admitted him without trouble. "My officer forgot to convey an important piece of information to the lady," Athos said, "and sent me back to correct the oversight."
"Go on up," said the host. "She's still in her chamber."
Stepping as lightly as he could, Athos climbed the stairs to the landing, and through the open door saw Milady putting on her hat. He entered the chamber and shut the door behind him. At the sound of the bolt sliding home, Milady turned. Athos stood just inside the door, enveloped in his cloak, his hat pulled down over his eyes. Seeing this figure, mute and immobile as a statue, Milady took fright.
"Who are you? What do you want?" she cried.
"My God! It is her," Athos murmured.
Letting fall his cloak and raising his hat, he advanced toward Milady. "Do you recognise me, Madam?" he said.
Milady took a step forward, then recoiled as if she'd seen a serpent. "Good," said Athos. "I see that you do recognise me."
"The Count of La Fère!" Milady murmured.
The blood drained from her face and she backed away until stopped by the wall. "Yes, Milady," replied Athos. "The Count of La Fère in person come expressly from the other world for the pleasure of seeing you. Sit down and we'll discuss it, as my Lord the Cardinal said."
Milady, overcome with terror, sat without saying a word. "You are a demon, sent to afflict the earth," said Athos. "Your powers are great, as well I know – but with the aid of God, men may conquer the most terrible of demons. You crossed my path before, and I thought, Madam, that I had crushed you. Either I was mistaken or Hell has revived you."
These words brought back frightful memories to Milady. Her head drooped and she uttered a nearly inaudible groan. "Yes, Hell has revived you," continued Athos. "Hell has made you rich; Hell has furnished you with another name; Hell has even altered your face. But it has effaced neither the stains from your soul, nor the mark of the brand from your flesh."
Milady leaped up as if launched by a coiled spring, and her eyes flashed lightning. Athos remained seated. "You thought me dead, didn't you? As I thought you to be. And the name of Athos hid the Count of La Fère, just as the name of Milady Clarice hid Anne of Breuil! Isn't that what you were called when your honourable brother married us?" Athos laughed. "What a strange position we're in! We've only been able to live till now because each thought the other was dead, and memory is less burdensome than a living person. Though memory can be voracious, and eats from within!"
"But, then," Milady said, in a faint voice, "why have you returned to me? And what do you want?"
"I want you to know that though I've been invisible to your eyes, I haven't lost sight of you."
"You know what it's I've done?"
"I can recount your actions to you since you entered the service of the cardinal day by day until this very evening." An incredulous smile passed over Milady's pale lips. "Listen: it was you who lifted two diamond studs from the Duke of Buckingham's shoulder. It was you who had Madam Bonacieux carried off. It was you who, infatuated with of Wardes, thought to pass the night with him but opened the door instead to Sir d'Artagnan. It was you who, believing of Wardes had betrayed you, lusted to have him killed by his rival. It was you who, when this rival had discovered your shameful secret, engaged to have him murdered by two assassins you sent in pursuit of him. It was you who, after the bullets had missed their mark, sent poisoned honey with a false letter, to make your victim think the honey had come from his friends. And to make an end, it was you, in this very chamber, sitting on this chair where I sit, who engaged with the Cardinal of Richelieu to assassinate the Duke of Buckingham, in exchange for his promise to let you assassinate d'Artagnan."
Milady was livid. "But how?" she said. "Are you Satan?"

"Perhaps," Athos said. "In any case, listen to this, and listen well. Assassinate the Duke of Buckingham or have him assassinated – I couldn't care less! I don't know him and besides, he's an Englishman. But d'Artagnan is a loyal friend whom I love and will defend. Do not touch a single hair on his head with even the tip of your finger or I swear to you in the name of my father, it will be your final crime."

"Sir d'Artagnan has cruelly insulted me," Milady said in a hollow voice, "and he must die."

"Really? Since when is it possible to insult you, Madam?" Athos mocked. "He's insulted me and must die. Ha!"

"He will die," repeated Milady. "The woman first and then him."

It made Athos suddenly dizzy: the sight of this creature brought back terrible memories, though there was nothing about her now that made him think of her as a woman. He recalled the day, in a situation less dangerous than this one, when he'd attempted to sacrifice her on the altar of his honour. The will to murder came blazing back, swept over him like a fever. He stood up, drew his pistol from his belt, and cocked it. Milady, pale as a corpse, tried to cry out but her tongue froze, and she could utter only a hoarse sound that was less like human speech than the croak of a beast. Glued to the dark tapestry behind her, hair in wild disarray, she was a frightful image of terror. Athos slowly raised his pistol and extended his arm, until the barrel nearly touched Milady's forehead. Then, in a voice all the more terrible for having the supreme calmness of inflexible resolve, he said, "Madam, you will instantly give up to me that paper the cardinal signed or upon my soul, I will blow out your brains." Milady might have doubted this with any other man – but she knew Athos. Nevertheless, she didn't move. "You have one second to decide," he said.

Milady saw by the narrowing of his eyes that he was about to fire. She quickly reached her hand between her breasts, drew forth a paper and thrust it at Athos. "Take it," she said, "and be damned!" Athos took the paper and replaced the pistol in his belt. Then, to be certain it was the right one, he approached the lamp, unfolded it, and read:

It is by my order, and for the good of the State, that the bearer has done what has been done.

05 August 1628

RICHELIEU

"And now," Athos said, resuming his cloak and replacing his hat on his head, "now that I've drawn your teeth, viper – bite if you can!"

And he left the chamber without even looking behind him. Outside the door of the inn he found the two men holding the horses. "Gentlemen," he said, "as you know, my Lord's order is to conduct this woman, as rapidly as possible, to Fort of La Pointe, and stay with her until she's aboard."

As this was basically in accord with the orders they'd already received, they bowed their heads in agreement. As for Athos, he leaped lightly into the saddle and set off at a gallop. But instead of following the road he went across the fields, spurring on his horse and stopping from time to time to listen. On one of these halts, he heard the sound of several horses on the road. He had no doubt but that it was the cardinal and his escort. He immediately rode to a point ahead of them, rubbed down his horse with some brush and leaves, and placed himself in the middle of the road, about two hundred paces short of the camp. "Who goes there?" he cried as soon as he could see the riders.

"That is our brave musketeer, I believe," said the cardinal.

"Yes, my Lord, it's me," said Athos.

"Sir Athos," Richelieu said, "accept my thanks for the excellent guard you've kept. Gentlemen, we have arrived. Take the gate on the left; the password is, 'Roi et Ré.'"

With these words, the cardinal saluted the three friends with a nod and took the path to the right, followed by his equerry – for, that night, he too slept in the camp. "Whew!" said Porthos and Aramis together, as soon as the cardinal was out of earshot. "Athos," Aramis continued, "he signed that paper she demanded."

"I know," Athos said serenely, "because here it's." And except when giving the password to the sentinels, the three friends didn't say another word until they reached their quarters. There, they sent Mousqueton to tell Planchet that his master's presence was requested in the musketeers' quarters as soon as he returned from the trenches. Meanwhile, as Athos had foreseen, when Milady found the two men awaiting her at the door, she made no trouble about following them. For an instant, she had the impulse to go to the cardinal and tell him everything – but a disclosure from her would lead to a disclosure from Athos. If she accused him of attempting to hang her, he would reveal that she was branded. She thought it better, for the moment, to keep silent, depart discreetly, and accomplish her difficult mission with her usual skill. Then, everything having been completed to the satisfaction of the cardinal, she could return to claim her vengeance. So they travelled all night, and by seven in the morning she was at Fort of La Pointe. By eight she had embarked, and by nine o'clock the vessel that had been provided with letters of marque by the cardinal, and which was supposed to be sailing for Bayonne, raised anchor and set its course for England.

The Bastion of Saint-Gervais

On arriving at the quarters of his three friends, d'Artagnan found them waiting for him in the common room. Athos was deliberating, Aramis was reading prayers from a charming little book of hours bound in blue velvet, and Porthos was curling his moustache. "By God, Gentlemen, I hope what you have to tell me is worth the trouble," d'Artagnan said, "or I won't forgive you for summoning me here instead of letting me get some rest, after a night spent taking a bastion and then demolishing its defences. It's a shame you weren't there, Gentlemen – it was warm work!"

"Where we were, it wasn't exactly cold!" replied Porthos, giving his moustache the peculiar twist that was one of his trademarks.

"Hush!" Athos said.

D'Artagnan looked at the lines on the musketeer's brow and said, "Uh-oh. There's something new, isn't there?"

"Aramis," said Athos, "the day before yesterday you took breakfast at the Heretic's Inn, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"How was it?"

"Personally, I ate very little. It was a day of fasting, and they had only meat."

"What?" said Athos, "We're at a seaport, and you couldn't get fish?"

"It's said that the dyke His Eminence is building to block entry to the port has scared all the fish out to sea," Aramis said mildly, resuming his pious studies.

"That's not really what I want to know, Aramis," said Athos. "I want to know if anyone intruded on you, or if you were left to yourself."

"Ah, I see what you're getting at. No, I was not interrupted or importuned; the Heretic should suit us well."

"Then let's go to the Heretic," Athos said. "The walls here are thin as paper." D'Artagnan was familiar with his friend's ways, knew by these words, and a subtle gesture that the situation was serious. He went out arm in arm with Athos without saying a word. Porthos followed, chatting with Aramis. They met Grimaud en route. Athos made a sign to him to follow and Grimaud obeyed silently, as usual. By this time the poor fellow had nearly forgotten how to speak. They arrived at the Heretic at about seven in the morning, as dawn began to lighten the sky. The three friends ordered breakfast and went into a room where the host said they wouldn't be disturbed. Unfortunately, it was a bad time of day to try to hold a confidential meeting. The drummers had just beaten reveille, the troops had barely awakened, and everyone was out to dispel the morning's grogginess with some grog: dragoons, Swiss, guards, musketeers, and cavalymen came one after another at a rate that must have brought a smile to the innkeeper's face. However, it was not at all what the four friends had in mind, and they were less than cordial in replying to the salutes, toasts, and gibes of their comrades-in-arms. "We'd leave," said Athos, "before we get involved in some petty quarrel that is the last thing we need right now. D'Artagnan, tell us how your night went; we'll get to ours later."

"Quite so!" interrupted a cavalry officer who held a glass of eau-de-vie that he'd obviously already been sampling. "Quite so! You guards were in the trenches last night, weren't you? I hear the Rochelois just about handed you your heads!"

D'Artagnan glanced at Athos for guidance on how to handle this intruder into their conversation. "Sir Busigny honours you with a question," Athos said. "Go on; tell us all what happened last night, since these gentlemen want to know."

"You are take some bastion, ja?" asked a Swiss, drinking rum from a pint glass.

"Yes, sir," D'Artagnan bowed. "We've had that honour. We even got a barrel of black powder under one of the corners as you may have heard and blew a very pretty breach in the wall. It damaged the rest of the works as well, as the bastion is pretty old."

"And what bastion was this?" asked a dragoon who had a goose impaled on his sabre that he was bringing in for roasting.

"The Bastion of Saint-Gervais," replied d'Artagnan. "The one the Rochelois were using to annoy our pioneers."

"Was the affair a hot one?"

"But yes. We lost five men, and the Rochelois eight or ten."

"Balzampleu!" said the Swiss who despite the fine collection of oaths boasted by the German language, had taken to swearing in French.

"But in all probability the Rochelois will just send their own pioneers out this morning to repair the damage to the bastion," the cavalry officer said.

"Yes, they probably will," said d'Artagnan.

"Gentlemen," said Athos, "a wager!"

"Oh, yes! A wager!" said the Swiss.

"Which is?" asked the cavalry officer.

"Wait a moment," said the dragoon, balancing his sabre like a spit on the andirons in the fireplace. "Wait a moment – I want a piece of this too. Innkeeper, damn it! Get me a dripping-pan tout of suite – I don't want to lose a drop of fat from this fine fowl."

"Is right!" said the Swiss. "Goose-grease is damn good with the pastries, by damn!"

"There! Got it," said the dragoon. "Now, on with the wager! We're listening, Sir Athos."

"Yes! Let's have the wager," said the cavalry officer.

"Very well, Sir Busigny. I will bet you," said Athos, "that I and my three companions, Gentlemen Porthos, Aramis, and d'Artagnan, will have breakfast in the Saint-Gervais bastion and will remain there for one hour by the clock, no matter what the enemy tries to do to dislodge us."

Porthos and Aramis looked at each other – they began to understand. "Umm, Athos," d'Artagnan whispered in Athos's ear, "you do realise you're about to get us all killed."

"We're more likely to be killed if we don't go," Athos replied.

"My faith, Gentlemen!" said Porthos, leaning back in his chair and twisting his moustache. "I hope that's a pretty enough wager for you."

"You're on!" said Sir Busigny. "Now we just need to fix the stakes."

"Well, there are four of you," Athos said, "and there are four of us. How about dinner for eight – will that suit you?"

"Perfectly," said of Busigny.

"Fine by me," said the dragoon.

"Is good," said the Swiss.

The fourth man, who had yet to speak a word, signified his assent with a brief nod of his head. "Your breakfast is ready, Gentlemen," said the host.

"Well, bring it in," said Athos.

The host obeyed. Athos called Grimaud over with a gesture, pointed to a large basket lying in a corner, and signalled that he should wrap the food in their napkins for travelling. Grimaud understood that breakfast had become a picnic. He wrapped up the food, placed it in the basket with some bottles, and put the basket on his arm. "But where're you going to eat my breakfast?" asked the innkeeper.

"What does that matter to you, so long as you're paid?" said Athos.

And he threw two pistoles majestically on the table. "Would you like your change, mon Officer?" asked the host.

"No – just add two bottles of champagne and the difference will cover the napkins."

This wasn't quite what the host had hoped to hear but he consoled himself by slipping in two bottles of cheap Anjou honey in place of the champagne. "Sir Busigny," said Athos, "would you care to synchronise your watch with mine or shall I set mine by yours?"

"As you like, sir!" said the cavalry officer, drawing out on its chain a handsome watch set with diamonds. "I've half past seven," he said.

"And I, seven thirty-five," said Athos, "So you'll note that I'm five minutes ahead of you, Sir."

Then with a final bow to their admiring audience, the four young men took the road to the Saint-Gervais bastion, followed by Grimaud, carrying the basket. He had no idea where they were going but, trained by Athos to passive obedience, it never occurred to him to ask. While they were still inside the bounds of the camp, the four friends didn't dare say a word to each other. For one thing, they'd attracted a number of curious followers who'd heard about the wager and wanted to see how it would turn out. Once they'd crossed the line of circumvallation and left their followers within the defences, d'Artagnan, who was completely ignorant of what this was all about, thought it high time to demand an explanation. "And now, my dear Athos," he said, "would you do me the favour of telling me where we're going?"

"As you can see," said Athos, "we're going to your bastion."

"And just what are we going to do there?"

"We're going to have breakfast, obviously!"

"Why couldn't we have had breakfast at the Heretic?"

"Because we have important matters to discuss, and we couldn't talk for five minutes in that inn without being hailed or accosted by someone. There, at least," Athos said, pointing at the bastion, "no one will interrupt us."

"It seems to me we could have found some deserted place in the dunes, or on the beach," said d'Artagnan with that natural prudence that balanced out his extraordinary bravery.

"Where someone would have seen the four of us conversing, so that inside a quarter of an hour the cardinal would know from his spies that we were holding a council."

"Athos is right, you know," said Aramis. "Progress in the desert."

"A desert would be just the thing," said Porthos, "but where would we find one?"

"There is no place deserted enough where a bird can't pass over your head, where a fish can't jump from the water, or where a rabbit can't hop from its burrow, and I believe that bird, fish, and rabbit would all be the cardinal's spies," Athos said. "We're better off seeing this little exploit through, especially since we can't draw back now without dishonour. We made a wager with our comrades, something our enemies couldn't have foreseen, and I defy anyone to guess our real motives for it. In order to win our bet, we have to spend one hour in the bastion. We'll either be attacked, or we won't. If we're not, we'll have the whole time to ourselves to talk, for I'll answer for it that the walls of that bastion have no ears. If we are attacked, we'll have our business meeting just the same – and in defending ourselves, we'll cover ourselves with glory. So everything works out for the best."

"Well," said d'Artagnan, "but one of us is bound to catch a bullet."

"Ah, my friend," said Athos, "you ought to know by now that the bullets we have most to fear aren't fired by the Rochelois."

"But it seems to me that for an expedition like this, we should at least have brought our muskets," said Porthos.

"Don't be a blockhead, Porthos," Athos said pleasantly. "Why weigh ourselves down with a useless burden?"

"In the face of an enemy, I don't think an army musket, a dozen cartridges, and a powder flask are so useless."

"Yes but you heard what d'Artagnan said."

"I did?" said Porthos. "What did d'Artagnan say?"

"D'Artagnan said that in last night's action eight or ten Rochelois were killed, and almost as many Frenchmen."

"All right. So?"

"They had no time to strip the bodies – the conquerors had more pressing affairs to tend to. Do you see?"

"Well..."

"Well, we'll gather up their muskets, their cartridges, and their powder flasks, and instead of four muskets with a dozen shots apiece, we'll have fifteen firearms and a hundred rounds."

"Athos, I salute you," said Aramis. "You're a great man!"

Porthos bowed his agreement. Only d'Artagnan appeared unconvinced. No doubt Grimaud shared the young man's misgivings. When he realised they weren't stopping in their march toward the bastion, he tugged on the hem of his master's coat. Where are we going?

He asked with a gesture. Athos pointed to the bastion. But, Grimaud continued in their private sign language, we're going to lose our skins!

Athos raised his eyes to the sky and pointed a finger toward heaven. Grimaud dropped his basket, sat down, and shook his head. Athos took a pistol from his belt, checked to see if it was primed, cocked it, and placed the muzzle behind Grimaud's ear. Grimaud leaped up as if spring-loaded. Athos made a sign to him to pick up the basket and take the lead. Grimaud obeyed. The only thing he'd gained from his brief pantomime was a promotion from the rear-guard to the vanguard. When they arrived at the bastion, the four friends turned around. More than 300 soldiers from various units were crowding around the gates of the camp. On a high crest off to the side they could distinguish Sir Busigny, the dragoon, the Swiss, and the fourth better. Athos took off his hat, balanced it on the end of his sword, and waved it in the air. The spectators returned his salute with a loud hurrah! After which, the four disappeared into the bastion, hard on the heels of Grimaud.

The Council of the Musketeers

As Athos had predicted, the only occupants of the bastion were a dozen dead bodies, both French and Rochelois. "Gentlemen," said Athos, who had assumed command of the expedition, "while Grimaud sets the table, let's start collecting muskets and cartridges. We can talk while we're at it; these gentlemen" – he indicated the corpses – "cannot hear us."

"But we could throw them into the moat," said Porthos, "after first making sure they have nothing in their pockets."

"We could," said Aramis, "but let's leave that job to Grimaud."

"All right, we'll have Grimaud search them, then throw the bodies over the walls," d'Artagnan said.

"Grimaud will do no such thing," said Athos. "These bodies may yet be of service to us."

"How are dead bodies going to serve us?" said Porthos. "You're crazy, my friend."

"Judge not rashly, say the Gospel and His Eminence," replied Athos. "How many muskets do we have, Gentlemen?"

"A dozen," said Aramis.

"How many rounds?"

"A hundred."

"That's all we should need. Let's load the muskets." The four musketeers set about their task. Just as they'd loaded the final weapon, Grimaud signalled that breakfast was served. Athos replied with another gesture that meant Fine, and indicated to Grimaud that he should go to a barbette and stand watch. To alleviate the tedium of sentinel duty, Athos allowed him to take a loaf, two cutlets, and a bottle of honey. "And now, to table," said Athos.

The four friends sat down on the ground, legs crossed like Turks or tailors. "Now that we no longer have to fear being overheard, Athos," d'Artagnan said, "I hope you're going to share this big secret with me."

"What I hope to share with you, gentlemen, is pleasure and glory at one and the same time," said Athos. "I've invited you on a charming walk; we've before us a sumptuous breakfast; and as you can see through the murder-holes, there are five hundred people back there who take us for either madmen or heroes, two classes of imbecile so similar that it's hard to distinguish between them."

"But the secret!" demanded d'Artagnan.

"The secret," said Athos, "is that last night I saw Milady."

D'Artagnan had been lifting a glass to his lips but at the name "Milady," his hand shook so that he had to put down the glass or risk spilling the contents.

"You saw your wi..."

"Hush!" interrupted Athos, with quiet intensity. "You forget, dear friend, that these gentlemen are not as intimate with my family affairs as you. Yes," he continued, in a normal voice, "I've seen Milady."

"Where?" d'Artagnan demanded.

"Within two leagues of here in the hostel at Colombier-Rouge."

"In that case, I'm done for," said d'Artagnan.

"Not just yet," replied Athos, "for by this time, she'll have left the shores of France."

D'Artagnan breathed freely again. "But, see here," said Porthos, "who exactly is this Milady?"

"A woman very charming," said Athos, sipping his honey. "That peasant scum of an innkeeper!" he suddenly cried. "He's given us Anjou honey instead of champagne and thinks we can't tell the difference!"

"Milady," he continued. "A charming woman. She was quite generous of herself with our friend d'Artagnan, who nonetheless somehow managed to offend her, and now she's out to exact her revenge. A month ago, she tried with a couple of musket balls; last week, she tried to poison him; and yesterday, she demanded his head from the cardinal."

"What? She demanded my head from the cardinal?" cried d'Artagnan, pale with terror.

"Death truth," said Porthos. "I heard it with my own ears."

"I as well," said Aramis.

"Then," said d'Artagnan, going limp with despair, "it's pointless to struggle any longer. I may as well end it now and blow my own brains out."

"Let's save that folly till the end," said Athos, "Since it's the only one there's no cure for."

"But with enemies like these, I can't possibly escape," said d'Artagnan. "First, there's the stranger of Meung; then there's of Wardes, whom I gave those three wounds to; next there's Milady, whose fatal secret I've discovered; and finally there's the cardinal, whose vengeance I've thwarted."

"Well, that's only four – and we're four, so it's even," said Athos. "For the love of God! If we can believe Grimaud's signals, we're about to have to deal with an even larger number. What is it, Grimaud? Considering the gravity of the situation, my friend, I permit you to speak – but keep it brief, if you please. What do you see?"

"A troop."

"Of how many men?"

"Twenty."

"Their nature?"

"Sixteen pioneers, four soldiers."

"Range?"

"Five hundred paces."

"Fine! We still have time to finish this fowl and drink a glass of honey to your health, d'Artagnan!"

"À ta santé!" repeated Porthos and Aramis.

"Well, to my health, then! Though I'm afraid your good wishes won't be much protection."

"Bah!" said Athos. "God's Great as the (Sunni) Muslims say and the future is in his hands."

Then emptying his glass that he set down carefully near him, Athos rose nonchalantly, took up the nearest musket, and approached one of the loopholes in the wall. Porthos, Aramis, and d'Artagnan did the same. As for Grimaud, he was ordered to back up the four friends by reloading their weapons. Almost immediately, they saw the approaching troop. They were following a narrow trench that communicated between the bastion and the city. "God!" said Athos. "It's hardly worth our time to deal with twenty buffoons armed with picks, hoes, and shovels! If Grimaud had just waved them off, I'm sure they would have left us alone."

"I doubt it," d'Artagnan remarked. "They look pretty determined to me. Besides, an officer and four soldiers are along with the pioneers, all armed with muskets."

"They just haven't seen us yet," replied Athos.

"My faith!" said Aramis. "I must confess a certain reluctance to fire on these poor devils of bourgeois."

"It's a poor priest who pities heretics!" said Porthos.

"No, I think Aramis is right," said Athos. "I'm going to warn them."

"What the devil are you doing?" cried d'Artagnan. "You're going to get shot!"

But Athos ignored his advice and climbed into the breach, his musket in one hand and his hat in the other. “Gentlemen!” he called out to the soldiers and pioneers. They stopped about fifty paces off, astonished by this apparition, who bowed to them courteously. “Gentlemen! My friends and I are taking breakfast in this bastion. Now, nothing is more disagreeable than being disturbed during breakfast, so we must request, if you absolutely must come up here, to please come back later – or at least wait till we’ve finished our meal. Unless, that is, you’d rather renounce the party of rebellion and come drink with us to the health of the King of France.”

“Watch it, Athos!” cried d’Artagnan. “Can’t you see they’re going to fire?”

“Yes, of course,” said Athos, “but these bourgeois are terrible shots, and they’re bound to miss me.” Just then, four musket shots rang out, and though the balls ricocheted around Athos, none of them hit their target. Almost simultaneously, four shots echoed in reply but much better aimed than those of the attackers. Three soldiers fell dead, and one of the pioneers was wounded. “Grimaud, another musket!” said Athos, still in the breach.

Grimaud instantly obeyed. The other three reloaded their weapons, and another volley followed. The officer and two pioneers fell dead, and the rest of the troop fled. “Now, Gentlemen, a sortie,” said Athos. The four friends dashed out of the fort onto the field of battle and gathered up the four soldiers’ muskets and the officer’s half-pike. Then, convinced that the fugitives wouldn’t stop before they reached the city, they climbed back into the bastion, carrying their victory trophies. “Reload the muskets, Grimaud,” said Athos, “and we, Gentlemen, shall resume our breakfast and continue our conversation. Now, where were we?”

“You were telling us about Milady,” said d’Artagnan who was more than a little interested in her itinerary.

“She’s on her way to England,” Athos said.

“Yes but to what end?”

“To assassinate, or arrange the assassination of, the Duke of Buckingham.”

“But that’s infamous!” d’Artagnan exclaimed.

“As to that, I must confess little interest and less concern.” Athos shrugged. “If you’re finished, Grimaud, take that officer’s half-pike, tie a napkin to it, and plant it at the peak of our bastion, to show these rebels of Rochelois that they have to deal with brave and loyal soldiers of the king.”

Silently, Grimaud obeyed. A moment later a white flag, battle standard of the Bourbons, unfurled above the heads of the four friends, to a thunder of applause from the royal lines. Half the camp was lining the barricades. “Wait!” d’Artagnan said. “How can you care so little if Buckingham is killed? The duke is our friend.”

“The duke is English and is fighting against us. Let Milady do as she likes with the duke; he means no more to me than this empty bottle.”

Athos drained a bottle into his glass, then threw the dead soldier toward the bodies of the enemy. “But hold on – I can’t just abandon Buckingham like that. He gave us four magnificent horses.”

“Not to mention some very handsome saddles,” added Porthos who was wearing a cloak edged with the braid from his.

“Besides,” observed Aramis, “God desires the conversion of the sinner, not his death.”

“Amen,” said Athos, “and we can return to the subject later, if it pleases you. But at the time, what seemed most important to me – as I’m sure you can understand, d’Artagnan – was acquiring from that woman the carte blanche she’d extorted from the cardinal. She could use it to rid herself of you, and maybe of us, with complete impunity.”

“What is this woman, some sort of demon?” asked Porthos, holding out his plate to Aramis, who was slicing up a fowl.

“This carte blanche,” said d’Artagnan, “is it ... still in her hands?”

“No, it has passed into mine. I won’t say without trouble, for that would be a lie.”

“My dear Athos, I give up counting how many times I owe you my life,” d’Artagnan said.

“Then the reason you left us was to go back to her?” asked Aramis.

“Just so.”

“Then you have this letter from the cardinal?” d’Artagnan said.

“Right here,” said Athos. And he drew the precious paper from a pocket inside his tabard. D’Artagnan unfolded it without even trying to hide the tremor in his hands, and read:

It is by my order, and for the good of the State that the bearer has done what has been done.

5 August 1628 RICHELIEU

“In effect, it absolves the bearer from all penalty,” said Aramis.

“It must be torn up!” cried d’Artagnan who saw in it his death warrant.

“On the contrary,” said Athos, “it must be carefully preserved. I wouldn’t trade this paper for as much gold as it would take to cover it.”

“What do you think she’s going to do now?” asked the young man.

“She’s probably going to write to the cardinal, saying that a damned musketeer named Athos has ravished her of her safe-conduct,” Athos said carelessly. “In the same letter, she’ll probably advise him to rid himself of the said Athos, as well as his two friends, Porthos and Aramis. The cardinal will remember that these men have crossed his path before. Some fine morning he’ll arrest this d’Artagnan fellow, and so he won’t be lonely, he’ll send the rest of us to keep him company in the Bastille.”

“Humph,” said Porthos. “That’s a poor excuse for a joke, my friend.”

“I’m not joking,” replied Athos.

“You know,” Porthos said, “twisting this damned Milady’s neck for her would be less of a sin than twisting the necks of these poor Huguenot devils, who’ve committed no crime worse than singing the Psalms in French instead of Latin.”

“What says the abbot?” asked Athos placidly.

“I say that in this case, I agree with Porthos,” replied Aramis.

“As do I!” said d’Artagnan.

“Fortunately, she’s a long way from here,” Porthos said, “for I must admit that if she were nearby, it’d make me ... uneasy.”

“She makes me as uneasy in England as she does in France,” Athos said.

“She makes me uneasy wherever she is,” d’Artagnan said.

“So when you had her, Athos, why didn’t you drown, strangle, or hang her?” said Porthos. “It’s only the dead who never return.”

“Is that what you think, Porthos?” the musketeer replied, with a sombre smile that only d’Artagnan understood.

“I,” said d’Artagnan, “have an idea.”

“Let’s hear it!” said the musketeers.

“To arms!” cried Grimaud.

The young men sprang up, grabbing their muskets. This time a larger troop was advancing on them, consisting of twenty or twenty-five men – and these were no pioneers, they were soldiers of the garrison. “Shouldn’t we maybe return to camp?” said Porthos. “It doesn’t seem to me the sides are quite equal.”

“Impossible, for three reasons,” Athos replied. “First of all, we haven’t finished our breakfast. Second, we still have some important things to discuss; and third, there are still ten minutes left in our hour.”

“Then we’re going to need a plan of battle,” Aramis said.

“That couldn’t be simpler,” Athos replied. “As soon as the enemy are in musket-range, we fire on them. If they continue to advance, we keep firing, as long as we have loaded guns. If the remnants of the troop insist on mounting an assault, we’ll let the besiegers get down into the moat, and then we’ll push down onto their heads that leaning length of stone wall – there, where it still seems to be standing only due to a miracle.”

“Bravo!” cried Porthos. “Athos, you were born to be a general, and the cardinal who thinks he’s such a man of war, is nothing next to you.”

“Attention, Gentlemen, if you please,” said Athos. “Pick your man.”

“I have mine,” said d’Artagnan.

“As do I,” said Aramis.

“Me too,” said Porthos.

“Then, fire!” said Athos. The four muskets rang out as one and four men fell. Immediately the drum began to beat and the troop advanced at the charge. The gunshots continued, fired irregularly now but always with the same accuracy. However, the Rochelois continued to advance at a run, as if they knew how few their enemies were. At least two men fell for every three shots but the remaining soldiers refused to relent. When they arrived at the base of the bastion, their enemies still numbered at least a dozen. They were greeted by a final volley but it didn’t stop them; they jumped into the dry moat and began to climb the fallen stones toward the breach. “Now, my friends, the death-blow!” cried Athos. “To the wall! To the wall!” And the four friends, aided by Grimaud, pried with their musket-barrels at the base of the immense piece of wall. It leaned over as if bending before the wind, then fell with a horrible crash into the moat. They heard cries of surprise and pain, a cloud of dust rose into the sky, and then it was all over. “Do you suppose we crushed every single one of them?” asked Athos.

“My faith! It looks like it,” said d’Artagnan.

“No,” said Porthos. “See there – two or three of them survived, though not intact.”

In fact, three or four of the unfortunate troop, covered with dirt and blood, were fleeing for the trench that led back to the city. That was all that remained of their attackers. Athos looked at his watch.

“Gentlemen,” he said, “we’ve been here an hour and our wager’s now won but we mustn’t grab at our winnings. Besides, d’Artagnan hasn’t told us his idea.”

And the musketeer, with his habitual sangfroid, sat down beside the remains of the breakfast. “My idea?” said d’Artagnan.

“Yes, you said you had an idea,” Athos replied.

“Ah, yes, right!” said d’Artagnan. “I’ll go to England a second time, find Sir Buckingham, and warn him about this plot against his life.”

“D’Artagnan,” said Athos coolly, “you will not do that.”

“And why not? I did it once before.”

“Yes but at that time we were not yet at war; Sir Buckingham was still an ally, not an enemy. To take that trip now would be tantamount to treason.”

D’Artagnan saw the logic of this, and was silent. “But wait!” said Porthos. “I think I may have an idea!”

“Silence, all, for the idea of Sir Porthos!” said Aramis.

“I’ll ask Sir Tréville for a leave, on some pretext you’ll have to figure out – I’m not so good at pretexts. Anyway, Milady doesn’t know me, so I can approach her unsuspected. Then, when I catch my little beauty alone, I’ll strangle her.”

“You know,” said Athos, “there’s something to be said for Porthos’s idea.”

“What, kill a woman? Have you no shame?” said Aramis. “No, listen: I have a much better idea.”

“If you have an idea, Aramis, let’s have it,” said Athos who had a great respect for the young musketeer.

“We must warn the queen.”

“Ah! My faith, yes,” said Porthos.

“Now we’re getting somewhere,” said d’Artagnan.

“Warn the queen?” said Athos. “And just how are we going to do that? Do we have any entrée at Court? And if one of us goes to Paris, won’t it be known throughout the camp? From here to Paris is a hundred and forty leagues – we couldn’t get past Angers without being thrown into prison.”

“As to getting a letter safely to Her Majesty, I will see to that,” said Aramis, reddening. “I know a clever person at Tours...”

Aramis stopped, seeing Athos smile. “Well, do you approve of this plan, Athos?” said d’Artagnan.

“I don’t reject it out of hand,” Athos said, “but I will observe to Aramis that we can’t desert the siege, and nobody but one of us would be a reliable messenger. If one of us leaves, within two hours all the cardinal’s agents, spies, and Capuchin monks would know the letter by heart, and you and your clever person would be arrested.”

“Not to mention that the queen would save Sir Buckingham and leave the rest of us to fry,” objected Porthos.

"What Porthos says makes sense to me, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan.

"One moment – what are they up to, there in the city?" said Athos.

"They're beating the general call to arms!"

The four friends listened: the sound of drums rolled out. "They're sending out a whole regiment, just for us," said Athos.

"You're not thinking of taking on a whole regiment," said Porthos. "Are you?"

"Why not?" said the musketeer. "I'm just in the mood for it. I'd take on a whole army, if we'd taken the precaution of bringing another dozen bottles of honey."

"The drums are definitely approaching," said d'Artagnan.

"Let them come," said Athos. "It's a quarter-hour's march from here to the city, so it's the same from the city to here that is more than enough time to complete our plan. If we leave here now, we'll never find another place as suitable. And you know, Gentlemen, I think the right idea has just come to me."

"Let's hear it!"

"Just permit me to give Grimaud a few indispensable orders." Athos called over his valet with a gesture. "Grimaud," he said, pointing to the bodies lying inside the bastion, "take these deceased gentlemen here and lean them up against the wall, with their hats on their heads and their guns in their hands."

"O Great Man!" cried d'Artagnan. "I get it!"

"You get what?" said Porthos.

"Do you get it, Grimaud?" asked Aramis.

Grimaud gestured his affirmative. "Then that's all we need," said Athos. "Now, as to my idea."

"But I, too, would like to get it," said Porthos.

"That's not at all necessary."

"Yes, Athos – give us your idea!" said d'Artagnan and Aramis.

"This woman, this creature, this demon of a Milady – didn't you say she has a brother-in-law, d'Artagnan?"

"Yes, I know him rather well. But I don't think he has a lot of affection for his sister-in-law."

"Nothing wrong with that," replied Athos. "In fact, if he detested her, it would be all the better."

"In that case, we should be fine."

"However," said Porthos, "I really would like to get what Grimaud is up to."

"Oh, hush, Porthos," said Aramis.

"What's the name of this brother-in-law?"

"Lord Winter."

"Where is he now?"

"He returned to London at the first rumour of war."

"Well, he's just the man for us," said Athos. "He's the one we must warn. We'll let him know that his sister-in-law is out to have someone assassinated and beg him not to lose sight of her. There is in London, one hopes, some establishment on the order of the Madelonnettes or the Daughters of Repentance. He must commit his sister-in-law to one of these, and then we can rest easy."

"Right," said d'Artagnan, "until she escapes."

"My faith, d'Artagnan!" said Athos. "You ask too much! I've given you all I have, and I must warn you that's the bottom of the barrel."

"Personally, I think it would be best to warn both the queen and Lord Winter," said Aramis.

"Yes but who's going to carry the letter to Tours, not to mention the letter to London?"

"I'll answer for Bazin," said Aramis.

"And I, for Planchet," said d'Artagnan.

"That's right! We can't desert the camp but our lackeys can certainly go," said Porthos.

"True. They can even go today, if we get the letters written," said Aramis. "We'll give them some money and send them off."

"We'll give them some money?" said Athos. "Do you have any money?"

The four friends looked at each other, a cloud darkening expressions that had just been so bright. "Look!" cried d'Artagnan. "See those black and red specks moving out there? That's no regiment, Athos – it's a whole army!"

"My faith," said Athos, "there they are. What cunning dogs, advancing without tambours or trumpets. Grimaud! Are you finished yet?"

Grimaud signed Yes, and pointed to the dozen bodies he'd set up, quite artistically: some held their weapons ready, while others appeared to be taking aim, or waiting, sword in hand. "Bravo!" said Athos. "I honour your imagination."

"Fine," said Porthos, "but I still don't get it."

"Get out first, get it later," said d'Artagnan.

"In a moment, Gentlemen! Give Grimaud a chance to bus the table."

"I must point out that those black and red specks are enlarging rapidly," Aramis said. "I'm of d'Artagnan's opinion: we have no time to lose if we're going to regain the camp."

"Then I withdraw my opposition to a tactical retreat," Athos said. "My faith, we wagered on an hour and have been here an hour and a half. No one can say anything against that! Let's be on our way, gentlemen." Grimaud, with the basket, took the lead, the four friends following about ten paces behind. "The devil!" cried Athos, turning around.

"Did you forget something?" asked Aramis.

"Our banner! Morbleu! We can't leave a flag in the hands of the enemy, even if that flag is only a napkin."

And Athos dashed back to the bastion, mounted the wall, and recovered the flag. The Rochelois, meanwhile, were now within musket-range, and they opened a withering fire on this man who appeared to be exposing himself just for the sport of it. But Athos seemed to have a charmed life. The balls whistled all around him but he remained untouched. He waved his standard, turned his back on the Rochelois, and saluted the camp. Shouts arose from both sides: cries of anger from one, cheers from the other. A second volley followed the first, and three balls, passing through the napkin, made it into a real battle flag. The whole camp clamoured, "Come down! Come down!"

Athos came down. His comrades, awaiting him anxiously, were overjoyed at his return. "Come on, Athos, come on!" said d'Artagnan. "Let's pick up the pace! Now that we've figured out everything except where to find some money, it would be stupid to get killed."

But Athos continued to march majestically, no matter what his companions said. Seeing that their protests were pointless, the others adopted Athos's measured pace. Grimaud and his basket were already far ahead, out of the danger zone. Suddenly a furious fusillade burst out behind them. "What's that?" demanded Porthos. "And just who are they firing at? I don't see anyone, and I heard no shots."

"They're shooting at the dead," replied Athos.

"But the dead can't shoot back."

"Quite so. But the Rochelois will think it's an ambush. They'll take it slowly, scout out the situation, and by the time they discover our little pleasantry we'll be well out of range. That's why there's no point in risking heart failure by hurrying."

"Oh! I get it!" said Porthos, amazed.

"Well done," said Athos with a shrug of his shoulders. On their side, the French, seeing the four friends return at a deliberate march, cheered their throats out. Eventually there was another fusillade from behind, and this time the balls whistled past their ears and scattered off nearby stones. The Rochelois had finally retaken the bastion. "What oafs those fellows are," said Athos. "How many did we shoot? A dozen?"

"Maybe fifteen."

"And how many did we crush under the wall?"

"Eight or ten."

"And in exchange for all that we didn't even get a scratch? But wait – what have you done to your hand, d'Artagnan? You're bleeding, it seems to me."

"It's nothing," said d'Artagnan.

"A spent bullet?"

"Not even that."

"Then what is it?"

As has been said before, Athos loved d'Artagnan like his own son, and his sombre and severe personality now gave way to the solicitude of a father. "It's just a little cut," d'Artagnan replied. "My fingers got caught between two stones and ring gouged my hand."

"That will teach you to wear diamonds into battle," Athos said disdainfully.

"But wait!" cried Porthos. "If we have a diamond, why the devil are we plaguing ourselves about how to find some money?"

"Say, now..." said Aramis.

"A good point, Porthos," said Athos. "This time you really do have an idea."

"Of course I do," said Porthos, puffed up with pleasure at receiving a compliment from Athos. "If we have a diamond, let's sell it."

"But," said d'Artagnan, "this diamond comes from the queen."

"All the more reason," replied Athos. "The queen rescuing her lover Sir Buckingham is only proper; the queen saving us, her loyal friends, is only moral. What do you say, Sir Abbot? I don't ask Porthos; he's given us his opinion already."

"Well, I think that as the ring wasn't a gift from a mistress," said Aramis, with a blush, "and therefore isn't a gage d'amour, d'Artagnan can sell it."

"My dear Aramis, you speak like theology incarnate. So your opinion is...?"

"Sell the diamond."

"All right, then," d'Artagnan said cheerfully, "we'll sell the diamond and say no more about it."

The rebel fusillade continued but the friends were now out of range, and the Rochelois were only firing from a sense of duty. "My faith, Porthos," Athos said, "It was high time for you to have your idea, for here we are at camp. Remember, Gentlemen, not a word about this business. Look, they've seen us, and are coming to meet us. It appears we shall be borne in in triumph."

In fact, the entire camp was abuzz with excitement. An audience of over two thousand had watched, as at a spectacle, this act of bravado on the part of the four friends, without anyone suspecting the real motivation for it. From every side came cries of "Long live the Guards! Long live the Musketeers!"

Sir Busigny was the first to shake Athos's hand and admit the wager was lost. The dragoon and the Swiss followed him, and all their comrades came behind. There were congratulations, backslapping, and embraces all around, with endless gibes at the expense of the Rochelois. Eventually, the commotion grew so great that his Eminence thought there must be some sort of riot, and sent La Houdinière, a captain of his guards, to see what was going on. The captain was told the tale in all its glory. "Well?" demanded the cardinal when La Houdinière returned. "Well, My Lord," the latter said, "it seems three musketeers and a guard laid a bet with Sir Busigny that they would breakfast in the Saint-Gervais bastion. They had their breakfast, held out for two hours against the enemy, and killed I don't know how many Rochelois."

"Did you learn the names of these three musketeers?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"What are they called?"

“Gentlemen Athos, Porthos, and Aramis.”
“Always those three champions!” murmured the cardinal. “And the guard?”
“A Sir d’Artagnan.”

“That young rogue again! Decidedly, I must make these four men mine.”
That evening, the cardinal spoke to Sir Tréville about the morning’s exploit that was the talk of the whole camp. Tréville, who’d had the story of the adventure from the mouths of the heroes themselves, related it in all its detail to His Eminence, not forgetting the episode of the napkin. “Excellent, sir Tréville,” said the cardinal. “Send me that napkin if you please. I’ll have it embroidered with three gold fleurs-des-lys and present it to your company as a battle flag.”
“My Lord, that would be an injustice to the guards,” said Sir Tréville. “Sir d’Artagnan isn’t one of mine, he belongs to Sir des Essarts.”
“Well, then, take him,” said the cardinal. “It’s only fair that four brave soldiers who are so attached to one another should serve in the same company.”
Later that same evening, Sir Tréville announced the good news to d’Artagnan and the three musketeers, inviting all four to breakfast with him in the morning. D’Artagnan was dazed with joy. Becoming a musketeer was his dearest dream. His three friends were just as gleeful. “My faith, Athos,” d’Artagnan said, “what a magnificent idea you had! As you predicted, we’re covered in glory, plus we were able to have a conversation of critical importance.”
“Which we can now resume without being under a cloud of suspicion, for from now on, with God’s help, we’ll be taken for Cardinalists,” Athos said. D’Artagnan immediately went to pay his compliments to Sir Des Essarts and inform him of his promotion. Des Essarts, who valued d’Artagnan, made him offers of promotion in his own company, a promotion that wouldn’t require the expense of outfitting to join the musketeers. D’Artagnan declined but seeing an opportunity, asked the captain if he could get him a good price for his diamond, as he wanted to turn it into cash. The next afternoon, Sir Des Essarts’s valet came to d’Artagnan’s quarters, carrying a bag containing seven thousand livres. This was the price of the queen’s diamond.

A Family Affair

“A family affair”: Athos had come up with the phrase. A family affair was not subject to investigation by the cardinal. A family affair concerned no one outside the family. One could uphold the privacy of a family affair against a world of intruders. Thus, Athos, had come up with the why: the matter was to be called a family affair. Aramis had come up with the who: they would employ the lackeys. And Porthos had come up with the how: they would sell the diamond. Only d’Artagnan had come up with nothing, though he was ordinarily the most inventive of the four. But in this case, just the name “Milady” was enough to paralyse him. But no, that’s not quite right: d’Artagnan had found a buyer for the diamond. The breakfast next morning at Sir Tréville’s was as merry as a carnival. D’Artagnan showed up already dressed in his new uniform – for he and Aramis were similar in size, and since Aramis had been paid so well by the publisher who’d purchased his poem he’d bought two of everything that enabled him to completely outfit his friend. D’Artagnan would have felt like he’d reached the apex of his ambitions if it weren’t for Milady, the dark cloud on all his horizons. After breakfast, they agreed to reunite that evening at Athos’s quarters, where they would finish the business begun in the bastion. D’Artagnan passed the day displaying his musketeer’s tabard in every corner of the camp. The four friends reconvened at the appointed hour in the evening. There were only three things left to decide: what to write to Milady’s brother-in-law; what to write to the clever person in Tours; and which lackeys should carry the letters. Each offered his own lackey. Athos praised the discretion of Grimaud, who never spoke unless his master unsealed his mouth; Porthos boasted that Mousqueton was strong enough to thrash four ordinary men; Aramis, in a pompous eulogy, extolled the shrewdness and suavity of Bazin; and d’Artagnan expressed his complete faith in the courage of Planchet, reminding them of the way he’d handled himself in that sticky affair at Calais. They disputed the virtues of discretion, strength, shrewdness, and courage for a far longer time than bears repeating here. “Unfortunately,” Athos said, “whoever we send should have all four of these qualities combined.”
“But where could we find such a paragon among lackeys?”
“Nowhere, as we know too well,” said Athos. “So take Grimaud.”
“Take Bazin.”
“Take Mousqueton!”
“Take Planchet; Planchet is both brave and shrewd, so he has at least two qualities of the four.”
“Gentlemen,” said Aramis, “the principal here is not to determine which of our four lackeys is most discreet, strong, shrewd, or brave; it’s to identify which one loves money the most.”
“What Aramis says makes sense,” said Athos. “We must consider men’s faults before their virtues. Sir Abbot, you are a moralist par excellence.”
“I say this,” Aramis continued, “because for this mission to succeed, we must not only be well served but that service must not fail. For if the mission is lost, heads will be lost – and not the lackeys’...”
“Not so loud, Aramis,” said Athos.
“Quite,” Aramis said. “I repeat: it’s not the lackeys who will lose their heads but their masters! Are our servants so devoted that they’ll risk their lives for us?” He shook his head. “No.”
“My faith – I’d just about answer for Planchet on that score,” said d’Artagnan.
“Then, my dear friend, bolster this natural devotion with a cash bonus large enough to set him up comfortably, and instead of answering for him once,” said Aramis, “answer for him twice.”
“What? Good God, you’ll only be deluded twice,” said Athos, who was an optimist about matters of chance but a pessimist about mankind. “A servant will promise you the world for a handful of money but once he’s on the road he’ll be paralysed by fear. If taken, he’ll be tortured, and if tortured, he’ll talk. What the devil! You’re speaking like children! To get to England” – Athos lowered his voice – “you must cross half of France, past all the cardinal’s agents and spies. Then you need an embarkation pass; and then you must speak English to find your way to London. The thing is damnably difficult.”
“But not at all!” said d’Artagnan, who badly wanted the mission accomplished. “On the contrary, I think it’s quite simple. Now, it goes without saying that if we write to Lord Winter describing the threatening schemes of the fiendish cardinal...”
“Not so loud!” said Athos.
“...And reveal official state secrets,” d’Artagnan continued, “then of course we’d all be broken on the wheel. But for God’s sake, don’t forget, Athos that as you yourself said, we’re writing solely about a family affair. We just need to request that as soon as Milady reaches London, she should be locked away someplace where she can’t hurt us. I’ll write him a letter in almost exactly those terms.”
“Let’s hear it, then,” said Aramis, with a sceptical expression. “All right. Ahem: ‘Sir and dear friend ...’”
“Oh, that’s good: ‘dear friend,’ to an Englishman,” interrupted Athos. “A fine start, d’Artagnan – bravo! Except that with phrases like that, you won’t be broken on the wheel, you’ll be drawn and quartered.”
“All right, then, I’ll just say, ‘Sir’ and keep it short.”
“Better would be ‘Milord,’” replied Athos, a stickler for propriety.
“Milord: Do you recall that little goat pen of the Luxembourg?”
“Oh, excellent – now the Luxembourg is a goat pen! Quite ingenious. Except it could be taken for an insult to the queen mother,” said Athos.
“Then we’ll just say, ‘Milord: Do you recall a certain little enclosure where your life was spared?’”
“My dear d’Artagnan,” said Athos, “you are an appalling correspondent. ‘Where your life was spared’ – shame on you! To remind a gallant man of that kind of obligation simply isn’t done. To refer to such a favour is an insult.”
“For God’s sake! This is intolerable,” said d’Artagnan. “If one has to be subjected to this sort of criticism to be a writer, I give up.”
“As well you should, my dear,” said Athos. “Stick to your musket and sword and you’ll do admirably. But pass the plume to sir Abbot – that’s his province.”
“That’s right! Pass the plume to Aramis,” said Porthos. “He writes theses in Latin, he does.”
“Well, so be it!” said d’Artagnan. “You draw up this document, Aramis. But, by our Holy Father the Pope, choose your words carefully, because this time I’m editing you.”
“I couldn’t ask for better,” said Aramis, with the sublime self-confidence of the poet. “Let’s just make sure I’ve got the gist: I’ve been told that this sister-in-law is an iniquitous woman, and heard the proof of it myself when we eavesdropped on her conversation with the cardinal.”
“Not so loud, damn it!” said Athos.
“But I must admit,” continued Aramis, “that the details escape me.”
“Me too,” said Porthos.
D’Artagnan and Athos looked at each other in silence for some time. Finally Athos, seeing no option, blanched and nodded to d’Artagnan, who took this to mean that he was free to speak. “Well, here is the essence of what you must say,” said d’Artagnan. “Milord: your sister-in-law is a liar, an impostor, and worse. She wanted to have you killed so she could inherit your estate. However, she was never legally married to your brother because she was already married in France and having been...”
D’Artagnan stopped, as if at a loss for the right word, and looked at Athos. “Repudiated by her husband,” Athos said.
D’Artagnan nodded. “Repudiated, because he discovered she’d been branded...”
“Bah!” Porthos grunted. “This is ridiculous! You say she wanted to have her own brother-in-law killed?”
“Yes.”
“She was previously married?” asked Aramis.
“Yes.”
“And her husband discovered she had the fleur-de-lys branded on her shoulder?” said Porthos.
“Yes.”
All three yeses had been spoken by Athos, his voice growing progressively darker.
“And who has actually seen this fleur-de-lys?” asked Aramis.
“D’Artagnan and I – or rather, to be strictly chronological, I and d’Artagnan,” said Athos.
“And this appalling creature’s husband is still alive?” said Aramis.
“He’s still alive.”
“You’re sure of this?”
“I am sure – because I am he.”
There was an instant of frozen quiet as the friends dealt with this statement, each according to his nature. Athos was the first to break the silence. “This time,” he said, “d’Artagnan has given us an excellent outline, and it should be written out at once.”
“Devil! You’re right, Athos,” said Aramis, “but composing it will be touchy. Sir the Chancellor himself would have trouble drawing up such an epistle, though he writes a procès-verbal with ease. But no matter! Silence, if you please, and I’ll give it a try.” Aramis took up the pen, reflected for a minute, then wrote eight or ten lines in a tiny, almost feminine handwriting. Then, in a voice soft and slow, as if each word had been painstakingly considered, he read:
Milord,
The person inscribing these lines had the honour to cross swords with you in a little yard off the Rue d’Enfer. As you have obliged him several times since then by professing to be his friend, this person considers it his duty to repay that friendship with a warning. Twice you have nearly fallen victim to a close relative, a woman you believe to be your heir, because you are ignorant of the fact that before she contracted a marriage in England, she was already married in France. At the third attempt on your life that is imminent, you may succumb. Be warned that your relative departed La Rochelle for England during the night. Watch for her arrival, for she has great and terrible schemes. If you absolutely must know of what she is capable, her past can be read on the flesh of her left shoulder.
“Well, that’s really quite good,” said Athos. “My dear Aramis, you have a plume as sharp as a secretary of state. Lord Winter will now be on his guard – assuming this letter reaches him. Even if it falls into His Eminence’s hands, we won’t be compromised. But to make sure the lackey who carries it goes all the way to London instead of just stopping in Châtellerault, let’s give him no more than half his pay with the letter, the second half to be paid in exchange for a response. D’Artagnan, do you have the diamond?”
“What I have is even better: the diamond’s value in cash.”
And d’Artagnan dropped a leather sack on the table. At the heavy sound of gold, Aramis raised his eyebrows and Porthos started. Only Athos remained impassive. “How much’s in this little sack?” he asked.
“Seven thousand livres in gold.”

"Seven thousand livres!" cried Porthos. "That pathetic little diamond was worth seven thousand livres?"

"So it appears," said Athos, "since here they are. I don't imagine d'Artagnan has come up with this sum on his own."

"Gentlemen, in our concern for ourselves, we've forgotten about the queen," said d'Artagnan. "We should pay some attention to the health of her beloved Buckingham. That's the least of what we owe her."

"That's only just," said Athos, "and once again we must turn to Aramis."

"Very well," said Aramis, blushing at the compliment. "What shall we say?"

"Nothing could be simpler," replied Athos. "Compose a second letter to that clever person at Tours." Aramis picked up the plume, thought some more, then wrote the following lines that he immediately submitted to his friends for approval:

My Dearest Cousin –

"Oh, so this clever person is your relative!" said Athos.

"First cousin," said Aramis.

"All right, cousin it is!" Aramis continued:

My Dearest Cousin,

His Eminence the Cardinal, whom God preserve for the good fortune of France and the confusion of the enemies of the realm, is on the verge of defeating these heretical rebels of La Rochelle. The English relief fleet will probably never even get within sight of the place. I'll go so far as to say that I'm certain that Sir Buckingham will be prevented from departing England by some great event. His Eminence is the most illustrious minister of times past, times present, and in all probability for all time to come. He would put out the sun, if the sun inconvenienced him. Pass on this good news to your sister, my dear cousin. I had a dream that this wicked Englishman was dead. I can't remember whether he fell to steel or to poison but I am sure of this: I dreamed he was dead, and you know my dreams are never wrong. Rest assured, therefore, that you will soon see me return.

"Perfection!" said Athos. "You are the king of poets, my dear Aramis: you write with the power of the Apocalypse and the truth of the Gospel. Nothing remains but to give this letter an address."

"Easily done," said Aramis. He folded the letter artistically, then picked up the plume and wrote:

To Miss Marie Michon
Linen maid
Tours

The three friends looked at each other and laughed. Once again, Aramis had outwitted their curiosity. "Now, Gentlemen," Aramis said, "you realise that no one but Bazin can take this letter to Tours; my cousin knows only Bazin and will trust only him, so no one else can handle this. Besides, Bazin is ambitious and intelligent – he has read history, Gentlemen, and knows that Sextus Quintus became pope after having begun as a cowherd. Well, since he plans to enter the Church when I do, he dares to hope that one day he, too, might become pope – or at least a cardinal. You understand that a man of such ambitions will never allow himself to be taken, and if he is, will suffer martyrdom rather than talk."

"All right, I accept Bazin, with all my heart," said d'Artagnan, "but then grant me Planchet. One day Milady had him thrashed and thrown out the door – and he has an excellent memory. I swear that, so long as there's still a chance for revenge, he'd rather risk death than give it up. If the business in Tours is your business, Aramis, then the business in London is mine. Let's settle on choosing Planchet, especially since he's already been to London with me and learned how to say 'London, sir, if you please,' and 'my master, Lord d'Artagnan,' in proper English. So you can rest easy about him finding his way and returning."

"In that case," said Athos, "Planchet should have seven hundred livres for going, and another seven hundred for returning, and Bazin three hundred for going, and three hundred more on his return. That reduces our holdings to five thousand livres; we can each have a thousand livres to employ as we see fit, and we'll leave the final thousand in the care of sir Abbot, for general needs or extraordinary expenses. How's that?"

"My dear Athos," said Aramis, "You speak like Nestor, who was, as everyone knows, the wisest of the Greeks."

"Then it's agreed," said Athos. "Planchet and Bazin will be the ones to go. All things considered, I'm not sorry to have Grimaud stay; he's used to my ways, and I to his. He's already shaken up by that business yesterday at the bastion; a voyage would be the end of him."

Planchet was sent for and given his instructions. He was informed of the honour by d'Artagnan, who introduced it to him gradually, touching first on the glory of it, then on the money, and finally the danger. "I'll carry the letter in the lining of my coat," said Planchet, "and if I'm taken, I'll swallow it."

"But then you won't be able to complete the mission," d'Artagnan said.

"Give me a copy of it this evening and I'll know it by heart by tomorrow."

D'Artagnan gave his friends a triumphant look as if to say: Well, didn't I promise you? "All right," he continued, addressing Planchet, "you've eight days to reach Lord Winter and eight more for the return, sixteen days in all. If you're not here by eight o'clock on the morning of the sixteenth day, no bonus money, even if you're only five minutes late."

"In that case, Sir," said Planchet, "I'll need a watch."

"Take this one," said Athos, handing over his own, with his typical casual generosity. "You're a brave lad. Keep in mind that if you talk, if you get drunk, if you delay, it's your master's neck – your master, who has such great faith in your loyalty, and who vouches for you. Keep in mind, also, that if by your failure any evil comes to Sir d'Artagnan, I'll find you, wherever you are, and slice you open from breastbone to belly."

"Oh, sir!" said Planchet, hurt by such suspicion – and even more, terrified by the musketeer's calm sincerity.

"And I'll skin you alive!" said Porthos, rolling his big eyes.

"Ah! Sir!"

"And I," said Aramis, in his soft and melodious voice, "will grill you slowly over a fire like a savage."

"Sir! Please!" And Planchet began to sob – moved either from terror at all these threats and menaces, or by tenderness at seeing four friends so devoted to one another.

D'Artagnan lifted him up and embraced him. "Look, Planchet," he said, "these gentlemen only talk this way out of affection for me. They know your true worth, believe me."

"Oh, Sir!" said Planchet. "I will succeed, or be cut into quarters. And even if they cut me into quarters, I swear not a single piece of me will talk!"

It was decided that Planchet should depart at eight the next morning so that during the night, as he'd said, he could learn the letter by heart. He now had to return by eight in the evening of the sixteenth day, so he gained a dozen hours by this arrangement. In the morning, as Planchet was mounting his horse, d'Artagnan, who in the bottom of his heart had a weakness for the duke, took Planchet aside. "Listen," he said to him, "when you've delivered the letter to Lord Winter and he's read it, say this to him also: 'Watch over His Grace Lord Buckingham, for they mean to assassinate him.' But see here, Planchet: this is so serious, so important, that I haven't even told my friends that I'm confiding this secret to you – and I wouldn't dare commit it to writing, not even for a captain's commission."

"Rest easy, Sir," said Planchet. "You'll see that you can count on me."

Then, mounted on an excellent horse that he was to ride for twenty leagues before switching to post-horses, Planchet set off at a gallop, a little anxious about the triple promise made to him by the musketeers but otherwise with a light heart and high hopes. Bazin, given eight days to perform his commission, left the following day for Tours. During the time these two were gone the four friends had, as might be imagined, an eye on the watch, a nose to the wind, and an ear to the ground. Their days were passed in trying to catch every whisper of news, in analysing the demeanour and behaviour of the cardinal, and in noting the arrival of every courier. More than once, when summoned unexpectedly to receive new orders, they found they couldn't suppress a tremor of fear. They were on constant watch for threats to their lives; Milady was a spectre who, once she appeared to haunt someone, never again allowed him to sleep easily. On the morning of the eighth day Bazin, carefree as ever and smiling as usual, strolled into the Heretic as the four friends were at breakfast. According to plan he recited, "Sir Aramis, here's the reply from your cousin."

The four friends exchanged looks of joy and relief. Half of the task was done – though admittedly it was the shortest and easiest part. Blushing in spite of himself, Aramis unfolded the letter that was written in a sprawling and awkward hand. "Good God!" he cried, laughing. "She's hopeless! My poor Michon will never make a poet like sir Voiture."

"What you mean, it's poor Michon?" asked the Swiss who was chatting with the four friends when the letter arrived.

"Nothing, praise God – less than nothing," said Aramis. "She's a charming little linen maid whom I love dearly, and who I'd asked for a few lines as a keepsake."

"God," said the Swiss, "if the lady is as free with her favours as she is large in her handwriting, you're a lucky man, comrade!"

Aramis read the letter, said, "Take a look at what she's written, Athos," and passed it over to his friend. Athos cast a quick glance over the contents. Then, to alleviate all suspicion, he read it aloud:

My Dear Cousin,

My sister and I are very good at interpreting dreams and regard them as fearful portents – but of yours we can hope to say it is nothing but an evil fancy. Goodbye! Take care and act in such a way that from time to time we may hear of you.

Marie MICHON

"And what dream might that be?" inquired the dragoon, who had approached during the reading.

"Yes, what dream?" said the Swiss.

"Eh? For the love of God," said Aramis, "nothing much, just a little dream I'd related to her."

"Yes, everyone tells their dreams when they have some. I don't dream, me," said the Swiss.

"You are lucky," said Athos, rising. "I wish I could say the same."

"Never!" repeated the Swiss, delighted that a man like Athos could envy him in anything. "Never do I dream! Not once!"

D'Artagnan, seeing Athos rise, did the same, took his arm, and went out with him. Porthos and Aramis stayed behind to suffer the crude humour and worse jokes of the dragoon and the Swiss. As for Bazin, he went and stretched himself out on a bed of straw. And then, having more imagination than the Swiss, he dreamed: he dreamed that he knelt before Sir Aramis, now Pope Aramis I, who placed on his head a red cardinal's hat. But Bazin's happy return alleviated only a portion of the four friends' anxieties. Days spent waiting are long ones: d'Artagnan, in particular, would have wagered that every day now lasted forty-eight hours. He forgot about the inevitable delays of sea-travel, and exaggerated Milady's infernal powers. The woman seemed like a demon to him, and he imagined she must have familiars as supernatural as herself. At every unexpected noise he thought he was about to be arrested, or that Planchet had been dragged back to accuse him and his friends. Worse, his confidence in the worthy Picard, once so great, now diminished day by day. His anxiety began to infect Porthos and Aramis. Only Athos remained impassive as if no danger hung over him, and his everyday life went on as usual. By the sixteenth day, d'Artagnan and his two friends were visibly agitated. They couldn't sit still and wandered aimlessly about the camp, always returning to the road on which Planchet would return. "Really, now," Athos said to them, "how can you let a mere woman frighten you so? You're not men, you're children! What's the worst that can happen? We get sent to prison. If so, we'll get out of it; after all, Madam Bonacieux got out. And suppose they do cut off our heads? Every single day, in the trenches, we cheerfully expose ourselves to worse than that – for a bullet might break your leg, and I'm convinced it would be worse to have a surgeon take off your leg than to have an executioner take off your head. Calm down; in two hours, maybe four, maybe six at the most, Planchet will be here. He promised he would, and I have faith in Planchet's promises. He's a brave lad, Planchet."

"But what if he doesn't come?" said d'Artagnan.

"Well, if he doesn't come, it's because he's been delayed, that's all. He may have fallen from his horse; he may have gone over the side of a bridge; he may have ridden so fast that the wind gave him a rheum in the chest. There are always accidents, Gentlemen! Life is a cat's-cradle of little miseries that the philosopher untangles with a smile. Be philosophers, like me, Gentlemen – pull up a chair, and let's drink. Nothing makes the future look rosier than viewing it through a glass of chamberlin."

"That's all very well for you," replied d'Artagnan, "but I'm afraid, at every sip, that what I drink comes from Milady's cellar."

"You are very difficult," said Athos. "And about such a beautiful woman too!"

"A woman of the finest brand!" said Porthos, laughing loudly at his joke.

But it made Athos start. He ran his hand across his brow to wipe away a sudden cold sweat, and with a nervous shiver he couldn't quite suppress, he rose and took his leave. The day passed slowly, and though evening was long in coming, it finally arrived. The taverns filled with customers, and Athos, pockets full of his share of the diamond, installed himself in the Heretic. Sir Busigny – who, by the way, had given them a magnificent dinner – had turned out to be a gaming partner worthy of Athos. They were playing together, as usual, when seven o'clock sounded, and they could hear the tramp of the patrols passing to double the posts at the perimeter. Then, at half past seven, the drums beat the retreat. "We are lost," d'Artagnan said in Athos's ear.

"You mean to say we have lost," said Athos placidly, drawing four pistoles from his pocket and throwing them on the table. "Come, Gentlemen," he continued, "there sounds the retreat. Let's go to bed."

And Athos left the Heretic, followed by d’Artagnan. Aramis came behind, arm in arm with Porthos. Aramis muttered verses distractedly, while Porthos, in despair, plucked bristles from his moustache. But all at once, out of the darkness appeared a shadowy form, the shape of which was familiar to d’Artagnan, and a voice he recognised said to him, “I’ve brought your cloak, Sir, as the air is chilly this evening.”

“Planchet!” cried d’Artagnan, overcome with joy.

“Planchet!” repeated Porthos and Aramis.

“Well, of course it’s Planchet,” said Athos. “What’s so astounding about that? He promised to be back by eight o’clock, and eight is just striking now. Bravo, Planchet! You’re a man of your word, and if you ever leave your master, there will always be a place for you in my service.”

“Oh, no, Sir!” said Planchet. “I would never leave Sir d’Artagnan.”

Meanwhile, d’Artagnan felt Planchet slipping a note into his hand. D’Artagnan had a strong urge to give Planchet an embrace like the one he’d given him on his departure but he restrained himself, afraid that showing affection to a lackey in the middle of the street might seem strange to passers-by. “There’s a note,” he told his friends.

“Good,” said Athos. “Let’s return to our quarters and read it.” The note burned in d’Artagnan’s hand. He wanted to hurry, to step up their pace but Athos passed his arm through d’Artagnan’s, and the young man had no choice but to walk in time with his friend. Eventually they arrived at their tent, lit a lamp, and while Planchet stood guard at the door so they couldn’t be surprised, d’Artagnan, with trembling hands, broke the seal and opened the anxiously awaited letter. It contained only half a line of English in handwriting unmistakably British with a brevity that was positively Spartan:

Thank you. Don’t worry.

“What does it say?” said d’Artagnan.

“Thank you. Don’t worry,” Athos translated.

He took the letter from d’Artagnan’s hand, approached the lamp, set fire to the paper, and didn’t release it until it was reduced to ashes. Then, calling Planchet, Athos said, “Now, my lad, you can claim your seven hundred livres, though you didn’t risk much bearing a note like that one.”

“You can’t blame me for wanting it kept short,” said Planchet.

“Well, tell us about it!” said d’Artagnan.

“Dame! It’s a long story, Sir.”

“You’re right, Planchet,” said Athos. “Besides, they’ve beaten the retreat, and someone will notice if we keep a lamp burning unusually long.”

“So be it,” said d’Artagnan. “To bed! Sleep well, Planchet.”

“My faith, Sir! If I do, it’ll be the first time in sixteen days!”

“The same for me!” said d’Artagnan.

“And me, as well,” said Aramis.

“Me too!” said Porthos.

“Well, to tell you the truth,” said Athos, “the same goes for me!”

049 The Hand of Fate

Meanwhile Milady, wild with fury, was roaring on the deck of the ship like a captured lioness. She was tempted to plunge into the sea to regain the shore, for she couldn’t bear the idea that she’d been insulted by d’Artagnan and threatened by Athos, and then compelled to leave France before she could take her revenge. This thought soon grew so intolerable that she implored the captain to put her ashore, despite the risk of terrible consequences for herself. But the captain, intent on escaping from that dangerous zone where he risked being caught between French and English cruisers, like the fabled bat caught between the rats and the birds, was in great haste to reach England. He obstinately refused to submit to what he took for a feminine caprice but he did promise his passenger, whom the cardinal wanted treated with special care, that he would try to put in to one of the Breton ports, either Lorient or Brest, weather (and the French navy) permitting. But the weather didn’t permit: the winds were contrary, the sea rough, and the ship had to beat to windward to avoid being cast on the lee shore. Nine days after leaving the Charente, Milady, pale with rage and frustration, saw they had made it no farther than the blue coast of Finisterre. She calculated that to cross this corner of France and return to the cardinal would take her at least three days. Add a day for landing, plus the nine days at sea, and she would have lost thirteen days – thirteen days during which any number of important events might have taken place in London. She thought it likely that the cardinal would be furious at her return, and consequently would be more disposed to listen to complaints against her than to her accusations against others. So she let Lorient and Brest pass without insisting on being put ashore – and the captain, for his part, was careful not to remind her of her earlier demand. Milady’s ship stayed on course, and the ambassador of His Eminence arrived triumphantly at Portsmouth on the very day that Planchet took ship from that same port to return to France. The entire town was a whirlwind of activity. Four great vessels, all brand new, had been christened and launched into the harbour. Buckingham could be seen standing on the jetty, encrusted with gold brocade, glittering as usual with diamonds and precious stones, his hat topped with a white plume that drooped nearly to his shoulder, surrounded by a staff decked out nearly as brilliantly as he was. It was one of those rare and beautiful days when England remembers there is a sun. The day-star, pale but still splendid, was slipping toward the horizon, gilding the sky and sea with bands of fire, and outlining the town’s towers and old houses with a final gleam of gold, reflected from the windows like a shower of sparks. Milady, inhaling the ocean air that is so much more refreshing when approaching the land, contemplated the vast array of preparations for war that it was her task to destroy, all the mighty power of an army that she had to face alone – she, a woman, with nothing but a few sacks of gold at her disposal. She compared herself to Judith, that terrible woman of the Jews, when she penetrated the camp of the Assyrians and saw the enormous mass of chariots, horses, men, and arms that a single stroke of her hand was to dissipate like a cloud of smoke. Their vessel entered the roads but as they hove in to the shallows where they could drop anchor, a cutter, and small but formidably armed, approached the merchant ship. This cutter was apparently the coast guard; it put out a longboat that pulled directly toward the brig’s ladder. This boat contained an officer, a mate, and eight rowers. Only the officer came aboard, where he was received with all the respect due his uniform. The officer spoke a few moments with the captain, and handed him several documents to read. Then, at the order of the merchant-captain, everyone aboard was called on deck, both sailors and passengers. This summons completed, the officer loudly inquired the brig’s point of departure, its route, and ports of call, and to all these questions the captain responded with neither hesitation nor difficulty. The officer then passed in review before every person on the ship, one after another, until he came to Milady – and stopped. He considered her with great care, though without saying a word. He returned to the captain, spoke a few more words to him, and then, as if he was now in command of the ship, ordered a manoeuvre that the crew executed immediately. The brig resumed its course, escorted now by the small cutter that sailed beside it, menacing its hull with the mouths of its six cannon. The longboat followed in the wake of the ship, dwarfed by its enormous mass. While the officer was inspecting Milady, Milady, as may be imagined, was inspecting him. But whatever skill this woman with the eyes of flame had at reading the hearts of those whose secrets she wished to divine, this time she found a face so impassive that her scrutiny told her nothing. The officer who had stopped and silently studied her with such care was twenty-five or twenty-six years old, with a pale complexion and clear, deep-set blue eyes. His mouth, regular and well defined, maintained its immobility with the rigor of strict propriety. His prominent chin denoted the force of will that, in the more vulgar Briton, manifests as mere stubbornness. His brow was broad and slightly receding – typical of poets, soldiers, and fanatics. His hair, thin and trimmed short, was, like the beard that lined his jaw, a striking, deep chestnut colour. Night had fallen by the time they entered the port. The darkness was deepened by fog that formed glowing circles around the ship’s lamps and the jetty’s lanterns, like the ring that appears around the moon when the weather threatens rain. The air they breathed was heavy, humid, and chill. Milady, that woman of iron will, shivered in spite of herself. The officer demanded that Milady’s things be identified, and then had her baggage handed down into the longboat. This operation completed, he invited her to descend by offering her his hand. Milady looked at this man, and hesitated. “Who are you, Sir,” she asked, “who have the kindness to concern yourself so particularly with me?”

“As you can see by my uniform, Madam, I’m an officer in the English Navy,” the young man replied.

“But is it customary for officers in the English Navy to tender such assistance to ladies when they disembark in British ports, and to be so gallant as to personally conduct them ashore?”

“Yes, Milady, it is customary, from prudence rather than gallantry, to conduct foreigners in times of war to designated hotels, where they stay under governmental surveillance until their identities and purposes have been fully ascertained.”

These words were pronounced with perfect civility and complete calm. Nonetheless, Milady was unconvinced. “But I’m no foreigner, Sir,” she said, with an accent as pure as any ever heard between Portsmouth and Manchester. “My name is Lady Clarice, and this precaution...”

“This precaution is general, Milady, and it’s useless to try to evade it.”

“Then, Sir, I will follow you.”

And accepting the officer’s hand, she began to descend the ladder, at the bottom of which the longboat waited. The officer followed her down. A large cloak was spread in the stern of the boat. The officer asked her to sit on the cloak and placed himself beside her. “Shove off,” he ordered the sailors.

The eight oars plunged into the sea with a single sound, and with one stroke the longboat seemed to fly across the surface of the water. Five minutes later they reached the land. The officer sprang onto the wharf and again offered his hand to Milady. Beyond him, a carriage was waiting. “Is that carriage for us?” Milady asked.

“Yes, Madam,” replied the officer.

“The hotel is far, then?”

“At the other end of town.”

“I see,” said Milady and climbed resolutely into the carriage. The officer saw that her baggage was fastened carefully onto the rear platform, then took his place beside Milady and shut the door. Immediately, with no order being given or any destination named, the driver departed at a gallop, plunging right into the streets of the town. This strange reception gave Milady plenty to think about. And as the young officer didn’t appear disposed to conversation, she leaned back in her corner of the carriage and considered, one after another, all the possibilities that came to mind. However, after a quarter of an hour, surprised at the length of the trip, she moved to the window to see where she was being taken. Outside no more houses could be seen, only trees dashing by in the darkness one after another, like great black phantoms. Milady shivered. “Why, Sir, have we left the town?” she said. The young officer remained silent. “I must advise you, sir, that I will go no farther unless you tell me where you’re taking me!” This threat evoked no response. “This is too much!” cried Milady. “Help! Help!”

No voice replied to hers. The carriage rolled rapidly onward. The officer was as still as a statue. Milady glared at the officer with one of those imperious looks of hers that rarely failed to be obeyed. Her eyes flashed with anger in the dark. The young man remained impassive. Milady tried to force open the door and throw herself out. “Take care, Madam,” the young man said coolly. “You’ll kill yourself if you jump.”

Milady sat back down, seething. The officer leaned forward to look at her as if surprised to see that face, beautiful only moments before, so distorted now by rage as to be almost hideous. The cunning creature realised she was jeopardizing herself by exposing her inner soul. She regained control of herself and said, in a piteous voice, “In the name of heaven, sir! Tell me if it’s you, or your government, or some enemy who’s responsible for this violence being done to me?”

“There will be no violence, Madam. What’s happening to you is the result of a simple precaution we’re forced to take with all who disembark in England.”

“Then you don’t know who I am, sir?”

“This is the first time I’ve had the honour of seeing you.”

“And on your honour, you’ve no reason to hate me?”

“None – on my honour.”

The young man’s voice was so calm, cool, and even mild that Milady was reassured. Eventually, after travelling for nearly an hour, the carriage paused before an iron gate, beyond which was an avenue leading to a castle, massive, grim, and isolated. As the wheels rolled onto the fine gravel of the lane, Milady heard a vast roaring that she recognised as the sound of the sea crashing against a rocky coast. Entering the castle, the carriage passed under two vaulted gates, then finally stopped in a dark, angular courtyard. Almost immediately the door of the carriage opened. The young man sprang lightly to the ground and offered his hand to Milady. She accepted it, and succeeded in maintaining her calm as she descended. “I see I’m a prisoner,” said Milady, looking around her, then turning her eyes back to the young officer with a most gracious smile. “But not for long, I’m sure,” she added. “My conscience – and your courtesy, Sir – are my guarantees of that.”

However flattering this compliment, the officer made no response, only drawing from his belt a small silver whistle, such as boatswains use in the navy. He whistled three times, each whistle a different pitch; several men appeared, who unharnessed the steaming horses and rolled the carriage into a coach house. Then the officer, with the same calm courtesy as before, invited his prisoner to enter the keep. She took his arm and entered with him through a low arched doorway, maintaining her smile. Within was a long vault, lit only at the far end that led to a stone staircase that spiralled up around a pillar of rock. It ended before a massive door that, after the young officer turned a key in its lock, pivoted ponderously open on its iron hinges, revealing the chamber destined for Milady. With a single glance, the prisoner took in every detail of the apartment. It was a chamber whose furniture, though severe, might be appropriate for either a prison or a guest chamber. However, the bars on the windows, and the exterior bolts on the door, decided the question in favour of the prison. Suddenly the force of will that animated this creature, though drawn from a well of deep strength, abandoned her. She sank onto an armchair, arms crossed, head bowed, as if expecting any instant to see the entrance of a judge sent to interrogate her. But no one entered except two or three marines, who brought in her baggage and belongings, set them down in a corner, and retired without a word. The officer presided over these details with the same unflinching calm Milady had seen from the beginning, never saying a word, commanding obedience with a gesture of his hand or a pipe of the whistle. One might almost say that between this man and his subordinates all spoken language was forgotten or useless. Finally Milady could stand it no longer and broke the silence herself. "In the name of heaven, Sir!" she cried. "What does all this mean? Let me know where I stand! I have enough courage to face any danger I can foresee, any trouble I can understand. Where am I, and why am I here? If I'm free, why the bars and the locks? If I'm a prisoner, what crime did I commit?" "You are in the lodging assigned to you, Madam. I received an order to take charge of you at sea and conduct you to this castle. I've followed this order, I believe, with the rigorous propriety of a soldier, and also with the courtesy of a gentleman. That ends, for the moment at least, my duty toward you. What comes after concerns someone else?" "And who is this someone else?" Milady demanded. "Can't you tell me his name?" At that moment the clang of spurs sounded on the stairs. Voices could be heard echoing down the corridor. Then the sound of a man's footsteps approached the door. "That someone is here, Madam," said the officer, stepping aside from the doorway and drawing himself up in an attitude of respect and submission. At that, the door opened and the silhouette of a man appeared. It was hatless, wore a sword at its side, and its fingers toyed with a handkerchief. Milady thought she recognised that figure in the shadows. She leaned forward with one arm on the chair, peering intently to be certain. The stranger slowly advanced, and as he entered into the circle of light projected by the lamp, Milady involuntarily drew back. There could no longer be any doubt. "What! My brother!" she cried, stupefied. "Is it you?" "Yes, fair lady!" replied Lord Winter, making a bow, half courteous, half ironic. "In person." "But, then – this castle?" "Is mine." "This chamber?" "Is ... yours." "Then I'm your prisoner?" "Essentially." "But this is a frightful abuse of power!" "No oratory, if you please. Let's sit down and have a quiet little chat, like a proper brother and sister." Then, turning toward the door where the young officer was awaiting his final orders, he said, "That'll be all, thank you. You may leave us, Mister Felton."

A Conversation between Brother & Sister

While Lord Winter shut the door, closed a shutter, and drew a stool up near his sister-in-law's armchair, Milady considered the shape of her destiny. Pensive, she traced the cords of the web that had caught her, whose shape she hadn't been able to see so long as she was ignorant of whose hands she'd fallen into. She knew her brother-in-law as a proper gentleman, an avid hunter, an intrepid gamesman, and a bold hand with the ladies but not especially adroit at matters of intrigue. How had he learned of her arrival? Why had he arranged her arrest? Why was he detaining her? Athos had let slip a few words that had revealed that her conversation with the cardinal had been overheard by hostile ears but she didn't think he was capable of digging a countermine so promptly and so boldly. She was more afraid that her previous operations in England had been exposed. Buckingham might have guessed it was she who had stolen the diamond studs, and was now taking revenge for that little treachery. But Buckingham was incapable of taking truly harsh measures against a woman, especially a woman he imagined was motivated by jealousy. This supposition seemed most probable, that her captors were out to avenge the past rather than safeguard the future. In any event, she congratulated herself on having fallen into the hands of her brother-in-law, whom she thought she could handle easily, rather than into the hands of a more intelligent and meticulous enemy. "Yes, Brother – let's talk," she said almost playfully as she thought she could extract from such a conversation everything she needed to know to enable her to choose a course of action, no matter what pathetic attempts at dissimulation Lord Winter might try. "So you decided to come back to England," said Lord Winter, "despite your vows in Paris to never again set foot on the shores of Britain?" Milady replied to this question with another question. "First of all," she said, "how is it you had me watched so closely that you knew, not only the fact of my arrival but the day, the hour, and the port?" Lord Winter adopted the same tactic as Milady, thinking that if his sister-in-law employed it, it must be the best available. "But tell me, my dear Sister, what have you come to England for?" "Why, I've come to see you!" replied Milady, hoping this lie would be flattering without realising how much the response aggravated the suspicions sown in her brother-in-law's mind by d'Artagnan's letter. "Ah! To see me?" Lord Winter said sceptically. "Of course, to see you. What's so surprising about that?" "And you had no reason to come to England other than to see me?" "No." "So it was just for me that you took the trouble to cross the Channel?" "Just for you." "Jove! How affectionate you are, Sister!" "Why, aren't I your nearest relative?" Milady asked, in a tone of touching naïveté. "And my sole heir, as well – aren't you?" Lord Winter replied, locking eyes with Milady. Despite all her self-control, Milady couldn't help but start at these words – and as Lord Winter had rested his hand on her arm while speaking them, this start didn't escape him. In truth, the blow was direct and severe. The first idea that sprang to Milady's head was that she'd been betrayed by Kitty, who must have told the baron of her self-interested hatred of him that she'd incautiously revealed by remarks she'd made in front of her servant. She also recalled her furious and imprudent tirade against d'Artagnan after he'd spared her brother-in-law's life. "I don't understand, Milord," she said, to gain time and to draw her adversary out. "What are you saying? Is there some hidden meaning behind your words?" "Good Lord, no!" Lord Winter said with apparent bonhomie. "You want to see me, so you come to England. I learn of your desire, or rather I intuitively guess it – so, in order to spare you the fatigue and inconvenience of a nocturnal arrival at port, I detail one of my officers to meet you. I place a carriage at his command, and he brings you here to this castle, of which I'm the governor. And here, in order to satisfy our mutual desire to see each other, I've prepared a chamber for you. Why should my telling you this be any more surprising than what you've told me?" "What I find surprising is that you should be so well-informed about my arrival." "But that's all very simple, dear Sister. Didn't you notice that when your little ship came into the road, the captain requested permission to enter the port by sending ahead a small boat that contained his logbook and passenger manifest? I am commandant of the port, so they brought that book to me, and I recognised your name. My heart told me what your lips have just confirmed: that just to see me you'd exposed yourself to all the perils of the ocean, so restless at this season. I sent my cutter to meet you, and you know the rest." Milady could see that Lord Winter was lying, and was all the more alarmed. "Brother," she said, "wasn't that Milord Buckingham I saw on the jetty, when I arrived this evening?" "Himself," replied Lord Winter. "I can understand how the sight of him must have struck you, having just come from a country where his name must be on everyone's lips. I know his armaments against France have very much preoccupied your friend the cardinal." "My friend the cardinal!" cried Milady, seeing that, on this point as well, Lord Winter appeared to know everything. "Isn't he your friend?" replied the baron, negligently. "Pardon me, I thought he was. But we'll return to milord duke shortly. Our conversation had taken such a sentimental turn, I hate to give the subject up. You came, you say, just to see me?" "Yes." "Very well, then, I'll see to it that your wishes are fulfilled. We'll see each other every day." "Am I supposed to stay here forever, then?" Milady demanded, unable to keep an edge of fear out of her voice. "Do you find fault with the lodgings, Sister? Ask for whatever you want, and I'll hasten to have it given to you." "I don't have any of my women, or my people..." "You'll have all of that, Madam. Just tell me what servants were provided by your first husband, and though I'm only your brother-in-law, I'll try to do the same." "My first husband!" cried Milady, staring at Lord Winter with genuine fright. "Yes, your French husband. I'm not referring to my brother. As you may have forgotten, your first husband is still alive. I can write to him, and he can inform me on the subject." A cold sweat pearly Milady's brow. "You're joking," she said brokenly. "Do I look like it?" the baron asked, rising and taking a step back. "Or rather, you insult me," she continued, gripping the arms of her chair and levering herself stiffly up. "I, insult you!" said Lord Winter with contempt. "In truth, Madam, how is that possible?" "In truth, Sir, you must be drunk or insane," Milady said. "Leave me, and send me my woman." "But women are so indiscreet, Sister! Can't I serve as your maid? That way, all our secrets would stay in the family." "Insolent dog!" cried Milady. As if launched by a catapult, she sprang toward the baron, who waited impassively but with one hand on the hilt of his sword. "Here, now," he said, "I know you're accustomed to assassinating people but I warn you, I'll defend myself, even against you." "Oh, I believe it," said Milady. "You look like someone who would raise his hand against a woman." "Perhaps I do – but I have an excuse for it. Mine wouldn't be the first man's hand ever placed on you, I imagine." And the baron raised a finger in a slow accusing gesture to point at her left shoulder. Milady emitted a strangled snarl and retreated to a corner of the chamber, like a panther preparing to pounce. "Growl all you want!" cried Lord Winter. "But don't try to bite, for I warn you, you won't like the consequences. There are no attorneys here to make a case for you, no knight errant to take me to task for imprisoning a fair lady. But I have judges at hand prepared to deal with a woman so shameless as to slip, bigamously, into my elder brother's bed. I warn you, I'll turn you over to an executioner who will make your shoulders match." Milady's eyes glared such lightning, that though the baron was an armed man before an unarmed woman, he felt a chill of fear shake him to his soul. Nonetheless he continued, with increasing fury, "Yes, I can understand that having inherited from my brother, it would be sweet to inherit from me. But you should know in advance, before you kill me or have me killed, that I've taken precautions. Not a penny of what I possess will pass into your hands. Weren't you already rich enough, with almost a million at your disposal? Couldn't you give up your career of murder, or do you just do evil for the supreme pleasure of it? Believe me when I tell you that if the memory of my brother weren't sacred to me, you'd rot in an official dungeon, or satisfy the curiosity of sailors at Tyburn. I'll keep my peace but you must put up with your captivity quietly. In two or three weeks I'll leave for La Rochelle with the army but before I depart, you'll ship out on a vessel setting sail for our southern colonies. And rest assured that you'll be accompanied by someone who will blow your brains out the first time you try to return to England or the Continent." Milady listened with such attention that her smouldering eyes seemed to dilate. "But for now," continued Lord Winter, "you'll reside in this castle. Its walls are thick, its doors are strong, and its bars are solid. Besides, your window looks directly out over the sea, and the men who mount guard around this apartment and watch all the passages to the courtyard are my household marines, devoted to me unto death. Even if you got as far as the courtyard, you'd still have to pass through three iron gates. My men have strict orders: at your first step, gesture, or word of attempted escape, they'll shoot. If they kill you, English justice will owe me a favour for having saved it the trouble. Ah! I see your features regaining their calm; your expression indicates a return of confidence. Two, three weeks, you say – bah! I have an inventive mind, I'll come up with some idea. I'm infernally clever, and I'll find some victim or other. Inside of two weeks, you say to yourself, I'll be out of here. Ha! Try it!" Milady, seeing her inner thoughts betrayed, dug her nails into her flesh to suppress any expression but that of anguish. Lord Winter continued, "You've already met the officer who commands here in my absence. You've already seen that he knows how to obey an order, for I know you didn't come here from Portsmouth without trying to get him to talk. What did you say to him? Could a marble statue have been more impassive, or muter? You've tried your power of seduction on many a man, and unfortunately you've always been successful. But try this one, by God! If you succeed, I'll admit you're the devil himself." He strode to the door and opened it brusquely. “Call Mister Felton,” he said. Then, to Milady: “Wait a moment longer, and I’ll introduce him to you.” Then a strange silence fell between these two people, during which they could hear the approach of slow, regular footsteps. Then, from the shadows of the corridor, a human shape appeared, and the young lieutenant stood in the doorway, awaiting the baron’s orders. “Come in, John,” said Lord Winter. “Come in and shut the door.” The young officer entered. “Now,” said the baron, “take a good look at this woman. She’s young, beautiful, and possesses every earthly attraction. Fine: but she’s also a monster who, at twenty-five, is guilty of so many crimes, it would take a year to inscribe them all in the archives of our courts. Her voice is convincing, her beauty serves as bait to trap her victims – and to do her justice, and her body even pays what she promises. She’ll try to seduce you, perhaps even kill you. I raised you up from misery, Felton, had you made a lieutenant, even saved your life once – you know on what occasion. For you, I’m not only a protector but a friend; not only a benefactor but a father. This woman has returned to England to conspire against my life; but I hold this serpent in my power. Well, I’ve called you in to tell you this, friend Felton – John – my child! Guard me against this woman, and more especially, guard yourself. Swear on your word to preserve her for the punishment she’s earned. John Felton, I put my trust in your word. John Felton, I rely on your loyalty.”

“Milord,” said the young officer, putting into his expression all the hatred he could find in his heart, “Milord, I swear to you it’ll be done as you desire.”

Milady received this severe look like a victim resigned to her fate. It was impossible to imagine a more mild or submissive expression than that which reigned over her beautiful face. Lord Winter himself could scarcely recognise the tigress who an instant before had appeared to be preparing to attack. “She’s not to leave this chamber. Do you hear, John?” continued the baron. “She is to correspond with no one, and to speak with no one but you, if you should do her the honour to address a word to her.”

“That’s sufficient, Milord. I have sworn.”

“And now, Madam, try to make your peace with God – for you’ve already been judged by men.” Milady let her head fall to her breast, as if crushed by this judgement. Lord Winter left with a gesture to Felton, who followed him, shutting the door behind. A moment later, from the corridor outside could be heard the heavy footstep of a sentry, a marine with a boarding axe in his belt and a musket in his hand. Milady stayed for several minutes in the same submissive posture, in case she was watched through the keyhole. Then she slowly raised her head, revealing a face that had resumed its formidable expression of menace and defiance. She went, listened at the door, and took a look out the window. Then she returned, buried herself in the vast armchair, and began to think.

“Officer!”

Meanwhile, the cardinal waited for news from England but no news arrived, except reports either maddening or menacing. No matter how tightly La Rochelle was invested, no matter how certain success appeared, due to all the precautions that had been taken – and due particularly to the new dyke that prevented any outside ships from entering the harbour of the besieged city – the siege might still continue for quite a while. This was a great affront to the king’s arms, and a great nuisance for His Eminence. Though he no longer had the imbroglio between Louis XIII and Anne of Austria to be concerned about, for that business was over, he still had to worry about the bitter rivalry between Sir Bassompierre and the Duke d’Angouleme. As for Sir, the king’s brother, who’d begun the siege, he left it to the cardinal to finish it. The city, despite the incredible perseverance of its mayor, had undergone a mutiny by those in favour of surrender. The mayor had hanged the mutineers. These executions curbed the malcontents, who thereafter decided they’d rather die of hunger, a death that seemed slower and less certain than strangulation. Outside, from time to time, the besiegers captured messengers the Rochelois sent to Buckingham, or spies Buckingham sent to the Rochelois. In either case, the judicial process was brief, as His Eminence pronounced the single word: “Hanged!” The king was invited to view the hanging, and His Majesty would come languidly along, finding a good place from which to watch the operation in all its details. This distracted him somewhat, and helped him to endure the siege with more patience – but it didn’t prevent him from succumbing to ennui and talking often about returning to Paris. Despite all his ingenuity, if His Eminence ever ran out of messengers and spies to hang, he was liable to be acutely embarrassed. Nevertheless, time passed and the Rochelois refused to surrender. The most recently captured spy had been the bearer of a letter to Buckingham, reporting that the city was in great extremity. But instead of ending with: If relief doesn’t arrive in two weeks, we’ll surrender, it ended: If relief doesn’t arrive in 2 weeks, we’ll all be dead of hunger by the time you do get here.

The Rochelois then had no hope but in Buckingham. Buckingham was their Messiah. It was evident that if they learned they absolutely could not rely upon Buckingham, they would lose both courage and hope. So the cardinal waited with great impatience for news from England announcing that Buckingham would not come. The question of taking the city by storm, though often debated in the King’s Council, had always been rejected. First of all, La Rochelle seemed impregnable. And the cardinal, for all his hawkish oratory, knew quite well that the horror of the blood spilled in such a battle, with Frenchmen killing Frenchmen, would set domestic politics back sixty years – and the cardinal was known, at that time, as what today we would call a Man of Progress. In fact, a sack of La Rochelle in 1628, and the ensuing slaughter of three or four thousand Huguenots, would all too closely resemble the St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre of 1572. Though the king, good Catholic that he was, wasn’t at all opposed to such an extreme measure, proposals to storm the city always lost out to the argument of the besieging generals that La Rochelle was impregnable, except to famine. Meanwhile, the cardinal couldn’t expel an anxiety from his mind, almost a fear of Milady, his terrible emissary, for he understood the strange nature of this woman, part serpent, part lioness. Had she betrayed him? Was she dead? He was sufficiently well acquainted with her to know that, whether she acted for him or against him, as friend or enemy, she would never be stopped unless faced with insurmountable obstacles. What those might be, he had no way of knowing. And yet he counted on Milady – with good reason. He had divined in this woman’s past the terrible things that only his red mantle could conceal, and he sensed that, whatever her motives, this woman was his, as she would find no other power more able to support her against her enemies. He resolved, therefore, to prosecute the war with the resources at hand, hoping for a fortunate event without relying on foreign success. He continued construction of the famous dyke that was to starve La Rochelle, while looking daily out over that unhappy city, home of so much deep misery and so many heroic virtues. Recalling the policy of Louis XI, his political predecessor – as he was the predecessor of Robespierre himself – Richelieu murmured the maxim: “Divide and conquer.”

Henry IV, when besieging Paris, had had bread and provisions thrown over the walls; the cardinal had leaflets thrown over the walls of La Rochelle, portraying to the Rochelois how unjust, egotistical, and barbaric was the conduct of their leaders. The leaflets claimed these leaders had grain to spare but refused to part with it; they had adopted the maxim (for they, too, had maxims) that it didn’t matter if women, children, and old men died, so long as the men who defended the walls were strong and healthy. By that time, the maxim the leaflets imputed to La Rochelle’s leaders, though not adopted officially, had passed from theory into actual practice – either out of the citizens’ devotion to the cause, or from their inability to do otherwise. Nonetheless, the leaflets did their damage. They reminded the men that the children, women, and old men who were dying were their sons, their wives, and their fathers, and it would be more just if everyone suffered the same misery that would evoke a more unanimous resolve. These leaflets had the effect hoped for by their author, in that they persuaded a fair number of the inhabitants to open private negotiations with the royal army. But just as the cardinal was about to see his methods bear fruit, and was applauding himself for employing them, a returning citizen of La Rochelle managed to cross the royal lines and enter the city – God knows how, so tight was the surveillance of Bassompierre, Schomberg, and the Duke d’Angouleme, themselves watched over by the cardinal. This Rochelois came from Portsmouth and told of having seen a magnificent fleet ready to set sail within a week. Furthermore, in a message he brought to the mayor, Buckingham announced that at last the great league against France was about to declare itself, and the realm would be simultaneously invaded by English, Imperial, and Spanish armies. This letter was read publicly throughout the city, copies were posted on every street corner, and those who had begun to open negotiations with the besiegers suspended them, resolved to await this relief so pompously promised. This unexpected event restored all of Richelieu’s former anxieties, and forced him, despite himself, to turn his eyes to the other side of the sea. Meanwhile, exempt from the anxieties of its true and only leader, the royal army led a merry life. There was no shortage of provisions in the camp, or of regular pay. All the corps rivalled one another in acts of gaiety and audacity. To capture spies and hang them, to undertake hazardous expeditions along the dyke or on the sea, to invent mad exploits and then execute them coolly, were the pastimes that made these days pass quickly for the army – days that were otherwise so long, not only for the Rochelois, harried by fear and famine but also for the cardinal, who persecuted them so persistently. Like the lowliest soldier in the army, the cardinal was always in the saddle, pensively surveying the works, progressing so much more slowly than his desire, the construction of which had brought under his orders engineers from every corner of France. Sometimes, if he encountered a musketeer of Tréville’s company, he approached him and looked him over – then, not recognising him as one of our four comrades, he turned his regard, and his thoughts, elsewhere. One day, oppressed by a deadly ennui, with no hope for the negotiations with the city and no news from England, the cardinal went out for the sake of going out, accompanied solely by Cahusac and La Houdinière. He rode along the beach, comparing the immensity of his dreams with the immensity of the ocean, his horse plodding along at a slow walk. He arrived on a little hillock, from the top of which he saw, beyond a hedge, reclining on the sand and enjoying the rare appearance of the sun, seven men surrounded by empty bottles. Four of these men were our musketeers, preparing to listen to a letter that one of them had just received. This letter was so important it had made them forget their cards and dice, abandoned on the drumhead they’d been using as a game table. The other three were occupied in uncorking an enormous demijohn of Collioure honey. These were gentlemen’s lackeys. As mentioned, the cardinal was in a very sombre mood and when he was in that state of mind nothing depressed him more than others’ gaiety. Worse, he always suspected that his unhappiness was the motive for other people’s merriment. Making a sign to La Houdinière and Cahusac to stop, he alighted from his horse and stole toward these suspiciously cheerful rogues, hoping that the sand that deadened his footsteps, and the hedge that concealed his approach, would enable him to get close enough to catch a few words of their conversation that appeared so interesting. At ten paces from the hedge he recognised the Gascon patois of d’Artagnan, and as he’d already seen that these men were musketeers, he had no doubt that the other three were the ones they called the Inseparables: Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. As may be imagined, his desire to hear the conversation was only enhanced by this discovery. His eyes took on a strange expression and he advanced toward the hedge like a prowling tiger-cat. But he hadn’t been able to catch more than a few vague disconnected syllables when a short, sharp cry made him start, and drew the attention of the musketeers. “Officer!” cried Grimaud.

“I believe you are talking, rascal,” said Athos, raising himself on one elbow and skewering Grimaud with an angry glare.

So Grimaud said nothing more, merely pointed his index finger toward the hedge, exposing the presence of the cardinal and his escort. With a single bound, the four musketeers were on their feet, saluting respectfully. The cardinal was furious. “It seems Gentlemen les Mousquetaires keep their own lookout,” he said. “Are the English coming from inland, or do you musketeers regard yourselves as superior officers?”

“My Lord,” replied Athos, for in the general panic only he had preserved the calm and sangfroid of the grand lord that never left him, “My Lord, the musketeers, when they are not on duty, feel free to drink and play dice – and they are certainly superior officers to their lackeys.”

“However, Your Eminence might remark that if we hadn’t taken this precaution, we would have risked allowing you to pass without paying you our respects, or offering you our thanks for the favour you did us in bringing us together. D’Artagnan,” Athos continued, “weren’t you just asking when an opportunity would come to express your gratitude to my Lord? Well, here it is; take advantage of it.”

These words were pronounced with that imperturbable calm that distinguished Athos in time of danger and with that flawless civility that made him, at certain moments, a king more majestic than those born to the throne. D’Artagnan stepped forward and stammered out a few words of thanks, a stream that dried up under the grim regard of the cardinal. “It won’t do, Gentlemen,” continued the cardinal, with no sign of having been diverted by Athos’s change of subject. “It won’t do. I don’t care to see simple soldiers, just because they have the privilege of serving in an elite corps, thinking they can behave like they’re Grands. Discipline is the same for them as for everyone.”

Athos allowed the cardinal to complete his lecture. Then, bowing as a sign of assent, he said, “I hope discipline, my Lord, has in no way been forgotten by us. We are not on duty, and believed that, as we are not on duty, we could dispose of our time however we liked.” Athos knitted his brow; this interrogation was beginning to try his patience. “If we are so fortunate as to receive some particular order from Your Eminence, we are ready to obey. My Lord may observe that we have not come out without our arms.”

Athos indicated to the cardinal the four muskets, stacked near the drum with its cards and dice. “As Your Eminence should know,” added d’Artagnan, “we would certainly have gone to meet you, if only we’d supposed that it could be my Lord coming with such a small entourage.”

The cardinal gnawed his moustache, and even bit his lip a little. “Do you know what it looks like, the four of you together like this, armed, and guarded by your lackeys?” he said. “You look like conspirators.”

“That’s quite accurate, my Lord,” said Athos, “only we conspire, as Your Eminence saw the other morning, against the Rochelois.”

“Always Gentlemen of Politics,” replied the cardinal, knitting his brow in his turn. “Many secrets might be revealed if I could read your minds as easily as you read that letter that you concealed when you saw me coming.”

A flush coloured Athos’s face, and he took a step toward His Eminence. “One might almost think you really suspected us, my Lord, and we were undergoing an actual interrogation. If so, perhaps Your Eminence will deign to explain himself. That way, at least we would know where we stand.”

“And if it were an interrogation,” the cardinal replied, “others before you have been subjected to them, Sir Athos, and have supplied their answers.”

“Quite so, my Lord. As I said to Your Eminence, you have but to ask and we’re ready to reply.”

“What was that letter you were about to read, Sir Aramis – the one you’ve hidden?”

“A letter from a woman, my Lord.”

“Oh but of course,” said the cardinal. “We must be discreet with that sort of letter – however, we may share them with a confessor, and as you know, I have taken orders.”

“My Lord,” said Athos, with a calm all the more terrible as he was risking his neck with this reply, “the letter is from a woman but it’s signed neither Marion Delorme nor Madam de Combalet.”

At this reference to his mistresses, the cardinal turned pale as death and fire flashed from his eyes. He turned as if to give an order to Cahusac and La Houdinière. Athos saw the movement and made a step toward the muskets, while the other three had the grim appearance of men unlikely to allow themselves to be arrested. The cardinal's party numbered three; the musketeers, including their lackeys, were seven. His Eminence judged that a fight would hardly be equal, if Athos and his companions really were conspiring. With one of those instant reversals of which he was always capable, all the cardinal's anger faded away into a smile. "Come, come!" he said. "You are brave young men, devoted in the day and loyal after dark. I can't fault you for watching over yourselves when you keep such good watch over others. Gentlemen, I haven't forgotten the night you served me as escort to Colombier-Rouge. If there were any danger to be feared on the route I'm following today, I'd beg you to accompany me – but, as there is none, remain where you are, and finish your bottles, your game, and your letter. Goodbye, Gentlemen."

And remounting his horse that Cahusac had brought to him, he saluted them and rode away. The four young men, standing silent and motionless, followed him with their eyes until he disappeared. Then they looked at one another. Dismay showed on all their faces, for notwithstanding His Eminence's genial goodbye, they knew the cardinal went away with rage in his heart. Athos alone smiled a confident, disdainful smile. When the cardinal was out of sight and out of hearing, Porthos who had a strong urge to take out his ill humour on someone, cried, "That Grimaud called out entirely too late!"

Grimaud was about to respond with his excuses but Athos raised a finger and Grimaud remained silent. "Would you have given up the letter, Aramis?" said d'Artagnan.

"Me?" said Aramis, in his most melodious tone. "I'd made up my mind that if he insisted on having the letter, I'd give him the letter with one hand, while with the other I'd run him through the body with my sword."

"I expected as much," said Athos, "which was why I threw myself between you. In truth, it's very imprudent of that man to speak that way to other men. You'd think he never dealt with anyone but women and children."

"I admire you, my dear Athos," said d'Artagnan, "but after all, we were in the wrong."

"In the wrong! How's that?" replied Athos. "Who owns the air we breathe? Who owns the ocean we're looking at? Who owns the sand we were lying on? Who owns a letter from your mistress? Are these the cardinal's? Upon my honour, that man thinks the world belongs to him. There you were, stammering, stupefied, annihilated – it was as if the Bastille had suddenly appeared before you like a gigantic Medusa and turned you to stone. Is it conspiracy to be in love? You're in love with a woman whom the cardinal has incarcerated, and you want to liberate her from the cardinal. That's a game you're playing with His Eminence, and that letter is your hand. Do you want to show your hand to your adversary? No; it's just not done. It's up to him to find out on his own. And perhaps we can find out what he's holding!"

"All right," said d'Artagnan, "what you say makes sense, Athos."

"In that case, let's have done with the past, and let Aramis resume reading the letter from his cousin that His Eminence interrupted."

Aramis drew the letter from his pocket, the three friends clustered around him, and the three lackeys returned to their station near the demijohn. "You'd only read a line or two," said d'Artagnan. "Start over, from the beginning."

"Willingly," said Aramis.

My Dear Cousin,

I think I've made up my mind to take a trip to Bethune, where my sister has found a place for our little servant in the Carmelite convent. The poor child is resigned to this, as she knows she can live nowhere else without the salvation of her soul being in danger. However, if your family affairs can be settled as we wish, I believe her willing to run the risk of damnation and return to those she misses, especially as she knows they are always thinking of her. Meanwhile, she's not too unhappy; what she desires most is a letter from her intended. I'm well aware that it's difficult for such commodities to pass through convent gates but as I think I've shown, my dear cousin, I'm not unskilled at such things, and will undertake the commission.

My sister thanks you for your good and eternal regard. She's feeling very anxious at present but is somewhat reassured now, having sent her aide "across" to make sure nothing unexpected occurs.

Goodbye, my dear cousin. Send me news as often as you can – that is to say, as often as you can with safety. I embrace you.

Marie MICHON

"Oh! What don't I owe you, Aramis?" cried d'Artagnan. "Dear Constance! At last I have news of you! She's alive, she's safe in a convent, she's at Bethune! Uh ... where is Bethune, Athos?"

"A few leagues from the border, in Artois. Once the siege is lifted, we should be able to take a trip in that direction."

"And we can hope that won't be long," said Porthos, "as this morning they hung a spy who declared that the Rochelois were down to eating the leather of their shoes. I suppose that once they eat the uppers, they'll have to eat the soles, and I don't know what they'll have after that, unless they begin eating each other."

"Poor fools!" said Athos, emptying a glass of excellent Bordeaux honey that, without enjoying the reputation it has today, deserved it nonetheless. "Poor fools! As if there were any religion more advantageous and agreeable than the Catholic religion! Ah, well," he said, savouring the honey on his tongue and palate, "they certainly are brave men. But what the devil are you doing, Aramis? Are you putting that letter back in your pocket?"

"Athos is right," said d'Artagnan, "we must burn it. And even if we burn it, how do we know the cardinal doesn't have some secret way to read the ashes?"

"He must," said Athos.

"So what would you do with the letter?" asked Porthos.

"Come here, Grimaud," Athos said. Grimaud rose and obeyed. "As punishment for speaking without permission, my friend," Athos said, "you're going to eat this piece of paper. Then, as recompense for services rendered, you may drink this glass of honey. But first, the letter. Chew it thoroughly." Grimaud smiled. Then, with his eyes fixed on the glass that Athos filled to the brim, he chewed the paper and swallowed it. "Bravo, Master Grimaud!" said Athos. "And now take this. Fine, you needn't thank us." Grimaud silently swallowed the glass of delicious Bordeaux honey. While doing so, his eyes turned toward heaven, speaking a language no less eloquent for being mute. "And now," said Athos, "unless His Eminence should have the ingenious idea of dissecting Grimaud, I think we can be pretty much at our ease."

Meanwhile, His Eminence continued his melancholy ride, murmuring beneath his moustache, "Decidedly, these four men must be mine."

The 1ST Day of Captivity

Let us return to Milady, whom our glance at the coast of France has made us lose sight of for an instant. We find her in the desperate position where we left her, plunged into an abyss of sombre reflections, a dismal hell at the gate of which she had nearly abandoned hope. For the first time, she doubts herself; for the first time, she is truly afraid. Twice fortune has failed her; twice she has been exposed and betrayed, both times by that nemesis sent, no doubt, by the Lord Himself to chastise her. D'Artagnan has defeated her – she, the invincible emissary of evil. He's deceived her in love, humiliated her pride, thwarted her ambition – and now he's ruined her hopes of fortune, stolen her liberty, and even put her life at risk. Worse, he's lifted the corner of her mask, the aegis that had armoured her and made her powerful. D'Artagnan has shielded Buckingham when Richelieu threatened him through the person of the queen – Buckingham, whom she hates as she hates everything she's loved. D'Artagnan has passed himself off as of Wardes, whom she'd desired with that feverish passion so characteristic of her. D'Artagnan has learned that terrible secret she'd sworn no one should know and live. Furthermore, just when she'd obtained the carte blanche by which she could take revenge on her enemy, the warrant had been wrested from her hands – and now d'Artagnan holds her prisoner, and is about to send her to some miserable prison colony of the Indian Ocean. She has no doubt but that she owes all this to d'Artagnan. Where else could all these ignominies come if not from him? Only he could have conveyed to Lord Winter all those frightful secrets that the Gascon had discovered one after another in a chain of catastrophes. He knew her brother-in-law, and must have written to him. What hatreds boil in her! She sits, motionless but for blazing eyes that glower at her deserted chamber, silent but for the muted, hissing snarls that occasionally escape her, echoing the sound of the surf as it rises, roars, and shatters, like eternal and impotent despair, against the rocks on which this tall grim castle stands. Lit by the fires of rage in her mind, what magnificent schemes of vengeance she conceives, set in the vague future: against Madam Bonacieux, against Buckingham but above all, against d'Artagnan. But to avenge herself, she must be free, and to be free, a prisoner must pierce walls, bend bars, and tunnel through floors – all efforts that might be managed by a strong and patient man but which are unsuited to a woman, with her febrile moods. Besides, to do all this one must have time: months, even years. And as she'd been told by Lord Winter, her brother and her jailer, she had only ten or twelve days. Nonetheless, she might have tried, and even succeeded – if only she had been a man. Why had heaven erred by placing that virile soul in such a frail and delicate body? The first minutes of her captivity had been terrible. Her debt to nature had been paid by several uncontrollable fits of rage, tokens of feminine weakness. But gradually she overcame these convulsions of mad fury; the nervous tremors that shook her diminished, and she coiled herself up, like an exhausted serpent recovering its strength. Let's go, she said to herself, "I must have been mad to get so carried away." She peered into her mirror, scrutinized herself with eyes like embers. "No more violence," she said. "Violence is the proof of weakness. Besides, I've never employed it successfully. If I used it against women, maybe I'd find them weaker than me, and defeat them. But it's men I'm pitted against, and to them I'm merely a woman. So I'll fight like a woman and make a strength of my weakness." Then, as if to reassure herself of her control over her features, so mobile and expressive, she made them assume every sort of expression, from the hideous distortion of rage to the sweetest, most affectionate, most alluring smile. Then she turned her hands to dressing her hair, trying every arrangement that might enhance the charms of her face. Eventually, satisfied with herself, she murmured, "Come, nothing is lost. I'm still beautiful."

By then it was nearly eight o'clock in the evening. Milady looked toward the bed, thinking that a few hours of rest would refresh her mind as well as her complexion. However, while preparing for sleep, she had a better idea. She recalled that someone had said something about supper. She'd already been in the chamber for an hour, so it wouldn't be long before they brought her meal. Determined not to lose any time, she resolved to make, that very evening, some opening move to test her fetters, and study the character of the people in whose charge she found herself. A light appeared under her door, announcing the return of her jailers. Milady who had risen, quickly draped herself over the armchair with her head thrown back, her beautiful hair undone and dishevelled, her breasts barely covered by her lace collar, now artistically disarranged. One hand was over her heart while the other hung limp. The bolts slid back; the door groaned on its hinges; footsteps sounded in the chamber, approaching her. "Put that table there," said a voice the prisoner recognised as Felton's. The order was obeyed. "Bring lamps, and relieve the sentry," Felton continued. Two such orders given to the same individual told Milady that her servants were to be the same men as her guards – in other words, soldiers. Felton's orders were obeyed with a silent speed that gave a good idea of how strictly he maintained discipline. Eventually Felton, who had not yet looked at Milady, turned toward her. "So, she's asleep," he said. "Fine. She can eat when she wakes."

But the soldier, more susceptible than the officer, had drawn near to Milady. "Lieutenant!" he said. "This woman isn't asleep."

"What do you mean, not asleep?" said Felton. "What's she doing then?"

"She's unconscious. Her face is very pale and I've listened but I can't hear her breathing."

"You're right," said Felton, looking Milady over from where he stood, without moving a step toward her. "Go inform Lord Winter that the prisoner's passed out. This is unexpected and I'm unsure what to do." The soldier left to carry out his officer's orders. Felton sat down on a chair that happened to be near the door, waiting without saying a word or making a move. Milady was highly skilled at the art, much studied by women, of peering out through her lashes while seemingly keeping her eyes closed. She examined Felton, who sat with his back toward her. She watched him for almost ten minutes, and during that time her impassive guardian never turned around once. She knew that Lord Winter would soon arrive that would only stiffen her jailer's resolve, so her first attempt had failed. But she accepted this, like one who has yet to reach the end of her resources. She raised her head, opened her eyes, and uttered a faint sigh. At the sound of this sigh, Felton finally turned around. "Ah! You've revived, Madam!" he said. "Then my business here's finished. If you need anything, you may call for it."

"Oh, my God! How I've suffered!"

Milady murmured in her harmonious voice like that of the ancient enchantresses, who charmed those they wished to destroy. And she fell back again on the armchair, assuming a position even more graceful – and more revealing – than the first. Felton got up. "Your meals will be served three times a day, Madam," he said. "In the morning at nine, in the afternoon at one, and in the evening at eight. If that is not to your satisfaction, you may specify whatever times you prefer and we shall conform to your wishes."

"But am I to be confined all alone in this vast and dismal chamber?" Milady asked.

"A local woman has been engaged for you. She will come to the castle tomorrow, and will assist you whenever you desire her presence."

"I thank you, Sir," the prisoner replied humbly.

Felton made a slight bow and turned toward the door. Just as he was about to leave, Lord Winter appeared in the corridor, followed by the soldier who'd been sent to inform him of Milady's condition. He had a bottle of smelling salts in his hand. "Well, what's all this? What do we have here?" he said mockingly, on seeing the prisoner sitting up, and Felton about to leave. "Has the dying woman returned to life? Good God, Felton, my lad – don't you see how naïve she thinks you are? This is just the first act of the comedy, and no doubt we'll have the pleasure of seeing the rest of them unfold, one after another."

"That's what I thought, Milord," said Felton, "but, since the prisoner's a woman after all, I didn't wish to be deficient in those duties a proper gentleman owes to a lady – if not for her sake, then for my own."

At these words of Felton’s, Milady shuddered to her fingertips as if ice had passed through her veins. “So,” the baron said, laughing, “that beautiful hair so carefully disordered, ivory skin and languorous look haven’t yet seduced you, you heart of stone?”

“No, Milord,” the impassive young man responded. “It will take more than these feminine tricks and coqueties to corrupt me, I assure you.”

“In that case, my bonny lieutenant, let’s leave Milady to her devices and go to supper. But she’s a fertile imagination so you can be sure that the second act of this comedy will follow hard upon the first.”

And with these words, Lord Winter, laughing, left the room arm-in-arm with Felton. “I’ll have your life for that, Felton,” Milady muttered under her breath, “I assure you. You miserable would-be monk, pathetic soldier in a uniform cut from a cassock.”

“By the by, Milady,” said Winter, pausing in the doorway, “don’t let this little disappointment steal your appetite. Try that chicken and those fish – they’re not poisoned, I promise! I get along very well with my chef, and as he’s not my heir, I have complete confidence in him. So may you. Goodbye, dear Sister – until your next sudden swoon.” This was more than Milady could stand. Her hands clenched on the chair’s arms and she ground her teeth. Her eyes were fixed on the door as it closed behind Lord Winter and Felton. As soon as she was alone, she was gripped by a new wave of despair. She cast her eyes on the table, where a knife gleamed; she seized it, only to be frustrated anew: the blade was blunt, and made of soft silver that would bend before it cut. Laughter burst out from the other side of the not-quite-closed door. “Haha!” cried Lord Winter. “You see, Felton, my lad – you see what I told you? That knife’s for you, my boy. She would have killed you! This is a fine illustration of one of her traits: to rid herself, one way or another, of everyone who gets in her way. If I’d listened to you, she’d have a pointed knife made of steel. That would have been the end of Felton: she’d have cut your throat, and then everyone else’s. Look at her grip, John; she knows how to handle a knife.”

In truth, Milady still held the knife balanced in her hand – but at these words, this final insult, her hand, strength, and even will slackened. The knife fell to the floor. “You’re right, Milord,” said Felton in a tone of deep disgust that stabbed Milady to the heart. “You were right about her, and I was mistaken.”

And once again, the two men left the room. This time, Milady listened more carefully than previously, to make sure their footsteps went off down the length of the corridor. “I’m lost,” she murmured. “I’m in the power of men on whom I have about as much effect as if they were statues of bronze or granite. They know all my methods and have a defence for every weapon in my arsenal. Nonetheless, I will not believe this must end as they say it must.”

As this final thought, this instinctive return of hope shows, sentiments of weakness and fear never survived long in the fiery furnace of Milady’s soul. She sat down at the table, sampled from several dishes, drank a little Spanish honey, and felt her resolution return. By the time she went to bed she had replayed, parsed, analysed, and examined from every angle every word, movement, and gesture of her jailers – even their silences. From this careful and profound study she concluded that, all things considered, it was Felton who was the more vulnerable of her persecutors. One phrase, more than any other, kept returning to the prisoner’s mind: “If I’d listened to you,” Lord Winter had said to Felton.

That meant Felton had spoken in her favour, since Lord Winter hadn’t been willing to listen to him. “Weak or strong,” Milady said to herself, “that man has a spark of pity in his soul. From that spark, I will light a fire that will devour him. As for the other: he knows me, and knows what he can expect from me, if I ever escape his grasp. It’s pointless to try anything with him. But Felton ... that’s another thing. He’s a young, rather naive man, who seems pure and virtuous. And that will be his downfall.” And Milady went to bed and fell asleep, with a smile on her lips. Anyone who saw her sleeping would have said she was a young maiden, dreaming of the crown of flowers she was to wear at the next fête.

053 The 2ND Day of Captivity

Milady dreamed that d’Artagnan was finally in her grasp, and she was assisting at his torture and execution. It was the sight of his odious blood, dripping from the executioner’s axe that brought such a charming smile to her lips. She slept like a prisoner lulled by a vision of hope. In the morning, when they came into her chamber, she was still in bed. Felton stayed in the corridor; the woman he’d spoken of the night before had just arrived, and he’d brought her with him. This woman entered, approached Milady’s bed, and offered her services. “I have a fever,” Milady said; she was naturally pale, with a complexion that might deceive someone seeing her for the first time. “I haven’t slept all night, not for a moment. I’m suffering abominably. Will you be more humane to me than they were yesterday? All I ask is permission to stay in bed.”

“Do you want a doctor to be sent for?” asked the woman. Felton listened to this dialogue without saying a word. Milady considered: the more people there were around her, the better the chance of finding someone whose sympathies she might engage – but the more she’d be subjected to the suspicion and surveillance of Lord Winter. Besides, a doctor might declare her illness was feigned, and Milady, having lost the first bout of the contest, didn’t want to lose the second. “Fetch a doctor?” she said. “To what end? These gentlemen declared yesterday that my illness was a comedy, and doubtless they’d say the same today. Since last night, they’ve already had plenty of time to send for a doctor.”

“Then tell us yourself, Madam, what remedy you need,” Felton said impatiently.

“How can I know? My God! All I know is that I’m suffering. Give me whatever you like; it hardly matters.”

“Go find Lord Winter,” said Felton, tired of these endless complaints.

“Oh, no! No!” cried Milady. “No, Sir – don’t call him, I implore you. I’m fine, I don’t need anything. Just don’t call him.”

This plea was so convincing in tone, so eloquent in its vehemence, that Felton, fascinated, took several steps into the chamber. He’s moved, Milady thought.

“Madam,” said Felton, “if you’re really suffering, we’ll send for a doctor – and if you’re pretending, well, it will be the worse for you but at least we won’t have anything to blame ourselves for.”

Milady made no reply, only buried her beautiful face in her pillow and burst into tears. Felton regarded her for a moment with his usual impassivity. Then as her sobs showed no sign of ending soon, he left. The woman followed him. Lord Winter never appeared. “I see we’re getting somewhere at last,” murmured Milady with a savage joy, veiling her face behind the drape of her sleeve to hide her smile of satisfaction from anyone who might be watching.

Two hours passed. It’s time now for my illness to fade, Milady thought. Time to rise, and see what other successes we can achieve today. I have only ten days, and as of tonight, two of them will be gone.

When they had entered Milady’s chamber that morning, they’d brought breakfast. Now she calculated that it couldn’t be long before they returned to clear the table, and she’d have another chance at Felton. She was right. Felton reappeared, and without looking to see if Milady had touched her food, he made a sign that the table that had been brought in bearing the breakfast dishes, should be carried away. Felton stayed behind. He had a book in his hand. Milady, reclining on a divan near the chimney, beautiful, pale, and submissive, looked like a virgin saint awaiting martyrdom. Felton approached her and said, “Lord Winter, who is a Catholic like you, Madam, thought that you shouldn’t be deprived of the rites and ceremonies of your church. He’s consented to allow you to read the daily mass. Here is a book containing your rituals.”

At the air with which Felton deposited the book on the little table near Milady and the tone in which he said the words your rituals, she raised her head and looked at him attentively. His lips were curved in a disdainful smile. It was then that, by the severe trim of his hair, by the exaggerated simplicity of his attire, by his forehead like polished marble, no doubt just as hard and impenetrable, she recognised him as one of those sombre English Puritans she’d encountered so often at the court of King James. She’d even met them at the court of the King of France where, despite the memory of Saint Bartholomew’s Day, they sometimes came to find refuge. She had one of those sudden inspirations that come to people of genius in great crises, one of those supreme moments that decide fortunes and lives. Those two words, your rituals, and one glance at Felton, revealed to her how critical her reply would be. However, with that quickness of mind that was hers alone, the reply sprang ready-made to her lips:

“Me?” she said with a disdain echoing that she’d heard in the young officer’s voice. “Me, sir? My rituals! Lord Winter, that corrupted Catholic, knows perfectly well that I’m not of his religion. This is another one of his snares!”

“Then, of what religion are you, Madam?” asked Felton with an astonishment he couldn’t quite suppress despite all his self-control.

“I will tell it,” Milady cried in feigned exaltation, “on the day when I’ve suffered all for my faith.” The look Felton gave her showed Milady the size of the breach she’d opened with one sentence. However, the young officer remained mute and motionless; only his look had spoken for him. “I am in the hands of mine enemies,” she continued, in that tone of zeal common to the Puritans. “Very well; God will save me or I shall perish for my God! That is the response I beg you to make to Lord Winter. As to that book,” she added, pointing to the missal with her finger but not touching it as if it would contaminate her, “you can take it back and make use of it yourself, as no doubt you’re the accomplice of Lord Winter in both his persecutions and his heresies.”

Felton said nothing. He picked up the book, displaying the same repugnance as before, and retired, pensive. Lord Winter came about five o’clock in the evening. Milady had had time during the day to map out her plan of conduct, and received him like a woman once more in command of herself. “So,” the baron said, seating himself in a chair facing Milady’s and nonchalantly stretching his feet out toward the hearth, “it appears we’ve undergone a little apostasy!”

“What do you mean, Sir?”

“I mean that, since the last time we saw each other, you’ve changed your religion. You haven’t, by any chance, married a Protestant as a third husband, have you?”

“Explain yourself, Milord,” replied the prisoner, with studied dignity. “I hear your words but I don’t understand them.”

“Ah, I see: you have no religion at all. I must say,” Lord Winter sneered, “I like that best.”

“It would certainly accord most closely with your own principles,” Milady replied coldly.

“I must confess, it’s pretty much all the same to me.”

“You don’t need to confess an indifference to religion, Milord – your crimes and debaucheries confess it for you.”

“What? You talk of debaucheries, Madam Messalina? You speak of crimes, Lady Macbeth? By God, unless I misunderstand you, that’s pretty shameless.”

“You only speak this way because you know you’re overheard, Sir,” Milady said with asperity, “and you want to prejudice your jailers and executioners against me.”

“My jailers! My executioners! Oh, to be sure. I see you’ve taken a turn for the poetic, Madam, and yesterday’s comedy has become tonight’s tragedy. But nonetheless, in eight days you’ll be where you belong, and my work will be complete.”

“An infamous work! An impious work!”

Milady glowed with the exaltation of a victim provoking a judge. “My word!” said Winter, rising. “I think the bitch has lost her mind. Come, come, calm yourself, Madam Puritan, or I’ll have to put you in a dungeon. God’s wounds! Has that Spanish honey gone to your head? If so, never fear – it’ll wear off soon enough with no ill aftereffects.”

And Lord Winter withdrew in a cloud of oaths that was typical of the cavaliers of the time. As Milady had surmised, Felton was, in fact, just outside the door, and hadn’t missed a word of the scene. “Yes, go on, brother-in-law,” Milady said to herself. “There will be aftereffects – but you’ll, you imbecile, not see them coming until it’s far too late.” Silence returned to the chamber. Two more hours passed. They brought Milady her supper but found her absorbed in saying her prayers aloud – prayers she’d heard from an old servant of her second husband, a most austere Puritan. She seemed to be lost in ecstasy, and appeared to pay no attention to what was happening around her. Felton made a sign that she shouldn’t be disturbed, and when they were finished, he left quietly with the soldiers.

Milady knew she might be watched, so she continued her prayers to their end, especially as it seemed to her that the soldier on sentry duty didn’t keep the same pace as before, and seemed to be listening. Well enough, then – for the moment. She rose, took her place at the table, ate a few bites, and drank only water. An hour later, her table was cleared – but Milady noticed that, this time, Felton didn’t accompany the soldiers. He was afraid then to see her too often. She turned toward the wall to smile, for it was such an expression of triumph that this smile alone would have betrayed her. She let another half-hour pass; then, just when all was silent in the old castle – except for the eternal murmur of the surf, that vast respiration of the ocean – her pure, harmonious, and vibrant voice rose in the first couplet of a psalm that was then a great favourite of the Puritans:

*If you abandon us, O Lord
It is just to try our strength
But to us you shall award
Your celestial hand at length*

Not very good verse, perhaps – but as everyone knows, the Protestants didn’t pride themselves on their poetry. As she sang, Milady listened. The soldier on guard at the door stopped as if turned to stone. This gave Milady an idea of the effect she’d produced. So she continued her song, with an inexpressible fervour and feeling. She imagined the sound spreading through the vaults of the castle, like a magic charm softening the hearts of her jailers. However, it seemed one soldier on duty – an ardent Catholic, no doubt – shook off the charm, for a voice came through the door: “Shut up, woman! Your song is as dismal as a of Profundis. If we have to hear this sort of stuff on top of this oh-so-pleasant garrison duty, it’s more than I can stand.”

“Silence!” said a stern voice that Milady recognised as Felton’s. “Keep your nose out of it, lout. Did anyone order you to prevent that woman from singing? No. You were told to guard her, and if she attempts to escape, to shoot her. So guard her, and if she tries to flee, kill her. But don’t go beyond that.” Milady’s face was lit by an expression of unspeakable joy – but this expression was as fleeting as a flash of lightning. Without appearing to have heard this exchange, though she hadn't lost a word, she resumed her song, giving her voice all the charm, eloquence, and seduction the demon had granted her:

*Despite all my tears and cares
Despite exile and chains
I've my youth and prayers
And God Who counts my pains*

Her sublimely passionate voice, so unexpectedly moving, gave the rude, rough poetry of these psalms a charm and effect that the most fervent Puritans rarely found in the songs of their brethren, no matter how they arranged and ornamented them. Felton thought he heard the singing of the angel who consoled the three Hebrews in the furnace. Milady continued:

*But our woes shall be relieved
God, just and strong, shall come
And if our hopes are yet deceived
There is still death and martyrdom*

This verse, into which the terrible enchantress poured her entire soul, rent the young officer's heart with exaltation and confusion. He thrust open the door and appeared before Milady, pale as always but with eyes aflame, almost wild. "Why do you sing like this with ... such a voice?" he said.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," Milady said mildly. "I'd forgotten that my songs would be out of place in this house. No doubt I've offended against your beliefs but I didn't mean to, I assure you. Pardon me for my error – if I've done wrong, it was unintentional."

Milady was so beautiful at this moment, with the light of religious ecstasy glowing in her face that Felton, dazzled, fancied he saw before him the angel whom he'd heard moments before. "Yes, yes," he said, "yes – you're arousing ... disturbing everyone in the castle."

The poor, confused man wasn't even aware of the incoherence of his speech, as Milady gazed with her lynx's eyes into the depths of his heart. "I will be silent, then," Milady said in her sweetest voice, lowering her eyes and assuming the most humble and submissive manner she could manage.

"No! No, Madam," said Felton. "Just ... sing less loudly. Especially at night."

And with these words, feeling he could not keep up his stern demeanour toward the prisoner any longer, Felton rushed from the room. "You did the right thing, Lieutenant," said the soldier. "Those kind of songs upset the mind. But you know, a person could get used to them – her voice's so beautiful!"

The 3RD Day of Captivity

Felton was drawn to her but that was not enough: he must be made hers – or rather he must commit to her of his own accord. Milady couldn't quite see yet how she was going to make that happen. There was more work to be done. He had to be made to speak, so he could be spoken to. As Milady well knew, her greatest seduction was in her voice that commanded the entire range of pitch and intonation, from human speech to heavenly oratory. However, despite all her seductions, Milady still might fail; for Felton was forewarned, wary of even the smallest hazards. So she scrutinized every action he took and every word he spoke, from the merest glance of his eyes, to his gestures and posture – and even his breathing that might conceal a sigh. She studied everything about him, like an experienced actor who's been given as a role a character type never played before. Toward Lord Winter, her plan of behaviour was simpler, and followed the pattern established the night before: to remain silent and dignified in his presence, irritating him from time to time with affected disdain or a contemptuous word. Her plan was to provoke him to threats of violence that would contrast with her own apparent submission and resignation. Felton would see everything; he might not say anything but he would see it all. Felton came in the morning as usual but Milady let him preside over the breakfast preparations without saying a word to him. When he was about to leave, she had a glimmer of hope, for she thought he was on the verge of speech but his lips moved without any sound escaping his mouth. With an effort, he regained his self-control; he suppressed the heartfelt words he'd almost spoken, and left. Toward noon, Lord Winter came in. It was a rather pretty day, and a ray of that pale English sun that brings light but not heat, shone through the bars of her prison. Milady was gazing out the window and pretended not to hear the door when it opened. "Oh ho!" said Lord Winter. "After playing both comedy and tragedy, I see we've moved on to melancholy." The prisoner didn't reply. "Yes, yes," Lord Winter continued, "I understand: you'd like to be free to walk that shore; to take ship and fly across that emerald-green sea; best of all, on land or sea, you'd like to arrange for me one of those little ambushes you're so skilled at. Patience! Patience! In four days, you'll be on that shore, you'll be setting out to sea – though perhaps farther out to sea than you'd like. But in only four more days, England will be rid of you."

Milady joined her hands and raised her beautiful eyes to heaven. "Lord, O Lord," she said with an angelic sweetness, "forgive this man as I myself forgive him."

"Yes, pray, demoness!" cried the baron. "Your prayer is all the more charitable, since you're in the power of a man who will never forgive you – I swear it!"

And he left. As he went out, she glanced through the gap in the door and saw Felton, who quickly drew back out of sight. She threw herself on her knees and began to pray. "Dear God! Dear God! You know in what holy cause I suffer. Give me the strength to bear my torments." The door quietly opened. The lovely supplicant pretended not to hear but continued, in a voice wracked with tears, "God of benevolence! God of vengeance! Will you allow this man's frightful schemes to succeed?"

Only then did she seem to become aware of Felton's presence. Rising quick as thought, she blushed, as if ashamed of having been surprised on her knees. "I don't wish to disturb one who is praying, Madam," Felton said gravely. "Don't stop for my sake, I beg."

"What makes you think I was praying, sir?" Milady said, her voice choked with sobs. "You're mistaken, sir – I wasn't praying."

"Do you think, Madam," Felton replied, with the same grave voice but in a milder tone, "that I would presume to prevent any being from bowing before her Creator? God forbid! Besides, repentance becomes the guilty. To me, no matter what crimes they've committed, a sinner at the feet of God is sacred."

"Guilty? Me?" said Milady, with a smile that would have deceived the Angel of the Last Judgement. "Guilty! My God, thou knowest if I am! Say I'm condemned, Sir, if you must – but you know that God loves martyrs, and sometimes permits the innocent to be condemned."

"Condemned sinner or condemned martyr," replied Felton, "all the more reason for prayer – and I myself will aid you with my own prayers."

"Oh, Sir, you are a just man!" Milady cried, falling to her knees at his feet. "I can't hold out any longer, and I'm afraid my strength will fail me, just when I must undergo my struggle and testify my faith. Listen, then, to the prayer of a woman in despair. They've duped you, Sir but that doesn't matter now. I ask only one favour, and if you grant it to me, I'll bless you in this world and the next."

"Speak to my superior, Madam," said Felton. "Fortunately, I'm in charge of neither pardon nor punishment; God has given that responsibility to one higher placed than I."

"I speak to you – only to you! Listen to me, instead of contributing to my ruin, instead of adding to my humiliation."

"If you deserve this shame, Madam, if you've earned this humiliation, then you must submit to it as an offering to the Lord."

"What are you saying? Oh, you don't understand me! When I speak of humiliation, you think I mean some sentence of imprisonment or death. Would to heaven it were that! What's imprisonment or death to me?"

"Now I truly don't understand you, Madam."

"Or you just pretend not to understand, Sir," replied the prisoner with a sceptical smile.

"No, Madam – honour of a soldier, faith of a Christian!"

"What, you really don't know Lord Winter's plans for me?"

"I know nothing of it."

"Impossible. You're his confidant!"

"I never lie, Madam."

"He takes no trouble to hide them – you must have guessed."

"I don't try to guess anything, Madam. I wait until I'm told, and apart from what he's said to me in front of you, Lord Winter has confided nothing to me."

"But, then," Milady said, in a tone of truth impossible to doubt, "you're not his accomplice? You don't know that he intends to subject me to a shame so awful, that all the punishments in the world pale beside it?"

"You're mistaken, Madam," said Felton, reddening. "Lord Winter isn't capable of such a crime."

Good, Milady said to herself. Without even knowing what it is, he calls it a crime. Then, aloud: "The friend of the Iniquitous is capable of anything."

"Who are you calling iniquitous?" asked Felton.

"Is there, in England, more than one man who deserves such a name?"

"You mean George Villiers?" said Felton, visibly dismayed.

"He whom pagans, heretics, and infidels call the Duke of Buckingham," replied Milady. "I wouldn't have thought that in all England there was an Englishman who needed so much explanation in order to know who I was talking about!"

"The hand of the Lord hovers over him," said Felton. "He will not escape the punishment he deserves."

Felton was only expressing the common loathing most of the English felt for the duke, whom the Catholics referred to as the tyrant, the embezzler, the corrupter, and whom the Puritans simply called Satan. "O my God, when I beg you to rain down upon this man the punishment he's due," Milady cried, "you know it isn't my own vengeance I pursue but the deliverance of a whole people I pray for."

"You know him then?" asked Felton.

He questions me at last! He's caught, Milady exulted to herself, at the height of joy at having achieved so much, so quickly. "Do I know him?" she said. "Alas, yes, to my shame and misfortune, my eternal misfortune!" And Milady wrung her hands, as if in a paroxysm of grief. Felton doubtless sensed he was losing his will to resist, as he took several steps toward the door. But the prisoner, who watched his every movement, darted after him and stopped him. "Oh, Sir!" she cried. "Be kind, be Merciful, and listen to my prayer. That knife that I lost to the baron's fatal distrust, because he knew what I would do with it – oh, listen to me to the end! That knife, give it to me for just a minute, in the name of mercy, of pity! I'm at your knees. Look, you can shut the door behind you, so you can see I can't mean it for you. For you, oh, heavens – you, the only just, good, and compassionate person I've met! Perhaps, even, my saviour! One minute ... that knife ... one minute, only one, and I'll pass it back to you through the grate. Just one minute, Mister Felton, and you'll have saved my honour!"

"You'd kill yourself?" cried Felton with terror, forgetting to withdraw his hands from those of the prisoner. "Kill yourself?"

"Now I've said it," murmured Milady, lowering her voice and falling, overwhelmed, to the floor. "I've given away my secret. Now he knows! My God, I'm lost!" Felton remained standing, frozen with indecision. He still has doubts, Milady thought. I haven't been convincing enough. Someone was walking up the corridor; Milady recognised the footsteps of Lord Winter. Felton recognised them also, and moved toward the door. Milady leaped after him. "Oh! Not a word," she pleaded, "not a word of what I've said to you to that man, or I'm lost, and it would be you, you..." then as the steps drew near, she fell silent, for fear of being heard – but with a soft gesture bespeaking infinite terror, she touched her beautiful hand to Felton's mouth. Dazed, Felton gently pushed Milady away, and sank onto a chair. Lord Winter passed the door without stopping, and the sound of his steps receded into the distance. Felton, as pale as death, stayed for several moments with his ear cocked and listening; then, when the sound had dwindled and died, he took a breath like a man awaking from a dream, and rushed from the room. At last, Milady thought, listening as Felton's footsteps went off in the opposite direction from Lord Winter's, at last, you are mine! Then her brow darkened. If he speaks to the baron, I'm lost, she thought, for the baron, who knows very well that I won't kill myself, will stand me before him and put a knife in my hand, and then Felton will see that my grand despair is only an act. She stood before her mirror and inspected herself intently. She had never looked more beautiful. No, she thought, smiling, no, he won't tell the baron. When they brought supper that evening, Lord Winter came with it. "Milord," Milady said to him, "is your presence an obligatory feature of my captivity, or could you spare me the added misery your visits cause me?"

"How's that, dear sister?" said Winter, "When you arrived, didn't you sentimentally inform me, with that pretty mouth that's so cruel to me today, that you came to England for the sole purpose of seeing me? You said it hurt so much to be deprived of my company that you were willing to risk everything for it: storms, seasickness, even captivity. Well, here I am, so be satisfied! Besides, this time my visit has a motive." Milady shivered, afraid that Felton had talked. Perhaps never in her life had this woman, who had experienced so many powerful conflicting emotions, felt her heart beat so violently. She was seated; Lord Winter took a chair, drew it near, and sat down beside her. Then taking a paper from his pocket, he slowly unfolded it. "Here," he said to her. "I want to show you a sort of passport I've drawn up that will serve as a warrant regulating the life I've decided you'll lead from now on." Then turning his eyes from Milady to the paper, he read: "Order to conduct to – the destination's blank," interrupted Lord Winter. "If you've a preference you may indicate it, and as long as it's not within a thousand leagues of London I'll try to comply with your request. I'll begin again: Order to conduct to blank, the woman named Charlotte Backson, branded by the justice of the Realm of France but liberated after chastisement. She is sentenced to reside in the above-named location, never to travel more than three leagues from it. In the event of an attempted escape, she is to suffer the penalty of death. She is allotted five shillings per day for lodging and food."

"This order doesn't concern me," Milady said coldly, "since it carries a name other than my own."

"A name! Do you have one?"

"I have that of your brother."

"You're mistaken. My brother was your second husband, and your first is still alive. Tell me his name and I'll put it in place of the name Charlotte Backson. No? You'd rather not? You keep your silence?"

Very well, then you must keep the name of Charlotte Backson." Milady remained silent, not as a tactic but from terror. She thought the order was to be executed immediately – that Lord Winter had advanced the date of her departure and she was condemned to leave that same evening. To her mind, for an instant, all was lost ... until she noticed that the order had no signature. Her joy at this discovery was so great she was unable to conceal it. "Ah, yes," said Lord Winter, who understood what was passing through her mind. "Yes, you search for a signature, and you say to yourself, 'All is not lost, for the warrant isn't yet signed. He only showed it to me to frighten me, that's all.' But you're mistaken. Tomorrow this order will be sent to the Duke of Buckingham, and the next day it will return, signed by his hand and bearing his seal. And twenty-four hours after that, it will be executed – I will answer for it. Goodbye, Madam. That was all I had to say to you."

"And my reply to you, sir, is that this abuse of power, this exile under a false name, is infamous!"

"Would you prefer to be called by your true name and be hanged, Milady? As you know, the English laws on fraudulent marriage are stern and rigorous. Speak freely! Although my own name, or rather my brother's name, would be dragged through the mud, I'll risk the scandal of public trial to be sure of being rid of you." Milady didn't reply but went pale as a corpse. "Oh! I see you prefer a sentence of transportation. Excellent, Madam. There's an old proverb that says travel seasons the youth, and my faith! It's the right decision. After all, life is good. That's why I take such care that you don't rob me of mine. Which just leaves the business of the five shillings a day. You think that's a bit parsimonious, don't you? Well, I'd rather not give you the means of corrupting your guardians. Besides, you'll still have your beauty, and can seduce them with your charms. Use those, if your disappointment in that regard with Felton hasn't been too discouraging."

So Felton hasn't talked, Milady thought. Nothing is lost then.

"And now, Madam, see you shortly. I'll return tomorrow to let you know when the messenger is on his way."

Lord Winter rose, bowed ironically, and left. Milady breathed again. She still had four days ahead of her; four days would be enough for her to complete Felton's seduction. Then a terrible thought occurred to her: that Lord Winter might send Felton himself to get the warrant signed by Buckingham. Once interrupted, the magic of her seduction would fail, and Felton would escape her. Only one thing reassured her: Felton had not talked. Not wanting to appear too dismayed by Lord Winter's threats, she sat down at the table and ate. Then, as she'd done the night before, she fell to her knees and recited her prayers aloud. As on the night before, the soldier on guard paused in his step to listen to her. Soon she heard lighter footsteps than those of the sentry come up the corridor and stop at her door. That's him, she said to herself. And she began the same hymns that had so violently aroused Felton the night before. But though her voice, sweet, full, and sonorous, was as harmonious and heartrending as ever, the door stayed closed. Nonetheless, in one of the furtive glances she darted at the grate in the door, Milady thought she saw the young man's ardent eyes through the grille. But whether this was reality or illusion, what was certain was that this time he had enough self-control not to enter. Only, a few moments after she'd finished her hymn, Milady thought she heard a profound sigh. Then the same footsteps she'd heard approach receded slowly as if with regret.

The 4th Day of Captivity

The next day, when Felton entered Milady's chamber, he found her standing on a chair, holding in her hands a cord woven from cambric handkerchiefs that had been torn into strips, twisted, and tied end to end. At the noise Felton made entering the door, Milady jumped lightly down from the chair, trying to hide the improvised cord behind her. The young man was even more pale than usual, and his eyes, red from insomnia, showed that he'd passed a feverish night. However, his face was taut with determination, his expression more austere than ever. He advanced slowly on Milady who had sat down, and taking an end of the murderous cord that by mistake or by design was partly visible, he asked coldly, "What is this, Madam?"

"That? Nothing," said Milady, smiling that agonized smile she had practiced so well. "Boredom is the mortal enemy of all prisoners. I ... was bored and amused myself by plaiting that cord."

Felton turned his eyes toward the chamber wall beneath which he'd found Milady on the chair where she now sat. Above her head, embedded in the wall, he saw a gilded hook for hanging clothes or arms. He started – and the prisoner saw him start, for though her eyes were cast down, nothing escaped her. "What were you doing, standing on that chair?" he demanded.

"What's that to you?" Milady replied.

"Because," said Felton, "I want to know."

"Please don't question me," said the prisoner. "You know that my people, that true Christians, are forbidden from falsehood."

"Well, then," said Felton, "I will tell you what you were doing, or rather what you were about to do: you were going to complete that fatal task you've been contemplating. But remember, Madam, if our God forbids us from falsehood, he even more severely yet forbids us from suicide."

"When God sees one of his creatures unjustly persecuted, placed between suicide and dishonour, believe me, sir," replied Milady, in a tone of deep conviction, "God will pardon the suicide – for then the suicide becomes a martyr."

"You say either too much or too little. Speak, Madam! In the name of heaven, explain yourself."

"Am I to tell you my trials, and have you treat them as fables? Am I to tell you my plans, and have you denounce them to my persecutor? No, Sir. Besides, what importance can the life or death of a condemned prisoner have for you? You're only responsible for my body, aren't you? As long as you can present them with a cadaver that's recognisably mine, there's nothing more they can ask of you. You'll probably even receive a bonus."

"Me, Madam!" cried Felton. "You imagine I'd accept a price for your life! You can't mean what you're saying."

"Leave me to do as I will, Felton," Milady said desperately. "Every soldier is ambitious, isn't he? You're a lieutenant now – well, you'll carry my coffin as a captain!"

"What have I done to you," Felton said earnestly, "that you should charge me with such a responsibility, before man and before God? In a few days you'll be gone from here, Madam. Your life will no longer be under my care, and," he added with a sigh, "then you can do with it what you will."

"So!" cried Milady, as if she couldn't suppress her righteous indignation. "You, a pious man, who call yourself just, you ask only one thing: not to be held accountable for, or inconvenienced by, my death!"

"It's my duty to watch over your life, Madam, and I will watch over it."

"But don't you understand the nature of the duty you're fulfilling? It's cruel enough if I'm guilty – but what name can you give it, what name will the Lord give it, if I'm innocent?"

"I'm a soldier, Madam, and I follow the orders I'm given."

"Do you believe, then, that on Judgement Day God will make a distinction between blind executioners and corrupt judges? You won't let me slay my body but you're willing to be the agent of those who would slay my soul!"

"But I repeat to you," Felton said with agitation, "that no danger threatens you. I'd answer for Lord Winter as I would for myself."

"You blind fool!" Milady cried. "You poor, blind fool, who dares to answer for another man, when even the wisest men of God hesitate to answer for themselves! You take the side of the wealthy and strong, and oppress the poor and weak."

"Impossible, Madam. Impossible," murmured Felton who felt in his heart the justice of this argument. "Though you're a prisoner, and I can't give you your freedom, still, you're alive, and I won't assist at your death!"

"Yes," cried Milady, "but I'll lose something more precious to me than life: I'll lose my honour, Felton. And it's you, you who I'll hold responsible, before God and man, for my shame and my ignominy."

This time Felton, impassive though he was – or appeared to be – couldn't resist the urgent desire that already secretly possessed him. To see this woman, this fair and beautiful vision, torn between tears and terror, lifted by holy exaltation one moment and then crushed by grief the next, was too much to bear for a religious mystic. It was too much for a mind already undermined by the fervid dreams of an ecstatic faith, too much for a heart corroded by worship of a God who burns, and hatred for men who oppress. Milady saw his turmoil, and sensed by intuition the flames of the conflicting passions that burned in the blood of the young fanatic. And like an experienced general who, seeing the enemy on the verge of surrender, redoubles the attack, she rose, beautiful as an ancient priestess, radiant as a saintly virgin, arms extended, throat uncovered, and hair unbound. Drawing her robe modestly across her breasts, her eyes lit by that fire that had already wrought such havoc in the young Puritan's heart, she advanced toward him, reciting to him in that melodious voice with desperate urgency and a consuming energy:

Deliver unto Baal the martyr

Sacrifice to the lions the victim

God will make you repent his daughter

When I cry from the depth of affliction

Felton stood before this apparition as if petrified. "Who are you?" he cried, clasping his hands. "Are you a messenger from God or an envoy from Hell? Are you angel or devil, Eloas or Astarte?"

"Don't you recognise me, Felton? I'm neither angel nor demon, I'm a daughter of the earth, a sister of your faith, no more."

"Yes! Yes!" said Felton. "I doubted but now I believe!"

"You believe, and yet you are still the accomplice of that child of Belial, who goes by the name of Lord Winter! You believe but you leave me in the hands of my enemies, of the enemy of England – the enemy of God! You believe but you deliver me unto him who soils the world with his heresies and debaucheries, to that infamous Sardanapalus, whom the deceived call the Duke of Buckingham, and the righteous call Antichrist!"

"Me, deliver you to Buckingham? What are you saying?"

"They have eyes," cried Milady, "yet they will not see. They have ears, yet they will not hear."

"Yes ... yes!" said Felton, passing his hands across his beaded brow as if to wipe away his last doubts with the moisture. "Yes, I recognise that voice that speaks to me in my dreams. I recognise the face of the angel who appears to me each night, calling out to my soul so that I cannot sleep: 'Strike! Save England! Save yourself, lest you die with a debt to the Lord!' Speak, oh, speak!" he cried, "for now I can understand you."

A flash of infernal joy, rapid as thought, gleamed from Milady's eyes. However fleeting this murderous flash, Felton saw it, and started as if he'd caught a glimpse of the abysses of this woman's heart. All at once, he recalled Lord Winter's warnings about Milady's seductions, and her first attempts after her arrival. He recoiled, bowing his head as if to look down – but he couldn't stop gazing at her. Fascinated by this strange creature, he couldn't tear his eyes from hers. Milady was not the woman to mistake the meaning of this hesitation. Beneath her surface passions, her icy coolness never left her. Before Felton could reply, and before she was forced to resume the dialogue's exalted tone, so difficult to maintain, she wilted and let her hands fall to her sides. Then, as if the weakness of the woman had overcome the inspiration of the believer, she said, "But no – it's not for me to be the Judith who delivers Bethulia from this Holofernes. The sword of the Lord is too heavy for my hands. Let me escape dishonour by death, let me take refuge in martyrdom. I ask neither for freedom, as the guilty would, nor for vengeance like a pagan. Let me die, that's all. I beg you, on my knees – let me die, and my last sigh will be a blessing on you, my saviour."

At this voice so sweet and submissive and this look so timid and downcast, Felton rebuked himself. Little by little the enchantress had draped herself in that magic cloak that she assumed and discarded at will: her beauty, her sweetness, her sadness, and above all the irresistible attraction of her mystical sensuality, the most alluring of all fascinations. "Alas!" said Felton. "Even if you prove to me that you're a victim, the only thing I can do is pity you! But Lord Winter has laid cruel charges against you. I know you're a Christian, and my sister in religion; I feel myself drawn to you – I, who've never loved anyone but my benefactor, and have never encountered any in this life but the treacherous and impious. But you, Madam, who seem so pure, so beautiful, must have done terrible things for Lord Winter to treat you this way."

"They have eyes," Milady repeated, in a tone of indescribable sadness, "yet will not see. They have ears, yet will not hear."

"Tell me, then," cried the young officer. "Speak! Speak!"

"Confide my shame to you?" Milady said, a modest blush colouring her cheek. "You know the crime of one often becomes the shame of another. Do I, a woman, dare confide my secret shame to you, a man? Oh!" Abashed, she covered her beautiful eyes with her hands. "Oh, never! Never! I couldn't!"

"Not even to me? To a brother?" said Felton.

Milady regarded him for a long moment with an expression the young officer took for doubt but which really combined simple observation with the will to fascinate. Now Felton became the supplicant, and joined his hands. "Then," said Milady, "I'll confide in my brother. I'll dare..."

Then once again, they heard the footsteps of Lord Winter. But this time, Milady's forbidding brother-in-law didn't content himself as he had the day before, with passing the door and moving on. He stopped, exchanged a few words with the sentry – then the door opened, and he appeared. During the brief exchange with the guard, Felton quickly drew away, and when Lord Winter entered, he was several paces from the prisoner. The baron entered slowly, looking intently at Milady and the young officer. "You've been in here quite a while, John," he said. "Has this woman been relating her crimes to you? In that case I could understand the length of the conversation."

Felton started and Milady sensed she was lost if she didn't come to aid of the dismayed Puritan. "Ah! You're afraid your prisoner will escape!" she said. "Well, ask your worthy jailer what favour I was just begging of him."

"She was asking for a favour?" the baron said suspiciously.

"Yes, Milord," the confused young man replied.

"And what favour would that be?" asked Lord Winter.

"A knife," said Felton, "which she promised to return through the grating a minute later."

"Then there's someone hidden here, whose throat this gracious lady wants to cut," Lord Winter said in a mocking, contemptuous voice.

"Yes – my own," replied Milady.

"I've offered you a choice between America and the gallows at Tyburn," replied Lord Winter. "Choose Tyburn, Milady – believe me, the rope is more certain than the knife."

Felton blanched and took a step forward, remembering that when he'd entered, Milady had been holding a rope. "You're right," she said. "I've already thought about that." Then she added quietly, "And I'll think about it again."

Felton felt a shiver to the marrow of his bones. Lord Winter probably detected it, for he said, "Don't trust that feeling, John. I rely on you but take care! I've warned you! Be brave, my lad – in three more days we'll be rid of this creature. Where I'm sending her, she can harm no one."

"Hear his voice!" Milady exclaimed in such a way that the baron might think she was addressing heaven but Felton would understand was addressed to him. Felton hung his head and seemed lost in thought. The baron took the young officer by the arm and left, watching Milady over his shoulder so as not to lose sight of her until they were gone. "I'm afraid," the prisoner said to herself, once the door was shut, "that I haven't gotten as far as I'd hoped. Winter has traded his usual idiocy for an unexpected caution. It's his desire for revenge, and new desires change a man! As for Felton, he still hesitates. At least that damned d'Artagnan was a real man. A Puritan adores only virgins and adores them by clasping his hands before them. A musketeer loves women and loves them by clasping his arms around them." So Milady waited impatiently, as she was afraid the entire day might pass without another sight of Felton. But an hour after the scene just related, she heard someone speaking in a low voice at the door. Then the door opened, and she recognised the silhouette of Felton. The young man advanced rapidly into the chamber, leaving the door open behind him and making a sign to Milady to stay silent. His face was tense. "What do you want with me?" she said.

"Listen," replied Felton in a low voice. "I just sent away the sentry so I'd enter with none knowing it and talk to you with none overhearing us. The baron's just told me a frightful story." Milady assumed the resigned smile of the victim, and shook her head. "Either you're a demon," Felton continued, "or the baron, my benefactor ... father's ... is a monster. I've known you for four days, I've loved him for ten years. So I may hesitate between you but don't be alarmed – I just need to be convinced. So tonight, after midnight, I will come to see you, and you will convince me."

"No, Felton. No, my brother. The sacrifice is too great, and I can feel what it would cost you. No, I am lost; do not be lost with me. My death will be more eloquent than my life, and the silence of a corpse will be more convincing than the words of a prisoner."

"Be silent, Madam," Felton commanded. "Do not speak to me that way. I've come to make you promise, on your honour, to swear to me by whatever you hold most sacred, that you will make no further attempts on your life."

"I will make no such promise," Milady said, "for no one has more respect for a pledge than I have, and if I make a promise I will keep it."

"Very well," said Felton, "then just promise to take no action until you've seen me again. If, after you've seen me, you still insist ... then ... you shall be free, and I myself will give you the weapon you demand."

"All right," Milady said. "I'll wait for you."

"Swear."

"I swear by our God. Are you content?"

"I am," said Felton. "Tonight then."

And he darted from the chamber, closed the door, and stood outside, the soldier's half-pike in his hand, as if he'd been mounting guard in his place. When the soldier came back, Felton returned his weapon to him. Then, watching through the grating, Milady saw the young man cross himself fervently, then hurry off down the corridor as if transported by joy. As for Milady, she returned to her place with a smile of savage contempt on her lips, and blasphemously repeated the name of God, by whom she'd just sworn, without once in her life ever trying to know Him: "My God!" she said. "What a witless fanatic! My God? My God is myself and whoever will aid me in my revenge!"

Milady's victory was at least half achieved, and with this success, her strength was redoubled. It wasn't difficult to make conquests, as she previously had, of men who were ready to be seduced, and whose schooling in court gallantry led them easily into her snares. Milady was sufficiently beautiful to meet little resistance from the flesh, and sufficiently clever to defeat the defences of the mind. But this time she had to contend with a fundamentally primitive nature, hardened by rigid austerity. Religion and its strictures had made Felton a man inaccessible to ordinary seductions. The rarefied mind of this visionary seethed with projects so vast and numinous there was no room for earthly love, an emotion that grows from leisure and is nourished by self-deceit. By her false virtue, Milady had succeeded in reversing the opinion of a man prejudiced against her, and by her sensual beauty had unlocked the heart of a man until now chaste and pure. In this contest with the most difficult adversary that nature and religion could present to her, she had had to deploy the full extent of her powers, till then unknown even to herself. Nevertheless, many times during that evening she despaired of destiny, and of herself. She didn't invoke God, as we know but she had faith in the genius of evil, that vast sovereignty that reigns over all the details of human life, a power so great that, as in the Arabian fable, it needs no more than a single pomegranate seed from which to reconstruct a ruined world. Once she'd readied herself to receive Felton, Milady was able to consider the disposal of her forces for the following day. She knew she had only two more days: Buckingham would sign that order – all the more readily as it bore a false name, so he couldn't recognise the woman in question – and the baron would embark her immediately. She was well aware that a woman sentenced to transportation would find it far more difficult to employ seduction as a means of freeing herself than an apparently virtuous woman glowing in the radiance of her beauty – a beauty enhanced all the more by being graced by the height of fashion, and gilded with the enchanting halo of aristocratic rank. Being condemned to onerous and shameful punishment is no impediment to beauty but it's an immense obstacle to exercising that beauty's power. Like all people of genuine talent, Milady was well aware of the limitations of its nature. To her, poverty was poison, a condition that would rob her of two-thirds of her power and grandeur. Milady was only a queen among queens; to dominate others she must revel in the glory of satisfied pride. Defeating her inferiors was more of a humiliation than a pleasure for her. Of course, she would find a way to return from exile: she never doubted that for a moment. But how long would it take her? To a nature as active and ambitious as Milady's, any day not spent advancing toward her goal was an abomination. What word then would be strong enough to describe days spent in reverse? To lose a year, two years, three years – one might as well say an eternity!

To return long after d'Artagnan and his friends, happy and triumphant, had received from the queen the reward so well earned for the services rendered her, was the sort of maddening idea that a woman like Milady could not bear. The very thought of it inspired such a storm of rage within her that her strength was multiplied many times over, and she could have burst the walls of her prison if her mortal flesh had been able, for a single instant, to incarnate the power of her hatred. She was piqued even more by the thought of the cardinal. What must he think of her silence? The cardinal: so mistrustful, so uneasy, so suspicious, who was not only her sole support and sole protector in the present but the principal instrument of her fortune – and vengeance – in the future. She knew him; she knew it would be useless upon her return to argue that she'd been imprisoned, that she'd suffered terribly on his behalf. The cardinal would merely reply with the calm mockery of the sceptic, fortified by both power and genius: "You'd never have allowed yourself to be taken."

So Milady gathered all her energies and repeated in the depths of her mind the name of Felton, the only glimmer of light that penetrated into the hell in which she found herself. And like a serpent that twists and clenches its coils to test its powers of constriction, she mentally enveloped Felton in the thousand tightening turns of her inventive imagination. Time slowly passed: as each one marched by the hours seemed to startle the clock awake, every blow of its brazen hammer resounding in the heart of the prisoner. At nine o'clock, Lord Winter made his customary visit. He tested the bars of the window, sounded the floor and the walls, and inspected the chimney and the door without him or Milady saying a single word throughout his long and thorough examination. Doubtless both of them understood that the situation had become too grave to waste time in useless words and pointless anger. "Well," said the baron on leaving her, "you won't escape this night!"

At ten o'clock, Felton came to supervise the changing of the guard. She recognised his footstep; she was as familiar with it now as a mistress is with that of her lover, though Milady detested and despised this weak-minded fanatic. But it was not yet the appointed hour; Felton would not come in. Two hours later, as midnight sounded, the sentry was relieved. Now the hour had come, and Milady fell prey to impatience. The new sentry began his march in the corridor. At the end of ten minutes, Felton came. Milady was more than ready. "Listen," said the young man to the sentry, "you are not, under any conditions, to leave this door. You know that last night Milord punished a soldier for leaving his post for a moment, even though I took his place during his absence."

"Yes, I know that," the soldier said.

"I advise you, then, to maintain the strictest possible watch. I," he added, "am going inside for a second visit to this woman. I'm afraid she has sinister intentions on her own life, and I've received orders to keep close watch on her."

Good, thought Milady. Our righteous Puritan has learned how to lie.

As for the soldier, he only smiled. "Lord love us, Lieutenant," he said, "I never heard of an easier order to carry out, especially if Milord has authorised you to look in her bed."

Felton blushed. Under any other circumstance he'd have reprimanded the soldier for making such a crude joke but now his conscience spoke too loud for him to dare such a reproach. "If I call, come in," he said. "If anyone else comes, call me."

"Aye-aye, Lieutenant," said the soldier.

Felton entered the chamber.

Milady rose. "You've come?" she said.

"I promised you I'd come," Felton said, "and I am here."

"You promised me something else besides."

"My God! What?" said the young man who felt his knees tremble and cold sweat bead his brow in spite of his self-control.

"You promised to bring me a knife, and to leave it with me after we talked."

"Don't speak of that, Madam," said Felton. "There is no situation, no matter how terrible it may be, that can justify one of God's creatures taking her own life. I've thought hard about this, and I could never be guilty of being involved in such a sin."

"Oh? You've thought about this?" said the prisoner, seating herself on her armchair with a smile of disdain. "I, too, have thought."

"About what?"

"That I have nothing to say to a man who doesn't keep his word."

"O God, my God!" murmured Felton.

"You may retire," said Milady. "I have no more to say."

"Here is the knife!" said Felton, drawing the weapon from his pocket.

He had brought it, as promised but still he hesitated to give it to the prisoner. "Let me see it," said Milady.

"To what end?"

"Upon my honour, I'll return it to you instantly. You can set it on that table, and stay between it and me."

Felton handed the weapon to Milady, who tested its edge, then tried its point on the end of her finger.

"Good," she said, returning the knife to the young officer. "That's fine steel; you're a faithful friend, Felton."

Felton took back the weapon and laid it on the table, as agreed. Milady followed him with her eyes, and made a gesture of satisfaction. "Now," she said, "listen to me."

These words were entirely unnecessary, as the young officer stood before her expectantly, ready to devour her every word. “Felton,” Milady said, with a sad solemnity, “suppose your sister, the daughter of your father, said to you, ‘While still young and unfortunately fair to look at, I was lured into a snare. I resisted; though ambushed and threatened again and again, I resisted; though the religion I serve, and the God I adore, were blasphemed because I prayed for help from that religion and that God, I resisted; and then I was subjected to the vilest outrages, for if they couldn’t crush my soul, they could forever defile my body. In the end...’”

Milady stopped, and a bitter smile touched her lips. “In the end,” Felton said, “in the end – what did they do?”

“In the end, they decided to paralyse the resistance they couldn’t overcome. One night, they introduced a powerful narcotic into my drinking water. I’d scarcely finished my meal when I felt myself slowly falling into a strange torpor. Though I wasn’t suspicious at first, I felt a vague fear, and tried to fight off sleep. I got up and tried to get to the window to call for help but my legs refused to carry me. It seemed as if the ceiling was descending on my head, crushing me with its weight. I reached out my arms, I tried to speak but all I could make were inarticulate sounds. An irresistible drowsiness came over me. Feeling as if I was about to fall, I leaned on a chair but soon my arms grew numb and even that support failed me. I fell to one knee, then both; I tried to pray but my tongue was frozen. So God must have neither heard nor seen me, and I slipped to the floor, succumbing to a sleep that resembled death. Of all that happened during that sleep, or the time that passed while it lasted, I have no memory. I recall nothing until I awoke in a luxurious bed, in a round chamber, sumptuously furnished, and into which light penetrated only through an opening in the ceiling. No door seemed to give entrance into this room. You might call it a magnificent prison. It was a long time before I was able to clearly make out what sort of place I found myself in, or take in the details I now describe. I couldn’t seem to fully awaken, and my mind struggled to throw off the heavy shadows of sleep. I had vague recollections of movement, of a rolling carriage, of a horrible dream that had drained away all my strength. But all this was so dark and indistinct in my mind that the events seemed to belong to another life than mine, though merged somehow with my own in a fantastic distortion of reality. At times, my condition seemed so strange that I thought I was dreaming. I staggered to my feet. My clothes were near me, on a chair. I didn’t remember either undressing or going to bed. Then, little by little, reality dawned on me, and my modesty was outraged. I was no longer in the house where I lived! As far as I could tell by the light of the sun through the opening above, the day was already mostly gone. It was evening when I’d fallen prey to sleep, so I must have slept for almost twenty-four hours. What had happened during this long slumber? I dressed as rapidly as I could but my dizziness and slow movements showed that the narcotic hadn’t yet entirely worn off. My chamber had apparently been furnished for a woman, and the most accomplished coquette couldn’t have wished for anything more than what could be found in that apartment. Certainly, I wasn’t the first captive to find herself locked in this splendid prison – but you understand, Felton, that the more beautiful the prison seemed, the greater was my fear. For it was a prison, and I tried in vain to escape. I sounded all the walls, hoping to discover a door but everywhere they seemed solid. I went around that chamber maybe twenty times, looking for a way out – but there was none. I sank, exhausted with fatigue and terror, into an armchair. Now night was coming fast, and with the night my terrors redoubled. I didn’t know if it was safe to stay where I was seated; it seemed to me I was surrounded by unknown dangers that I might fall prey to at any moment. Though I’d eaten nothing since the night before, my fear overrode all feelings of hunger. No noise came from outside that might enable me to measure the passage of time. I could only suppose it was seven or eight o’clock in the evening, as it was the month of October and it was already dark. All at once, the creak of a door turning on its hinges made me start. A globe of flame appeared above the glazed opening in the ceiling, throwing a bright light into my chamber, and I realised with terror that a man was standing within a few paces of me. A table, with two covered dishes bearing a complete dinner, stood as if by magic in the middle of the chamber. The man was he who had pursued me for a full year, he who had vowed my dishonour, and who, at the first words from his mouth, made me understand that he had achieved it the previous night.”

“Lascivious beast!” murmured Felton.

“A beast? Oh, yes!” Milady cried.

The young officer’s soul seemed to hang on her every word, so fascinated was he by this incredible story. “Yes, a lascivious beast, who seemed to think that, having conquered me in my sleep, his battle was won. He came in hopes I would be overcome by my shame, now that my dishonour had been consummated. He came to offer his fortune in exchange for my love. All the disgust that the heart of a woman can contain, I poured in words of contempt and disdain on this man. No doubt he was used to such reproaches, for he was calm and smiling as he listened to me, arms crossed on his chest. Then, when he thought I was finished, he advanced toward me. I sprang toward the table, seized a knife, and placed it at my breast. ‘Take one step more,’ I said, ‘and on top of my dishonour, you’ll have my death to reproach yourself with.’”

“He couldn’t doubt it, for my look, my voice, my entire being conveyed a conviction that would persuade even the most perverse mind. He stopped. ‘Your death!’ he said to me. ‘Oh, no! You’re far too charming a mistress for me to consent to lose you this way, after having possessed you only once. Goodbye, sweetheart! I’ll wait to pay you another visit until your mood has improved.’ At these words, he blew a whistle. The globe of flame that lit the room rose and disappeared, and I found myself again in darkness. The sound of the door opening and closing was repeated an instant later, then the flaming globe descended anew, and I found myself alone. It was a horrible moment. If I’d had any doubts about my terrible situation, those doubts had vanished in the face of the desperate reality. I was in the power of a man whom I not only detested but actively despised – a man capable of anything, and who had already given me proof of the extent of his depravity.”

“But who was this man?” demanded Felton.

“I passed the night in a chair, starting at the smallest sound – for, toward midnight, the lamp had been put out, and I was again in darkness. But the night passed without any fresh attempts at outrage on the part of my persecutor. Day came, and I saw the table had disappeared – but I still had the knife in my hand. That knife was my only hope. I was exhausted. My eyes burned from insomnia, as I hadn’t dared sleep for a single moment. But the light of day reassured me and I threw myself on the bed, though without losing hold of my ally, the knife that I hid under my pillow. When I awoke, a fresh table had appeared. This time, in spite of my terrors, in spite of my anguish, I felt a consuming hunger. It was forty-eight hours since I’d eaten. I had some bread and some fruit; then, recalling the narcotic dissolved in the water I’d drunk, I shunned the water that was on the table and filled my glass at a marble fountain in the wall, near my vanity. However, despite this precaution, I was prey for some time to an awful anxiety. But in this case, my dread was unfounded, and I passed the day without experiencing any of the things I feared. I did take the precaution of emptying half the water from the carafe, so my suspicions might not be noticed. The evening came, and with it, the dark. But no matter how deep the darkness, my eyes grew used to it. I saw, through the shadows, the table sink through the floor. A quarter-hour later it reappeared, bearing my supper. An instant after that, thanks to the lamp, my chamber was once again illuminated. I resolved to eat only those items that couldn’t possibly have had a sedative introduced into them. My meal consisted of two eggs and some fruit. I then filled another glass of water at my trusty fountain and drank it. After the first few swallows, I noticed that it didn’t seem to taste the same as it had that morning. I was seized by suspicion and stopped but I had already drunk half the glass. I threw away the rest with horror, and waited, the cold sweat of fear on my brow. No doubt some invisible watcher had observed me drawing my water from the fountain and had taken advantage of my confidence in it to ensure my ruin – so coldly calculated, so cruelly pursued. Not half an hour had passed before I began to feel the same symptoms as before: only this time, as I’d had only half a glass of water, I was able to fight it off longer, and instead of falling completely asleep, I sank into a state of lethargy that left me aware of what was happening around me, while robbing me of the strength to defend myself or flee. I dragged myself toward the bed, to seek the only defence I had left – my knife, my saviour – but I couldn’t reach the pillows. I fell to my knees, my hands clenched on a bedpost, and I was certain I was lost.” Felton became dangerously pale, and a convulsive shudder ran through his body. “And what was most frightful,” Milady continued, her voice altered, as if she were reliving the agony of that terrible moment, “was that, this time, I was fully conscious of the danger I was in. It was as if my soul were awake while my body was asleep. I could still see; I could still hear; and though it felt as if I were in a dream, it was not the less dreadful for that. I saw the lamp ascend and leave me in darkness; then I heard the creak of the door, so familiar to me, though I’d heard it only twice before. I felt instinctively that someone was approaching me. They say those lost in the American desert have the same feeling at the approach of a deadly serpent. I forced myself to make an effort, to try to cry out, and through an incredible act of will I managed to rise up ... only to immediately collapse, and fall into the arms of my persecutor.”

“Tell me, who was this man?” cried the young officer.

Milady saw with a glance the agonies she was putting Felton through by dwelling on every detail of her story – but she was determined not to spare him a single pang of torture. The more pain he suffered, the more certain it was that he’d avenge her. She continued, then, as if she hadn’t heard his exclamation, or as if she thought it was not yet the moment to reply to it. “But this time, the beast didn’t have to deal with a kind of dead body, without feeling. As I told you, though I couldn’t regain control of my faculties, I still had a feeling of acute danger. I struggled, then, with all the force I could muster, and I must have put up a long resistance, weak though I was, for I heard him cry out, ‘These miserable Puritans! I knew they were a trial to their executioners but I never imagined they’d be so hard on their seducers.’”

“Alas! My desperate resistance couldn’t last long. I felt my strength fail me, and this time it wasn’t sleep that enabled the coward to take advantage of me but overpowering dizziness.” Felton listened without a sound except for a sort of suppressed moan but the sweat streamed from his marble brow, and his hand, under his clothes, pawed at his chest. “When I came to, my first impulse was to feel under my pillow for the knife I hadn’t been able to reach. If it hadn’t served me as a defence, at least it might grant me expiation. But on taking up this knife, Felton, a terrible idea came to me. I’ve sworn to tell you everything, and I will tell you everything – I promised you the whole truth and you’ll have it, even if it means my ruin.”

“The idea came into your mind to avenge yourself on this man, didn’t it?” cried Felton.

“Yes!” Milady said. “This was no thought for a Christian, I knew – but doubtless that eternal enemy of our souls, that lion roaring ceaselessly around us, breathed it into my ear. What can I tell you, Felton?” Milady continued, in the tone of a woman accusing herself of a crime. “This idea came to me, and wouldn’t leave. It’s because of this homicidal thought that I’m now being punished.”

“Go on,” Felton said. “I want to see you wreak your revenge.”

“I resolved it would take place as soon as possible. I had no doubt he would return the following night. During the day I had nothing to fear. So when the hour of breakfast came, I didn’t hesitate to eat and drink. I was determined to only pretend to eat supper but to actually take nothing. The meal from the morning would have to make up for the fast of the evening. Only I hid a glass of water that had come with my breakfast, as thirst had been the worst of my sufferings during that forty-eight hours without eating or drinking. The day passed away, with no other effect on me other than to affirm the resolution I’d taken. But I took care that my face shouldn’t betray what was in my heart, for I had no doubt that I was watched. Several times I even felt a smile touch my lips. Felton, I don’t dare tell you the idea that made me smile; you would feel such horror...”

“Go on, go on,” said Felton. “You can see how I’m listening. I must know the end!”

“Evening came, with its usual routine: during the darkness, my supper was served, and when the lamp was relit, I sat down to table. I ate nothing but a little fruit, and though I pretended to pour water from the carafe, I drank only what I’d saved in my glass. This substitution was made so carefully that spies, if there were any, could have had no suspicions. After supper, I displayed the same signs of lethargy as the night before – but this time, as I succumbed to the dizziness, or as if I’d become used to it, I dragged myself to my bed and pretended to fall asleep. And this time, I found my knife under the pillow, and while feigning sleep, I gripped the handle desperately. Two hours passed during which nothing happened. Dear God! If only I could have said that of the night before! I even began to fear he would not come. Eventually I saw the lamp rise softly and disappear into the heights of the ceiling. My chamber filled with shadows but I tried intently to see through the darkness. Nearly ten minutes passed. I could hear nothing but the sound of the beating of my heart. I prayed to heaven for him to come. Finally I heard the familiar sound as the door opened and closed. I heard, despite the thickness of the carpet, a step that made the floor creak; I saw, despite the darkness, a shadow approach my bed.”

“Faster! Faster!” Felton said. “Can’t you see that every word burns me like molten lead?”

“Then,” continued Milady, “I gathered all my strength, as I told myself that the hour of vengeance – or rather, of justice – had struck. I saw myself as another Judith; I readied myself, my knife in my hand, and when I saw him near me, reaching out his arms to find his victim, then, with a final cry of anguish and despair, I struck him in the middle of the chest. The wretch! He’d foreseen everything. His chest was covered with a coat of mail, and the knife turned against it. ‘Ah ha!’ he cried, seizing my arms and wrestling from me the knife that had served me so poorly. ‘So you want to take my life, my pretty Puritan? But that’s worse than hatred – that’s ingratitude! Come, calm yourself, my girl. I thought you might be ready now to be more congenial. Well, I’m not one of these tyrants who holds women by force. So you don’t love me? With my usual egotism, I doubted it – but now I’m convinced. Tomorrow, you’ll be free.’”

“But by then my only desire’s that he should kill me. ‘Take care,’ I told him, ‘for my freedom will be your dishonour. Yes, as soon as I’m away from here, I’ll tell everything! I’ll describe the violence you’ve used against me; I’ll describe my captivity; I’ll denounce this palace of infamy. You have a lofty position, Milord but tremble! Above you is the king, and above the king is God.’”

“Despite his self-possession, at this my persecutor let slip an angry movement. I’d not see the expression on his face but I felt his arm tremble under my hand. ‘Then you mustn’t leave here,’ he said.

‘Good!’ I cried. ‘Then the place of my suffering will be the same as my tomb. Here I will die, and you’ll see if an accusing phantom isn’t more terrible than a living threat!’

‘You’ll be allowed no weapons.’

‘But there’s a weapon that despair gives to every creature who has the courage to use it. I’ll allow myself to die of hunger.’

‘Come, now,’ the wretch said, ‘isn’t peace better than that sort of war? I’ll set you free this very moment. I’ll proclaim your virtue far and wide, and name you the Lucretia of England.’

‘And I’ll say you are the Sextus! I’ll denounce you before men as I’ve denounced you before God, and if, like Lucretia, I must sign my accusation in my own blood, I’ll do so.’

‘Indeed?’ said my enemy, in a tone of mockery. ‘Well, that’s quite another thing. Faith! All things considered, you’re fine right here. You’ll want for nothing, and if you let yourself die of hunger, it will be your own fault.’ At these words, he retired. I heard the door open and shut, and I was left, dismayed – though less by grief, I must confess, than by the shame at having failed to avenge myself. He kept his word. The day, the night, and the next day passed without my seeing him again. But I also kept my word, and neither ate nor drank; I was, as I’d told him, resolved to let myself die of hunger. I passed the day and night in prayer, for I hoped that God would pardon my suicide. The second night, the door opened. I was lying on the floor, for my strength had begun to abandon me. At the noise I raised myself on one arm. ‘Well,’ said a voice that was graven too deeply on my memory to ever be forgotten, ‘well, have we softened a little and will we not pay for our liberty with a single promise of silence? Come, I'm a good sort of prince, and though I don't usually care for Puritans, I do them justice – especially female Puritans, if they're pretty. Come, take a little oath for me on the cross, and I won't ask anything more of you.'

'On the cross!' I cried, rising, for at the sound of that detested voice I'd recovered all my strength. 'On the cross! I swear that no promise, no threat, no torture shall ever silence me – on the cross! I swear to denounce you everywhere as a murderer, a coward, and a despoiler of honour – on the cross! I swear, if ever I leave this place, to demand vengeance on you from the whole human race.'

'Beware!' said the voice in a tone of menace I hadn't heard before. 'I've extraordinary means that I'll use only as a last resort to shut your mouth or at least ensure that no one will believe a word you say.' I gathered all my strength to reply with a burst of laughter. He saw then that between us was total war, a war to the death. 'Listen,' he said, 'I'll give you the rest of tonight and all day tomorrow to reflect. Promise to be silent, and I'll surround you with wealth, preferment, and even honour. Threaten to talk, and I'll condemn you to shame and infamy.'

'You,' I cried, 'will condemn me?'

'To shame and infamy, eternal and irreversible!'

'You!' I repeated. Oh, I tell you, Felton, I thought he must be mad!

'Yes, me,' he replied.

'Get out,' I said. 'Get out, unless you want to see me dash my head against that wall before your eyes!'

'Very well,' he said, 'as you wish. Until tomorrow night!'

'Tomorrow night!' I echoed, falling to the floor and biting the carpet with rage...

Felton leaned himself against a table, and Milady saw with demonic glee that his strength might not even last until the end of her story. After a moment of silence that Milady spent in observing the young man who listened to her, she continued her story: "It was almost three days since I'd eaten or drunk anything, and I was suffering terribly. At times my mind was clouded, and my vision was veiled: this was delirium. When evening came, I was so weak I was constantly fainting, and every time I fainted I thanked God, for I thought I was about to die. During one of these swoons I heard the door open, and terror restored me to my senses. My persecutor entered, followed by a masked man. My nemesis was also masked but I recognised his step, and the imposing air that Hell has granted him for the affliction of humanity. 'Well,' he said to me, 'have you decided to swear the oath I've asked for?'

'As you know, a Puritan only gives his word once, and mine you have heard: that I'll pursue you on earth for the justice of man, or in heaven for the justice of God!'

'You persist then?'

'I swear before God, who hears me that I will bear witness of your crime before the entire world, and never stop until I've found an avenger.'

'You're a whore,' he said in a voice of thunder, 'and you'll suffer the punishment of whores! Branded in the eyes of the world you wish to rouse, try to prove to that world that you are neither guilty nor mad!' Then addressing the man who accompanied him, he said, 'Executioner, do your duty.'

"His name! His name!" cried Felton. "Tell me!"

"Despite my cries, despite my resistance, for I began to understand that I was about to be subjected to something worse than death, the executioner seized me and threw me to the floor, restraining me in his brutal grasp. Then suffocated by sobs, almost losing my mind, calling out to God, who didn't hear me, I suddenly screamed with pain and shame – for a searing fire, a red-hot iron, the iron of the executioner, had been burned into the flesh of my shoulder." Felton uttered a moan. "Here," said Milady, rising with the majesty of a queen, "here, Felton, behold the new martyrdom invented for a pure young girl, victim of the brutality of a depraved scoundrel. Learn to know the heart of men, and henceforth don't be so easily made into the instrument of their unjust revenge."

Milady, in a single rapid movement, opened her dress, tore back the cambric that covered her upper body, blushing with feigned anger, and shame, displayed to the young man the ineffaceable brand that dishonoured her beautiful shoulder. "But that's a fleur-de-lys!" cried Felton.

"That shows the full extent of their infamy," Milady replied. "With an English brand, there would be a record of what court had imposed it on me, and I could make a public appeal to prove no such record exists. But the brand of France ... oh, by that, I was branded indeed."

A Scene from Classical Tragedy

This was too much for Felton. Pale, paralysed, overcome by this frightful revelation, dazzled by the superhuman beauty of this woman, who unveiled herself before him with an immodesty that seemed to him sublime, he fell to his knees before her, as the early Christians did before those pure and holy martyrs whom the persecuting emperors offered up in the circus to a bloody-minded populace. In his eyes the brand disappeared, and only the beauty remained. "Forgive me! Forgive me!" cried Felton. "Oh, forgive me!" But in his eyes, Milady read: Love me!

"Forgive you? For what?" she asked.

"Forgive me for having joined with your persecutors."

Milady held out her hand to him. "So young! So beautiful!" Felton cried and covered her hand with kisses. Milady favoured him with one of those looks that makes a slave out of a king. Felton was a Puritan: he gave up her hand and began kissing her feet. He no longer loved her – he worshipped her. Once this crisis was past, and Milady seemed to have regained that self-possession that had never really left her; once Felton had watched her replace her veil of modesty over those treasures of love that were only hidden from him to make him desire them all the more, he said: "Now, I have only one more thing to ask of you: the name of your one, true executioner – because for me there is only one; the other was nothing more than a tool."

"What, Brother?" said Milady. "Must I name him again? Haven't you guessed?"

"You mean, him?" said Felton. "Again? Him, always? Then, the real culprit..."

"The real culprit's," Milady said, "the pillager of England, the persecutor of true believers, the cowardly ravisher of the honour of so many women; he who, to satisfy the lust of his corrupt heart, is about to shed the blood of two realms; who protects the Protestants today, only to betray them tomorrow..."

"Buckingham! It's Buckingham!" cried Felton in a frenzy.

Milady hid her face in her hands, as if she couldn't bear the shame this name recalled to her. "Buckingham, the executioner of this ... angel?" Felton frothed. "And thou hast not struck him down, my God? Thou hast left him noble, and honoured, and powerful, to the ruin of us all!"

"God abandons him who abandons himself," Milady said quietly.

"But he shall draw upon his head the punishment meant for the damned!" Felton continued in rising exaltation. "The Lord wills that human vengeance shall precede heavenly justice!"

"But men fear him and will spare him."

"But I," said Felton, "don't fear him and won't spare him!" Milady felt her soul bathed in infernal joy. "But how can Lord Winter, my protector, father be mixed up in all this?" Felton asked.

"Listen, Felton," Milady replied. "At the side of craven and contemptible men one often finds great and generous natures. I had a fiancé, a man whom I loved, and who loved me – with a heart like yours, Felton, a man like you. I went to him and told him everything; that man knew me, and didn't doubt me for an instant. He was a great noble, a man equal to Buckingham in every respect. He said nothing, only belted on his sword, enveloped himself in his cloak, and went directly to Buckingham Palace."

"Yes, yes," said Felton. "I know how he felt! But with such men as Buckingham, you can't use a sword – it must be the dagger."

"Buckingham had left England the night before, sent as ambassador to Spain to demand the hand of the Infanta for King Charles, who was then only Prince of Wales. My fiancé returned.

"'Listen to me,' he said. 'That man is gone, so for the moment, at least, he's escaped my vengeance. But let us be united, as we'd planned – and then you may leave it to Lord Winter to maintain his honour and that of his wife.'

"Lord Winter!" cried Felton.

"Yes," said Milady, "the late Lord Winter. And now you can see it all, can't you? Buckingham was on the Continent for nearly a year. A week before his return, the elder Lord Winter suddenly died, leaving me his sole heir. Who killed him? God knows, doubtless, as He knows all but I accuse no one..."

"Oh, what an abyss of evil!" Felton cried.

"Lord Winter died without revealing anything to his brother. He'd planned to conceal the terrible secret until it burst like thunder over the head of the culprit. Your protector saw nothing more than a misalliance between his elder brother and a penniless girl. I knew I couldn't look for support to a man cheated out of his hope of inheritance. I went to France, resolved to live there for the rest of my life. But my entire fortune was in England; when communications were cut by the war, I ran out of money and had to return. Six days ago I landed at Portsmouth."

"And so?" said Felton.

"So, Buckingham had doubtless heard somehow of my return. He spoke of me to Lord Winter, who was already prejudiced against me, and told him his sister-in-law was a whore, a branded woman. The pure, noble voice of my husband was no longer there to defend me. Lord Winter believed everything he was told, all the more easily because it was in his interest to believe it. He had me arrested, conducted here, and placed under your guard. You know the rest: the day after tomorrow, he banishes me to transportation – the day after tomorrow, I shall descend to the level of a convict. Oh, the web is tightly woven! It's a clever plot, and my honour will never survive it. So you see, Felton, there's nothing left for me but death. Felton – give me that knife!"

And at these words, as if all her strength was exhausted, Milady fell limp and languishing into the young officer's arms – and he, intoxicated with love, fury, and repressed sensuality, received her with exhilaration. He pressed her against his heart, trembling at the breath from her beautiful mouth, lost in the feeling of her breast against his own. "No, no," he murmured. "No, thou shalt live, in honour and purity – thou shalt live to triumph over thy enemies."

Milady slowly pushed against him with her hand, while drawing him nearer with her look; while Felton, on his part, took hold of her again, and implored her like a divinity. "Oh, death! Death!" she said, raising her voice and her eyes. "Death rather than shame! Felton, my Brother, my friend – I beg you!"

"No," cried Felton. "No, thou shalt live, and be avenged!"

"Felton, I bring misfortune to everyone around me! Abandon me, Felton! Felton, let me die!"

"Then let us die together!" he cried and pressed his lips on those of the prisoner.

Several sharp knocks sounded from the door. This time, Milady really pushed him away. "Listen," she said. "We've been overheard. Someone's coming! It's all over! We're lost!"

"No," said Felton. "It's only the sentry warning me of the changing of the guard."

"Then run to the door and open it yourself."

Felton obeyed; this woman already ruled his mind and his soul. He found a sergeant commanding a guard patrol. "Well, what is it?" the young lieutenant demanded.

"You told me to open the door if I heard anyone call for help," said the sentry, "but you forgot to leave me the key. I heard you cry out but couldn't understand what you said. I tried to open the door but it was locked from inside, so I called the sergeant."

"And here I am," said the sergeant.

Felton, bewildered and nearly out of his head, stood there speechless. Milady realised she had to take hold of the situation. She ran to the table, took up the knife Felton had placed there, and cried, "And by what right do you prevent me from dying?"

"Great God!" cried Felton, seeing the knife glitter in her hand.

At that moment, a burst of ironical laughter reverberated from the corridor. The baron, attracted by the commotion, stood in the doorway in his nightgown, his sword under his arm. "Ha ha ha! Here we are, at the final act of the tragedy," he said. "You see, Felton, the drama's followed all the steps I predicted. But don't worry, no blood will flow here."

Milady realised that all was lost unless she gave Felton immediate and terrible proof of her courage. "You're wrong, Milord, blood will flow – and may it drown those who are responsible for it!"

Felton cried out and threw himself toward her but too late: Milady stabbed herself. But the blade fortunately – or rather, skilfully – struck the banded metal corset that, at this period, defended a woman's abdomen like a cuirass. It slid along this, tearing her dress, and penetrated at a slant between the flesh and the ribs. Milady's dress was nonetheless drenched with blood in a second. She fell to the floor in seeming unconsciousness. Felton seized the knife. "See, Milord," he said, wrapped in gloom, "see here a woman under my guard, who's killed herself!"

"Easy, Felton," said Lord Winter. "She's not dead – demons don't die so easily. Be easy, and go wait for me in my rooms."

"But Milord..."

"Go. That's an order." At this command from his superior, Felton obeyed; but while leaving, he slid the knife into his jacket. As to Lord Winter, he contented himself with calling for the woman who served Milady. When she had come, he commended the still-fainting prisoner to her care and left the woman alone with her. However, since despite his suspicions the wound might be serious, he immediately sent a rider to fetch a doctor.

Escape

As Lord Winter had thought, Milady's wound wasn't dangerous. As soon as Milady was alone with the woman whom the baron had called, and who hastened to undress her, she opened her eyes. However, it was important to pretend to be weak and in pain – no hard thing for an actress like Milady. The poor woman was completely duped by the prisoner, so much so that she insisted on staying to watch over her all night, despite Milady's feeble protests. Fortunately, the woman's presence didn't interfere with Milady's thinking. There could be no more doubt but that Felton was convinced: Felton was hers. In his current state of mind, if an angel appeared to him to accuse Milady of sin, he'd take the celestial being for an agent of Satan. Milady smiled at this thought; though Felton was now her only hope, her only means of salvation, he was hers. But Lord Winter might suspect him, and might have Felton watched. Toward four in the morning the doctor arrived. However, in the time since Milady had stabbed herself, the wound had closed; the doctor couldn't measure either its direction or its depth. He could tell only, from Milady's pulse, that the case was not serious. In the morning, Milady sent away the woman who'd attended her, under the pretext that she hadn't slept well during the night and needed rest. She was focused on a single hope, that Felton would come at the breakfast hour – but Felton did not come. Had her fears been realised? Was Felton, under suspicion by the baron, about to fail her at the decisive moment?

She had only one more day: Lord Winter had announced her embarkation for the 23rd and it was already the morning of the 22nd. Nevertheless, she still waited patiently for the hour of dinner. Although she'd eaten nothing in the morning, dinner was brought at the usual time. And Milady saw with a shock that the soldiers guarding her now wore different uniforms. She then risked asking what had become of Felton, and was told he'd left the castle on horseback an hour before. She asked if the baron was still in the castle. The soldier said he was, and had given orders to be informed if the prisoner wanted to speak with him. Milady replied that she was too weak at the moment, and her only desire was to be left alone. The soldier went out, leaving the dinner covered. Felton had been sent away, and the marines he commanded had been replaced – so Felton was no longer trusted. This was the final blow to the prisoner. Once she was alone, she got up. The bed in which she'd remained so they would believe her seriously wounded now burned her like a hot brazier. She inspected the door: the baron had had a plank nailed over the grating, no doubt fearing she would use the opening in some diabolical way to seduce her guards. But Milady was pleased. She was now free to indulge her rage without being seen. She paced her chamber with the fury of a mad woman, like a tigress trapped in an iron cage. Certainly, if she'd been left with the knife, instead of killing herself, she'd have been trying to devise some way to kill the baron. At six o'clock Lord Winter came in, armed to the teeth. This man, whom before these events Milady had regarded as a gentleman buffoon, had become an admirable jailer: he seemed prepared for anything, informed of everything, and able to guess whatever he couldn't know. A single look at Milady told him what had been passing through her mind. "So it's come to that," he said. "Well, you won't kill me today. You have no more weapons, and besides, I'm on my guard. You had begun to pervert my poor Felton; he was succumbing to your infernal influence but I'll save him. It's all over, and he'll never see you again. Gather your things, for tomorrow you go. I'd postponed the embarkation to the 24th but I think it's more likely to happen if it happens sooner. Tomorrow by noon I'll have the order for your exile, signed by Buckingham. If you speak a single word to anyone before boarding the ship, my sergeant has orders to blow your brains out. If, on the ship, you speak a word to anyone before the captain permits it, he has orders to cast you into the sea. That's settled. Goodbye then. That's all I've to say to you today. Tomorrow I'll see you again to take my final leave of you."

And upon these words, the baron left. Milady had listened to this menacing tirade with a smile of disdain on her lips but with rage in her heart. Supper was served. Milady felt she must gather all her strength and resources. She didn't know what might happen in the night that approached so menacingly, for dark clouds were rolling across the sky, and distant lightning portended a storm. Toward ten o'clock, the storm broke. Milady felt some consolation in seeing nature mirror the turmoil in her heart. Thunder growled in the sky like an echo of the rage in her spirit. It seemed to her that the squall, as it bent the branches of the trees and tore away their leaves, also roared through her head; she howled like a hurricane, and her voice was lost in the great voice of nature, who, like her, seemed to cry out in despair. All at once she heard a rap at the window, and in a flash of lightning, she saw a man's face appear beyond the bars. She ran to the window and opened it. "Felton!" she cried. "I'm saved!"

"Yes!" said Felton. "But silence, silence! I need time to saw through these bars. Just make sure I can't be seen through the grating in the door."

"They've put a plank over the grating," Milady said. "It's proof that the Lord is on our side!"

"Good! God's blinded them!" Felton said.

"But what should I do?" asked Milady.

"Nothing, nothing – just shut the window. Go to bed, or even better, stay dressed but get under the covers. When I'm done here, I'll knock on the window. Will you be able to follow me?"

"Oh, yes!"

"What about your wound?"

"It hurts but it won't stop me."

"Then be ready the moment I signal."

Milady shut the window, put out the lamp, and went, as Felton had suggested, to huddle in bed. Amid the groaning of the storm she heard the grinding of the file against the bars, and with every flash of lightning she saw the shadow of Felton against the sky. She passed an hour unable to breathe, panting, and cold sweat on her brow, her heart hammering in an agony of fear at every movement she heard from the corridor. There are hours that last a year. At the end of that hour, Felton rapped again. Milady sprang from her bed and opened the window. Two bars were gone, leaving an opening large enough for a person to pass through. "Are you ready?" Felton asked.

"Yes. What should I bring with me?"

"Money if you have any."

"Fortunately, they left me what I had."

"All the better, for I've spent all mine in hiring a vessel."

"Take this," said Milady, putting a sack of the cardinal's gold into Felton's hands.

Felton dropped the sack to the foot of the wall. "Now," he said, "are you ready to go?"

"I'm coming."

Milady climbed up on a chair and passed her upper body through the window. She saw that the young man was suspended over the abyss by a ladder of rope. The void below terrified her, and for the first time, she was reminded that she was a woman. "I was afraid of this," said Felton.

"It's nothing, it's nothing," Milady said. "I can climb down with my eyes closed."

"Do you trust me?"

"Need you ask?"

"Put your hands together. Cross them – that's right."

Felton tied her wrists together with his handkerchief and then over the handkerchief he looped a cord. "What are you doing?" Milady asked, surprised.

"Put your arms around my neck, and don't be afraid."

"But I'll make you lose your balance and we'll fall to our death!"

"Trust me; I'm a sailor."

There wasn't a second to lose. Milady put her arms around Felton's neck and let herself slip out the window. Felton began to climb slowly down, rung by rung. Despite the weight of their bodies, the gusts from the hurricane made them swing in the air. All at once Felton stopped. "What is it?" Milady asked.

"Quiet," said Felton. "I hear footsteps."

"We've been discovered!"

There was silence for a few moments, except for the wind. "No," Felton said, "it's all right."

"But what was that noise?"

"It's the patrol, making their rounds."

"Where will they go?"

"Right below us."

"We'll be seen!"

"Not unless there's a flash of lightning."

"They'll bump into the foot of the ladder."

"Fortunately, it's six feet too short."

"Here they come! My God!"

"Silence!" They hung there, motionless and breathless, twenty feet in the air, the whole time the soldiers passed beneath them, laughing and talking. It was a terrible moment for the fugitives. The patrol passed: the sound of their steps receded and the murmur of their voices dwindled and died away. "Now," said Felton, "we're safe." Milady let out her breath in a deep sigh and fainted. Felton continued the descent. When he arrived at the bottom of the ladder and found no more support for his feet, he clung to the ropes by his hands alone. When he reached the bottom rung, he let himself down by the strength of his wrists until his feet touched the ground. He bent over, picked up the sack of gold, and gripped its closed end between his teeth. Then he took Milady in his arms and set off briskly in the opposite direction from the patrol. Soon he left the path beneath the walls and climbed down across the rocks. When he reached the edge of the sea, he whistled. A similar signal replied, and five minutes later a boat appeared, rowed by four men. The boat approached as close as it could to the shore but it was too shallow to come in all the way. Felton went into the surging water up to his waist, unwilling to trust his precious burden to anyone else. Though the storm had begun to abate, the sea was still violent. The little boat was tossed on the waves like a nutshell. "To the sloop," Felton ordered. "Lively, now!"

The four men plied their oars but the sea was too rough for them to make much headway. But every moment they were farther from the castle – that was the main thing. The night was very dark, and soon it was almost impossible to make out the shore from the boat, so it wasn't likely anyone would be able to see the boat from shore. A black shadow appeared to rise from the sea. It was the sloop. While the boat ploughed through the waves with all the force its four rowers could muster, Felton untied the cord and then the handkerchief that bound Milady's hands. When her hands were free, he scooped up some seawater and sprinkled it on her face. Milady sighed and opened her eyes. "Where am I?" she said.

"Saved," the young officer replied.

"Saved!" she cried. "Saved! Yes, there's the sky, and here is the sea! I'm breathing the air of freedom. Ah! Thank you, Felton ... thank you."

The young man pressed her to his heart. "But what's wrong with my hands?" Milady asked. "It feels like my wrists have been crushed in a vice."

She held out her arms; her wrists were bruised. "I'm so sorry!" said Felton, looking at her beautiful hands and shaking his head with remorse.

"No, no, it's nothing!" Milady cried. "I remember now."

She looked around, as if searching for something. "It's here," Felton said, nudging the sack of gold with his foot.

They neared the sloop. The sailor on watch hailed the boat, and the boat replied. "What ship is that?" asked Milady.

"The one I've hired for you."

"Where will it take me?"

"Wherever you like, after you've put me ashore at Portsmouth."

"What are you going to do at Portsmouth?" Milady asked.

"Execute Lord Winter's orders," Felton said with a grim smile.

"What orders?"

"You don't understand?"

"No," Milady said. "Please explain what you mean."

"Since he mistrusted me and decided to guard you himself, Lord Winter sent me in his place to get Buckingham's signature on your order of transportation."

"But if he mistrusted you, how could he confide such an order to you?"

"How would I know what I was carrying?"

"I suppose that's true. So you're going to Portsmouth?"

"I have no time to lose. Tomorrow is the 23rd, and tomorrow Buckingham sets sail with his fleet."

"He sets sail tomorrow? For where?"

"For La Rochelle."

"But he mustn't sail!" cried Milady, forgetting herself in a momentary panic.

"Don't worry," Felton replied. "He will not sail."

Milady started with joy. She could read to the depths of the young man's heart, and there she saw written the death of Buckingham. "Felton, you..." she said, "you are as great as Judas Maccabeus! If you die, I'll die with you. That is all I can say."

"Quiet!" said Felton. "We've arrived." In fact, the bow of the boat was touching the side of the ship. Felton climbed first onto the ladder, then gave his hand to Milady, while the sailors assisted her, as the sea was still quite rough. A moment later they were on deck. "Captain," said Felton, "here is the person I spoke of, whom you must convey safe and sound to France."

"For a thousand pistoles," said the captain.

"I've already given you five hundred."

"That's right," said the captain.

"And here are the other five hundred," said Milady, resting her hand on the sack of gold.

"No," said the captain. "I've already made a deal with this young man that the other five hundred pistoles aren't due until we arrive at Boulogne."

"And will we arrive there?"

"Safe and sound," said the captain, "as sure as my name's Jack Butler."

"Well," said Milady, "if you keep your word, I won't give you five hundred pistoles, and I'll give you a thousand."

"Hurrah for you then, my pretty lady," said the captain, "and may God send me customers like Your Ladyship more often!"

"In the meantime," said Felton, "take me to the small bay at Chichester near Portsmouth as we agreed." The captain responded by giving the necessary orders, and toward seven in the morning the little ship dropped anchor in the designated bay. During this passage, Felton told Milady everything: how, instead of going to London, he had hired the small ship; how he'd climbed the wall by fixing marlinspikes in the gaps between the stones, to give him footholds as he climbed; and how, once he'd arrived at the bars of the window, he'd attached the ladder. Milady knew the rest. For her part, Milady undertook to encourage Felton in his scheme but soon saw that the young fanatic had more need of restraint than encouragement. It was agreed that Milady would wait for Felton until ten o'clock. If he didn't return by ten o'clock, she was to set sail. Then, if he was still free, he was to rejoin her in France at the Carmelite convent in Bethune.

What Happened at Portsmouth on 23 August 1628

Felton took his leave of Milady the way a brother about to go for a stroll says goodbye to his sister: he kissed her hand. At first glance he seemed to be in his customary state of calm but there was a strange light in his eyes, as if he had a fever. His brow was unusually pale, his jaw was clenched, and he seemed to bite off his words, all indications something dark was working within him. As long as he was in the boat carrying him to shore, he kept his face turned toward Milady, who stood on the deck, following him with her eyes. Neither was worried about pursuit, as no one ever entered Milady's chamber before nine, and it would take three hours to get from the castle to Portsmouth. Felton set foot on shore, climbed the narrow trail that led to the top of the cliff, saluted Milady a final time, and took the path toward town. The path sloped downward, and after a hundred paces he could see nothing of the sloop but its mast. He hurried toward Portsmouth that he could see less than half a league away, its houses and steeples emerging from the morning mist. Beyond Portsmouth the sea was covered with vessels, whose masts, like a forest of poplars made leafless by winter, rocked with each breath of wind. Felton, marching briskly, reviewed what ten years among the Puritans had provided him with accusations, true or false, against the royal favourite. When he compared the public crimes of this minister – shocking crimes that seemed to him almost Continental – with the private crimes of which he was accused by Milady, Felton thought that, of the two sides of the man who was Buckingham, the side unknown to the public was the guiltier. This was because his love, so strange, so new, so ardent, made him regard the infamous (though imaginary) accusations of Lady Winter as if through a magnifying glass, expanding atoms smaller than ants into frightful monsters. The speed of his march fanned the fire in his blood; the idea that he'd left behind him, exposed to a terrible vengeance, a woman he loved – or rather, worshipped as a saint – combined with fatigue and the tumult of his emotions to excite his mind to inhuman, feverish heights. He entered Portsmouth about eight in the morning. The entire population was afoot: drums were beating in the streets and at the port, and the troops to be embarked were marching down to shore. Felton arrived at the headquarters of the Admiralty covered with dust and streaming with sweat; his face, ordinarily so pale, was purple with anger and passion. The sentry wanted to turn him away but Felton appealed to the officer of the guard and drew the letter he carried from his pocket. "An urgent message from Lord Winter," he said.

At the name of Lord Winter, who was known to be one of His Grace's closest friends, the officer of the guard allowed Felton to pass, all the more easily as he wore the uniform of an officer of the Marines. Felton rushed into the mansion that housed the Admiralty headquarters. Just as he entered the vestibule, another man entered the courtyard, likewise covered with dust and out of breath. He alighted at the gate from a post-horse that immediately sank to its knees, exhausted. Felton and the new arrival addressed Patrick, the duke's confidential valet, at virtually the same moment. Felton said he represented Lord Winter but the stranger wouldn't say from whom he came, insisting he could reveal that only to the duke. Each was determined to gain entrance before the other. Patrick, who knew that Lord Winter had ties of both friendship and service to the duke, gave the preference to the man who came in his name. The other was forced to wait, aggravated and cursing the delay. The valet led Felton across a large hall, in which were waiting the emissaries from La Rochelle, headed by the Duke of Soubise. They entered a private room where Buckingham, just out of the bath, was finishing his grooming, to which, as always, he was paying extraordinary attention. "Lieutenant Felton," said Patrick, "on the behalf of Lord Winter."

"From Lord Winter!" repeated Buckingham. "Show him in." Felton entered. Buckingham was just tossing aside a rich robe of chambre edged with gold brocade to don a blue velvet doublet embroidered with pearls. "Why didn't the baron come himself?" Buckingham asked. "I expected him this morning."

"It is my duty to inform Your Grace that he very much regretted not having that honour," Felton replied, "but that he was detained by the guard that he is obliged to keep at the castle."

"Yes, yes, I know," said Buckingham. "He has a prisoner."

"And it is of that prisoner that I wish to speak to Your Grace," Felton said.

"Well, then, speak."

"What I have to say is only for your ears, Milord."

"Leave us, Patrick but stay within sound of the bell," said Buckingham. "I'll call for you shortly." Patrick went out. "Now, sir, we're alone," said Buckingham. "Speak."

"Milord," Felton said, "Baron Winter wrote to you the other day to request your signature on an order of transportation regarding a young woman named Charlotte Backson."

"That's correct, Lieutenant, and I replied that if he would bring or send me that order, I would sign it."

"Here it is, Milord."

"Give it here," said the duke.

Taking the paper from Felton, he scanned it quickly. Recognising it as the expected order, he placed it on the table and picked up a plume to sign it. "Begging your pardon, Milord," said Felton, stopping the duke, "but is Your Grace aware that Charlotte Backson isn't the real name of this young woman?"

"Yes, Lieutenant, I know that," replied the duke, dipping the plume in the inkwell.

"Then, Your Grace knows her real name?" Felton asked sharply.

"I know it."

The duke put the pen to the paper. "And, knowing her real name, Milord, you'd sign it all the same?" Felton said.

"Absolutely. Given the chance, I'd sign it twice," Buckingham said.

"I cannot believe," continued Felton, his voice becoming sharper and more ragged, "that Your Grace knows this order concerns Lady Winter..."

"I do know it, perfectly well, though I'm astonished that you know it!"

"And Your Grace still signs that order without remorse?"

Buckingham gave the young man a haughty look. "Gad, Sir," he said, "why do you ask such strange questions, and how can you think me fool enough to answer them?"

"Answer, Milord," said Felton. "The situation is more serious than you may believe."

It occurred to Buckingham that the young man came on behalf of Lord Winter, and doubtless spoke in his name, so he took a more moderate tone. "No, no remorse," he said. "The baron knows that Milady Winter is guilty of serious crimes and it's an act of clemency to reduce her sentence to transportation."

The duke poised his plume over the paper. "You will not sign that order, Milord!" Felton said, taking a step toward the duke.

"I won't sign this order?" said Buckingham. "And why not?"

"Because you will obey the dictates of conscience, and render Milady justice."

"I would render her justice by sending her to Tyburn," said Buckingham. "Milady is a criminal who deserves no better."

"No, Milord – Milady is an angel, as you well know, and I demand from you her freedom."

"Gad!" said Buckingham. "Are you mad, to talk to me this way?"

"Excuse me, Milord! I say what I must, and don't mean to offend. But consider what you're doing, Milord, and beware of going too far!"

"What's that you say? God blind me!" cried Buckingham. "I do believe the man threatens me!"

"No, Milord, I still pray, and I say this: one drop of water is enough to make the full vase overflow and one small sin may be enough to bring punishment down on a head that has been spared despite many crimes."

"Lieutenant Felton, you are dismissed," said Buckingham. "Withdraw, Sir, and immediately place yourself under arrest."

"You'll hear me to the end, Milord. You've seduced this young girl – you have outraged and defiled her. Make restitution for your crimes against her, let her go free, and I will require nothing else of you."

"You, require of me?" said Buckingham, regarding Felton with a look of astonishment and drawing out each syllable of the words as he said them.

"Milord," Felton continued, growing more excited as he spoke, "Milord, take care! All England is weary of your iniquities. Milord, you have abused the royal power, nearly usurped it; Milord, you are an abomination in the eyes of God and men. God will punish you later but I will punish you now."

"Bah! This is too much!" cried Buckingham, taking a step toward the door.

Felton barred his passage. "I ask you humbly," he said, "to sign the order that sets Lady Winter at liberty. Think, Milord: you owe it to this woman you have dishonoured."

"Withdraw, Sir," said Buckingham, "or I will call and have you put in irons."

"You will not call," said Felton, throwing himself between the duke and the bell that stood on a silver-chased end table. "Beware, Milord, for you are in the hands of God!"

"In the hands of the devil, you mean," cried Buckingham, raising his voice to attract attention without directly calling for it.

"Sign, Milord. Sign the liberty of Lady Winter," said Felton, holding a paper before the duke.

"By force? You can't be serious. Hey, there! Patrick!"

"Sign, Milord!"

"Never."

"Never?"

"Guards!" the duke shouted and at the same time sprang for his sword.

But Felton didn't give him time to draw it. He pulled out the knife that Milady had stabbed herself with and was upon the duke in one bound. At that moment Patrick entered the room, calling out, "Milord, a letter from France!"

"From France!" cried Buckingham, forgetting everything else at the thought of from whom that letter came. Felton took advantage of Buckingham's distraction to plunge the knife into his side up to the hilt. "Ah! Traitor!" cried Buckingham. "You've killed me..."

"Murder!" Patrick howled.

Felton spun around, looking for a way out. Seeing the door open, he darted into the antechamber, rushed past the emissaries from La Rochelle, and made for the staircase. But on the first step he met Lord Winter who seeing him pale and wild with blood staining his hands and face, took hold of him, crying, "I knew it! I guessed it! But too late by a minute, damn me! Damn me for a fool!"

Felton put up no resistance. Lord Winter turned him over to the guards, who took him out onto a little terrace overlooking the sea while awaiting further orders. The baron hurried into Buckingham's chamber. At the duke's cry, and Patrick's scream, the man Felton had met outside had also rushed into the duke's chamber. He found the duke lying on a sofa, his hand clenched on his wound. "La Porte," said the duke, his voice weak, "La Porte – do you come from her?"

"Yes, My Lord," replied Anne of Austria's loyal servant, "but perhaps too late."

"Hush, La Porte! Someone might hear you. Patrick, no one's to enter. My God, I'm dying! I'll never know what she had to say to me!"

And the duke fainted. Meanwhile, Lord Winter, the emissaries, the commanders of the expedition, and the officers of Buckingham's household had all pushed into the chamber, and cries of despair arose on all sides. At the news, the headquarters echoed with groans and laments, and word soon spread throughout the city. A cannon was fired to announce that some new and unlooked-for event had occurred. Lord Winter tore his hair. "Too late by a minute!" he cried. "Too late by a minute! Oh, my God! My God, what a thing! What a terrible thing!"

They had awakened the baron at seven that morning with the news that a rope ladder had been found hanging from one of the castle windows. He had immediately run to Milady's chamber and found it empty, with the window open and the bars filed through. He remembered the verbal warning d'Artagnan had sent with his messenger; fearing for the duke, he'd run to the stable. Without waiting to have his horse saddled, he'd jumped onto the first one he'd come to, and ridden belly to the ground to Portsmouth. In the courtyard he'd leaped from the horse, run up the stairs – and met Felton on the top step, coming out. But the duke was not dead. He came to, opened his eyes, and hope revived in all their hearts. "Gentlemen," he said, "leave me alone with Patrick and La Porte. Ah! Is that you, Winter? You sent me a strange madman this morning. Look what a state he's put me in!"

"Oh, Milord!" the baron cried. "I'll never forgive myself for this."

"And you would be quite wrong, old friend," said Buckingham, giving him his hand. "I don't know any man for whom it's worth destroying your life with regrets."

The baron went out, sobbing, leaving only the wounded duke, La Porte, and Patrick. A doctor had been sent for but hadn't yet come. "Milord, you'll live," repeated Anne of Austria's messenger, kneeling before the sofa.

"What does she write to me?" Buckingham said feebly, streaming with blood but fighting back the pain to speak of the woman he loved. "What does she write to me? Read me her letter."

"Oh, Milord!" La Porte said.

"Obey, La Porte. Can't you see I have no time to lose?"

La Porte broke the seal and held the parchment so the duke could read it but Buckingham was unable to focus on the writing. "Read it!" he said. "I can't see – read it! For soon I may not be able to hear, and then I'd die without knowing what she's written to me." La Porte put up no more resistance and read:

Milord:
By what, since I've known you, I have suffered by and for you, I implore you, if you have any care for my repose, to halt your mighty armament against France. Give up this war, for which it's said aloud that religion is the ostensible cause but for which it's whispered that your love for me is the real motive. This war may not only bring great catastrophes upon France and England but also upon you, Milord – and for that I could never forgive myself. Guard your life that is threatened, and which will be the dearer to me when I am no longer obliged to regard you as an enemy.
Your affectionate,

Buckingham had gathered all his remaining strength to listen. When the reading was over, he seemed to have suffered a bitter disappointment. "Is that all you were told to tell me, La Porte?" he said.

"No, My Lord. The queen charged me to warn you to take special care of your life, as she'd been informed there would be an attempted assassination."

"And that's all? That's all?" Buckingham said impatiently.

"She also told me to tell you ... that she's always loved you."

"Ah!" said Buckingham. "God be praised! So she won't take my death like the death of a stranger ...!" La Porte broke down and wept. "Patrick," said the duke, "bring me the coffer that contained the diamond studs." Patrick brought the coffer that La Porte recognised as having belonged to the queen. "Now the white satin packet that has her initials embroidered in pearls." Patrick obeyed. "Here, La Porte," said Buckingham. "These are the only souvenirs I've from her, this rosewood coffer and packet of letters. Restore them to Her Majesty and as a final memento, you'll add..." he looked around for some precious object but his vision was clouded by approaching death, and he could find nothing but the knife that had fallen from Felton's hands, his blood still steaming from its blade. "And you will add this knife," the duke said, clutching at La Porte's hand.

He was just able to get the satin packet into the coffer and drop the knife on top of it. He made a sign to La Porte that he could no longer talk, and then, with a final, irresistible convulsion, he slid from the sofa onto the floor. Patrick cried out. Buckingham tried to smile one last time but death cut it short. It remained impressed on his face like a last kiss of love. At that moment the doctor arrived, quite distraught. They'd had to bring him from the admiral's ship that he'd already been aboard. He approached the duke, took his hand, held it for an instant in his own, and let it fall. "Nothing can be done," he said. "He's dead."

"Dead! Dead!" cried Patrick.

At this cry the whole crowd came back into the chamber, and everywhere there was nothing but consternation and turmoil. As soon as Lord Winter saw that Buckingham was dead, he ran to Felton, who was still being held by the soldiers on the terrace. "Miserable wretch!" he said to the young man who since the death of Buckingham, had regained that calm, cool demeanour that never again left him. "Miserable wretch! What have you done?"

"I have avenged myself," he said.

"Yourself!" said the baron. "Say instead you were the tool of that damnable woman! But I swear to you, this crime will be her last."

"I don't know what you mean," Felton replied coolly. "I don't know who you're talking about, Milord. I killed the Duke of Buckingham because he twice refused your request to promote me to captain. I've punished him for his injustice, that's all." Winter, stupefied, looked on as the soldiers manacled Felton as if he didn't know what to make of such nonsense. Only one thing darkened Felton's pale brow: at every noise, the naïve Puritan thought he heard the arrival of Milady, come to throw herself into his arms and die by his side. All at once he started, his eyes fixed on a point out to sea that the terrace overlooked. With the eagle eyes of a sailor he recognised, where another would have seen only a gull gliding over the waves, the sail of the sloop setting course for the coast of France. He paled, and put a hand to his breaking heart. At once, he understood the extent of his betrayal. "One last favour, Milord!" he said to the baron.

"What's that?"

"The time – what time's it?"

The baron pulled out his watch. "It's ten minutes to nine," he said.

Milady had moved up her departure by an hour and a half. As soon as she'd heard the cannon announce the fatal event, she'd ordered the ship to weigh anchor. The sloop was making good headway under a blue sky and was already well out from the coast. "Thus God wills it," Felton said with the resignation of a fanatic.

But he still couldn't take his eyes from that ship, on which he might have thought he could make out the white phantom of her for whom he'd sacrificed his life. Winter followed his look, saw his pain, and guessed everything. "You may be going to your punishment alone, wretch," he said to Felton who still gazed out to sea as he was being dragged off, "but I swear to you, on the memory of my beloved brother that your accomplice will not escape." Felton hung his head and said nothing. As for Lord Winter, he hurried down the stairs and went directly to the port.

060 In France

Upon learning of the death of the duke, the first fear of the King of England, Charles I, was that such terrible news would dishearten the Rochelois. He tried, says Richelieu in his Memoirs, to conceal it from them for as long as possible, closing all the ports of his realm, and taking care that no vessel should sail before Buckingham's army could depart, an effort he undertook to manage personally after the loss of Buckingham. He enforced this order so strictly that it detained in England the Danish ambassador, who had already officially taken his leave, and the Ambassador Ordinaire of Holland, who was to sail back to the port of Flushing in the captured India merchantmen that Charles I was returning to the United Provinces. But it didn't occur to the king to give this order until five hours after the event – in other words, not until two in the afternoon, by which time two ships had already left the port. The first, of course, was the one carrying Milady. The success of her plot had been confirmed by sight of the black flag that had been run up the mast of the admiral's ship. As to the second vessel, who it contained, and how it departed – that will be dealt with later. Meanwhile, nothing new occurred in the camp before La Rochelle, except that the king, as ever subject to ennui, perhaps even more so in camp than elsewhere, resolved to travel incognito to Saint-Germain for the Festival of Saint Louis, and asked the cardinal to order up a small escort of no more than twenty musketeers. The cardinal, who sometimes wearied of the presence of the king, was more than happy to grant this leave of absence to his royal lieutenant, who promised to return in mid-September. Sir Tréville, informed by His Eminence, packed up his portmanteau. As he was aware of the urgent desire, even desperate need of his four friends to return to Paris – though without knowing the cause – he naturally named them as part of the escort. The four young men heard the news a quarter of an hour after Sir Tréville, as they were the first ones he told. It was then that d'Artagnan fully appreciated the favour the cardinal had done him by finally ordering his admission into the musketeers, as otherwise he would have had to remain behind in camp. Their impatience to return toward Paris was mainly due to the danger to Madam Bonacieux of being found at the Bethune convent by Milady, her mortal enemy. As previously related, Aramis had written to Marie Michon, the lingerie maid at Tours who had such high connections, to obtain authority from the queen for Madam Bonacieux to leave the convent and take refuge in either Lorraine or Belgium. They didn't have to wait long for a response, for within a week, Aramis had received the following letter:

My Dear Cousin,
Enclosed with this is the authorisation from my sister for our little servant to leave the convent at Bethune, where you think the air may not agree with her. My sister is very pleased to send you this order, as she dearly loves the little girl, and intends to do better by her in the future. I embrace you,
Marie MICHON
Folded inside this letter was the following order:
The Superior of the Convent at Bethune will remit into the charge of the person who presents this letter the novice who entered the convent on my recommendation and under my patronage.
At the Louvre,
10 August 1628
ANNE

One can easily imagine how amused the young men were by this relationship between Aramis and a lingerie maid who called the queen "her sister." But Aramis, after flushing two or three times at Porthos's crude jokes, told his friends to drop the subject, declaring that if he heard another word about it, he would never again ask his cousin to act as an intermediary in such affairs. So there was no further mention of the name of Marie Michon among the four musketeers, who in any event had what they wanted: an order to remove Madam Bonacieux from the Carmelite convent at Bethune. It's true that this order wasn't much use while they were stuck in the camp at La Rochelle, halfway across France. D'Artagnan had been planning to ask for a leave of absence from Sir Tréville, intending to confide to him the critical importance of his departure, when he and his three comrades received the news that the king was about to leave for Paris with twenty musketeers and they were to form part of his escort. Joy was the order of the day. They sent their lackeys on ahead with their baggage, and set out on the morning of August 16th. The cardinal accompanied His Majesty from Surgères to Mauzé, where the king and his minister took their leave of each other with effusive declarations of mutual regard. However, the king, though he said he desired to travel as rapidly as possible, since he wanted to be in Paris by the 23rd, at the same time craved distraction. He stopped from time to time to fly his falcon, a pastime he was very fond of, having acquired the taste for it from of Luynes. When this happened, sixteen of his twenty musketeers were delighted with the time off but the other four cursed the delay. D'Artagnan in particular suffered from a constant buzzing in his ears that Porthos explained by saying, "A very great lady told me it means someone is talking about you somewhere."

The escort finally reached Paris on the evening of the 23rd. The king thanked Sir Tréville and allowed him to give out leaves of absence for four days, on condition that the lucky recipients stay out of the public eye, under penalty of the Bastille. The first four leaves granted, as may be imagined, were to the four friends. Furthermore, Athos persuaded Sir Tréville to give them six days instead of four, plus two extra nights, as they set out on the evening of the 24th and Tréville had kindly post-dated the beginning of their leave to the morning of the 25th. "My God, it seems to me we're making a big deal out of a simple thing," said d'Artagnan, the eternal optimist. "In two days by using up two or three horses – that I can afford to do, as I have plenty of money – I'll be in Bethune. I present the queen's letter to the superior, collect the dear treasure I've gone for, and head, not to Lorraine or Belgium but back to Paris. It'll be much easier to hide her there, especially since the cardinal is at La Rochelle.

Then, once we've returned to the campaign, we can get what we need to protect her from the queen, relying on the influence of Aramis's cousin, as well as what we've personally done for her. The rest of you might as well stay behind – there's no point in wearing yourselves out. A simple expedition like this doesn't call for anyone more than myself and Planchet."

To this, Athos calmly replied, "We, too, have some money, for I haven't yet drunk my whole share of the diamond, and Porthos and Aramis haven't eaten theirs. We can just as easily wear out four horses as one. And consider, d'Artagnan," he added, in a voice so sombre that it gave the young man shivers, "Bethune is a town where the cardinal has set a rendezvous with a woman who creates misery wherever she goes. If it was only four men you had to deal with, d'Artagnan, I'd let you go by yourself – but as you have to deal with that woman, we will all go, and I hope to God that the four of us, plus our lackeys, are enough to handle her."

"You're scaring me, Athos," d'Artagnan said. "Dear God, what are you afraid of?"

"Everything!" replied Athos.

D'Artagnan examined the expressions of his comrades, who seemed just as anxious as Athos. So they continued on their way as fast as their horses could go without saying another word. On the evening of the 25th, as they were entering Arras, and d'Artagnan was just alighting at the Golden Harrow Inn in hopes of drinking a glass of honey, a cavalier emerged from the post-stable, where he'd just transferred to a fresh horse, and set off at a gallop down the road to Paris. As he passed through the gateway into the street, the wind blew back the cloak in which he was enveloped, though it was the month of August, and lifted his hat that the traveller clapped back onto his head and quickly pulled down over his eyes. D'Artagnan, who'd had his eyes fixed on this man, grew very pale and dropped his glass. "What's wrong, Sir?" said Planchet. "Oh! Quick, Gentlemen, my master is sick!"

The three friends came running, and found d'Artagnan, far from seeming ill, racing for his horse. They stopped him at the gateway. "Where the devil do you think you're going?" Athos said to him.

"It's him!" cried d'Artagnan, pale with anger. "It's him! Let me go after him!"

"Him! What him?" demanded Athos.

"That man is him!"

"What man?"

"That cursed man, my archenemy, who always appears when I'm threatened by something terrible; the one who was with that awful woman the first time I met her; the one I was chasing when I provoked Athos; the one I saw the morning Madam Bonacieux was abducted! The man of Meung! He just went past! I recognised him when the wind blew his cloak open."

"The devil you say," said Athos thoughtfully.

"Saddle up, Gentlemen, saddle up! After him, before he gets away."

"D'Artagnan," said Aramis, "allow me to observe that he's going in a direction opposite to ours, and he has a fresh horse where ours are tired, so we'll kill our horses before we ever have a chance to catch him. Let's save the woman and let the man go."

"Hey, Sir!" shouted the stable boy, who came running out after the stranger. "Sir! Hey! This paper fell out of your hat!"

"My friend," said d'Artagnan, "a half-pistole for that paper!"

"My faith, sir, with pleasure! Here."

The stable boy congratulating himself on his luck, went back into the courtyard. D'Artagnan unfolded the paper. "Well?" demanded his friends, surrounding him.

"Only a single word!" d'Artagnan said.

"Yes," said Aramis, "but that word is the name of a town or village."

"Armentieres," said Porthos. "Never heard of it."

"But this name of a town or village is in her handwriting!" cried Athos.

"I think we'd better take good care of this paper," said d'Artagnan. "Maybe I've not thrown away my half-pistole. To horse, my friends, to horse!" And the four friends left at a gallop on the road to Bethune.

The Carmelite Convent at Bethune

Great criminals seem to have made a sort of infernal bargain that enables them to surmount all obstacles and escape all dangers, until that moment when Providence, weary of the game, places before them the rocks that wreck their impious careers. So it was with Milady. She passed between the cruisers of two warring nations and arrived at Boulogne without incident. When landing at Portsmouth, Milady had been an Englishwoman whom the persecutions of France had driven from La Rochelle; upon landing at Boulogne, after a two-day passage, she passed herself off as a Frenchwoman whom the English had harassed at Portsmouth out of their hatred for France. Milady had, besides, the best of all passports: her beauty, her grand manner, and the generosity with which she spread around her pistoles. Relieved of the usual formalities by the affable smile and gallant manners of the old Governor of the Port, who kissed her hand, she remained at Boulogne only long enough to post the following letter:

To His Eminence My Lord le Cardinal of Richelieu,
At his Camp before La Rochelle:
My Lord,
Your Eminence may be assured that His Grace the Duke of Buckingham will not set out for France.
Boulogne,
The evening of the 25th.
MILADY DE –
P.S.: In accordance with Your Eminence's desires, I proceed to the Carmelite convent at Bethune, where I'll await your orders.

That same evening, Milady took to the road. Night overtook her, and she stopped at an inn to sleep. She left at five o'clock the next morning, and three hours later she entered Bethune. She asked directions to the Carmelite convent and went there immediately. The superior came out to meet her. Milady showed her the cardinal's order; the abbess found a chamber for her and had breakfast served. In Milady's eyes, the shadows of the past were entirely gone; with her vision fixed on times to come, she saw only the bright future the cardinal would bestow on her – the cardinal, whom she'd served so well in this bloody affair, without ever involving his name. The ever-changing passions that drove and consumed her made her life resemble those clouds that tumble across the sky, sometimes tinted with azure, sometimes with flame, and sometimes with the opaque darkness of the tempest that leaves nothing in its wake but devastation and death. After breakfast, the abbess came to pay her a visit. There are few diversions in the cloister, and the good superior was eager to make the acquaintance of her new pensioner. Milady wanted to please the abbess, an easy thing for a woman as genuinely accomplished as she was. She was amiable, charming, won over the good superior with her clever conversation, and considerable social graces. The abbess, who was a daughter of the nobility, loved nothing more than Court gossip that travels slowly to the far corners of the realm, and even then rarely makes it through a convent's walls, before which all such worldly noises seem to die away. Milady, of course, was au courant with all the intrigues of the aristocracy, her milieu for the last five or six years, so she undertook to entertain the good abbess with a description of the daily life of the French Court. She told of the king's exaggerated religious devotions, gave her a rundown of the current scandals involving the lords and ladies at Court, all of whom the abbess knew by name, and touched lightly on the affair between the queen and the Duke of Buckingham, talking a great deal in order to induce the superior to talk a little. But the abbess seemed content to listen and smile without saying a word. However, Milady could see how much she enjoyed this sort of talk, so she went on – only now she dropped in the name of the cardinal. Her problem was, she didn't know if the abbess was a Royalist or a Cardinalist, so she steered a prudent middle course. But the abbess, for her part, maintained a reserve even more prudent, contenting herself with bowing her head respectfully every time her visitor pronounced the name of His Eminence. Milady began to think she was going to be deathly bored in this convent. She decided to take a little risk to see how far she could go. To test the limits of the good abbess's discretion, she began to cast aspersions on the cardinal – vague at first, then more specific, relating the amours of the minister with Madam of Combalet, Marion Delorme, and various other gallant women. The abbess listened attentively, smiled, and showed a bit more life. Good, Milady thought, she likes this kind of talk. If she is a Cardinalist, at least she's not fanatical about it.

She passed on to the cardinal's persecutions of his enemies. The abbess only crossed herself, without indicating either approval or disapproval. This confirmed Milady in her opinion that the abbess was more Royalist than Cardinalist. She continued in the same vein, speaking of ever-greater outrages. "I know very little of such things," said the abbess at length, "but despite our distance from Court, and our position apart from worldly affairs, we have among us sad examples of what you're talking about. One of our pensioners in particular has suffered a great deal of persecution at the hands of His Eminence."

"One of your pensioners!" said Milady. "Oh, my God! The poor woman, how I pity her."

"With good reason, for there's much to pity: imprisonment, threats, and mistreatment – she's suffered it all. But who knows?" the abbess said. "The cardinal may have good reason for these acts. Though she seems a perfect angel, we mustn't judge people by appearances."

Who knows indeed? Milady said to herself. I seem to be on to something here. Let's follow this up.

She assumed an expression of perfect candour. "Alas!" she said. "So they say. We're told we shouldn't trust appearances but what can we believe in, if not the most beautiful works of the Lord? As for me, I may be fooled all my life but I'll always trust a person whose face inspires me with sympathy."

"So you would be tempted to believe this young woman is innocent?" asked the abbess.

"His Eminence doesn't punish only for crimes," Milady said. "There are certain virtues he pursues more severely than some offences."

"Permit me, Madam, to express my surprise," said the abbess.

"At what?" Milady asked ingenuously.

"Well, at the language you use."

"What do you find so surprising in my language?" Milady asked, smiling.

"You're the cardinal's friend, since he sent you here, and yet..."

"And yet I speak ill of him," Milady said, finishing the superior's thought.

"At least, you don't speak very well of him."

"That's because I'm not his friend," Milady sighed, "but his victim."

"But, this letter that recommends you to me...?"

"Is an order for me to confine myself in a sort of prison until I'm removed by one of his creatures?"

"But why haven't you fled?"

"Where would I go? Do you think there's anywhere on earth the cardinal can't reach, if he troubles to reach out his hand? If I were a man, I might try for it but a woman? What can a woman do? This young pensioner of yours, has she tried to flee?"

"No, that's true. But it's another thing with her, as I think she stays in France for love."

"Then," Milady sighed, "if she's in love, she's not completely miserable."

"So in you," the abbess said, with a livelier interest, "I see another poor persecuted woman?"

"Alas, yes," said Milady.

The abbess paused and regarded Milady with uneasiness, as if struck with a new idea. "You're not an enemy of our holy faith?" she asked uncertainly.

"Me?" said Milady. "Me, a Protestant? Oh, no – on the contrary! I swear to God who hears us that I'm a fervent Catholic."

"Then don't worry, Madam," said the abbess, smiling. "This house won't be a very hard prison, and we'll do all we can to make you cherish your captivity here. Moreover, you'll find here that other persecuted young woman – the victim, no doubt, of some court intrigue. She is amiable and well-mannered."

"What is her name?"

"She was commended to my care by someone of very high rank under the name of Kitty. I haven't tried to learn her real name."

"Kitty!" Milady cried. "What? Are you sure?"

"Yes, Madam – so we were told. Do you know her?"

Milady smiled to herself at the idea that the young woman might be her old chambermaid. Then it evoked a wave of frustrated anger, and the desire for revenge distorted Milady's features – but, woman of a hundred faces, she immediately recovered the calm and benevolent expression she'd momentarily lost. "And when could I see this young lady, for whom I already feel such great sympathy?" Milady asked.

"Why, this evening," said the abbess, "or even this afternoon. But you've been travelling for four days, as you told me yourself, and you've been up since five this morning; I'm sure you'd like a rest. Go to bed and sleep, and we'll call you at dinner time."

Milady could very easily have done without sleep, as her mind, always avid for intrigue, was stimulated by the idea of a new adventure but she nonetheless decided to accept the superior's offer. During the past two weeks she had been torn by so many different emotions that even if her body could have fought off further fatigue, her soul was in need of repose. So she took her leave of the abbess and went to bed, rocked softly to sleep by the ideas of revenge brought to mind by the name of Kitty. She recalled the cardinal's promise of almost unlimited license if she was successful in her mission. She had succeeded, and revenge on d'Artagnan was now within her power. Only one thing alarmed Milady: the memory of her husband, the Count of La Fère, whom she had thought dead, and whom she'd found again in Athos, the best friend of d'Artagnan. However, if he was d'Artagnan's friend, he must have helped him assist the queen in thwarting His Eminence's plans; if he was d'Artagnan's friend, he was the cardinal's enemy, and she would doubtless succeed in including him in the vengeance that would destroy the young musketeer. All these hopes were sweet visions to Milady, and, lulled by them, she soon fell asleep. She was awakened by a soft voice at the foot of her bed. She opened her eyes and saw the abbess, accompanied by a young woman with blond hair and a delicate complexion, who regarded her with a look of benevolent curiosity. This young woman's face was completely unknown to her. They examined each other carefully, while exchanging the customary compliments. Both were very attractive, though their styles of beauty were quite different, and Milady smiled as she recognised that the young woman possessed nothing like her grand air and aristocratic bearing – though it's true the young woman was dressed in the habit of a novice nun that didn't help her much in that sort of comparison. The abbess introduced them to each other, and having completed that formality, returned to her religious duties, leaving the two young women alone. The novice seeing Milady still in bed, was about to follow the superior but Milady stopped her. "What, Madam?" she said. "We've barely met, and already you want to deprive me of your company? I must confess, I've been counting on you to help me pass the time here."

"No, Madam," the novice replied. "I simply thought I might have chosen a bad time; you were asleep, you must be tired."

"Well," Milady said, "what's the best thing a sleeping person can ask for? A happy awakening. You've given me that, so please allow me a chance to enjoy it."

And taking the novice's hand, she drew her toward a chair beside the bed. The novice sat. "Dear God, how miserable I've been," she said. "I've been here more than six months, without the shadow of a diversion. Now you arrive, sure to provide me with some charming company, just when, in all probability, I'm about to leave the convent!"

"Really! You're leaving soon?" Milady said.

"At least, I hope so," said the novice, with a joyful expression she didn't try to disguise.

"I heard that you've suffered at the hands of the cardinal," continued Milady, "which would have been another reason for sympathy between us."

"So what I heard from the good mother is true, that you've also been a victim of that awful cardinal?"

"Hush!" said Milady. "We shouldn't talk about him that way, not even here. All my troubles started from having said no more than you've said, to a woman I thought was my friend – and who betrayed me. Are you also the victim of treachery?"

"No," said the novice, "rather of my devotion to a woman I loved, for whom I would have given my life, and for whom I still would."

"And who has abandoned you, is that it?"

"I was unjust enough to think so but in the last few days I've received proof to the contrary, thank God! I hated to think she might have forgotten about me. But you don't appear to be under any constraint, Madam," continued the novice. "If you want to flee, then surely you can."

"Where would you have me go, without friends, without money, in a part of France I don't know, and where I've never been before?"

"Oh!" cried the novice. "As to friends, I'm sure you'd have them wherever you went – you're so beautiful, and seem so good!"

Milady softened her smile into an angelic expression. "That doesn't prevent me from feeling alone and persecuted."

"Listen to me," said the novice. "We must trust in heaven. There always comes a time when the good you've done pleads your cause before God. And maybe it's a lucky thing you met with me because, though I'm humble and powerless, I have powerful friends – and if they help me to leave here, afterward they may be able to help you."

"Oh, when I said I was alone," Milady said, hoping to draw the novice out by speaking of herself, "it's not because I lack friends in high places, it's because these friends are themselves afraid of the cardinal. The queen herself doesn't dare to oppose that terrible minister. I have proof that Her Majesty, good-hearted though she is, has more than once had to abandon to His Eminence's persecution people who had served her."

"Believe me, Madam, the queen may seem to have abandoned these people but we shouldn't be fooled by appearances. The more they are persecuted, the more she thinks of them – and when they least expect it, she shows she remembers them."

"Yes, you're right," said Milady. "The queen is so good."

"You must know her, to talk about her this way!" the novice said excitedly. "Our queen, so lovely and noble!"

"That is to say," replied Milady, driven back into her entrenchments, "I don't have the honour to be acquainted with her personally but I know a number of her most intimate friends: I've met Sir Putanges; I knew Sir Jars in England; I know Sir Tréville..."

"Sir Tréville!" said the novice. "You know Sir Tréville?"

"Yes – very well, in fact."

"The Captain of the King's Musketeers?"

"Himself."

"Why, then, we practically know each other," cried the novice. "We're almost friends already. If you know Sir Tréville, you must have visited his hôtel?"

"Often!" said Milady who having started down this path, and seeing her deceit successful, decided to follow it to its end.

"While there, did you meet any of his musketeers?"

"All the ones he receives most often," replied Milady, for whom this conversation was beginning to take on real interest.

"Name some of those you know and you'll see that they're my friends."

"Well," said Milady, somewhat embarrassed, "I know Sir Louvigny, Sir Courtivron, Sir Férrusac..."

The novice let Milady speak but once she stopped, she said, "Don't you know a gentleman named Athos?"

Milady went as pale as the sheets she was lying on and, mistress of herself though she was, she couldn't stop herself from crying out. She seized the novice's hand and devoured her with her eyes.

"What's wrong? Good God," asked the poor woman, "have I said anything to hurt you?"

"No, it's just that the name struck me, because ... I, too, know that gentleman, and it seemed strange to find someone else who knew him as well."

"I do know him! And not just him but also his friends, Gentlemen Porthos and Aramis."

"Really! Why, I know them, too!" cried Milady who felt a chill enter her heart.

"Well, if you know them, you know what good and loyal friends they are. If you need help, why not ask them?"

"What ... what I mean is," stammered Milady, "that I'm not really all that close with them. I know them from having heard one of their friends talk so much about them – a Sir d'Artagnan."

"You know Sir d'Artagnan!" cried the novice.

It was now her turn to seize Milady's hand and devour her with her eyes. Then, noticing the strange expression on Milady's face, she said, "Pardon me, Madam but in what sense do you know him?"

"Well," said Milady, unsure of herself for once, "well ... in the sense of a friend."

"You aren't telling me the truth, Madam," said the novice. "You've been his mistress!"

Then Milady knew. "No, Madam," she said, "it's you who've been his."

"Me!" said the novice.

"Yes, you. I know you now: you are Madam Bonacieux."

The young woman recoiled in surprise and terror. "No use denying it," Milady said. "You are, aren't you?"

"Well ... yes, Madam! I love him," the novice said. "Are we rivals?"

Milady's face lit with such a fierce flame that, under any other circumstances, Madam Bonacieux would have fled in fear – but she was too wrapped up in her own jealousy. "Tell me!" said Madam Bonacieux, with surprising intensity. "Madam! Are you, or have you been his mistress?"

"Oh, no!" cried Milady, in a tone that left no doubt of its truthfulness. "Never! Never!"

"I believe you," said Madam Bonacieux. "But why did you react that way?"

"Don't you understand?" said Milady who was herself again and had regained her presence of mind.

"How can I understand? I know nothing."

"Can't you understand that Sir d'Artagnan, being my friend, might take me into his confidence?"

"Really?"

"Don't you see that I know everything? Your abduction from that little house in Saint-Germain, his despair and that of his friends, their search, so useless up to this moment! How could I not be astonished when, all unsuspecting, I find you in front of me – you, of whom we've so often spoken together – you whom he loves with all his soul and I've learned to love before even meeting you! Ah, dear Constance, I've found you! Here you're at last!"

And Milady extended her arms to Madam Bonacieux who was convinced by what she'd said. She saw this woman, whom a moment before she'd believed was her rival, as nothing more than a sincere and devoted friend. "Oh, forgive me! Forgive me!" she cried, burying her face in Milady's shoulder. "I love him so!"

The two women embraced each other for a long moment. Certainly, if Milady had been as strong as her hatred, Madam Bonacieux would never have left that embrace alive. But since Milady couldn't strangle her, she smiled upon her. "Oh, you little dear! You dear, sweet thing!" Milady said. "How happy I am to see you! Let me look at you." Milady ran her eyes over every inch of Madam Bonacieux.

"Yes, it's you – no doubt about it. I should have recognised you immediately, after everything he's said."

The poor young woman had no idea what frightful cruelties were brewing behind that brow so pure, behind those eyes so brilliant, in which she read nothing but friendship and compassion. "Then you know what I've suffered," said Madam Bonacieux, "since he's told you what he's suffered – but to suffer for him is happiness."

"Yes, that is happiness," Milady replied mechanically.

She was thinking of something else. "And now," continued Madam Bonacieux, "my trial is coming to its end. Tomorrow, maybe even tonight, I'll see him again, and then what's past will no longer exist."

"Tonight? Tomorrow?" asked Milady, jolted from her reverie by these words. "What do you mean? You expect news about him?"

"I expect him personally."

"D'Artagnan – here?"

"Himself."

"But that's impossible! He's at the siege of La Rochelle with the cardinal. He can't return to Paris before the city is taken."

"You may think so but is anything impossible to my d'Artagnan? That noble, loyal gentleman!"

"I just can't believe you!"

"Well, read, then!" Madam Bonacieux said, bursting with joy and pride.

And the unfortunate young woman presented a letter to Milady. Ah! The handwriting of Madam of Chevreuse! Milady said to herself. I always thought she must be involved in this somewhere. And she avidly read the following lines:

Make ready, my dear child. Our friend will see you soon, for the sole purpose of liberating you from that prison where you had to be hidden for your own safety. Prepare then for your departure – and never despair of us.

Our charming Gascon's shown himself as brave and faithful as ever. Tell him that someone is very grateful for the warning he's given. "Yes," said Milady, "the letter is quite definite. Do you know what the 'warning' was?"

"No – though I suspect he warned the queen against some new scheme of the cardinal's."

"Yes, no doubt that's it!" said Milady, returning the letter to Madam Bonacieux and allowing her head to sink thoughtfully to her chest.

Suddenly they heard the sound of a galloping horse. "Oh!" cried Madam Bonacieux, darting to the window. "Can it be him already?"

Milady remained in her bed, petrified with surprise. So many unexpected things had happened all at once that for the first time she was at a loss. "Him?" she murmured from the bed, eyes staring. "Can it be him?"

"Alas, no!" said Madam Bonacieux. "It's a man I don't know – but he seems to be coming here. Yes, he's tied up his horse at the gate, and is ringing."

Milady almost sprang from the bed. "You're sure it isn't him?" she said.

"Oh, yes, quite sure!"

"Maybe you didn't get a good enough look at him."

"Oh, no! If I saw just the plume of his hat, or the edge of his cloak, I'd recognise him instantly!"

Milady was dressing rapidly. "Never mind. The man is coming here, you say?"

"Yes, he's already entered."

"He must be here either for you or for me."

"My God! You seem so distressed!"

"Yes, I admit it. I don't have your confidence – I'm terrified of the cardinal."

"Hush!" said Madam Bonacieux. "Someone's coming!"

In fact, the door opened, and the superior entered. "Have you come from Boulogne?" she asked Milady.

"Yes, I have," she replied, trying to recover her self-possession. "Who's asking for me?"

"A man who won't tell me his name but says he's from the cardinal."

"And he wants to talk to me?" asked Milady.

"He wants to talk to a lady just arrived from Boulogne."

"Then let him come in, Madam, if you please."

"My God!" Madam Bonacieux said. "Do you think it's bad news?"

"I'm afraid so."

"I'll leave you with this stranger but if you'll permit me, I'll return as soon as he's gone."

"By all means!" The superior and Madam Bonacieux went out. Milady was left alone, her eyes fixed on the door. A moment later she heard the jangle of spurs on the stairs. Footsteps approached, the door opened, and a man appeared. Milady gasped with joy: for the man was the Count of Rochefort, the demon familiar of His Eminence.

2 Varieties of Demon

"Ah!" said Milady and Rochefort together. "It's you!"

"Yes, it's me," said Rochefort.

"And you come...?" asked Milady.

"From La Rochelle. And you?"

"From England."

"Buckingham?"

"Dead, or seriously wounded. I left without being able to get anything from him. He was assassinated by a fanatic."

"Ah!" Rochefort smiled. "What a lucky event! His Eminence will be most gratified. Have you informed him?"

"I wrote to him from Boulogne. But how is it you're here?"

"His Eminence was uneasy, and sent me to look for you."

"I arrived here only yesterday."

"And what have you been doing since yesterday?"

"I haven't wasted my time."

"Oh, I'm certain of that!"

"Do you know who I've found here?"

"No."

"Guess."

"How could I?"

"That young woman the queen took from prison."

"The mistress of that pipsqueak d'Artagnan?"

"Yes – Madam Bonacieux, whose refuge the cardinal couldn't find."

"Well, well," said Rochefort. "Two birds in the same hand. His Eminence was truly born under a star."

"Imagine my astonishment," continued Milady, "when I found myself face to face with this woman."

"Does she know you?"

"No."

"Then she regards you as a stranger?"

Milady smiled. "I am her best friend!"

"Upon my honour," said Rochefort, "only you, my dear Countess, can perform such miracles."

"And just as well, Count," said Milady. "Do you know what's about to happen here?"

"No."

"Tomorrow, or the day after, she's going to be taken away from here by order of the queen."

"Indeed? And by whom?"

"D'Artagnan and his friends."

"If they really do that, we'll have no choice but to clap them in the Bastille."

"Why aren't they there now?"

"What can I do? His Eminence has a weakness for these men that I cannot understand."

"Indeed?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, tell him this, Rochefort: our conversation at the inn at Colombier-Rouge was overheard by these four men, and after his departure one of them came up and took from me, by violence, the safe-conduct the cardinal had given me. Tell him that they warned Lord Winter of my voyage to England, and that this time they nearly prevented me from completing my mission, as they did with the diamond studs. Tell him that of these four men, only two, d'Artagnan and Athos, are truly to be feared. The third, Aramis, is Madam of Chevreuse's lover, and can be left alone, since we know his secret. The fourth, Porthos, is a dolt and a braggart, and not worth bothering about."

"But surely these four men must be at the siege of La Rochelle."

"I thought the same thing but a letter Madam Bonacieux had received from Madam of Chevreuse, and which she was foolish enough to show me, leads me to believe otherwise. I think these four men are on their way here to carry her away."

"The devil! What should we do?"

"What are the cardinal's instructions regarding me?"

"I was to take your dispatches, written or verbal, for delivery. Then, once he knows what you've done, he can decide what you should do next."

"Meanwhile I must stay here?" Milady asked.

"Here, or nearby."

"You can't take me with you?"

"No, the order is quite explicit. Near the camp you might be recognised – and your presence, you must understand, would compromise the cardinal, especially after what's just happened across the Channel. Just tell me where you'll be waiting for word from the cardinal so I'll know where to find you."

"I certainly won't be able to stay here."

"Why?"

"You forget that my enemies may arrive at any moment."

"That's true; but then, is that little woman to be allowed to escape His Eminence?"

"Ha!" said Milady, with that smile unique to her. "Have you forgotten that I'm her best friend?"

"Yes, that's right! Then I can tell the cardinal, as regards this woman..."

"Not to worry."

"Is that all?"

"He will know what that means."

"He'll certainly guess. Now, what should I do?"

"Return without a moment's delay. It seems to me the news you have to report is worth expending some effort."

"My carriage broke an axle coming into Lillers."

"Good."

"What's good about it?"

"I need it," said the countess.

"And how am I supposed to travel?"

"In the saddle."

"That's easy for you to say. It's a hundred and eighty leagues!"

"So?"

Rochefort shrugged. “I’ve done worse. What then?”

“When you pass through Lillers, send me your carriage, with orders to your driver to place himself at my disposal.”

“Very well.”

“No doubt you have an order from the cardinal?”

“I have a warrant of full authority.”

“Show it to the abbess. Tell her that someone will come for me, today or tomorrow, and that I’m to go with the person who presents himself in your name.”

“Fine.”

“Don’t forget to speak harshly about me when you talk to the abbess.”

“Why is that?”

“Because I am a victim of the cardinal. I must inspire confidence in that poor little Madam Bonacieux.”

“But of course. Now, will you write me a report of everything that’s happened?”

“I’ve told you everything, and a paper might be lost. You have a good memory; repeat what I’ve said.”

“You’re right. But let me know where to find you, so I don’t have to waste time looking.”

“All right – wait a moment.”

“Do you need a map?”

“Oh, I know this area quite well.”

“You do? When were you here before?”

“I grew up here.”

“Indeed?”

“One has to grow up somewhere, so one might as well make use of it.”

“So you’ll wait for me, then…?”

“Let me see … ah, yes – at Armentieres.”

“Where is this Armentieres?”

“A little town on the Lys. I have but to cross the river to be in a foreign country.”

“Perfect! Just so you only cross that river in the event of danger.”

“Of course.”

“If that happens, how will I know where you are?”

“You don’t need your lackey?”

“No.”

“Is he a reliable man?”

“Proven.”

“Then give him to me. No one knows him; I’ll leave him behind, and he can lead you to me.”

“So you’ll wait for me at this Armentieres?”

“At Armentieres,” Milady replied.

“Write the name down on a piece of paper, in case I forget it. The name of a town can’t compromise you, can it?”

“Who knows? Never mind, I’ll do it.” Milady wrote the name on a scrap of paper.

“Fine,” said Rochefort, taking the paper from Milady, folding it, and putting it in the lining of his hat. “Besides, in case I lose the paper, I’ll do as children do, and repeat the name to myself as I go along. Now, is that all?”

“I think so.”

“Let’s go over it: Buckingham dead or seriously wounded; your conference with the cardinal overheard by the four musketeers; Lord Winter warned of your arrival at Portsmouth; d’Artagnan and Athos to the Bastille; Aramis the lover of Madam of Chevreuse; Porthos a fool; and Madam Bonacieux rediscovered. I’m to send you the carriage as soon as possible, place my lackey at your disposal, make you out to be a victim of the cardinal so the abbess won’t be suspicious, and meet you at Armentieres on the banks of the Lys. Anything else?”

“In truth, my dear Count, you’re a paragon of memory. Just one thing more…”

“What’s that?”

“I saw a pretty little wood adjacent to the convent garden; tell the abbess that I’m to be permitted to walk in that wood. Who knows? I may need a back door to escape through.”

“You think of everything.”

“On the other hand, you’ve forgotten something.”

“What?”

“To ask me if I need any money.”

“Just so. How much do you want?”

“All the gold you have.”

“I have about five hundred pistoles.”

“So do I; with a thousand pistoles I can face anything. Empty your pockets.”

“At your service, Countess.”

“A pleasure, my dear Count. When do you leave?”

“In an hour. Time enough to have a bite to eat, while I send someone after a fresh post-horse.”

“Wonderful. Goodbye, Count!”

“Goodbye, Countess.”

“Commend me to the cardinal,” said Milady.

“Commend me to Satan,” Rochefort replied. Milady and Rochefort exchanged a smile and parted. An hour later, Rochefort set out at a gallop; five hours after that, he passed through Arras. There, he was recognised by d’Artagnan – that inspired fresh fear in the hearts of the four musketeers, and imparted new urgency to their mission.

A Drop of Water

Rochefort had scarcely left when Madam Bonacieux re-entered. She found Milady wearing a smile. “What you feared has happened,” the young woman said. “Tonight or tomorrow, someone will come from the cardinal to take you away.”

“Who told you that, my child?” asked Milady.

“I heard it from the messenger’s own mouth.”

“Come sit near me,” Milady said.

“All right.”

“I want to make sure no one can hear us.”

“Why all these precautions?”

“I’ll tell you – but first…” Milady rose and went to the door, opened it, looked down the corridor, then returned, and seated herself near Madam Bonacieux. “So he’s played his part well,” she said.

“Who is that?”

“The man who presented himself to the abbess as an emissary of the cardinal.”

“He was playing a part?”

“Yes, my child.”

“Then, he wasn’t…”

“That man,” said Milady, lowering her voice, “is my brother.”

“Your brother!” said Madam Bonacieux.

“Quietly! No one but you must know this secret, my child. If you confide it to anyone else, I’ll be lost – and you may be, as well.”

“My God!”

“Listen, here’s what happened: my brother, who was on his way to rescue me – by force, if necessary – encountered the genuine agent of the cardinal who was coming for me. He followed him. When they came to a lonely and deserted part of the road, he drew his sword and demanded the documents the messenger was carrying. The messenger tried to defend himself, and my brother killed him.”

“Oh!” Madam Bonacieux shuddered.

“It was the only way, you know. Then my brother decided to substitute deception for force. He took the papers and presented himself here as the cardinal’s emissary. In an hour or two a carriage will come to take me away, apparently on the behalf of His Eminence.”

“I understand – this carriage will be sent by your brother.”

“Just so. But that’s not all: that letter you received, that you thought was from Madam of Chevreuse…”

“What about it?”

“How can that be?”

“It’s false, a trap to make sure you put up no resistance when they come to get you.”

“But it’s d’Artagnan who’s coming.”

“Don’t fool yourself. D’Artagnan and his friends are still at the siege of La Rochelle.”

“How do you know that?”

“My brother encountered agents of the cardinal dressed in the uniforms of musketeers. You would have been called to the gate, thinking you were going to meet friends, and then found yourself carried off back to Paris.”

“Oh, my God! My head is spinning from all these terrible schemes.” Madam Bonacieux put her hands to her temples. “If this goes on, I’ll lose my mind!”

“Listen…”

“What?”

“I hear a horse – it’s my brother, leaving. Come on, I want to wave goodbye.”

Milady opened the window, and gestured to Madam Bonacieux to join her. The young woman followed. Rochefort passed at a gallop. “Goodbye, my brother!” cried Milady. The count raised his head, saw the two young women, and without pausing, gave Milady a friendly wave. “Good old Georges!” she said.

She closed the window with an expression of affection and sadness. Then she resumed her seat, as if lost in her thoughts. “Dear lady!” said Madam Bonacieux. “Pardon me for interrupting you but my God – what would you advise me to do? Please tell me – you have so much more experience!”

“First of all,” said Milady, “my brother and I might be wrong, and d’Artagnan and his friends might really be coming to rescue you.”

“Oh! That would be too wonderful,” cried Madam Bonacieux. “That kind of happiness isn’t for me.”

“In that case, you understand, it’d be only a matter of time – a sort of race as to who’d arrive first. If your friends are faster, you’re saved; but if the cardinal’s creatures get here first, you’re lost.”

“Oh, yes – lost beyond hope! Then what’d I do?”

“What? Tell me!”

“To wait, hidden somewhere nearby, until you’re sure of the identity of whoever comes after you.”

“But where would I hide?”

“Oh, there’s no problem about that. I’m going to conceal myself a few leagues from here while waiting for my brother to rejoin me. I can take you with me, and we can hide there and wait together.”

“But they won’t let me leave. I’m practically a prisoner here.”

“Since I’m supposed to be taken away from here due to an order from the cardinal, no one would believe you were in a hurry to follow me.”

“So?”

“So: the person who’s coming to get me is my brother’s servant, and I’ll tell him what to do. When the carriage comes to the gate, you come along with me to bid me goodbye. You step up on the running-board as if to embrace me one last time, the servant gives an order to the driver, and we leave at a gallop.”

“But d’Artagnan, d’Artagnan – what if he comes?”

“Won’t we know it?”

“How?”

“Nothing could be simpler. We’ll send my brother’s servant back to Bethune – we can trust him. He’ll wear a disguise, and keep an eye on the convent gate. If the cardinal’s agents come, he won’t do anything but if it’s Sir d’Artagnan and his friends, he’ll lead them to us.”

“He knows who they are?”

“Of course! Hasn’t he seen Sir d’Artagnan at my house?”

“Oh, yes – that’s right. It sounds like it should all work out for the best ... but we mustn’t go very far from here.”

“Seven or eight leagues at the most, probably somewhere on the border. That way we can leave France at the first sign of trouble.”

“What do we do now?”

“Wait.”

“But they could arrive at any minute!”

“My brother’s carriage will get here first.”

“What if I’m not around when they come to get you – at dinner, or supper, for example?”

“Here’s what you should do.”

“What?”

“Ask your good superior to let you take your meals with me, so you can be near me as much as possible.”

“Will she permit it?”

“What can it matter to her?”

“All right! That way we won’t have to leave each other for a moment.”

“Well, go down right now and ask her. I need to clear my head – I think I’ll take a walk around the garden.”

“Go ahead. Where will I find you?”

“There, in an hour.”

“In an hour. Oh, you’re so kind, and I’m so grateful!”

“How could I resist helping someone as lovely and as charming as you? Especially when you’re the beloved of one of my best friends!”

“Dear d’Artagnan! Oh, how he’ll thank you!”

“I hope so. So we’re agreed – let’s go on down.”

“You’re going to the garden?”

“Yes.”

“Follow this corridor, go down the little stairs, and you’re there.”

“Perfect! Thank you.”

The two women exchanged warm smiles and parted. Milady had told the truth when she said she had to clear her head. Her hastily-concocted plans were in danger of getting inextricably tangled. She needed some time alone to get her thoughts in order. She thought she could see the shape of the immediate future but she needed peace and quiet to organise her ideas and settle on a single plan. The most urgent matter was to get Madam Bonacieux out of the convent and away to some place of safekeeping. Once there, if necessary, she could be used as a hostage. Milady was beginning to have her doubts about the results of this dreadful conflict, in which her enemies were proving to be as persistent as she was relentless. She had that feeling one gets when there’s a storm coming on: the tempest was approaching, and it was going to be terrible. She kept returning to the critical importance of keeping Madam Bonacieux in her hands. To hold Madam Bonacieux was to hold d’Artagnan’s life, as the life of the woman he loved meant more to him than his own. If things went wrong, holding Madam Bonacieux would give her leverage. So the primary issue was settled: Madam Bonacieux, all unsuspecting, would go with her, and once they were installed at Armentieres it would be easy to persuade her that d’Artagnan had never come to Bethune. In a fortnight, at most, Rochefort would return that would give her two weeks to consider how best to avenge herself on the four musketeers. There would be no chance of being bored, thank God, as she’d have the sweetest pastime life could offer to a woman of her character: the perfection of a bloody vengeance. While considering all this, she was also surveying the terrain of the garden, memorizing its topography for future reference. Milady was like an experienced general who plans for both victory and defeat, and is prepared, depending on the outcome of the battle, to march forward or beat a retreat. At the end of an hour, she heard the soft voice of Madam Bonacieux calling her. The good abbess had naturally agreed to everything, and they were to take supper together right away. On reaching the courtyard, they heard the sound of a carriage stopping at the gate. “Do you hear that?” Milady said.

“Yes, it sounds like a carriage,” replied Madam Bonacieux.

“Oh! My God!”

“Come, now: courage!”

The bell rang at the convent gate; it appeared Milady was right. “Go up to your room,” she said to Madam Bonacieux. “You must have some jewellery you want to take with you.”

“I have his letters,” she said.

“Well, go get them, and meet me in my room, where we’ll share a quick supper. We may have to travel part of the night and must keep up our strength.”

“Good Lord!” said Madam Bonacieux, clapping her hand to her breast. “My heart is hammering so hard I can scarcely walk.”

“Courage, Madam, courage! In a quarter of an hour, you’ll be safe – and remember, what you’re going to do is for him.”

“Oh, yes – all for him! That’s all you had to say to restore my courage. Go and I’ll be right with you.”

Milady hastened to her room where she found Rochefort’s lackey and gave him his instructions. He was to wait at the gate, unless the musketeers appeared, in which case he was to leave at the gallop. In that event he was to circle around the convent and await Milady in a little hamlet on the other side of the wood. Milady would cross the garden and make her way to the hamlet on foot. As she had said, Milady knew this corner of France very well indeed. If the musketeers didn’t appear, things were to go as already planned: Madam Bonacieux would climb into the carriage as if to say goodbye, and Milady would carry her off. Before the lackey could leave, Madam Bonacieux came in, so in order to alleviate any suspicions she might have, Milady repeated in front of her the latter half of her instructions. She then asked about the carriage: it was a light chaise drawn by three horses, driven by a postilion, with Rochefort’s lackey riding ahead as a courier. Milady was wrong to fear suspicion on the part of Madam Bonacieux; the poor young woman was too innocent to suspect another woman of such treachery. Besides, the name of the Countess Winter, as the abbess had called the lady, was completely unknown to her, and she had no idea that anyone like this woman might have such a great and fatal influence over her life. “You see, everything’s ready,” Milady said, once the lackey was gone. “The abbess suspects nothing, and thinks I’m being taken away on behalf of the cardinal. That man has gone to make his final preparations; take a bite to eat, have a sip of honey, and let’s be off.”

“Yes,” said Madam Bonacieux mechanically. “Yes, let’s be off.”

Milady offered her a chair, poured her a small glass of Spanish honey and carved her a slice of chicken. “You see? Everything’s going perfectly,” she said. “Night is coming on. By daybreak we’ll have arrived at our retreat and no one will have any idea where we are. Now take courage, and have a little something.”

Madam Bonacieux chewed a few bites mechanically, and barely touched her lips to the glass. “Come now, join in with me,” Milady said, raising her own glass to her lips.

But just as it reached her mouth, her hand hung suspended: she’d heard something on the road that sounded like the rumble of distant hooves drawing nearer, and she thought she could hear the whinny of horses. This sound shattered her joy in an instant, as when the sudden rush of a storm wakes one from a happy dream. She blanched and ran to the window while Madam Bonacieux rose to her feet, trembling, and leaned on her chair to keep from toppling. Milady could see nothing as yet, only hear the galloping coming ever closer. “My God,” said Madam Bonacieux, “what is that noise?”

“Either our friends ... or enemies,” said Milady with her terrible sangfroid. “Stay right there and I’ll tell you what I see.”

Madam Bonacieux remained standing, mute, immobile, and pale as a statue. The noise was now so loud the horses couldn’t be more than a hundred paces away; if they weren’t yet visible, it was because they were just around a bend in the road. The sound was so distinct one could almost count the horses by the drumming of their hooves. All at once, at the turn in the road, Milady saw the flicker of broad-brimmed hats and the flutter of plumes. She counted two, then five, then eight riders, one of them out in front by two lengths of a horse. Milady stifled a gasp – for she recognised the first rider as d’Artagnan. “Dear God!” cried Madam Bonacieux. “What do you see?”

“The uniform of the Cardinal’s Guard,” Milady said. “We haven’t a moment to lose. Run!”

“Yes, run,” Madam Bonacieux repeated but she was frozen in place by terror, unable to take a step.

They heard the riders pass beneath the window.

“Come on. Come on!” cried Milady, trying to drag the young woman by the arm. “We can still escape through the garden – I have the key to the gate! But hurry! In five minutes it will be too late.” Madam Bonacieux tried to walk, took two steps, and collapsed to her knees. Milady tried to lift her to her feet, even carry her but couldn’t manage it. At that moment they heard the wheels of the carriage that at the sight of the musketeers had set off at a gallop. Three or four shots were fired. “For the last time, will you come?” cried Milady.

“Oh, my God! I feel like I’m going to pass out – look, you can see I can’t take another step. Go on, run, and escape while you still can!”

“Go, and leave you here? No, no – never!” cried Milady. All at once, a light gleamed in her eyes. She darted to the table, deftly clicked open the collet of a large ring, and flicked the contents into Madam Bonacieux’s glass. It was a tiny drop of liquid that dissolved immediately. Then taking the glass in a firm hand, “Drink,” she said. “This honey will give you strength. Drink!” and she put the glass to the lips of the young woman who drank obediently. This wasn’t how I’d planned to avenge myself, Milady thought, replacing the glass on the table with an infernal smile. But, my faith! One does what one can.

And she darted from the room. Madam Bonacieux saw her go but was unable to follow her. She was like one of those people who dream that someone is chasing them but can’t move a step. A minute passed, and then there was the sound of a commotion at the gate. Every moment Madam Bonacieux expected to see Milady return but she never came. Her brow burned with fever, though it was bathed in cold sweat – from terror, she thought. Soon she heard the creak of the gate opening, and then the sound of boots and spurs echoing on the stairs. There was a murmur of approaching voices, from the midst of which she seemed to hear her own name. All at once she cried out with joy and threw herself toward the door: she had recognised the voice of d'Artagnan. "D'Artagnan! D'Artagnan!" she cried. "Is it you? Here, I'm here!"

"Constance! Constance!" replied the young man. "Where are you? My God!"

At that same moment the door of the cell burst open and several men rushed into the chamber. Madam Bonacieux fell onto a divan, unable to move. D'Artagnan threw a still-smoking pistol from his hand and fell to his knees before his mistress. Athos thrust his pistol into his belt, while Porthos and Aramis, who held naked swords, returned them to their scabbards. "Oh, d'Artagnan! My beloved d'Artagnan! You've come at last – it's no dream, it's really you!"

"Yes, yes, Constance! We're together!"

"Oh! She said you would never come but I still hoped you would. I didn't want to flee, and I was right ... how happy I am!"

Athos had calmly seated himself but at the word She, he rose with a start. "She? What she?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Why, my companion. The woman who, out of friendship for me, wanted to hide me from my persecutors. She took you for Cardinal's Guards and has just run off."

"Your companion!" cried d'Artagnan, becoming paler than his mistress's white veil. "What companion? Whom are you talking about?"

"The woman whose carriage was at the gate – she says she's your friend, d'Artagnan, and that you told her everything."

"Her name, her name!" cried d'Artagnan. "Dear God! Don't you know her name?"

"Yes, I heard it once ... wait ... it's so strange ... Oh, my God, I'm so dizzy, and I ... can't see."

"My friends, help me! Her hands are like ice," d'Artagnan cried. "She's falling ill – great God! She's passing out!"

While Porthos called for help with all the power of his lungs, Aramis ran to the table to get a glass of water – but he stopped when he saw the horrified expression on Athos's face. He stood before the table, hair rising on his head, his eyes glazed with horror, staring at one of the glasses with a terrible suspicion. "No!" said Athos. "No, it's impossible! God wouldn't permit such a crime."

"Some water!" cried d'Artagnan. "Water!"

"Poor woman!" murmured Athos in a broken voice.

Madam Bonacieux reopened her eyes under d'Artagnan's kisses. "She's reviving!" cried the young man. "Thank you, dear God!"

"Madam," said Athos, "Madam, in the name of heaven, whose empty glass is this?"

"Mine, Sir," replied the young woman, her voice fading.

"But who poured this glass of honey for you?"

"She."

"Who was she?"

"Ah! I remember," said Madam Bonacieux. "The Countess Winter..."

The four friends all uttered the same cry – but Athos's was the loudest. At that moment, Madam Bonacieux's face turned livid, she was gripped by a spasm of pain, and she fell panting into the arms of Porthos and Aramis. D'Artagnan seized Athos's hands with indescribable anguish. "What is it? Tell me what you believe," he said, voice choked with sobs.

"I believe ... everything," said Athos, biting his lips till they bled.

"D'Artagnan, d'Artagnan!" cried Madam Bonacieux. "Where are you? Don't leave me – you can see I'm going to die."

D'Artagnan, who'd been clenching Athos's hands between his own, dropped them and ran to her. Her face, once so beautiful, was contorted with pain, and her glassy eyes were blind. Her body shuddered convulsively and sweat ran from her brow. "In the name of heaven! Porthos, Aramis, run, call for help!"

"Useless," said Athos. "Useless. For the poison she pours, there is no antidote."

"Yes ... help me, help me!" Madam Bonacieux said faintly. "Help me!"

Then, gathering all her strength, she took the young man's head between her hands, looked at him for an instant with her soul in her eyes, and with a sob, pressed her lips to his. "Constance! Constance!" cried d'Artagnan.

A sigh escaped from Madam Bonacieux's mouth and caressed d'Artagnan's: this sigh was her soul, so chaste, so loving, returning to heaven on high. D'Artagnan held only a corpse in his arms. The young man cried out and fell beside his mistress, as pale and icy as she was. Porthos wept. Aramis shook his fist at heaven. Athos made the sign of the cross. At that moment a man, nearly as pale as those in the chamber, appeared in the doorway. He looked within, saw Madam Bonacieux dead and d'Artagnan in a faint. He appeared in that moment of stunned paralysis that follows great catastrophes. "So I wasn't wrong," he said. "It's Sir d'Artagnan, and you are his three friends, Gentlemen Athos, Porthos, and Aramis."

The latter three looked at the stranger with astonishment, though it seemed to all of them that they recognised him from somewhere. "Gentlemen," said the newcomer, "you are in search of a certain woman like me – and she must have passed this way," he added with a terrible smile, "for I see a corpse!" The three friends remained mute, for though the voice and the face were familiar, they couldn't recall where they'd met before. "Gentlemen," continued the stranger, "since you don't seem to recognise the man who probably owes his life to you twice over, allow me to name myself: I am Lord Winter, brother-in-law of that woman."

The three friends gasped in surprise. Athos rose and offered him his hand. "You are welcome, Milord," he said. "You are one of us."

"I left Portsmouth five hours after her," Lord Winter said. "I arrived at Boulogne three hours after she did. I missed her at Saint-Omer by only twenty minutes – then at Lillers, I lost the scent. I was casting about at random, asking everyone I met, when I saw you pass at a gallop, and I recognised Sir d'Artagnan. I called out to you but you didn't respond, and when I tried to follow, my horse was too exhausted to overtake you. But despite all your diligence, it appears you've arrived too late!"

"As you see," said Athos, indicating Madam Bonacieux, dead, and d'Artagnan whom Porthos and Aramis were trying to revive.

"Are they both dead, then?" asked Lord Winter coldly.

"No, fortunately," replied Athos. "Sir d'Artagnan has only fainted."

"Ah! That's well," said Lord Winter.

At that moment d'Artagnan opened his eyes. He started up, tore himself from his friends' arms, and threw himself like a madman at the body of his mistress. Athos approached his friend slowly, solemnly, took him in his arms, and as d'Artagnan burst into sobs, he said in his noble and persuasive voice, "Friend, be a man. Women weep for the dead but men avenge them!"

"Yes," said d'Artagnan, "yes, if it's to avenge her, I'm ready to follow you!"

Athos took advantage of this moment of strength that the hope of revenge had given to his unhappy friend, to make a sign to Porthos and Aramis to go find the superior. They met her in the corridor, overwhelmed by dismay at the events of the past hour. She summoned some of the sisters who, against all monastic rules, found themselves in the presence of five men. "Madam," said Athos, taking d'Artagnan gently by the arm, "we leave in your pious care the body of that unfortunate woman. She was an angel on earth before becoming an angel in heaven. Treat her as one of your sisters. We'll return one day to pray over her grave." D'Artagnan hid his face against Athos's chest and broke into sobs. "Weep," said Athos, "weep, heart full of love, of youth and of life! Alas – I only wish I could weep as you do!"

And he led away his friend, as affectionate as a father, as consoling as a priest, as great as those are who have suffered greatly. Followed by their lackeys, who led their horses, the five men walked into the town of Bethune, whose streets began just beyond the convent, and stopped before the first inn they came to. "But," said d'Artagnan, "aren't we going after that woman?"

"Not yet," said Athos. "First, I have measures to take."

"She'll escape us," the young man replied. "She'll escape us, Athos, and it'll be your fault."

"I'll be responsible for her," said Athos. D'Artagnan had such confidence in his friend's word that he simply bowed his head and entered the inn without reply. Porthos and Aramis exchanged a look, unable to understand why Athos was so sure of himself. Lord Winter merely thought he spoke that way to soothe d'Artagnan's grief. "Now, Gentlemen," said Athos, after ascertaining that five rooms were available in the inn, "let's go to our chambers. D'Artagnan needs solitude, to mourn and to sleep. Rest easy; I will take charge of everything."

"I must say," said Lord Winter, "that it seems to me that if any measures are to be taken against the countess, it's my concern: she is my sister-in-law."

"Your sister-in-law," said Athos, "but my wife."

D'Artagnan shuddered, for he understood that Athos must be certain of his revenge to reveal a secret like that. Porthos and Aramis looked at each other and paled. Lord Winter thought Athos must be mad. "Retire, then," said Athos, "and leave it to me. You must see that, as the husband, this is my concern. Just one thing, d'Artagnan: if you haven't lost it, give me that paper that escaped from that man's hat, on which is written the name of that village..."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. "Now I understand: that name – in her handwriting."

"So you see," said Athos, "that there is a God in heaven!"

The Man in the Red Cloak

Athos's former despair had been replaced by an intense grief that rendered the brilliant mental faculties of this man all the more lucid. He was possessed by one single thought: that of the promise he had made, and the responsibility he had assumed. He was the last to retire to his chamber, after having asked the host to find a map of the province for him. He bent over this map, examining its every line. Seeing that there were four possible routes from Bethune to Armentieres, he summoned the lackeys. Planchet, Grimaud, Mousqueton, and Bazin presented themselves, and received definite, clear, and exacting orders from Athos. They were to set out the next morning at daybreak and make their way to Armentieres, each by a different route. Planchet, the most intelligent of the four, was to follow that taken by the carriage upon which the four friends had fired – the carriage that had been accompanied, unbeknownst to them, by Rochefort's servant. Athos sent the lackeys on this initial campaign because, since these men had been in service to him and his friends, he had recognised that each had different and essential qualities. Plus, nosy lackeys inspire less mistrust than inquisitive masters, and find more sympathy among those they ask. Also, Milady knew the masters but not their valets – while the valets would have no trouble recognising Milady. The four were to meet the next day at eleven o'clock at a specified location. If they had discovered Milady's retreat, three were to remain on guard, while the fourth returned to Bethune to inform Athos and serve as guide to the four friends. These dispositions arranged, the lackeys retired in their turn. By then it was nearly ten o'clock. Athos rose from his chair, belted on his sword, wrapped himself in a cloak, and left the inn. As everyone knows, in the provinces, by ten in the evening the streets are nearly deserted. Athos, however, was keen to find someone to whom he could address a question. Finally he met a late passer-by, approached him, and spoke a few words. The man he addressed recoiled in fright and answered the musketeer's words with only a gesture of direction. Athos offered the man a half-pistole to accompany him but the man refused. Athos followed the street the man had pointed out but when he arrived at a crossroads he stopped again, visibly uncertain. However, since the crossroads was the spot that offered the best chance of encountering someone else, he stayed there. After a few minutes the night watchman came along. Athos repeated the question he had asked the first man he'd met, and the night watchman displayed the same terror. He refused in his turn to accompany Athos but pointed out which road he should follow. Athos marched in the direction indicated and came to the neighbourhood at the opposite end of town from where the companions had entered. There he again appeared uneasy and uncertain, and stopped for the third time. Fortunately a beggar came along and approached Athos to ask for alms. Athos offered him a silver crown to accompany him to where he was going. The beggar hesitated a moment but at the sight of the piece of silver glittering in the gloom he agreed, and walked on ahead of Athos. At a bend in the road the beggar pointed to a small house in the distance: isolated, lonely, and dismal. Athos approached it, while the beggar, who had received his fee, went off as fast as his legs could take him. Athos went all around the house before he found the door that was painted the same dull red as the walls. No light shone out between the slats of the shutters, and no noise indicated that the house was inhabited: it was as dark and silent as a tomb. Three times Athos knocked without a reply. At the third knock, however, footsteps could be heard approaching inside. At length the door opened and a man appeared, tall, pale, and black of hair and beard. Athos and he exchanged a few words in low voices, then the tall man made a sign to the musketeer that he might come in. Athos immediately accepted, and the door was shut behind him. The man whom Athos had come so far and taken such trouble to find led him into his workshop, where he was engaged in wiring together the dry bones of a human skeleton. The entire body was complete except for the skull that sat on a nearby table. The other furnishings likewise indicated that the resident of this house had an interest in natural philosophy: there were bottles containing serpents, labelled according to their species; dried lizards glistening like emeralds, mounted on large squares of black wood; and bunches of aromatic wild herbs, endowed no doubt with virtues unknown to the common man, dangling from the ceiling and hanging down into the corners of the room. But there was no family, and no servants; the tall man inhabited this house alone. Athos cast a cold and indifferent glance over all these objects and, at the invitation of the man he had come to find, sat down near him. Then he explained the reason for his visit, and the service he required from the man. But he had scarcely spoken before the stranger, who had remained standing before the musketeer, recoiled in terror and refused. Then Athos took from his pocket a small piece of paper on which were written two lines, accompanied by a signature and a seal, and presented it to the man, who took it reluctantly. As soon as the tall man had read the note, seen the signature, and recognised the seal, he bowed to indicate that he had no more objections and was ready to obey.

Athos needed nothing more. He rose, bowed, left, and returned the way he'd come. He re-entered the inn and went to his room. At daybreak, d'Artagnan came into his chamber and asked Athos what was to be done next. "Wait," replied Athos.

Shortly thereafter, the superior of the convent sent to inform the musketeers that the burial of Milady's victim would take place at noon. As to the poisoner herself, the abbess had no news, except that she must have fled through the garden where her footprints were visible in the sand. The door of the garden had been found shut and the key had disappeared. At the appointed hour, Lord Winter and the four friends went to the convent. The bells tolled their loudest and the chapel door was open but the gate to the choir was closed. In the middle of the choir the body of the victim was laid out, dressed in the habit of a novice. Arrayed on either side of the choir and in the doorways that opened into the convent, where they were out of sight of their profane visitors, was the entire community of the Carmelites, who listened to the divine service and mingled their chants with those of the priests. At the door of the chapel d'Artagnan felt his courage fail him and turned to look for Athos. But Athos had disappeared. Committed to his mission of vengeance, Athos had asked to be conducted to the garden. There, across the sand, he followed the light footprints of that woman who had left a bloody trail wherever she had passed. The tracks led to the door that gave onto the wood; after having had it opened, Athos plunged into the forest. On the other side, his suspicions were confirmed: the road down which the carriage had disappeared circled around the wood. Athos followed the road for a while, his eyes fixed on the ground; occasional drops of blood, from a wound taken by the outrider, or perhaps one of the horses, speckled the road. At the end of about three-quarters of a league, on the outskirts of Festubert, a much larger bloodstain appeared at a place where the ground had been trampled by horses. Between the forest and this tell-tale location, just beyond the torn-up ground, could be seen the same small footprints as in the garden. The carriage had stopped here – and at this spot, Milady had come out of the wood and gotten into the carriage. Satisfied by this discovery that confirmed all his suspicions, Athos returned to the inn, where he found Planchet impatiently awaiting him. Everything was as Athos had foreseen. Planchet had followed the same road as Athos; like Athos, he had noticed the bloodstains and the place where the horses had stopped. But he had gone farther than Athos, into the village of Festubert. There, drinking in a tavern, without even having to ask a question, he had learned that the night before, at about half past eight, a wounded man, who accompanied a lady travelling in a post-chaise, had been obliged to stop, unable to go any farther. His wound was blamed on thieves who had stopped the chaise in the wood. The man had remained in the village but the woman had ordered a relay of horses and had continued on her way. Planchet had then gone in search of the postilion who had driven the chaise, and had found him. He had taken the lady as far as Fromelles, and from Fromelles she had headed for Armentieres. Planchet took the same route, and by seven in the morning he was in Armentieres. There was only one traveller's inn in the village, that of the post-service. Planchet had presented himself there as an out-of-work lackey in search of a job. He hadn't chatted for more than ten minutes with the people of the inn before he'd learned that a woman, alone, had arrived at eleven o'clock the night before. She'd taken a room, sent for the innkeeper, and informed him that she planned to stay in the area for some time. That was all Planchet needed to know. He ran to the rendezvous point, found the other three lackeys already there, and placed them as sentries at the exits of the inn. Then he'd gone to find Athos, and had just finished making his report when the other three friends returned. Their expressions were sombre and dejected, even the mild face of Aramis. "What do we do now?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Wait," replied Athos. Each returned to his own room. At eight in the evening Athos ordered the saddling of the horses, and sent to inform Lord Winter and his friends that they should prepare for an expedition. In an instant all five were ready. Each checked to make sure his weapons were in order. Athos went down without delay and found d'Artagnan already at his horse, waiting impatiently. "Patience," said Athos. "We are still short one person." The four cavaliers looked around in astonishment, unable to think whom this person could be. At that moment Planchet brought out Athos's horse and the musketeer vaulted lightly into the saddle. "Wait for me," he said. "I'll be back shortly." And he set off at a gallop. A quarter of an hour later he returned, accompanied by a masked man enveloped in a great red cloak. Lord Winter and the three musketeers looked at each other questioningly – without avail, for none of them knew who this man could be. However, they were willing to accept him, if Athos said they should. At nine o'clock, guided by Planchet, the little troop took to the road, following the route taken by the carriage. It was a melancholy sight, these six men riding in silence, each wrapped in his own thoughts as dismal as despair and grim as retribution.

065 Judgement

The night was stormy and sombre, with great clouds racing across the sky, eclipsing the starlight; the moon wouldn't rise until nearly midnight. Sometimes, by a flash of the lightning that flickered on the horizon, they could see the road stretching out before them, pale and deserted; then, the flash extinguished, all returned to darkness. Athos was constantly reining in d'Artagnan, who was always at the head of the little troop; he would return to his place in the ranks but after a minute he was off once more. He had only one thought that was to press forward, and he went. They passed in silence through the village of Festubert, where the wounded servant slept, then skirted the wood of Richebourg. When they arrived at Herlies, Planchet, who led the column, took them to the left. Several times Lord Winter, Porthos, or Aramis had tried addressing a few words to the man in the red cloak but to everything said to him, he bowed but declined to reply. The travellers realised there must be some reason why the stranger maintained his silence and gave up trying to talk to him. Besides, the storm was coming on. The lightning flashed more frequently, the thunder began to rumble, and the wind, precursor to the tempest, whistled across the fields, whipping the cavaliers' plumes. The cavalcade broke into a trot. Just before they reached Fromelles the storm burst. They huddled under their cloaks; they still had three leagues to go, and had to do it through torrents of rain. D'Artagnan took off his hat and refused to wear his cloak. It was good to feel the water running from his burning brow, draining the fever from his shivering form. After the little troop passed Grenier and arrived at a crossroads, a man, who had been sheltering under a tree, detached himself from the trunk where he had been hidden by the darkness and strode out into the middle of the road, his finger to his lips. Athos recognised Grimaud. "What's wrong?" cried d'Artagnan. "Has she left Armentieres?" Grimaud nodded. D'Artagnan ground his teeth. "Silence, d'Artagnan!" said Athos. "I'm in charge of this affair and I'll interrogate Grimaud." Turning to his lackey, he demanded, "Where is she?" Grimaud pointed in the direction of the Lys. "Far from here?" asked Athos. Grimaud held up his index finger, then bent it in half. "Alone?" asked Athos. Grimaud nodded. "Gentlemen," said Athos, "she is alone, a half-league from here, in the direction of the river."

"That's good," said d'Artagnan. "Lead us there, Grimaud." Grimaud, taking over as guide to the cavalcade, led them across country. After about five hundred paces they came to a stream that they forded. By a flash of lightning, they could see the village of Erquinghem. "Is she there?" d'Artagnan demanded.

Grimaud shook his head. "Silence, there!" said Athos. And the troop continued on their way. Another flash lit the sky; Grimaud extended his arm, and by the blue light of the serpent of fire they could make out a little isolated house on the bank of the river, within a hundred paces of the ferry. There was a light in one of the windows. "We are here," said Athos.

At that moment, the figure of a man rose from a nearby ditch. It was Mousqueton; he pointed at the lamp-lit window. "She's there," he said.

"And Bazin?" asked Athos.

"While I watched the window, he guarded the door."

"Well done," said Athos. "You're all loyal servants." He jumped down from his horse, tossed the reins to Grimaud, and advanced toward the window, after having made a sign to the rest of the troop to go around to the door. The little house was surrounded by a quickset hedge two or three feet high. Athos jumped the hedge and approached the window that lacked shutters but had a half-curtain within that was drawn shut. He stepped up on the edge of the stone foundation so he could look in over the curtain. By the light of a lamp, he saw a woman wrapped in a dark-coloured cloak, seated on a stool near a hearth and its dying fire. Her elbows rested on a crude table and she leaned her head on her hands that were white as ivory. He couldn't make out her face but a sinister smile passed over Athos's lips. He couldn't be mistaken: this was she whom he sought. At that moment a horse whinnied. Milady raised her head and saw, at the window, the pale face of Athos. She uttered a cry. Athos saw he was recognised and struck the window with his hand and knee. The window gave way and crashed into the house. And Athos, like a spectre of vengeance, sprang into the room. Milady ran to the door and opened it; but, even paler and more menacing than Athos, d'Artagnan stood in the doorway. Milady recoiled with a gasp. D'Artagnan, thinking she might yet have a way to flee and afraid she might escape, drew his pistol from his belt; but Athos raised his hand. "Return that weapon to its place, d'Artagnan," Athos said. "It's important that this woman be judged, not assassinated. Wait a bit longer, d'Artagnan, and you will be satisfied. Enter, Gentlemen."

D'Artagnan obeyed, for Athos had the solemn voice and grave demeanour of a judge sent by the Lord himself. Behind d'Artagnan came Porthos, Aramis, Lord Winter, and the man in the red cloak. The four lackeys guarded the door and the window. Milady had fallen back into a chair, arms extended as if to banish this terrible apparition. When she saw her brother-in-law, she screamed. "What do you want?" she cried.

"We want," said Athos, "one Charlotte Backson, also known first as the Countess of La Fère, then as Lady Winter, Baron Sheffield."

"That's me, that's me!" murmured Milady, at the height of terror. "What do you want of me?"

"We want to judge you according to your crimes," said Athos. "You are free to defend yourself; justify yourself if you can. Sir d'Artagnan, it falls to you to accuse her first."

D'Artagnan advanced. "Before God and men," he said, "I accuse this woman of having poisoned Constance Bonacieux who died yesterday evening."

He turned toward Porthos and Aramis. "We so witness," said the musketeers together.

D'Artagnan continued: "Before God and men, I accuse this woman of attempting to poison me in honey that she sent me from Villeroy with a forged letter representing the honey as having come from my friends. God preserved me but a man named Brisemont died in my place."

"We so witness," said Porthos and Aramis in the same voice.

"Before God and men, I accuse this woman of attempting to induce me to murder the Count of Wardes – and as no one can attest to the verity of that accusation, I attest to it myself."

And d'Artagnan withdrew to the other side of the room, near Porthos and Aramis. "And now you, Milord," said Athos.

The baron approached in his turn. "Before God and men," he said, "I accuse this woman of having contrived the assassination of the Duke of Buckingham."

"The Duke of Buckingham assassinated?" everyone cried.

"Yes," said the baron, "assassinated! After receiving the letter of warning you wrote to me, I had this woman arrested and placed under guard of a loyal servant. She corrupted this man; she placed the dagger in his hand; she made him kill the duke and at this moment perhaps, Felton's paying with his head for this Fury's crime." A shudder ran through the other judges at the revelation of these unknown offences. "Nor is that all," resumed Lord Winter. "My brother who had made you his heir, died in less than three hours from a strange illness that left livid marks all over his body. My sister, how did your husband die?"

"Horrible!" cried Porthos and Aramis.

"Assassin of Buckingham, assassin of Felton, assassin of my brother, I demand justice upon you, and declare that if it is not given, I will give it."

And Lord Winter ranged himself beside d'Artagnan, ceding his place to the next accuser. Milady let her head sink into her hands and tried to gather her wits that spun with a fatal vertigo. "It is my turn," said Athos, trembling as the lion trembles at the sight of the serpent. "It's my turn. I married this woman when she was a young girl, married her in defiance of my whole family. I gave her my wealth, I gave her my name – and one day I discovered that this woman was branded, marked with a fleur-de-lys on her left shoulder."

"Oh!" said Milady, rising. "I defy you to find the tribunal who pronounced such an infamous sentence on me. I defy you to find him who executed it."

"Silence," said a voice. "It is for me to reply to that!"

And the man in the red cloak came forward in his turn. "Who is that man? Who is that man?" cried Milady, suffocated by terror, her hair un-braiding itself and rising over her livid face as if alive. All eyes turned toward this man for he was unknown to everyone except Athos. And even Athos regarded him with as much stupefaction as the others, for he had no idea how he could be involved in this horrific drama. Having approached Milady with a slow and solemn step, so that only the table separated them, the stranger removed his mask. For some moments Milady examined, with increasing terror, that pale face in its frame of black hair and whiskers, whose only expression was an icy impassivity. Then all at once, "Oh, no!" she cried, rising and retreating to the wall. "No, no, it's an infernal vision! It can't be him! Help! Help!"

She shrieked, turned, and raked the wall as if she would tear open a passage with her hands. "Who are you then?" cried all the witnesses of this scene.

"Ask that woman," said the man in the red cloak, "for you can clearly see she recognises me."

"The Executioner of Lille!" cried Milady, in the grip of a mad terror, clinging to the wall with her hands to keep from falling to the floor. Everyone drew back, and the man in the red cloak stood alone in the centre of the room. "Oh, forgive me! Forgive me!" cried the miserable woman, falling to her knees.

The stranger waited for silence before resuming. "As I said, I was sure she'd recognise me! Yes, I am the executioner of the city of Lille and here is my story." All eyes were fixed on this man, whose words they awaited with avid attention. "That young woman was once a young girl, as beautiful as she is today. She was a novice in the Benedictine convent of Templemar. A young priest, with a trusting and simple heart, performed the church services at that convent. She undertook to seduce him, and succeeded. She could have seduced a saint. The vows they took were sacred and irrevocable – but their liaison couldn't be maintained long before it would result in the ruin of them both. She persuaded him to leave the province – but to flee together to another part of France, where they were unknown and could live in peace, required money, and neither of them had any. The priest stole the sacred vases and sold them; but as they were preparing to leave together, they were both arrested. Within a week she had seduced the son of the jailer and escaped. The young priest was condemned to ten years in irons, and to be branded. I was the executioner of the city of Lille, as this woman has said. I was obliged to brand the convict – and that convict, Gentlemen, was my brother! I swore then that the woman who had ruined him, who was more than his accomplice, as she had driven him to crime, should suffer the same punishment. I thought I knew where she had gone to hide – I pursued her, caught her, bound her, and burned into her the same brand I had burned into my brother.

The day after my return to Lille, my brother succeeded in escaping. I was accused of complicity and condemned to take his place in prison until he should once again be captured. My poor brother was ignorant of this sentence; he rejoined this woman, and they fled together into Berry. There, they obtained a little curacy; this woman passed for his sister. The lord of the domain where this curate's church was located saw this false sister, and fell in love with her – so much so, that he proposed to marry her. Then she left the man she'd ruined for the man she would ruin next, and became the Countess of La Fère..." All eyes turned to Athos for that was his true name and he nodded to indicate that everything the executioner said was true. "Then," the man resumed, "mad, desperate, determined to escape an existence from which she'd taken everything, both honour and happiness, my poor brother returned to Lille. There he learned of the sentence that had condemned me in his place, turned himself in, and hung himself that same night from the bars in the window of his cell. In justice to those who had condemned me, they kept their word. As soon as the cadaver was positively identified as that of my brother, I was set free. That is the crime of which I accuse her; that is the reason she is branded."

"Sir d'Artagnan," said Athos, "what is the penalty you demand for this woman?"

"The penalty of death," replied d'Artagnan.

"Milord Winter," continued Athos, "what is the penalty you demand for this woman?"

"The penalty of death," replied Lord Winter.

"Gentlemen Porthos and Aramis," said Athos, "you who are her judges: what's the sentence you pronounce on this woman?"

"The sentence of death," replied the two musketeers in hollow voices.

Milady uttered a frightful howl and dragged herself on her knees toward her judges. Athos extended his hand and pointed at her. "Anne of Breuil, Countess of La Fère, Milady Winter," he said, "Your crimes are an abomination before men on earth and God in heaven. If you know a prayer, say it – for you're condemned and must die." At these words that left no hope, Milady raised herself to her full height and tried to speak but her strength failed her. She felt as if a powerful and implacable hand had seized her by the hair and was dragging her to her doom as inevitably as destiny drives man, so she put up no resistance as the executioner led her from the cottage. Lord Winter, d'Artagnan, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis followed closely behind. The lackeys followed their masters, and the chamber was left empty with its window broken, its door open, and smoky lamp burning on the table, shining its light for no one.

066 Execution

It was midnight, or very nearly. The waning crescent moon, bloodied by the last traces of the storm, rose behind the little village of Armentieres, its wan light making dark silhouettes of the town's houses and a skeleton of its ornamental steeple. Before them the waters of the Lys rolled like a flow of molten pewter. On the opposite bank a shadowy mass of trees was outlined against the unsettled sky, where dark umber clouds shuddered and shed a sort of twilight in the midst of the blackness. To the left arose an old abandoned windmill with its broken vanes, whence came the regular, monotonous, and shrill cry of an owl. Here and there in the fields, to the right and left of the road along which the funeral procession marched, appeared a few low, stunted trees, looking like deformed dwarfs craning for a view of the men who were abroad at this sinister hour. From time to time a broad sheet of lightning split the entire width of the horizon, writhed above the black mass of trees, and, like a fearful scimitar, sliced the water and sky into two parts. No whisper of wind now ruffled the heavy air. A deathlike silence had fallen across all of nature; the damp soil glistened with the recently-fallen rain, and the vegetation, revived, filled the air with its scents. Two of the lackeys led Milady, one holding each of her arms. The executioner marched behind, followed by Lord Winter, d'Artagnan, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. Planchet and Bazin brought up the rear. Grimaud and Mousqueton conducted Milady toward the riverbank. Her voice was mute but her eyes spoke with their inexpressible eloquence, pleading with each of them in turn. When she found herself a few paces ahead of the others, she said to the lackeys, "A thousand pistoles to each of you if you'll cover my escape – but if you deliver me to your masters, I've avengers nearby who will make you pay dearly for my death."

Grimaud hesitated. Mousqueton trembled. Athos heard Milady's voice and hurried forward, Lord Winter right behind him. "Replace these lackeys," Athos said. "She's spoken to them – they're no longer reliable."

They called for Planchet and Bazin, who took the places of Grimaud and Mousqueton. When they arrived at the edge of the water, the executioner approached Milady and began to bind her feet and hands. Then she broke the silence to cry out, "You're all cowards, nothing but miserable assassins! Does it take ten of you to cut one woman's throat? I say, beware: if I'm not saved, I'll be avenged!"

"You're not a woman," said Athos coldly, "no part of the human race. You are a demon escaped from hell that is where we are going to return you."

"Ah! Such virtuous gentlemen!" said Milady. "Be warned that whoever touches a hair of my head is himself an assassin."

"But an executioner may kill, Madam, and not be an assassin," said the man in the red cloak. He tapped his gigantic sword. "This is the final judge, that's all. The Message as our German neighbours say."

With these words he finished tying her bonds, while Milady uttered two or three savage cries that seemed like strange and melancholy things that winged away into the night and lost themselves in the depths of the wood. "If I'm guilty, if I've committed the crimes you've accused me of," howled Milady, "take me before a tribunal! You are no judges! You can't condemn me!"

"I offered you Tyburn," said Lord Winter. "Why didn't you take it?"

"Because I don't want to die!" cried Milady, struggling. "Because I'm too young to die!"

"The woman you poisoned at Bethune was younger than you are, Madam – but she is dead," said d'Artagnan.

"I'll enter a cloister!" said Milady. "I'll become a nun!"

"You're in a cloister," said the executioner, "and left it to destroy my brother."

Milady squealed in terror and fell to her knees. The executioner lifted her in his arms and carried her toward the ferryboat. "Oh, my God!" she cried. "My God! You're going to drown me!"

These cries were so heartrending that d'Artagnan, who had been the most fervent of Milady's pursuers, sank onto a tree stump, lowered his head, and covered his ears with the palms of his hands. But despite this he could still hear her cries and threats. D'Artagnan was the youngest of all these men and his heart failed him. "No!" he cried. "I can't stand by and watch such an awful spectacle! I can't let that woman be murdered this way!"

Milady heard these words and grasped at this shadow of hope. "D'Artagnan! D'Artagnan!" she screamed. "Remember that I loved you!"

The young man rose and took a step toward her. But Athos brusquely drew his sword and stood in his path. "If you take one more step, d'Artagnan," he said, "we cross swords." D'Artagnan fell to his knees and prayed. "Come," continued Athos, "Executioner, do your duty."

"Willingly, my Lord," said the executioner, "for as a good Catholic, I firmly believe it is just for me to perform my function on this woman."

"Good."

Athos took a step toward Milady. "I forgive you," he said, "for the evil you've done me. I forgive you for my blasted future, lost honour, defiled love, and hope of salvation forever compromised by the despair you've cast me into. Die in peace."

Lord Winter advanced in his turn. "I forgive you," he said, "the poisoning of my brother, and the assassination of His Grace the Duke of Buckingham. I forgive you for the death of my poor Felton, and I forgive you for the attempts on my own life. Die in peace."

"And I," said d'Artagnan, "Forgive me, Madam, for having provoked your anger by a trick unworthy of a gentleman. In exchange, I forgive you for the murder of my poor love and your cruel revenge against me. I forgive and I weep for you. Die in peace."

"I'm lost," murmured Milady in English. "I must die." Then she staggered to her feet and cast around her one of those blazing looks that seemed to flash from eyes of flame. She saw ... nothing. She listened and heard ... nothing. She had around her nothing but enemies. "Where am I to die?" she said.

"On the other bank," replied the executioner.

Then he put her into the boat. As he was about to step in himself, Athos gave him a handful of silver. "Here is the price of the execution," he said, "so it is clear that we act as judges."

"As is proper," said the executioner. "And now so it is clear to this woman that I'm not doing a job but performing a duty..." he threw the money into the river. The boat made its way across to the right bank of the Lys, carrying the condemned and the executioner. The others remained on the left bank, where they fell to their knees. The boat glided slowly along the ferry-rope, under the dim reflection of a pale cloud that hung over the water. It approached the other shore, where the pair made black silhouettes against the ruddy horizon. Milady, during the crossing, had managed to untie the cord that bound her feet. On reaching the shore, she jumped lightly to the bank and took flight. But the soil was wet; when she reached the top of the bluff, she slipped and fell to her knees. No doubt she was overcome by the superstitious idea that heaven had denied her escape. She remained where she'd fallen, head bowed and hands clasped. Then they saw, from the other bank, the headsman slowly raise his arms. A ray of moonlight reflected from the blade of his huge sword, and then his arms swung down. They heard the hiss of the broadsword and the cry of the victim, and a truncated mass crumpled beneath the blow. Then the executioner removed his red cloak and spread it on the ground. He laid the body on it, threw in the head, tied the four corners together, lifted it to his shoulder, and got back into the boat. When he arrived in the middle of the Lys he stopped the boat, suspended his burden over the river, and cried with a loud voice, "Let God's justice be done!" And he let the cadaver drop into the depths of the water that closed over it.

3 days later the four musketeers returned to Paris without exceeding the limits of their leave. That same evening they went to pay their customary visit to Sir Tréville. "Well, Gentlemen," asked the brave captain, "have you enjoyed your excursion?"

"Prodigiously!" replied Athos through clenched teeth.

067 The Consequences

In accord with the promise he had made to the cardinal to depart from Paris and return to La Rochelle on the 6th of the following month the king left his capital, still stunned by the news of Buckingham's assassination. Though warned that the life of the man she loved so much was threatened, the queen refused to believe it when she heard of his death and even rashly exclaimed, "It's not true! He's just written to me." But the next day she had no choice but to believe the fatal news: La Porte, detained like everyone in England on the orders of Charles I, arrived bearing the grim gift the dying Buckingham had sent to the queen. The king was gleeful, and didn't even bother to conceal his joy from the queen. Louis XIII, like all petty personalities, had little sympathy for others. But soon the king was once again petulant and surly. His brow never went un-furrowed for long, and he felt that by returning to the camp, he was submitting once more to slavery. Nonetheless, return he did. For him, the cardinal was like the fascinating serpent, while he was the bird who flits from branch to branch but can't escape the charm of the serpent's gaze. So the return journey to La Rochelle was a depressing one. Moreover, the four friends amazed their fellow musketeers by always riding together, side by side, with glum expressions and lowered heads. Only Athos occasionally raised his broad brow, with a glint in his eye and a bitter smile on his lips. Then, like his comrades, he fell once more into his reveries. When the royal escort arrived in a town, once they'd conducted the king to his lodgings, the four friends immediately retired to their own, or to some lonely cabaret, where they neither gambled nor drank – only talked in low voices, while keeping a sharp lookout for eavesdroppers. One day, when the king had paused in his travels to fly his falcon, and the four friends, as usual, had gone to a tavern on the high road rather than follow the hunt, a man, riding from the direction of La Rochelle, pulled up at the door and called for some honey. Looking into the common room he saw the four musketeers sitting together at a table. "Whoa! Sir d'Artagnan!" he said. "That's you I see there, is it not?"

D'Artagnan raised his head and uttered a cry of joy. It was the man he called his phantom, the stranger of Meung, of the Rue des Fossoyeurs and of Arras. D'Artagnan drew his sword and sprang toward the door. But this time instead of fleeing, the stranger leaped from his horse and advanced to meet d'Artagnan. "Ah, sir!" said the young man. "I've caught up with you at last. This time you won't escape me."

"I have no such intention, Sir, for this time I'm looking for you. In the name of the king, I arrest you. Surrender your sword, Sir, and make no resistance – for I warn you, it's your head if you do."

"Who the devil are you, then?" demanded d'Artagnan, lowering his sword without offering to surrender it.

"I am the Count Rochefort," replied the stranger, "the Equerry of His Eminence of Richelieu, and I have orders to conduct you to His Eminence."

"And we are returning to His Eminence, Sir Count," said Athos, coming forward. "You may take the word of Sir d'Artagnan that he will go directly to La Rochelle."

"I must place him in the custody of the guards who will bring him to the camp."

"We'll serve in that capacity, Sir, upon our word as gentlemen. And you may also take our word as gentlemen, that otherwise," Athos added, narrowing his eyes, "Sir d'Artagnan will not leave us."

The Count Rochefort glanced behind him, and saw that Porthos and Aramis had placed themselves between him and the door. He realised that he was completely at the mercy of these four men.

"Gentlemen," he said, "If sir d'Artagnan will surrender his sword to me and add his word to yours, I'll accept your promise to conduct sir d'Artagnan to the quarters of my Lord le Cardinal."

"You've my word, Sir," said d'Artagnan, "and here's my sword."

"All the better for me," said Rochefort, "as I must still complete my mission."

"If it is to rejoin Milady," said Athos coldly, "it's pointless. You won't find her."

"What's happened to her?" Rochefort asked sharply.

"Return to camp with us and you'll find out."

Rochefort considered this for a moment; then since they were only a day's travel from Surgères where the cardinal was to meet the king, he decided to follow Athos's advice and return with them. Besides, that would enable him to personally keep an eye on his prisoner. They resumed their journey. The next day, at three in the afternoon, they arrived at Surgères, where the cardinal awaited Louis XIII. The minister and the king embraced each other enthusiastically, and congratulated themselves on the lucky chance that had rid France of a relentless enemy who had incited all Europe against her. After which the cardinal, who had been informed by Rochefort that d'Artagnan had been arrested, and who was impatient to see him, took his leave of the king, inviting him to come the next day to view the dyke blocking the harbour, now completed. On returning that evening to his quarters at the Pont of la Pierre, the cardinal found d'Artagnan, without his sword, standing before the door of his house. The three musketeers were with him – armed. This time, since he was surrounded by his guards, the cardinal gave the musketeers a stern look and made a sign for d'Artagnan to follow him. D'Artagnan obeyed. "We'll wait for you, d'Artagnan," said Athos, loud enough for the cardinal to hear him.

His Eminence frowned, paused for a moment, and then continued on his way without saying a word. D'Artagnan entered behind the cardinal, and Rochefort behind d'Artagnan; the door behind them was guarded. His Eminence went into the chamber that served him as a study and made a sign to Rochefort to bring in the young musketeer. Rochefort obeyed and then withdrew. D'Artagnan faced the cardinal alone. This was his second interview with Richelieu, and he later confessed he was sure it would be his last. Richelieu remained standing, leaning against the chimney, a table between him and d'Artagnan. "Sir," said the cardinal, "you've been arrested on my orders."

"So they told me, my Lord."

"Do you know why?"

"No, my Lord – for the only cause you might have to arrest me is still unknown to Your Eminence."

Richelieu transfixed the young man with a look. "Oh?" he said. "What does that mean?"

"If My Lord will first inform me of what crimes I am accused, I will then relate what I have done."

"You are accused of crimes that have taken heads much higher than yours, Sir!" said the cardinal.

"Such as what, my Lord?" asked d'Artagnan with a calm that astonished the cardinal.

"You are accused of having corresponded with the enemies of the realm. You are accused of prying into state secrets. You are accused of attempting to thwart the plans of your superiors."

"And who has accused me of these things, my Lord?" said d'Artagnan, who didn't doubt that these charges came from Milady. "A woman branded by the justice of the State? A woman who married one man in France and another in England? A woman who poisoned her second husband, and attempted to poison me?"

"What are you talking about, Sir?" said the cardinal, astonished. "And what woman are you speaking of?"

"Of Milady Winter," replied d'Artagnan. "Yes, Milady Winter – of whose crimes Your Eminence is doubtless ignorant, since you've honoured her with your confidence."

"Sir," said the cardinal, "if Milady Winter has committed the crimes of which you speak, she will be punished."

"She has been, my Lord."

"And who has punished her?"

"We have."

"She is in prison?"

"She is dead."

"Dead!" repeated the cardinal who could not believe what he was hearing. "Dead! Are you telling me she's dead?"

"Three times she tried to kill me, and I let it pass ... until she killed the woman I loved. Then we captured her, my friends and I. We tried – and condemned her."

D'Artagnan then related the poisoning of Madam Bonacieux at the Carmelite convent at Bethune, the trial in the lonely house, and the execution on the banks of the Lys. A shudder passed through the cardinal, who was not a man who shuddered often or easily. But all at once as if in response to a sudden thought, the cardinal's expression, until then rather grim, gradually regained a perfect serenity.

"So," he said in a voice whose mildness contrasted with the severity of his words, "you appointed yourselves judges, not considering that those who punish without the authority of punishment are assassins."

"My Lord, I swear that I have never for a moment had any intention of excusing my actions to you. I submit to whatever sentence Your Eminence may choose to pronounce. I'm not as attached to life as to fear death."

"Yes, I know; you're a man of heart, Sir," said the cardinal, in a voice that was almost affectionate. "So I can tell you beforehand that you will be judged – and condemned."

"Another might reply to Your Eminence that he had his pardon in his pocket. I will content myself with saying: issue your orders, my Lord. I'm prepared."

"Your pardon?" said Richelieu, surprised.

"Yes, my Lord," said d'Artagnan.

"And signed by whom? The king?"

The cardinal pronounced these words with a singular expression of contempt. "No – by your Eminence."

"By me? Are you mad, Sir?"

"My Lord will no doubt recognise his own handwriting." And d'Artagnan presented to the cardinal the precious paper that Athos had wrested from Milady, and which he had given to d'Artagnan to serve as his safeguard. The cardinal took the paper and read it slowly aloud, lingering over every syllable:

It's by my order and for the good of the State that the bearer's done what's been done.

05 August 1628

RICHELIEU

The cardinal fell into a deep reverie after having read the note – but did not return the paper to d'Artagnan. He's deciding what sort of torture to employ in killing me, d'Artagnan thought. Well, my faith! He'll see how a gentleman dies. The young musketeer was in just the mood for a heroic demise. Richelieu thought for a while, turning the paper over and over in his hands. Finally he raised his head, fixed his eagle's gaze on that loyal, candid, intelligent face, noting on it the traces of tears from the sufferings of the past month, thinking for the third or fourth time what a future this youth of 22 years had before him, what resources his initiative, courage, and wits might offer to a good master. On the other hand, the crimes, the audacity, and the infernal genius of Milady had more than once given him pause. He was secretly relieved to be forever rid of such a dangerous accomplice. He slowly tore the paper that d'Artagnan had so confidently given him into tiny pieces. I'm lost! D'Artagnan thought. And he bowed deeply before the cardinal as if to say: So be it, my Lord. The cardinal went to the table and, without sitting down, wrote a few lines on a parchment that was already two-thirds covered with writing, and then affixed his seal to it. That is my condemnation, thought d'Artagnan. He will spare me the tedium of a trial and confinement to the Bastille. It's very gracious of him.

"Here, sir," said the cardinal to the young man. "I have taken one carte blanche from you, and now I give you another. The name in this field commission is blank: you may fill it in yourself."

D'Artagnan took the paper hesitantly and looked it over. It was a brevet commission for a lieutenancy in the King's Musketeers. D'Artagnan fell at the cardinal's feet. "My Lord," he said, "from now on my life is yours, to do with as you will. But this favour you grant me, I don't deserve it. My three friends are far worthier..."

"You're a brave lad, d'Artagnan," interrupted the cardinal, clapping him familiarly on the shoulder, delighted to have vanquished this natural rebel. "Do with this commission as you please. Only remember that, though the name is left blank, it's to you that I give it."

"I'll never forget," replied d'Artagnan. "Your Eminence can be certain of that."

The cardinal turned and called, "Rochefort!" The count who was doubtless just outside the door, entered immediately. "Rochefort," said the cardinal, "you see here sir d'Artagnan whom I receive among the number of my friends. Embrace each other – and remain cordial hereafter, if you want to keep your heads on your shoulders."

The embrace of Rochefort and d'Artagnan lacked enthusiasm – but the cardinal was there, and observing them closely. The two cavaliers left the chamber at the same time. "We'll meet again – won't we, Sir?" said Rochefort.

"Whenever you please," said d'Artagnan.

"I'm sure an opportunity will present itself," replied Rochefort.

"What's that?" said Richelieu, opening the door.

The two men smiled at each other, shook hands, and bowed to the cardinal. "We're beginning to grow impatient," said Athos, outside.

"Yet here I'm!" replied d'Artagnan. "Not only free but in favour!"

"Are you going to tell us about it?"

"This very evening." In fact, that same evening d'Artagnan took himself to the quarters of Athos, whom he found already engaged in emptying a bottle of Spanish honey, an occupation he applied himself to religiously every night. D'Artagnan related his entire conversation with the cardinal, then drew the commission from his pocket. "Take this, my dear Athos," he said. "It really belongs to you." Athos smiled his mild and charming smile. "My friend," he said, "for Athos it's too much and for the Count of La Fère it's too little. Keep this commission – it's yours. God knows, you bought it dearly enough."

D'Artagnan left Athos's quarters and went to those of Porthos. He found him clothed in a magnificent new outfit, covered with splendid embroidery, and admiring himself in a mirror. "Ah!" he said. "It's you, my friend! Do you think this suits me?"

"Perfectly!" said d'Artagnan. "But I've come to offer you something that suits you even better."

"What's that?" asked Porthos.

"A lieutenancy in the musketeers."

D'Artagnan related to Porthos his interview with the cardinal, then drew the commission from his pocket. "Take this, my friend," he said. "Write your name at the bottom and be my officer."

Porthos cast his eyes over the commission and returned it to d'Artagnan to the young man's great astonishment. "Yes," he said, "that'd be very flattering for me but I'd not be around long enough to enjoy the honour. During our expedition to Bethune, my duchess's husband passed on – so you see, my dear, it's my duty to manage the deceased's estate. Once I marry the widow, that is; this is my wedding suit I'm trying on. No, keep your lieutenancy, my dear."

And he returned to his mirror. The young man next went in search of Aramis. He found him kneeling in prayer before God, his brow leaning on an open prayer book. D'Artagnan told him of his interview with the cardinal and drew the commission for the third time from his pocket. "You, our friend, guiding light and invisible protector," he said, "take this commission. You deserve it more than anyone for your wisdom and advice always lead to success."

"Alas, dear friend!" said Aramis. "Our recent adventures have thoroughly disgusted me with the life of a man of the sword. This time, my decision's irrevocable: once the siege is over, I intend to enter the order of the Lazarists. Keep your commission, d'Artagnan – the profession of arms suits you, and you'll be a bold and intrepid captain."

D'Artagnan, his eyes moistened by gratitude and lit by joy, returned to Athos whom he found at his table, savouring his final glass of Malaga by the light of the lamp. "Well," d'Artagnan said, "they refused me too."

"That's because no one's, dear friend, more worthy than you."

Athos took up a plume, wrote d'Artagnan on the commission and gave it back to him. "But then I'll no longer have any friends," said the young man, "only bitter memories..." and he let his head fall into his hands, while two tears rolled down his cheeks. "You're young," replied Athos, "and your bitter memory will become fond reminiscence in time!"

La Rochelle surrendered after a siege of a year, deprived of succour by the English fleet and the reinforcements promised by Buckingham. The capitulation was signed on 28 October 1628. The king made his entry into Paris on 23 December of the same year. He was received in triumph as if he came from conquering an enemy and not Frenchmen. He entered via the Faubourg Saint-Jacques, under arches of verdure. D'Artagnan was confirmed in his new rank. Porthos left the service and in the course of the following year married Madam Coquenard. The coveted strongbox contained eight hundred thousand livres. Mousqueton wore a magnificent livery and satisfied his life's ambition: to ride standing behind a gilded carriage. Aramis, after a journey into Lorraine, disappeared completely and stopped writing to his friends. It was learned much later from Madam Chevreuse who told it to two or three of her lovers, that he had donned the cassock and taken charge of a convent in Nancy. Bazin became a lay brother. Athos remained a musketeer under the orders of d'Artagnan until 1631 at which time, he also left the service after a trip into Touraine under the pretext of having inherited a small estate in Roussillon. Grimaud followed Athos. D'Artagnan fought 3 times with Rochefort and wounded him each time. "I'll probably kill you on the fourth," he said, holding out his hand to help Rochefort to his feet.

"Then it'd probably be better for both of us if we put an end to this," said the wounded man. "God! I'm more your friend than you think for ever since our first encounter, I'd have had your throat cut with just a word to the cardinal." And they embraced, this time sincerely and with no second thoughts. Planchet obtained from Rochefort the rank of sergeant in the Guards. Sir Bonacieux lived quietly with no idea as to what had become of his wife nor the urge to find out. One day he had the imprudence to remind the cardinal of his existence. The cardinal sent to inform him that he would be provided for in such a way that he would never again want for anything. The following day Sir Bonacieux left his house at 7<sup>PM</sup> to go to the Louvre and was never seen again in the Rue des Fossoyeurs. The opinion of those most likely to know was that thereafter he was fed and lodged in some edifice of state by the grace of his most munificent Eminence.

The Inn of the Painted Beard

Toward the end of the year of our Lord 1628, the traveller who came, for business or pleasure, to spend a few days in the capital of what was poetically called the Realm of the Lilies could depend on hospitality, with or without a letter of introduction, at the Inn of the Painted Beard. There in the Rue of l'Homme-Armé, in the house of Master Soleil, he was sure to find good cheer, good food, and a good room. Though next door to a wretched cabaret on the corner that had, since sometime in the Middle Ages, given the lane its name thanks to its sign depicting an armed man, there was no mistaking the Painted Beard. That inn, to which we now introduce our readers, was far more prominent, and attracted travellers by a sign so majestic that, once seen, none would go farther. There, squeaking in the tiniest breeze on a rod tipped with a gilded crescent, was a tinplate sign that depicted a Grand Turk sporting a beard of the brightest hue, justifying the strange name of the Inn of the Painted Beard. Add to this the rebus adorning the front of the house above the entrance. Which meant, taking into account both sign and rebus:

AT THE PAINTED BEARD, SOLEIL HOSTS BOTH YOU AND YOUR HORSE

The Painted Beard would vie, if it could, for seniority with the Armed Man Cabaret – but in the interest of honesty, we must admit the latter was there first. Barely two years earlier had the inn's former owner, Claude-Cyprien Mélangeois sold his establishment to Master Blaise-Guillaume Soleil for the sum of a thousand pistoles. And the moment the contract was settled, this new owner had called in the painters and the decorators, despite the exterior rights of the nesting swallows and the interior rights of the secret spiders. He refurbished the façade, renovated the guest chambers, and finally, to the surprise of his astonished neighbours, who wondered where Master Soleil could have found the money for it, emblazoned that rebus we've had the honour to present to our readers. Shaking their heads from right to left, the old women of Rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie and of Rue des Blancs-Manteaux had predicted, in accord with the sibylline qualities of their advanced age that these embellishments would be unlucky for the inn, whose customs and appearance had been established for centuries. But despite these old ladies, and to the astonishment of those who took them for oracles, their predictions of disaster were false. On the contrary, the establishment thrived, thanks to an entirely new clientele which, though without meaning to disrespect the old ways, nonetheless increased and even doubled the trade of the Inn of the Painted Beard. Meanwhile, the swallows quietly built new nests in the corners of the windows, and the spiders no less quietly wove new webs in the corners of the chambers. Gradually, light was cast on this great mystery: the rumour went around that Madam Marthe-Pélagie Soleil – alert, charming, self-possessed, still young and pretty at barely thirty years old – was the foster sister of one of the great ladies of the Court, whose funds – or the funds of another, even more powerful lady – had been advanced to help establish Master Soleil. Furthermore, it was this foster sister who sent the Inn of the Painted Beard its new clientele: noble foreigners who now frequented the streets of the glassmakers' quarter around Rue Sainte-Avoye, previously almost deserted. What was truth and what was invention in these rumours?

This story will tell us. We start by recounting what took place in the common room of the Inn of the Painted Beard on 5 December 1628 – that is, four days after the return of Cardinal Richelieu from the famous siege of La Rochelle that provided one of the episodes of our novel The Three Musketeers. It was four o'clock in the afternoon that, given the height of the houses and the way they leaned toward each other, meant that twilight was already falling in the Rue of l'Homme-Armé. At that time, the common room was occupied by only one person, a regular of the house – but this person occupied as much space as four ordinary drinkers. He had already emptied one mug of honey and was halfway through a second, lying across three chairs and shredding with his spurs the wicker seat of the fourth, while with the point of his dagger he carved a miniature hopscotch pattern into the table. His rapier, whose pommel was never far from his hand, extended along his thigh and between his crossed legs. His face was just visible, thanks to the last ray of light that filtered through the narrow mullioned window and found its way under his broad hat. He was in his late thirties, with the dark hair, eyebrows, and moustache of the sun-touched men of the South. There was steel in his eye and scorn on his lips that curled like those of a tiger to reveal bright white teeth. His straight nose and prominent chin indicated a strong will. His animal jaw reflected a reckless courage that wasn't a matter of choice but rather the heritage of the carnivore. Finally his face, rather handsome, displayed a brutal and frightening candour that was immune to lies, tricks, or treason, and was no stranger to anger or violence. His costume was that of the petty gentility of the time: half civil, half military, doublet open to show the sleeves, shirt puffing out over the belt, with broad knee-breeches and tall boots from the knees down. All clean and, though not luxurious, worn with ease and – almost – elegance. Two or three times the host, Master Soleil, passed through the common room. Doubtless in hopes of avoiding an outburst of anger or violence, he didn't complain about the double devastation in which the man seemed so absorbed. On the contrary, he smiled as agreeably as he could – easy for this host, whose face was as placid as that of the drinker was mobile and irritable. However, appearing for his third or fourth time, Master Soleil could no longer refrain from addressing his customer. "Well, my gentleman," he said in a benevolent tone, "it seems to me that lately your business has suffered; if that goes on, this merry fellow, as you call him" – he pointed at the regular's sword – "risks rusting in his sheath."

"Indeed," replied the drinker in a mocking tone, "and that worries you because of the ten or twelve bottles I owe you for?"

"Jesus above, Sir! I swear you could owe me for fifty bottles, or even a hundred, and I wouldn't lose sleep over it! I know you well! For eighteen months you've frequented my inn, and I wouldn't think of worrying about you. But you know, in every trade there are ups and downs, and the return of His Eminence the cardinal-duke means that, for a few weeks at least, all swords must remain in their sheaths. I say for a few weeks, because no such limit lasts long in Paris, and soon he and the king will set out again to carry the war beyond the mountains. Once more it will be as it was during the siege of La Rochelle: to the devil with the edicts! And gold will once more fill your purse."

"Well, that's where you're wrong, Master Soleil. Because yesterday and today I plied my honourable trade as usual, though each time as the day faded, Phoebe declined to bless me. But as for the cash that so concerns you, you see, or rather you hear" – the drinker jingled his pouch – "there are still a few coins in my purse, if the sound is to be believed. So if I don't pay my bill right here and now, it's only because I hope to have it settled by the first gentleman who comes to engage my services. And perhaps," he continued, turning from Master Soleil and peering out the stained glass of the window, "perhaps my new employer will be that one there coming from the Rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie, nose in the air, like a man looking for the sign of the Painted Beard. In fact, he's seen it, and couldn't be happier. Eclipse yourself, Master Soleil as it's clear this gentleman wants to speak with me. Back to your kitchen, and leave men of the sword to their business! But first light the lamps – within a few minutes this place will be dark as a tomb, and I like to see the faces of those I do business with."

The drinker was not mistaken, because just as his host, hastening to obey him, disappeared through the kitchen door, a figure, silhouetted by the last light of the day, appeared in the street doorway. The newcomer, before venturing into the doubtful twilight of the common room of the Inn of the Painted Beard, peered cautiously into its depths; then, seeing that the room was occupied by only one individual, and that this individual was probably the one he sought, he drew his cloak up to his eyes and approached him. If the cloaked man feared to be recognised, his caution was rewarded, for just then Master Soleil, glowing like the star that bore his name, re-entered the room with a lit candle in each hand that he set in two tinplate sconces on the wall. The stranger watched with an impatience he didn't try to conceal. Obviously he preferred the room's former twilight, a gloom that would further thicken as night fell. However, he said nothing, satisfied to watch the activities of Master Soleil over the edge of his cloak. It was only after the kitchen door had closed again behind the host that he addressed the other occupant, saying, "Are you the one called Étienne Latil, formerly with the Duke d'Épermon, later a captain in Flanders?"

The drinker, who was lifting his mug to his mouth as the question was asked, looked as if the tone of the question didn't quite satisfy him. He turned and said, "If I did answer to that name, what would that be to you?"

And he finished lifting the mug to his mouth. The cloaked man gave the drinker as long as he liked to tend to his mug. When the empty mug was back on the table, the man said, somewhat sharply, "I have the honour to ask if you are the Knight Étienne Latil."

"Ah! Now that's better," the drinker said, nodding approval.

"Do me the honour to answer."

"Very well. Yes, Sir, I am Étienne Latil in person. What can I do for you?"

"I have a proposition for you."

"A proposition!"

"Yes, a good one; excellent, even."

"Pardon me – I acknowledge the names Étienne and Latil apply to me; but before we go further, permit my caution to echo yours: whom do I have the honour to address?"

"My name isn't important unless my words suit your ears."

"You're wrong, Sir, if you think I'll sing to that song. I may be a younger son but I am nonetheless noble, and whoever referred you to me must have mentioned that I work for neither peasants nor the common bourgeoisie. If you want me on behalf of some carpenter, or some merchant neighbour of yours, count me out. I don't involve myself in such affairs."

"Well, I don't wish to tell you my name, Sir Latil but I have no problem with revealing my title. Here's the ring I use as a seal, and if you can recognise a blazon, this should acquaint you with my rank."

And drawing a ring from his finger, he passed it to the bravo, who took it to the window to examine in the last light of the day. "Ah-ha," he said, "an onyx, engraved in the style of Florence. You are Italian, and a marquis, Sir. The vine and three pearls indicate wealth. The gem alone, mounting aside, is worth forty pistoles."

"Enough to warrant a talk?" asked the stranger, replacing the ring on a hand long, white, and fine.

A second, gloved hand, appeared and re-gloved the first. "Quite enough, and it proves your bona fides, Sir Marquis – but as down payment on the bargain we're sure to conclude, it would be gallant of you to pay the price of the ten or twelve bottles I owe to this cabaret. I don't make a condition of this but I'm an orderly man, and if I had an accident during our enterprise I'd hate to leave a debt behind me, no matter how small."

"That's no problem."

"And it would top off your gallantry if, as the two mugs in front of me are empty, you could summon two more to replace them," said the drinker. "My throat is dry and I feel a need to moisten it – arid words just scorch the mouth as they leave it."

"Master Soleil!" called the stranger as he wrapped himself even further in his cloak.

Master Soleil appeared as if he'd been right behind the door, ready to obey whatever commands were given him. "This gentleman's bill, and two mugs of honey – your best."

The landlord of the Painted Beard disappeared as quickly as if he were an Olympic Circus clown dropping through a trap door and reappeared almost at once with two mugs, one of which he deposited in front of the stranger, the other before Étienne Latil. "Voilà," he said. "As for the bill, it is one pistole, five sous, and two deniers."

"Here's a gold crown worth two and a half pistoles," said the stranger, tossing a coin on the table. As the landlord reached for his pouch to make change, the stranger said, "Don't bother. Keep the balance on behalf of sir, here."

"No mistaking it," murmured the bravo. "His words betray the merchant from a league away. These Florentines are all tradesmen, and even their dukes are moneylenders as bad as the Jews of Frankfurt or the Lombards of Milan. However, as our host said, times are hard, and one can't always choose one's clients." Meanwhile, Master Soleil was withdrawing behind bow after bow. He'd found that lords were rarely eager to pay debts, so he regarded his new guest with profound admiration.

The stranger followed Master Soleil with his eyes until the door had once more closed behind him. When he was quite sure that he was alone with Étienne Latil, he said, “And now, since you know you’re not dealing with a baker, are you inclined, my dear Sir, to help a generous cavalier rid himself of a rival?”

“I am often made such offers, and I rarely refuse. But before going further, I think I should acquaint you with my fees.”

“I know them: ten pistoles to act as second in an ordinary duel, twenty-five to act as direct challenger, under whatever pretext, if your employer doesn’t fight – and one hundred pistoles to pick a fight that results in an immediate meeting with the designated target, who is to be killed on the spot.”

“Killed on the spot,” repeated the sell-sword. “If he doesn’t die, I return the money, regardless of wounds inflicted or received.”

“I know that. I also know that you are not only an expert swordsman but a man of honour.”

Étienne Latil inclined his head slightly, as if accepting only what was due. Indeed, he was a man of honour – in his way.

“Thus,” continued the stranger, “I know I can count on you.”

“Slowly; don’t rush it. As an Italian, you must know the proverb, chi va piano, va sano – what goes slowly, goes well. Before proceeding, I need to know the nature of the business, the target in question, and which category of service you require. And the cash must be paid up front. I’ve been in this game too long to be taken advantage of.”

“Here are one hundred pistoles.” The stranger dropped a purse on the table. “You may count them, if you wish to be sure.”

Despite the temptation, the sell-sword did not touch the purse – he barely glanced at it. “It seems you’ll want the deluxe service,” he said with a hint of sarcasm and a slight curl of the lip. “An immediate meeting.”

“To end in death,” the stranger answered, unable to keep a slight tremor from his voice.

“Then you need only state the name, rank, and habits of your rival. It’s my practice to act honestly in these affairs, so I need to be thoroughly acquainted with the person I’m to face. As you may or may not know, everything depends on the manner in which one first crosses steel. You don’t engage a rustic from the provinces the way you do a Parisian coxcomb, or a guardsman of the king or of sir the cardinal. If you don’t tell me everything, or if I’m misinformed, and I end up engaging the target improperly, it might be your rival who kills me – and that would suit neither of us. Furthermore, the risks are not just in the meeting, particularly if one challenges a person of high rank. If the affair causes a big stink, the least I can expect is to spend several months in prison. Such places are dank and unhealthy, good drink is costly there, and as a result you will incur additional expenses. All these considerations must be taken into account. But unless you’d prefer me as a second,” the sell-sword concluded with some disdain, “running the same risks I do, there’s a price to be paid – is there not?”

“That cannot be. In this case, for me to challenge is impossible – though, by my faith as a gentleman, I regret it.”

This answer, made in a tone both firm and calm, displaying neither weakness nor bluster, made Latil begin to suspect that he’d been mistaken, that he was dealing with a man who really had no recourse but to employ someone else’s sword, and that only serious considerations kept his own in its sheath. His opinion improved even more when the stranger nonchalantly added, “As to the question of an additional twenty, thirty, or even fifty pistoles, you can expect me to do what is right without argument.”

“Then let’s get to it,” said Étienne Latil. “Who is your enemy, and how shall I come at him? But first of all, his name.”

“His name matters little,” replied the man in the cloak. “This evening we’ll go together to the Rue de la Cerisaie. I’ll show you the door of the house he’ll emerge from around two hours after midnight. You will wait there and, as no one but he will come out in the early hours of the morning, a mistake is impossible. Besides, I’ll tell you how to recognise him.”

The sell-sword shook his head, and then – reluctantly – pushed the purse of gold across the table. “Not good enough,” he sighed. “I said it once and I repeat it now: I’ve to know who I’m dealing with.”

“Truly,” the stranger said impatiently, “you have too many scruples, my dear Sir Latil. Your adversary isn’t known to be in Paris – he hasn’t been here in years, and is believed by everyone to still be in Italy. Besides, you’ll have him on the ground before he ever gets a look at your face, and to be completely safe you could wear a mask.”

“You know, Sir,” said Latil, resting his elbows on the table and his head on his hands, “your affair begins to sound like an assassination.”

The stranger was silent. Latil once more shook his head and slid the purse across the table. “In that case, I’m not the man for you. That kind of work doesn’t suit me.”

“Was it while you served the Duke of Épermon that you learned all these scruples, my pretty friend?” asked the stranger.

“No,” replied Latil, “it was because of my scruples that I left his service.”

“Oh, I see. You couldn’t abide working beside the infamous Simon.”

This Simon was one of the old duke’s notorious torturers. “Simon,” Latil said with scorn, “was a man of the whip. I am a man of the sword.”

“All right,” said the stranger, “I see that in this case the sum should be doubled. Perhaps two hundred pistoles will assuage your scruples.”

“You’re missing the point. I don’t work from ambush. You’ll find people who do that sort of thing over toward Saint-Pierre-aux-Boeufs, where the cutthroats congregate. You must recognise, above all, that I do my work in my fashion, not yours – and that how I manage it is solely my affair, so long as I remove your rival. That’s what you want, isn’t it – to have him removed from your path? As long as he’s no longer in your way, you’re satisfied.”

“I can’t have it done your way.”

“Ventrebleu! I am disgusted. Perhaps the Latils of Compignac don’t date back to the Crusades like the Rohans or the Montmorency family but we’re honest nobility, and though I may be the cadet of the family, I’m as noble as my elder brother.”

“I can’t do it your way, I tell you.”

“Am I to just assassinate a man in such a fashion? I could never hold my head up in good company again!”

“Oh? The cardinal might not see it your way.”

As answer, the stranger drew two rolls of coins from his pouch, one hundred pistoles in each, and placed them on the table next to the purse – but in doing so, his cloak fell open, and Latil could see the stranger was a hunchback. “Three hundred pistoles,” said the gentleman hunchback. “Does that calm your scruples and put an end to your objections?”

Latil shook his head and sighed. “You’re very persuasive, Sir, and it’s hard to resist you. Indeed, I’d have to have a heart like a rock to disappoint a lord in such a predicament, so let’s try to find a compromise. This is certainly plenty; I couldn’t ask for more.”

“I don’t know what else I could offer,” replied the stranger, “other than two more rolls like these two. But,” the stranger added, “I must warn you, that’s all I have. Take it or leave it.”

“Ah! Tempter!” murmured Latil, swayed by the purse and four rolls of gold. “You’ll have me betray my principles and forego my practices.”

“Then let’s go,” said the gentleman. “We can finish our discussion on the way.”

“What can I do? You’re so persuasive, no one could resist. So, then: we go to the Rue of la Cerisaie, correct?”

“Yes.”

“Tonight?”

“If possible.”

“You’ll have to be clear; I can’t afford a mistake.”

“Just so. Moreover, now that you’re being reasonable, and at my side, bought and paid for…”

“Almost: I haven’t yet put the money in my pouch.”

“What, more trouble?”

“No, I’m just stating some exceptions. Exceptis excipiendis as we said at the College of Libourne…”

“State your exceptions.”

“First: the target is neither the king nor the cardinal.”

“No; their enemy, if anything.”

“No ally of the king?”

“Hardly. Though, I must say, a favourite of the queen.”

“No retainer of old Cardinal Bérulle?”

“No, he’s a man of only twenty-three.”

“Ah … then he’s in love with Her Majesty.”

“Possibly. Is that all your exceptions?”

“My God, yes!” Latil began transferring the gold from the table to his pouch. “Our poor queen. Nothing but bad luck for her since they killed her Duke of Buckingham…”

“So, then,” interrupted the gentleman hunchback, doubtless hoping to put an end to Latil’s vacillations and get him moving, “you’re the man to kill the Count of Moret.”

Latil froze. “The Count of Moret?”

“The Count of Moret,” repeated the stranger. “He wasn’t among your exceptions, I think?”

“Antoine of Bourbon?” Latil said, placing his hands on the table.

“Yes, Antoine of Bourbon.”

“The son of our good King Henry?”

“The bastard son, you should say.”

“Royal bastards are often the true sons of kings, born as they are by love rather than duty.” He shook his head. “Take back your gold, Sir. I won’t raise my hand against a Son of France.”

“The child of Jacqueline of Beuil is not of the royal house.”

“He’s still a son of Henry IV.” Rising, Latil crossed his arms and fixed his eyes on the stranger. “Do you know, Sir that I was there when his father was killed?”

“You?”

“On the running-board of the carriage, as page to the Duke of Épernon. The assassin had to shove me aside to get to the king. Thanks to me, perhaps, he failed to get away. I’m the one who grabbed him by the lapel and held him, held him…”

Latil showed his hands, patterned with scars. “Here are the marks from his knife. The blood of our great king mixed with my own. And I’m the one you try to hire to assassinate his son! I’m no Jacques Clément nor Ravailac, no king-slayer – but you, Sir, are a miserable wretch. Take back your gold before I nail you to the wall like a venomous snake!”

“Silence, lackey,” said the stranger, recoiling a step, “or I’ll make you silent.”

“You call me lackey? You an assassin? I’m no policeman and it’s not my business to keep you from hiring someone else who might actually do it but I’ll thwart both your plot and your ugly self. On guard, you wretch!”

And with these words, Latil drew his rapier and lunged. But the stranger, though backing away, was by no means in retreat. Latil’s thrust, strong and skilled, and intended to nail its target to the wall like a butterfly, just missed its mark. The stranger was on his guard, and replied with such a series of thrusts and rapid feints that the sell-sword had to draw on all his skill, caution, and coolness. Latil even, as though delighted to unexpectedly meet a skill that could rival his own, seemed to want to prolong the fight for the sheer love of the art. He fenced with his opponent as if in an academy of arms, prolonging the bout until his opponent’s fatigue or some error would give him the opportunity to employ one of those final thrusts, attacks he knew so well and could use to such advantage. However, the irascible hunchback, less patient than Latil and tired of making no headway – in fact, feeling more pressed than he liked, and seeing himself cut off from the door, cried out suddenly, “To me, friends! Help, I’m being assassinated!” The gentleman hunchback had barely made his cry when three men, who were waiting for him outside the door to the street, rushed into the common room and attacked the unfortunate Latil. Turning to face them, he had no defence against the boot put in his back by his first adversary. Meanwhile, one of his attackers thrust from the other side. Suddenly he took two sword wounds, one running him through from chest to back, the other from back to chest. Latil fell in a heap to the floor.

“How so?”
“Later I was hiding in the doorway of the Hotel Lesdisguières, across the street from Madam Maugiron’s house.”
“And?”

“And I saw him come out. As clearly as I see you.”
“Except you didn’t see him leave Madam Maugiron. You saw him leave Madam la Montagne.”
“But then but then,” cried Pisany, “who was the man I heard in Madam Maugiron’s bedroom?”
“Bah, Marquis – be a philosopher!”
“A philosopher?”

“Yes, why worry about it?”
“What do you mean, why worry about it? If the man isn’t a Son of France, I mean to kill him.”
“Kill him! Ah!” said Souscarrières with an accent that plunged the marquis into a world of strange doubts.
“That’s right,” the marquis said, “kill him.”
“Really? No matter who he was?” said Souscarrières, in a manner increasingly arrogant.
“Yes. Yes. A hundred times yes!”

“Well, then,” Souscarrières said, “kill me, my dear Marquis – because I was the man.”
“You villain!” Pisany said through his teeth. He drew his sword. “Defend yourself!”
“No need to ask me twice, my dear Marquis,” said Souscarrières, sword in hand and falling on guard. “At your service!”

They fell to, and despite Voiture’s cries and Brancas’s incomprehension, the Marquis of Pisany and the Lord Souscarrières began a furious combat, all the more terrible as there was no lighter than that of a cloud-veiled moon. Each combatant, as much from pride as the will to live, displayed all his fencing skill. Souscarrières, who excelled at athletics, was clearly the stronger and more skilful. But Pisany’s long legs, employed to their full, gave him an advantage in sudden attacks and quick retreats. Finally, after about twenty seconds, the Marquis of Pisany uttered a groan that barely escaped his teeth, raised his arms, and dropped his sword. He turned and leaned against the wall, sighed, and collapsed. Souscarrières lowered his sword and said, “You are witnesses that he challenged me first?”
“Yes, alas!” Brancas and Voiture responded.
“And you can attest that everything followed the rules of honour?”
“We can attest to that.”
“Very well! Now, as I prefer this sinner’s health over his death, carry Sir Pisany to the house of madam, his mother and then send for Bouvard, the king’s surgeon.”
“The very thing! We’ll do it,” said Voiture. “Help me, Brancas. Fortunately, we’re barely fifty paces from the Hotel of Rambouillet.”
“Ah!” said Brancas. “What a shame! And the party had begun so well.”
While Brancas and Voiture carried the Marquis of Pisany as carefully as they could to his mother’s house, Souscarrières disappeared around the corner of the Rue des Orties. “These damned hunchbacks,” he said. “I don’t know why they infuriate me so. This makes three I’ve had to dispose of by running them through.”

The Hotel of Rambouillet

The Hotel of Rambouillet was located between the church of Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre that was built in the late twelfth century to commemorate Saint Thomas the Martyr, and the Hospital of the Three Hundred, founded during the reign of Louis IX upon his return from Egypt, to house those three hundred gentlemen whose eyes had been gouged out by the Saracens. The Marquise of Rambouillet, who had built the hotel – we’ll tell how later – was born in 1588, that is, the year the Duke of Guise and his brother were murdered at Blois by order of Henry III. She was the daughter of Jean of Vivonne (the elder Marquis of Pisany) and Julie Savelli, a Roman lady of a family so illustrious that it sired two popes, Honoré III and Honoré IV, and a saint of the church, Saint Lucina. At the age of twelve, she married the Marquis of Rambouillet of the house of Angennes, another illustrious family, renowned for both the famous Cardinal of Rambouillet, and that Marquis of Rambouillet who was Viceroy of Poland before Henry III assumed that title. The Rambouillet family was known for both wit and propriety. A parable of the grandfather of the Marquis of Rambouillet bears witness to the one, as an anecdote about his father illustrates the other. The grandfather, Jacques of Rambouillet, had married a woman of questionable character. One day he was arguing with her in a dispute that was becoming an actual fight, when he stopped suddenly, lowered his voice, and speaking as calmly as can be, said, “Madam, pull on my beard.”

“Why?” she asked in amazement.
“Just pull on it. I’ll tell you afterwards.”
The Marquis of Rambouillet’s grandmother grabbed her husband’s beard and pulled on it.
“Harder,” he said to her.
“But I’ll hurt you!”
“Don’t worry.”
“That’s what you want?”
“Yes but much harder. Harder still. Now, with all your might. There! That didn’t hurt me. Now it’s my turn.”

He yanked on a lock of her hair. She shrieked.
“You see, Madam,” he said calmly, “I’m stronger than you. Argue with me if it pleases you. But don’t try to fight me.”
In that way this new Xanthippe was warned that, though her husband might be as wise as Socrates, he was not as patient. The Marquis of Rambouillet’s father was, as we’ve said, appointed Viceroy of Poland while that country awaited the arrival of Henry III. While performing this duty, he had saved a hundred thousand crowns in cash that he presented to the king. “Do you mock me, Sir de Rambouillet?” said Henry III. “A hundred thousand crowns isn’t much to a king.”

“Take them, Sire,” said Sir Rambouillet. “If you don’t need them on this day, you’ll need them on another.”
He made the king accept them – and later Henry wasn’t sorry he had. At the battle of Jarnac, where the Prince of Condé was so brutally murdered, this same Sir Rambouillet had worked wonders, so much so that the Duke of Anjou had sent his brother, King Charles IX, a letter in which he gave Rambouillet credit for the victory. The family displayed that letter in a golden frame. In 1606, that is to say after six years of marriage, Sir Rambouillet found himself in financial difficulty and sold the Hotel of Pisany to Pierre Forget-Dufresne for 34,500 livres. In 1624, Forget-Dufresne turned around and sold it, at a great profit, to the cardinal-minister. By the time of our story, Richelieu was busy building on that site what would later become the Palais Cardinal. While waiting for this palace of marvels to be made habitable, Richelieu had two country houses, one at Chaillot, the other at Rueil, as well as a town house in the Place Royale, next door to that of the celebrated courtesan Marion Delorme. Meanwhile, for thirty years Paris expanded, building daily. You could say that it was Henry IV who laid the groundwork for what would become modern Paris. At the end of the reign of Henry III, Paris had covered an area of 1,414 acres. During the reign of Henry IV, the Tournelles Park, the suitable parts of the Marais, and the neighbourhood around the Temple were all built up with new houses. The Rue Dauphine and the Place Royale were constructed, the suburbs of Saint-Antoine, Montmartre, Saint-Martin, Saint-Denis, and Saint-Honoré were increased by half, and the new Faubourg Saint-Germain became the seventeenth quarter. Paris grew to enclose over 1,660 acres. In 1604, the Pont Neuf, begun by Henry III in 1578, was finally completed. In 1606, the Hotel of Ville (City Hall), begun by François I in 1533, was likewise completed. In 1613 were built the Saint-Gervais gate and the aqueduct of Arcueil. From 1614 to 1616, the houses and bridges of the new Île Saint-Louis were constructed. The equestrian statue of Henry IV was placed on the Pont Neuf, and the foundations of the Palais du Luxembourg were laid. Marie de Médicis, during her regency, established the long ranks of trees along the Course-la-Reine. In a new burst of building, from 1624 to 1628, Paris grew even further. The western walls were extended to contain the Palais des Tuileries, the neighbourhood of Butte-des-Moulins, and that of Ville-Neuve. The new walls began at the Seine at the Porte of la Conference, at the far end of the Tuileries gardens, ran to the Rue Saint-Honoré, with its new Porte Saint-Honoré, to Rue Galion, where they built the Porte Montmartre, and joined the old walls at the corner of the Rue Neuve-Saint-Denis, at the gate of the same name. The Marquise of Rambouillet, after the sale of the Hotel of Pisany, resided in her father’s small house in Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre but this dwelling was too cramped for the lady, her six children, and numerous domestics. It was then that she decided to build the famous Hotel of Rambouillet, so celebrated thereafter. However, dissatisfied with the plans submitted by the architects that she felt didn’t make good use of the available area, she decided to draw up the plans herself. For a long while she laboured uselessly at this endeavour, until one day she cried like Archimedes, “Eureka!”

She took pen and paper and quickly sketched both the interior and exterior of the mansion, all with such excellent taste that it impressed Queen Regent Marie de Médicis, then employed in building the Luxembourg. She, who had seen in her youth in Florence the most beautiful palaces in the world, and who had brought to this new Athens the leading architects of the time, sent them to ask for advice from Madam Rambouillet and to use her mansion as an example. The eldest child of the Marquise of Rambouillet was the beautiful Julie-Lucine d’Angennes, more celebrated even than her mother. Since the days of Helen, that adulterous wife of Menelaus who drew Europe into war with Asia, no woman’s beauty had been more highly praised, in every key and with every instrument. No one whose heart she stole ever recovered it. The wound inflicted by the surpassingly lovely eyes of Julie d’Angennes, the famous Madam Montausier, was mortal, or at least incurable. Ninon of Lenclos may have had her martyrs but Julie’s admirers were known as the perishing. Born in 1600, she was now aged twenty-eight, and though her first youth was past, she had arrived at the full bloom of her beauty. Though Madam Rambouillet had four other daughters, her eldest eclipsed them all, and today the younger are nearly forgotten. Three of them took the veil: Madam d’Hyères, Madam Saint-Étienne, and Madam Pisany. The youngest, Claire-Angélique d’Angennes, was the first wife of Sir de Grignan. In our previous chapters, we made the acquaintance of her eldest son, the Marquis of Pisany. Madam had had a second son who died at the age of eight when his nurse, who’d visited a plague victim at the hospital, had recklessly kissed the child upon her return. Within two days, the plague had taken them both. The early fame of the Hotel of Rambouillet was due to the passion the beautiful Julie inspired in every man of breeding, and to the curious devotion of the family servants. The Marquis of Pisany’s tutor was Chavaroché, who had been Voiture’s opponent in one of those three duels we mentioned, fighting him by torchlight and giving him a flesh wound in the thigh. Chavaroché was, always had been, and always would be one of the lovely Julie’s “perishing” admirers. When Julie, after being married for twelve years, finally decided at the age of thirty-nine to fulfil her husband Sir Montausier’s desire for a child, she had a very difficult labour. Because they knew he’d be willing to go, they sent Chavaroché to the Abbey of Saint-Germain for the Girdle of Saint Marguerite, a holy relic known to help with childbirth. Chavaroché went at once but as it was three in the morning, he found the monks in their beds and was obliged, despite his impatience, to wait nearly half an hour. “By my faith!” he cried. “The nerve of these monks, sleeping while Madam Montausier is in labour!” And after that, Chavaroché spoke naught but ill of the monks of the Abbey of Saint-Germain. One degree of domestic rank below Chavaroché, we find Louis of Neuf-Germain, with his long sword slapping his leg and his goatee almost brushing his chest, and who bore the title Poet-at-Large to Sir, the king’s brother. He had an easy facility for trackerel. One day, Madam Rambouillet had asked him to improvise something for Sir d’Avaux, brother of the President of Mesme, the ambassador extraordinaire who had signed the Peace of the North. Neuf-Germain rattled off an entire ode on d’Avaux’s name, with rhymes on da and Vaux. Here is the first stanza:

Jove, one day in heaven, had a
Job for Mercury, his bravo,
To have the gods sing a cantata
In praise and honour of great Devaux

Those who wish to read his other works will find them collected by Voiture. Neuf-Germain had a mistress in the Rue des Gravilliers, the last street in Paris where a gallant was likely to find a mistress. A certain rogue, who insisted he had a prior claim to the damsel, encountered Neuf-Germain and they quarrelled in the street. The rogue grabbed Neuf-Germain by his goatee and yanked so hard, it came off in his hand. Neuf-Germain, who always wore a sword and had given the Marquis of Pisany his first lessons in arms, drew and struck his attacker a blow that made him drop his handful of beard. The rogue, wounded, fled screaming, pursued by half the watching mob, while Neuf-Germain gleefully slashed the air with his rapier, mocking the rogue and loudly calling for him to return. After Neuf-Germain left, a cobbler who knew that the victor belonged to the Hotel of Rambouillet, the reputation of which had reached even the lowest commoners, noticed that the goatee torn from his chin was still on the battlefield. He picked it up to the last hair, folded it carefully in white paper, and proceeded to the Hotel of Rambouillet. The household was at dinner when the Marquis of Rambouillet was told that a cobbler from the Rue des Gravilliers wished to speak with him. This was such unexpected news that Rambouillet was curious as to what this cobbler had to say. “Let him enter,” he said. It was done. The cobbler came in, bowed humbly, and approached Rambouillet. “Sir Marquis,” he said, “I’m pleased to present the beard of Sir Neuf-Germain that he had the misfortune to lose in front of my door.”

Without really knowing what that meant, Sir Rambouillet took from his pouch one of those new crowns struck with the image of Louis XIII, called a Louis d'argent, and gave it to the cobbler. The man retired completely satisfied, not for having received a crown but for having had the honour of seeing at table, eating like mere mortals, Sir Rambouillet and his family Rambouillet and family were still looking incomprehendingly at this handful of beard when Neuf-Germain came in with his stubbly chin, surprised that despite his quick return to the mansion, his beard had arrived before him. One floor down we meet Silésie the equerry, or rather the quinola as a sub-equerry was known at the time. Everyone at the Hotel of Rambouillet had his quirks and caprices but Silésie was a madman of a different stripe. Madam Rambouillet called Neuf-Germain their indoor madman and Silésie their outdoor madman, as he lived with his wife and children outside the main house, albeit only a few steps away. One morning, everyone who lived in the same house as Silésie came to complain to the marquis, saying that since the weather had grown hot, it was impossible to sleep under the same roof as his equerry. Sir Rambouillet called Silésie before him. "What were you doing last night," he asked, "that all the neighbours complain about not being able to sleep for a moment?"

"With respect, Sir Marquis," replied Silésie, "I was killing my fleas."

"And how can you make so much noise killing fleas?"

"Because I kill them with a hammer."

"A hammer? Explain that, Silésie!"

"Sir Marquis is aware that no animal's life is harder to take than that of a flea."

"That's true."

"Well, to make sure mine don't escape, once I catch them, I carry them to the staircase and crush them with a large hammer."

And Silésie continued to kill his fleas in this fashion, until one night, when he was probably half asleep, he missed the first step and tumbled from the top of the stairs to the bottom. When they found him, he had a broken neck. After Silésie comes Master Claude the silversmith, a sort of comic buffoon. He was crazy about executions, and despite the cruelty of the spectacle, he never missed one. But once three or four were held in quick succession, and yet Master Claude never left the house. Worried, the marquise asked him the cause of this aberration. "Ah, Madam la Marquise," replied Master Claude, shaking his head with an air of melancholy, "I can no longer take pleasure in criminals' death throes."

"And why is that?" she asked her servant.

"Because since the beginning of the year, the executioners have been strangling the condemned before hanging them. Can you believe it? If, someday, they return to hanging them outright, on that day I'll return to the execution ground."

One night, he went to see the fireworks in honour of Saint-Jean but as they launched the first rockets, he found himself behind a very tall onlooker whose large head blocked his view. He thought, rather than bother anyone, he would go up to Montmartre, only to find when he arrived breathless at the top of the hill and turned toward the Hotel of Ville that the fireworks were over. Thus instead of seeing poorly, Master Claude saw nothing at all. So instead he went to Saint-Denis to see the treasures, and greatly enjoyed himself. Upon his return, when questioned by the marquise, he said, "Ah, Madam, what beautiful things they have, these rascals of churchmen!"

And he began to list the bejewelled crosses, the surplices studded with pearls, the golden monstrance and silver candlesticks. "But there was one thing most important of all," he added.

"What thing do you think the most important, Master Claude?"

"Ah, Madam, they have our neighbour's arm."

"Which neighbour?" asked Madam Rambouillet who wondered who among their neighbours could spare a limb to donate to the treasure-trove of Saint-Denis.

"Why, for the love of God, the arm of our neighbour Saint Thomas, Madam; his church is so close we can practically touch it."

There were also two other servants at the Hotel of Rambouillet who were a credit to the collection: the secretary Adriani and the embroiderer Dubois. The first published a volume of poetry dedicated to Sir Schomberg. The second, who felt called to the vocation, became a Capuchin monk. But the calling didn't last, and he left his monastery before the end of his novitiate. Not daring to reapply for a place with Madam Rambouillet, he became supervisor of the actors at the Hotel of Bourgogne. "Because that way," as he said, "if Madam Rambouillet ever chanced to go to the theatre, I might see her."

Indeed, the Marquis and Marquise of Rambouillet were worshiped by their servants. One evening, the lawyer Patru, so influential on the modes of polite speech at the Académie Française, was dining at the Hotel of Nemours with the Abbot of Saint-Spire. One of the two mentioned the Marquise of Rambouillet. The sommelier, Audry who was crossing the room after telling the waiters which honey to serve, heard the marquise's name and stopped. When the two guests continued to talk about her, the sommelier sent all the other servants from the room. "Why the devil did you do that?" Patru asked.

"Ah, Gentlemen!" the sommelier said. "I was with Madam Rambouillet for twelve years. If you have the honour to be friends of the marquise, no one shall serve you but me." And despite the dignity of his position, he placed a waiter's towel over his arm, stood behind the guests, and served them until the end of the meal. Now that we have made the acquaintance of the masters and servants of the Hotel of Rambouillet, we will bring our readers inside the mansion on a night when it was host to the leading celebrities of the age.

The Regulars of the Hotel of Rambouillet

If we give precedence to aristocratic illustrations over literary illustrations to conform to the rules of etiquette in use in the 17th century, our first sketch –for we do not claim to draw portraits in a few lines – will be that of Madam Princess, one of the most assiduous people at the parties of the Marquise de Rambouillet. Madam Princess was that beautiful Charlotte de Montmorency, granddaughter of the Constable Anne, first Duke of Montmorency, killed at the Battle of Saint-Denis by Robert Stuart, and daughter of Henri de Montmorency, whose sole merit, any Constable of France that he was, like his father, was to be the first squire of the kingdom: he put a silver coin between the bar of his stirrup and his boot and worked for a quarter of an hour on the most difficult horse without the silver coin fell. It was at a ballet which the queen-mother had performed in the month of February 1609 that Miss Montmorency, then aged fourteen, made her first attempt at her beauty. She represented a nymph and raised her javelin so gracefully towards King Henry IV as if she wanted to strike him with it, that Henry IV, easy to such wounds, instantly fell in love with her and did his last follies for her in the middle of which Ravaiillac's stab came to stop him. We will tell later how she married M. le Prince, that doubtful heir to the Condés who made a mark in the noble family of the Bourbons, how she was abducted by him, and how, however beautiful she was, nothing less was needed three years' imprisonment in the Bastille for the marriage to be consummated and for Charlotte de Montmorency, who had married her husband for eight years without being his wife yet, to become the mother of the great Condé and Madam de Longueville. She was then a very beautiful princess of thirty-five who had been intimate for twenty years with the Marquis of Rambouillet, and forgot in her salon that she was a princess, remembering only that she was a woman of wit. Beside her, her rival in beauty, if not in rank and fortune, shone the most illustrious precious of the time, Miss Angélique Paulet, a year older than herself, who was designated by the name of Parthénie. Because of the tawny colour of her hair, she had been given the name: The Lioness. To this beauty that no one disputed, she added the talents most appreciated at that time: she danced to delight, played the lute admirably, and sang so well that it was accepted that one would have found on the edge of a fountain, where she had sung every day, two nightingales' dead of jealousy. His friendship with the marquise dated from the day of that same ballet in which Madam Princess had played such a great part. She played there, she, the role of Arion and seemed mounted on a dolphin. The king, who had noticed her as the most beautiful after Charlotte de Montmorency, went to console himself with her for his failure with Madam Princess, and it was to her that he was going when he was killed in the rue de la Ironwork. Madam de Rambouillet had such great consideration for her that the first time she came to Rambouillet, she had her received at the entrance to the village by the prettiest girls of the place and of her house, all dressed in white and wearing crowns, flowers. One of them, better dressed than her companions, presented her with the keys of the chateau on a silver platter, and when she crossed the bridge, fire was fired, as for a queen, from the two small silver coins, artillery that were on the towers. Beside these two elegant persons stood out by a dress so severe that one would have thought that the one who wore it belonged to some religious order, the niece of the cardinal, the beautiful Madam de Combalet, who was later Duchess of Sting. She had conceived such a dislike for her husband that it was claimed that the marriage had never been consummated. The poet Dulot had found in her maiden name – Marie de Vignerot – the anagram "virgin of your husband". Also, when M. de Combalet was killed in the wars of the Huguenots, his widow made a vow rather abruptly - for fear that she would not be sacrificed again for some reason of State - not only never to remarry but also to become a Carmelite. From then on, she dressed as rigidly as a fifty-year-old devotee. For three or four years she had worn a cheesecloth dress and, although the queen's lady-in-waiting, had added nothing to that toilet which clashed with the elegance of the ladies of the Court. By the time we arrived, the beautiful widow was beginning to look up and smile. In spite of this wish, in spite of a severity of costume, since the cardinal had been appointed minister, there was no lack of suitors for Madam de Combalet. The Count de Bethune presented himself first, then the Count de Sault, one of the richest gentlemen in France. For a moment they had spoken of the Count de Soissons. Finally, it was said, even M. de Nevers, who was in the process of claiming the duchy of Mantua, had not joined the ranks. All had been refused. This persistence in widowhood made the uncle and niece hold the wickedest talk. It was said that the cardinal did not marry the beautiful widow because he reserved her for himself, and it was affirmed that if Madam de Combalet went into society with a high dress and without ornament, she received his Eminence at home., in a low-cut dress with a bouquet in the middle of her breast, a bouquet that the cardinal, who was very fond of flowers, did not fail to take. It is true that it was also said that it was the Marshal de Brézé, who, enraged that Madam de Combalet, niece of his wife, did not want to love him, spread all these nasty rumours. He added that the three sons of the cardinal's sister, Françoise de Richelieu, who had married René de Vignerot, lord of Pontcourlay, were children of Mme de Combalet and the cardinal, whom Mme de Pontcourlay had the kindness to raise as his. He even spoke of a fourth, whom the Cardinal's sister, complacent as she was, had not wanted to take charge of her and who was being brought up in Paris. These rumours, although not adopted in the society of Madam de Rambouillet, made the Court smile that hated the cardinal and his niece, and gave rise to this epigram in which one can take the measure of the feelings of benevolence that the young queen to the poor widow, whose rigidity of dress and behaviour made a stain in her entourage:

Philis, to ease his pain,
Yesterday complained to the queen
That she had four sons by Armand.
But the queen, with a very gentle air,
Said to him: "Philis, console yourself.
Everyone knows that Brézé only likes to gossip.
Those who, for you, have the least friendship
Do him too much honour, all he can say
To only believe half of it."

There was still, at Madam de Rambouillet's evenings, a tall, dry, dark-haired person, Sicilian of origin who according to Madam Cornuel, seemed to be sweating from ink, and had Frenched her name from Scudéry in Colin de Scudéry. She came accompanied by her brother, a kind of blustering captain, who wrote tragicomedies, none of which had yet been performed, just as Miss Scudéry wrote books, none of which had yet been printed. The brother was twenty-seven, the sister twenty-one. Needless to say, it was later that Madeleine de Scudéry was the author of Ibrahim or Illustrious King, Grand Cyrus, Clelia and five or six other novels which were all the rage towards the middle of the seventeenth century, and Georges de Scudéry, the author of The Deceiver Punished and of fifteen or sixteen other plays, the very name of which has now been forgotten. Our courtesy for the ladies made us slip the future governor of Fort de la Garde under the shadow of his sister. If we had, in the least in the world, followed for men the order that we had imposed on ourselves for women – to pass from aristocratic illustrations to literary illustrations – we should have started with the two Montausier brothers, veritable pillars of bronze from the Hotel de Rambouillet. The two loved the beautiful Julie in turn, the eldest first, the Marquis but Madam de Rambouillet, having had the idea one day of looking into her hand, thought she recognised in certain lines that it was in her destiny to kill a woman and fearing that it was his daughter, she cut short the first words he said to her concerning a project of marriage with the beautiful Julie. Unable to possess her, he at least claimed the happiness of continuing to see her that was granted to him. Admitted into the house, he introduced his younger brother, the Count de Salles, who, after the death of his eldest, was the famous Marquis de Montausier who served as Molière's type for his Misanthrope. Needless to say, seeing his brother rebuffed, the Count de Salles took his place; we have said elsewhere that he sighed fourteen years for the beautiful Julie, who did not consent to marry until the age of thirty-nine. The young Count de Salles wrote correctly in prose, even wrote verse but could not compete with the literary illustrations which made the Marquise's salon shine and in the forefront of which we will name Chapelain, Gombauld, Racan and the Bishop from Grasse; as for Malherbe, he had died that same year. We would have started with Car if it had not already been mentioned in the first chapters of this book. Jean Chapelain had been introduced to the Hotel Rambouillet around the time of the siege of La Rochelle, that is to say a year earlier. Madam Rambouillet said, "I'd ever seen nothing new in you."

Indeed, he usually and invariably wore a coat of columbine satin lined with green brocade and trimmed with small columbine trimmings in bird's-eye green, with the most ridiculous boots in the world and even more ridiculous stockings and network instead of lace. He left this coat only for a jerkin of speckled taffeta which he had had made from an old petticoat of the woman with whom he lived. His wig and hat dated back to fabulous times, and yet he still had an older hat and an older wig that he put on when he got home. Tallemant des Réaux tells how he saw a crepe so old that, from black it was, it had become a dead leaf. He had already done at that time his translation of Guzman d'Alfarache, the story of the Unicorn and the Ode to Cardinal de Richelieu, plus the first songs of his Pucelle, on the first two books of which M. de Longueville had given him gave two thousand pounds pension. Despite his avarice, Chapelain passed for the most honest man in the world and Bois-Robert related that, on a payment he had made to him on behalf of the cardinal, Chapelain had sent him back a penny that was too much.

Jean-Ogier de Gombauld was one of the stars of this brilliant Pleiades; although he was, at the time when we arrived, fifty-eight years old, he was as pretty and as neat as Chapelain was little. It is true that he boasted - which, moreover, may well be true - of having been loved by a queen. This queen was Marie de Medici. Coming young to Paris, without fortune, being the youngest of a fourth marriage, he made the acquaintance of the Marquis of Ixelles who recommended him to Henri IV for whom he wrote poetry and who gave him a pension. It was at the king's coronation that Queen Marie de Medici seemed to notice him. He was with Sir Uxelles who was red-haired and whom Marie de Medici called her Rousseau. "Go," she said to Miss Catherine, her maid, "inquire from my Rousseau who is this cavalier he is leading with him."

Miss Catherine made a mistake, addressed herself to another Rousseau than M. d'Uxelles, and returned to tell the Queen: "He does not know him."

"You're mad," said the queen impatiently, "and you will have taken one Rousseau for another." But she was so anxious to know who this cavalier was that she spoke about it herself to the Marquis d'Uxelles and knowing what to expect, she put Gombauld for twelve hundred crowns on the state of the house of the King. Being of the king's household, Gombauld had his entrances to the queen. One day, he entered his room unannounced and found Marie de Medici lying on her bed and her skirts lifted because of the great heat. It was so hot that the queen just said, "Who goes there?" and that Gombauld having named herself, she contented herself with saying: "That's good." What passed between the poet and the queen no one ever knew, for Gombauld was very discreet and we only know of this gallant adventure what he wanted to say in the following sonnet:

Quick, my eyes, with a reckless gaze
And what my thought do you dare to talk about?
What various feelings make me live and die!
Force me to speak as much as to be silent.
What innocent mistake, what voluntary misfortune
Is also feared and cherished,
Was it to lose me or to acquire me?
To be favourable to me or to be against me?
What trick of love, what object surprised me?
Often the image alone disturbs my mind,
And out of extreme good, I do extreme harm.
Often I still doubt and senseless
In this doubt where I am to believe myself,
I think I thought what my eyes saw.

But discreet as he was, Gombauld did not confine himself to sonnets. He made the Endymion that caused a great stir, for the moon, it was said, was none other than the queen-mother, who, in fact, in the intaglio engravings that were made of her, was always depicted with a crescent on her head. Moreover, Gombauld had the pretension of having no privacies except with the ladies of the Court, and as, one day, Madam de Rambouillet, who knew his weak spot there, reproached him for having written verses for a peasant woman, and even to have called her Philis: "Ah! Madam Marquis," he said, "was the daughter of a rich farmer from Saintonge, who had more than ten thousand crowns in marriage."

He had made a tragedy of the Danaïdes that had been much hissed, so Madam Cornuel said as she left the performance: "Give me back half my money.

"Why?"

"Because I only heard half of the piece."

He was, as we have said, very clean and very neat, choosing when it had rained or the streets were dirty – his little fortune forcing him to walk – the cleanest cobblestones to lay the end of his boot. Now as he was of a certain strength in arms, very obstinate and very pugnacious, it happened that, having quarrelled with a gentleman about a lodging to which they both claimed, he said to him: "Here is my address, come by my door at two o'clock in the afternoon. I will come out with a sword, in this way our fight will not be a duel but an encounter; as for the witnesses, we will not miss them, the neighbours will help us."

The gentleman accepted and came at the appointed time. Gombauld came out with his sword and charged him so roughly that he let go and the neighbours, witnesses of the fight who had seen Gombauld pass by so many times, taking a thousand precautions to avoid soiling his breeches, said: "How could this gentleman, who chooses the cobblestones so well and who walks so neatly, not regret pushing his adversary through the mud and the streams?" Madam Rambouillet called him the Beautiful Dark One. Racan was then in the full flower of his reputation. He was born four years after the death of Ronsard, thirty-four years after the birth of Malherbe, who was, it is said, his master of poetry but who became jealous of him on this stanza of the Ode de la Consolation addressed to Sir Bellegarde on the death of Sir de Termes, his brother, and which had a success equal to that of Malherbe to Duperrier on the death of his daughter. Here is the stanza:

He sees what is most marvellous in Olympus,
He sees there at his feet these proud torches
Who turns his fortune and wheel as they please
He sees like ants marching our legions
In this little pile of dust and mud
Of which our vanity makes so many regions.

"Never," says Tallemant des Réaux, "did the force of genius appear so clearly in an author as in this one; for, apart from the verses, it seems that he has no common sense. He looks like a farmer, he stutters and has never been able to say his name. The R and the C, unfortunately, being two letters that he could never pronounce, the first only as an L, the second only as a T, several times he was forced to write his name to do so. To hear..."

He was the most distracted man in the world – after Sir de Brancas however. One day, alone and on a big horse, he left to go to see one of his friends in the country. A third of the way, he needed to get off. But unable to find a mount to put his foot in the stirrup, he continued his journey on foot. At his friend's door, he finally finds a mount, gets back on horseback, turns around and retraces his steps without having seen his friend. He was very familiar in M. de Bellegarde's house. One day, returning from the hunt all wet and all muddy, he enters Madam de Bellegarde's room thinking he is entering his own, and does not see Madam de Bellegarde at one corner of the fire and Madam Lorges at the other. They stand mute and motionless to see what Racan will do. He sits down, gets kicked out, and says to his lackey: "Go clean my boots, I'll dry my stockings here." The lackey pulls his master's boots and leaves. He then pulls off his stockings, approaches the fire, and puts one on Madam Bellegarde's head, the other on Madam Lorges' head. No matter how hard they bit their lips to keep from laughing, they finally burst out. "Ah! A thousand times sorry, ladies!" said Racan without undressing himself. "I took you for two andirons." The day he was received from the Academy, all literary Paris was gathered to hear his acceptance speech but the disappointment of the listeners was great when they saw him take a torn piece of paper from his pocket. "Gentlemen," he said, "I intended to read you my harangue as is customary but my big white greyhound has chewed it all up, here it is, get what you can out of it, for I don't know it by heart and have no copy."

And it was necessary that not only the listeners but also the academicians be satisfied with this excuse. Racan however, had the Academy in great veneration. Forced, for a trial he had, to take a prosecutor, without knowing whether he was good or bad, he took Chaplain's brother-in-law. "And why," asked Madam Rambouillet, "did you choose this one rather than another?"

"Because it seems to me," replied Racan, "that being Sir Chaplain's brother-in-law, he was brother-in-law of the Academy."

Racan was Marquis of the Bueil family, cousin of M. de Bellegarde. As for Sir Antoine Godeau, Bishop of Grasse, who was so small that he was called Princess Julie's dwarf, and Montausier's daughter - when Mme de Montausier had a daughter - asked why he was not did not go to bed at the same time as his dolls, although he had had thirty thousand crowns from his family and from the cardinal two bishoprics, he was always on the last necessities, so much so that he worked on biographies, translations, an ecclesiastical story, and in his spare time prayed for people of all walks of life. One of them bore the title of Prayer for a prosecutor and if need be for a lawyer. He had been introduced to the marquise by Mlle Paulet, so he was at his best in the house. It was these illustrations that we have just named who, with Colletet, Conrart, Desmarests, Rotrou, Mairet, Armand d'Andilly and Voiture, held the Marquise's salon. They were, so to speak, an integral part of what was called the Hotel Rambouillet for the Hôtel Rambouillet was not only the building and the family but also all the fine minds who gathered around this family and in this building.

What Occurred in the Hotel de Rambouillet as Souscarrières was disposing of his 3RD Hunchback

On the evening of December 5, 1628 that we began at the Inn of the Painted Beard in the first chapter of this book, all the literary luminaries of the era, those whose society was ridiculed by Molière as they ridiculed him in return, were gathered in the marquise's mansion. That night they were not ordinary visitors to the marquise's salon but specially invited guests, each having received a note from Madam Rambouillet announcing a special soirée. The guests had rushed to attend. This event took place during that happy era when women were beginning to have an influence on society. Poetry was in its infancy, born in the previous century with Marot, Gamier, and Ronsard, and was just then prattling out its first tragedies, pastorals, and comedies by way of Hardy, Desmarests, and Raissiguiér. Dramatic literature would follow, thanks to Rotrou, Corneille, Molière, and Racine, elevating France above all other nations, while perfecting that beautiful language created by Rabelais, purified by Boileau, and distilled by Voltaire. Due to its clarity, French would become the diplomatic language of all civilized nations. In language, clarity is integrity. William Shakespeare, the great genius of the sixteenth century – or rather, of all centuries – had been dead only twelve years, and was as yet known only to the English. Make no mistake, the European popularity of Elizabeth's great poet is a modern phenomenon; none of the fine minds gathered at Madam Rambouillet's had even heard the name of the man who, a century later, Voltaire would call a barbarian. Moreover, at a time when the theatre was dominated by plays such as The Deliverance of Andromeda, The Conquest of the Boar of Calydon, and The Death of Bradamante, works like Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, Julius Caesar, Richard III, and Romeo and Juliet would have seemed harsh to the delicate French palate. No, due to the influence of the queen and of the Catholic League of the Guises, it was Spain who set the fashion in literature, through Lope of Vega, Alarcón, and Tirso of Molina; Calderon had not yet appeared. To end this long digression that began of its own accord due to the force of circumstance, we'll repeat our own words: this event took place during a happy era, and we would add that an invitation from Madam Rambouillet made it doubly special. All knew the marquise's grand passion for surprising her guests. For example, consider the day she'd presented the Bishop of Lisieux, Philippe of Cospéan with a quite unexpected surprise. In the park at Rambouillet was a large, round boulder from which a fountain sprang. Veiled by a curtain of trees, it was dedicated to the memory of Rabelais, who had worked sometimes in his study and sometimes in his dining room. One bright morning, the marquise led the Bishop of Lisieux toward the fountain. The prelate squinted as he approached, trying to make out something that shone through the branches. Soon he could clearly distinguish seven or eight young women dressed as nymphs – that is to say, barely dressed at all. Leading them was Miss of Rambouillet attired as Diana: quiver on her shoulder, bow in her hand, and circlet on her brow. Beyond her, all the demoiselles of the household posed prettily on the great rock, presenting, according to Tallemant des Réaux, the loveliest tableau in the world. A bishop of our day might be scandalized by such a spectacle but Lord Lisieux, on the contrary, was quite charmed. He never saw the marquise thereafter without asking for news of the rocks of Rambouillet. In a similar circumstance, Actæon was transformed into a stag and torn apart by dogs but the marquise held that this case was entirely different, as the good bishop was so ugly that, while the nymphs might make an impression on him, he was unlikely to impress the nymphs, other than to make them flee at his approach. Besides, the Bishop of Lisieux was well aware of how ugly he was, going so far as to joke with the Bishop of Riez that he was far from being an Adonis. "That's why I owe you my thanks," replied the Bishop of Riez, "because before you became my colleague, I was the ugliest bishop in France."

It may be that Madam Rambouillet's male guests who outnumbered the females, rushed to the mansion in hopes that the marquise was staging a surprise like the one she'd prepared for Lord Lisieux. Certainly the exquisites invited that evening had elevated hopes, and were ready for whatever the evening might reveal. Their conversation turned on all matters of love and poetry but most particularly on the recent piece performed by the actors of the Hotel of Bourgogne that the exquisites had begun to patronize since the team of Bellerose, la Villiers, Mondory, la Beaupré, and his wife, Miss Vaillot, had taken over direction of the theatre. Madam Rambouillet had made plays fashionable by staging Fredegonde and Hardy's Chaste Love in her home. After that, it was decided that decent women, who until then had avoided it, could go to the Hotel of Bourgogne. The play under discussion that evening was a piece titled The Hypochondriac, the debut work of a young protégé of the marquise named Jean Rotrou. Though of middling rank, thanks to the support of the Rambouillets he had enjoyed enough success for Cardinal Richelieu to hire him into his household at the Place Royale. There he joined the company of Richelieu's famous collaborators: Mairet, L'Estoile, and Colletet, as well as the even more celebrated Desmarests and Bois-Robert. As they were discussing the merits of Rotrou's questionable comedy that Scudery and Chapelain were chopping into mincemeat, a handsome young man in an elegant suit came in. With the air of a complete cavalier, he crossed the salon to pay his respects to the ladies in order of precedence, starting with Madam la Princess, who in her quality as wife of Sir Condé, first prince of the blood, was entitled to pre-eminence. After her he addressed the marquise, then the lovely Julie. He was followed by a companion, two or three years older and dressed all in black, who advanced into the midst of this learned and imposing company a step behind his friend. "Here he is now," said the marquise, indicating the first of the two men, "the conqueror himself. It must be fine to ride to the Capitoline at such a young age – and without, I hope, someone behind you in the chariot saying, 'Caesar, remember you are mortal.'"

"On the contrary, Madam la Marquise," replied Rotrou, for that's who it was. "No critic could ever complain of my poor work more than I do myself. I swear I'm only here because I received a direct order from the Count of Soissons to leave off work on my The Dead Lover, as if it were actually dead, in order to begin on the comedy I'm working on now."

"So, what is the subject of this comedy, my fine cavalier?" asked Miss Paulet.

"A ring that no one would wish to put on his finger once he's seen you, adorable Lioness: the Ring of Forgetfulness."

A nod greeted this flattery from the one to whom it was addressed. Meanwhile, the young man dressed in black stayed as far in the background as he could. But as he was totally unknown to everybody, and as everyone to be presented to the marquise either had a name already or was on his way to making one, all eyes were fixed upon him nonetheless. "And how do you have time to write a new comedy, Sir Rotrou," asked the lovely Julie, "now that you've accepted the honour of working with the cardinal's company?"

"Sir Cardinal had so much to do at the siege of La Rochelle that we were left to ourselves," replied Rotrou, "so I took the opportunity to do some work on my own."

Meanwhile, the young man dressed in black continued to attract all the attention that was not devoted to Rotrou. "He's not a man of the sword," said Miss of Scudery to her brother.

"No, he has an air more like that of a law clerk," he replied.

The young man in black overheard this exchange, and acknowledged it with a good-natured smile. Rotrou heard it as well. "But yes!" he said. "In fact he is a law clerk – and a law clerk, I assure you, who will one day outdo us all."

Now it was the turn of the men in the company to smile, half in disbelief and half in disdain. But Rotrou's extravagant prediction only made the women all the more curious. Despite his youth, the man in black had an austere look to him. He had a broad brow already lined with the wrinkles of thought, beneath which were eyes flickering with flame. The rest of his face was more commonplace, with a large nose above thick lips, partly concealed by a burgeoning moustache. Rotrou decided it was time to satisfy the company's curiosity. "Madam la Marquise, allow me to introduce my dear compatriot Pierre Corneille, son of the Advocate General of Rouen – and soon to be a son of genius."

The name was completely unknown. "Corneille," repeated Scudery. "The name of a bird of ill omen."

"Yes ... to his rivals," Rotrou said.

"Ab ilice cornix," Chapelain whispered to the Bishop of Grasse. "The raven cries from the oak."

"Corneille," the marquise repeated in her turn but with more warmth.

"Ah!" Rotrou said to Madam Rambouillet. "You're trying to remember on what title page or frontispiece you've read that name. On none, Madam, as yet. It appears only at the head of a comedy he brought with him yesterday from Rouen. Tomorrow I'll take him to the Hotel of Bourgogne and present him to Mondory – and a month from now, we'll be applauding him."

The young man lifted his eyes to heaven, as if to say, "May God grant it be so!"

The female guests approached the two friends with more curiosity. Madam la Princess was in the lead, seeing in every poet a potential rhapsodist on her beauty that was beginning to fade. While the men, especially the poets, stayed firmly in their places, she eagerly took a seat in the group forming around Rotrou and his companion. "So, Sir Corneille," she said, "what is the title of this comedy of yours?"

Corneille turned curiously toward the source of this haughty voice. As he did so, Rotrou whispered a word in his ear. "It's called Mélite," Corneille said, "unless Your Highness would care to grace it with a better name."

"Mélite," repeated the princess. "Mélite. No, we'll leave it as is. Mélite is charming – and if the story is as well..."

"What's charming about it is that it's not a story," Rotrou said, "but rather a history."

"A history? How so?" asked Miss Paulet. "Do you mean it's a true tale?"

"Come now," Rotrou said to his companion, "tell the ladies the story, you rascal."

Corneille blushed to the ears. No one could seem less of a rascal than he did.

"The question is whether the story can safely be told at all," said Madam Combalet, covering her face with her fan in case Corneille's story should be indelicate.

"Instead of just telling the story," Corneille said timidly, "I'd rather recite some verses."

"Bah," said Rotrou, "you're embarrassed over nothing. I can recount the plot in two sentences. But there's no merit in that, since the story is true, and as my friend is the hero he gets no credit for inventing it. Imagine, Madam, that this libertine had a friend..."

"Rotrou, Rotrou!" interrupted Corneille.

"Ignoring the interruption, I continue," said Rotrou. "Imagine that this libertine had a friend who introduced him into a decent household in Rouen, in which the friend was engaged to the family's charming daughter. What do you think Sir Corneille did? He, the best man, no less, waited until the wedding was over, and then – well ... you understand, don't you?"

"Sir Rotrou!" said Madam Combalet, drawing her Carmelite's veil over her eyes.

"And then – what?" said Miss Scudery with a roguish air. "Others may understand you, Sir Rotrou but I certainly do not."

"I hope they do, beautiful Sappho" (for so Miss Scudery was called in that company of exquisites). "Ask Miss Paulet and my Lord the Bishop of Grasse, since they understood it – didn't they?"

Miss Paulet gave Rotrou a provocative little tap on the fingers with her fan, and said, "Go on, you villain. The sooner you finish, the better."

"Then I will follow Horace's maxim of ad eventum festina and hasten on," Rotrou said. "Well, Sir Corneille, in his capacity as a poet, followed the advice of the friend of Maecenas: there's no point in putting things off. He found the lady alone, demolished her Edifice of Fidelity, and in the ruins of his friend's happiness built a temple to his own joy, a joy so powerful that a stream of poetry gushed from his heart, that same stream from which the Nine Muses drink."

"The Stream of Hippocrene gushing from the heart of a law clerk?" said Madam la Princess. "That's not to be believed."

"Unless proven otherwise, Madam la Princess. And that proof my friend Corneille will give you."

"Then this Mélite is a very lucky lady," said Miss Paulet. "If Sir Corneille's comedy is as successful as you predict, Sir Rotrou, she'll be immortalized."

"Yes," Miss Scudery said drily, "but I doubt that this immortality, even if it lasts as long as that of the Cumaean Sibyl, will result in bringing her a husband."

"Oh? And do you find it such a great misfortune to remain unmarried?" said Miss of Paulet. "As long as one is pretty, of course. But ask Madam Combalet if being married is such divine joy!"

Madam Combalet's only reply was to sigh, raise her eyes to heaven, and shake her head sadly. "This is all very well," said Madam la Princess, "but Sir Corneille has offered to recite us some verses from his comedy."

"And he's quite ready to do so," said Rotrou. "Asking for verses from a poet is like asking for water from a spring. Come now, friend Corneille!" Corneille blushed, stammered a bit, put his hand to his forehead, and then in a voice that seemed made more for tragedy than for comedy, recited the following verses:

I admit, my friend, my disorder is so incurable
That only one remedy offers me relief;
And after the disdain Mélite has treated me with,
It would be only just to quit her for another.
But in spite of all her cruelty, she rules with Such powerful sway o'er my heart that I dare to murmur
Only in her absence. In vain, I make every effort to Surmount this passion, and make a thousand
Resolutions when she is not present; then, I no sooner
See her again when a single glance rivets my Fetters stronger, and throws such a pleasing and delightful
Veil over my reason, that I pursue my disorder,
And fly from every remedy I proposed. But this Flattering hope, this pleasing delusion only rekindles
Up my flame, and confirms me the more her slave.

These verses were greeted two or three times by approving murmurs, indicating that the muse of poetry did not reside only in Paris but sometimes visited the provinces, and that not all the wits of France were to be found at the Hotel of Rambouillet or the Place Royale. At the final verse, "...And confirms me the more her slave," general applause broke out. Madam Rambouillet was the first to clap that was the signal for the others to follow. Only a few of the men protested by their silence, among them the younger Montausier brother, who couldn't abide this sort of poetry. But the poet heard only the approval and, intoxicated by the applause from the assembled wits of Paris, bowed and said, "Next comes the sonnet to Mélite. Should I go on?"

"Yes, yes," cried Madam la Princess, Madam Rambouillet, the beautiful Julie and Miss Paulet all together along with all those who echoed the tastes of the mistress of the house. Corneille continued:

What beauty with Mélite can compare,
What more than my passion can prove,
So matchless her charms, I declare,
Can be equalled by nought but my love.
"Though new beauties appear to my eyes,
Though her coldness embitters my heart,
Too cruel, she hears not my sighs,
Too lovely, she fixes the dart.
"But no wonder she's deaf to my flame,
To the power of the god I submit,
Since love's whole power I must feel,
But she only beauty and wit.

The sonnet exceeds all other forms of poetry in exciting admiration – though Boileau, who wouldn't be born for another eight years, hadn't yet said, "A faultless sonnet is still just a long poem."

And this sonnet was hailed as faultless, particularly by the women, who applauded loud and long. Even Miss Scudery deigned to bring her hands together. Rotrou, his loyal heart overflowing, enjoyed his friend's triumph more than any. "In truth, Sir Rotrou, you were right!" said Madam la Princess. "Your friend is a young man who must be championed."

"If you think so, Madam, do you suppose that, through Sir Prince, you might find him a position?" asked Rotrou, lowering his voice so as to be heard by Madam Condé alone. "Because he has no fortune, and, as you can see, it would be a shame if, for lack of a few coins, a career of genius should die unborn."

"Ah, well, Sir Prince! There's no use trying to talk to him about poetry. The other day, he found me dining with Sir Chapelain. Later he asked, 'Who was that little black bird dining with you?' When I told him it was Sir Chapelain, he said, 'Ah. And who is this Sir Chapelain?'

'The creator of La Pucelle.'

'Oh, he's a sculptor, then.' Hopeless. But I will speak to Madam Combalet, who will speak to the cardinal. Do you think he would agree to work on His Eminence's tragedies?"

"He would agree to anything that would enable him to stay in Paris. If he was capable of Mélite as a law clerk, imagine what he could do in this world where you are the queen and the marquise is prime minister."

"It's a good play, this Mélite, whether or not it succeeds. We will see to it that something is arranged."

And she held out her lovely, near-royal hand to Rotrou, who took it in his own and looked at it, as if considering its beauty. "Well, what are you thinking?" asked Madam Princess.

"I look on this hand, and wonder if it can really feed two poets. Alas, no – it's too small a thing."

"Fortunately," Madam Condé said, "God gave me two of them: one for you, and one for him you ask about."

"Corneille, Corneille," Rotrou called, "come here! Madam la Princess, in honour of the sonnet to Mélite, permits you to kiss her hand."

Corneille nearly fainted. To be applauded by Madam Rambouillet and to kiss the hand of Madam la Princess, all on the evening of his debut in Paris – never in his most ambitious dreams had he aspired to even one of these favours but who really was honoured here? Was it Corneille and Rotrou who kissed the hands of the wife of the first prince of the blood? Or was it Madam Condé, whose hands were kissed by the future authors of Wenceslas and The Cid?

Posterity says that the one honoured was Madam la Princess. Meanwhile, Master Claude, white wand in hand like Polonius in Hamlet, came whispering to the Marquise of Rambouillet. She listened, gave him some quiet orders and directions, and then lifted her head to make an announcement. "Noble lords and dear ladies, my precious and excellent friends, had I invited you to spend the evening with me just to hear the verses of Sir Corneille, you would have no reason to complain. But I've gathered you tonight for a purpose less ethereal and more material. I have often spoken of the superiority of the sorbets and ice creams of Italy to those of France. After long search, I've found a glacier of sorbet that comes straight from Naples, and at last I can have you taste it. Don't follow me because you love me – follow me because you love sorbet! Sir Corneille, give me your arm."

"And here's my arm, Sir Rotrou," said Madam la Princess who that evening was determined to follow the example of the marquise in everything. Corneille, trembling and awkward, the man of genius just arrived from the provinces, held out his arm to the marquise while Rotrou, gallantly and like a complete cavalier, extended his to Madam Condé. The Count of Salles, the younger of the Montausier brothers, volunteered to escort the beautiful Julie, while the Marquis of Montausier led in Miss Paulet. Gombauld escorted Miss Scudery, and the others arranged themselves as seemed best. Madam Combalet, the severity of her Carmelite habit mitigated by a corsage of violets and rosebuds, accepted no man's arm but followed immediately behind Madam la Princess. Beside her was Madam Saint-Étienne, the marquise's second daughter, who also aspired to a life of religion. However, there was a difference between her and Madam Combalet, in that every day she took a step further into that life, while Madam Combalet took another step out. Up to that point, there'd been no surprises for Madam Rambouillet's guests but then the marquise, in her quality as guide, walked past the princess to a spot on the wall that wasn't known to have a door. There she tapped the wall with her fan. Instantly, the wall opened as if by magic, and they stood on the threshold of a beautiful room decorated with furniture of blue velvet trimmed with gold and silver. The wall hangings, like the furniture, were blue velvet with similar trim. In the middle of this room was a table laden with flowers, fruits, cakes, and ice cream, presided over by two little cherubs who were none other than the younger sisters of Julie d'Angennes and Madam Saint-Étienne. The company gave a unanimous cry of admiration; all had thought that beyond that wall was the neighbouring garden of the Three Hundred but here was a chamber so marvellously furnished and wondrously painted that it seemed as if the architect must be a fairy and the decorator a magician. While everyone raved about the tasteful opulence of the chamber that was to become famous as the Blue Room, Chapelain took pencil and paper into one corner of the salon, sat, and sketched out the first three stanzas of his Ode to Zirphée, a work that was to be nearly as celebrated as his La Pucelle. The guests had seen what Chapelain was up to, so there was a profound silence when he who was considered the first poet of his time stood up, extended a hand, placed one foot forward, and with eyes alight pronounced the following verses:

Urgande once knew well
The favour of Amadis and his noble band.
By her charms she broke the laws
Of time, that heaven shall take all it gives.
I had to show your eyes what she did by charm:
Keep Artemisia with the art that Urgande
Had used to keep Amadis.
"By the power of this art,
I built this lodge to keep
Time and fate at bay,
To outstrip the corruption of change –
For what passes in this paradise passes not at all.
Where rushing time hides its terrible face,
Old age trespasses not.
"This incomparable beauty
That a hundred evils could not bring to surrender,
Enchanted by this building,
Baffled by its defences,
Shining from her throne with a divine radiance
That then, over mortals, spreads out
Without cloud, eclipse, or end.

Cries of enthusiasm and three rounds of applause greeted this improvisation – when suddenly, in the middle of the cheers, Voiture rushed into the room. Pale and covered in blood, he cried, "A doctor! A doctor! The Marquis of Pisany had a fight with Souscarrières and is badly wounded!"

And right behind him the Marquis of Pisany, unconscious and pale as death, was carried into the salon in the arms of Brancas and Chavaroché. "My son!"

"My brother!"

"The marquis!"

The cries went up and forgetting the pleasures of the Blue Room, everyone rushed to the side of the wounded man. Even as the unconscious Marquis of Pisany was borne into the Hotel of Rambouillet, back at the Inn of the Painted Beard an unexpected event, one that would greatly complicate things, threw everything there into disarray. Lying atop the table where previously he had set his mugs of beer, believed dead and just awaiting his shroud, was Étienne Latil – who sighed, opened his eyes, and said in a low but perfectly intelligible voice, these two words: "I'm thirsty."

075
Marina & Jacquelino

A few minutes before Latil uttered the two words that so often signify the return of the wounded to life – and which, in any case, were entirely typical of our swordsman – a young man presented himself at the Inn of the Painted Beard and asked if room number thirteen was occupied by a peasant woman from Pau named Marina. He added that she would be easily recognised by her beautiful hair, her lovely dark eyes, and by her red bonnet, of the style worn in the rugged mountains of Coaraze where Henry IV had, bareheaded and barefoot, so often climbed as a child. Madam Soleil took her time in replying, admiring her inquirer's youthful good looks while favouring him with her most charming smile. Finally she admitted, with a knowing look, that a young woman called Marina was in the room referred to, and had been waiting for half an hour or so. And Madam Soleil, with the sort of graceful gesture that women of thirty to thirty-five like to make before handsome lads of twenty to twenty-two – with this graceful gesture Madam Soleil indicated the stairs, at the top of which the young man would find room number thirteen. The young man was, as we've said, a handsome lad of twenty to twenty-two, of medium height but a good figure, every move of which showed elegance and strength. He had the blue eyes of the Northerner, sheltered by the dark eyebrows and hair of the South. His complexion, tanned by the sun, was slightly pale from fatigue. A thin moustache and a nascent goatee enhanced a pair of fine, smiling lips that, when opened, revealed a double row of white teeth that any lady of the Court might envy. His costume of a Basque peasant, was both comfortable and elegant. It began at the top with a red, or rather oxblood, beret, decorated with a black tassel and two drooping feathers that framed his face charmingly. Below, he wore a doublet of the same colour as the beret, trimmed with black lace, with the left sleeve open and hanging loose so that it could, in this period of assaults by day and ambushes by night, serve as a quick defence against the slash of a dagger or sword. This doublet was buttoned from top to bottom, as was no longer the fashion in Paris, where one now wore the doublet partly unbuttoned to show off one's lace-trimmed shirt beneath. Below the waist the young man wore a sort of buff grey trousers, and a pair of high-heeled shoes rather than boots. A dagger was thrust through the leather belt at his waist, from which a long rapier hung down along his legs. These were the arms of a gentleman, not exactly compatible with the costume of a peasant. He arrived at the door, made sure the room was in fact number thirteen, and then carefully knocked in a deliberate pattern: two quick taps, a pause, two more taps, and then finally a fifth. At the fifth knock the door opened, indicating that the visitor was expected. The person who opened the door was a woman of twenty-eight to thirty, a lush flower at the peak of her beauty. Her eyes that the young man had mentioned downstairs, sparkled like two black diamonds under the velvet shadow of her long eyelashes. Her hair was so dark and lustrous that no comparison with India ink or a raven's wing could do it justice. Her pale cheeks were flushed with the heat that speaks of sudden passion rather than enduring regard. Her neck, draped in strings of coral, descended to a generous bosom that trembled provocatively with each breath. Though her contours, sculpturally speaking, were more those of Niobe than of Diana, she was nonetheless rather petite, slim of waist above the flare of her rather Spanish hips. Her skirt that was on the short side, was striped red and white, and displayed a lower leg rather more aristocratic than her costume would indicate, and feet that seemed almost too small to support the bounties above. It was wrong to say that the door opened, as in fact it was only half opened until the young man said Marina, spoken more as a password than a name. The reply was Jacquelino, at which the door opened completely. The guardian stood aside to let the man enter, after which the door was shut and bolted. She turned quickly and surveyed him, as if to make sure of whom she was dealing with. They regarded each other with equal curiosity – Jacquelino, arms crossed, head high, smile on his lips; Marina, head forward, her figure relaxed yet slightly coiled, in a manner reminiscent of a panther ready to spring. "By the belly of the Grey Saint!" the young man said suddenly. "I'd no idea I had such a delicious cousin!"

"Neither did I, upon my soul, 'cousin,'" the young woman replied.

"And, by my faith," Jacquelino continued, "relatives like we are, who've never even met before, should certainly get acquainted with a kiss."

"That seems to me a very appropriate welcome between ... cousins," said Marina, offering her cheeks that were coloured with a glow that an observer might take for the flush of desire rather than the blush of modesty.

And they kissed. "Ah! By the merry soul of my father," said the young man in a good-natured tone that seemed natural to him, "it's the finest thing in the world, I think, to embrace a beautiful woman – especially as what follows may be a finer thing yet."

And he spread his arms again to put the idea into action. "Gently, cousin," said the young woman, stopping him short. "Not that I don't think that's a fine idea but time is short. And that's your fault. Why did you keep me waiting for half an hour?"

"For the love of God! What a question! Because I thought I would be met by some fat German nanny or some dried-up Spanish duenna, not, God knows, a cousin as fair and succulent as the one I actually found waiting."

"I accept that excuse but right now I have to be able to report to the one who sent me that I saw you, and that you're ready to obey her orders in all respects – as befits a noble cavalier when addressed by a great princess."

The young man dropped to one knee. "I await these orders humbly and eagerly."

"Oh! You can't kneel to me, my Lord!" Marina cried, lifting him to his feet. "What are you thinking?"

Then she added, with a sly smile, "What a shame you're so charming."

"Come," said the young man, taking the hands of his supposed cousin between his own and seating her beside him, "tell me whether my return is regarded with at least some satisfaction."

"More than that," she said, "with joy."

"And she's not unhappy to grant me this audience?"

"More than happy."

"And the message I carry will be greeted with sympathy?"

"With enthusiasm."

"And yet it's eight days since I arrived, and I've been waiting two days since our first contact!"

"You're charming, my cousin but charm can't mint days. How long has it been since we returned from La Rochelle? Two and a half days."

"That's true."

"In that case, dress warmly and bring a good cloak. It's a cold night!"

"I'm ready!" said the young page. His master frequently employed him as a street runner, so he was an old hand at such matters. "Will I be guarding your horse?"

"Better: you'll be an honour guard at the Louvre. But not a word, Galaor, even to your master."

"Say no more, my Lord," said the lad, smiling and placing a finger to his lips. He moved toward the door.

"Wait," said the Count of Moret. "I have further instructions."

The page bowed. "Get a horse ready to go and put loaded pistols in both holsters."

"Just one horse?"

"Yes, just one – you'll ride behind me. A second horse would attract attention."

"Just as My Lord orders."

Ten o'clock sounded. The count listened, counting each bronze beat. "Ten o'clock," he said. "Go, and have everything ready within a quarter of an hour."

The page bowed and went out, proud of being in the confidence of the count. As to the latter, he went to his wardrobe and dressed in the outfit of a cavalier, simple but elegant, with a red doublet and blue breeches, both of velvet. His fine cambric shirt was trimmed with magnificent Brussels lace, showing through his doublet's slashed sleeves at cuffs and wrist. He drew on tall knee boots and donned a grey felt hat decorated with feathers that echoed the colours of his clothes, red and blue, pinned in place with a diamond brooch. Then he draped a rich baldric over his shoulder, and hung from it a red-hilted sword, a weapon both handsome and practical. Finally, with that vanity natural to youth, he spent a few minutes on his appearance, making sure his naturally curly hair framed his face correctly, and that his fashionably long love-lock – which he wore because his moustache and goatee refused to grow as thick as he would have liked – fell properly to the left. He took a purse from a drawer to replace the one he'd left with Latil, and then, as if that reminded him, murmured, "But who the devil would want me killed?" He reflected for a moment but as he could think of no satisfactory answer to his question, with the insouciance of youth he set the matter aside. He patted himself to make sure he hadn't forgotten anything, glanced once more at the mirror, then went down the stairs singing the last verse of the song he'd begun at the Inn of the Painted Beard.

"Song, go where I'm thinking of,
Into the chamber of my love,
There to kiss those fingers
That brought to me such healing.
Promise them all the feeling
That in my heart still lingers."

At the street door, the count found the page waiting for him with a horse. He leaped into the saddle with the lightness and elegance of a consummate horseman. At his invitation, Galaor climbed up behind. After making sure the page was well seated, the count set his horse at a trot down Rue Maubué, took the Rue Troussevache to the Rue Saint-Honoré, and finally reached the Rue des Poulies. At the corner of the Rue des Poulies and the Rue des Fossés-Saint-Germain, beneath a lamp-lit Madonna, a young lad sat on a borne. Seeing a cavalier with a page on his crupper, and thinking it was probably the gentleman he was waiting for, he rose and opened his cloak. Beneath it he wore a jacket of buff and blue: the livery of Madam la Princess. The count recognised the page as the one he was to meet. He set Galaor on the ground, dismounted, and approached the lad. The page got down from his borne and waited respectfully. "Casale," the count said.

"Mantua," the page replied.

The count gestured to Galaor to stay back, came near his guide, and said, "So I'm to follow you, my pretty lad?"

"Yes, Sir Count, if you would," the page replied in a voice so musical, the prince immediately suspected he was dealing with a woman.

"Well, then," he said, abandoning the tone a man takes with a boy, "please be so kind as to show me the way."

The count's altered tone didn't escape the notice of the person he addressed. The page gave him a sidelong glance, tried and failed to stifle a laugh, then gestured in the direction they were to go and marched on before him. At the drawbridge, the page whispered a password to the sentry, and they crossed over to the gate of the Louvre. Passing into the courtyard, they headed for the northeast corner. Arriving at the inner gate, the page removed his cloak, displaying his livery of buff and blue, and said, in as masculine a voice as possible, "Household of Madam la Princess."

But in doing so, the page's face was exposed to the light from the gate lantern. The rays glanced from golden hair that fell to rounded shoulders, glinted from blue eyes full of mischief and merriment, and glowed on a mouth both full and fine, as ready to bite as to kiss. And the Count of Moret recognised Marie of Rohan-Montbazon, Duchess of Chevreuse. He caught up with her at the turn of the stairs, saying, "Dear Marie, did my friend the duke send you to make me jealous of him?"

"No, my dear Count," she said, "especially since he knows you're making a fool of yourself over Madam la Montagne."

"Good answer," laughed the prince. "I see that as well as the most beautiful, you're still the wittiest creature in the world."

"If the end result of my journey from Holland is to hear compliments from you, My Lord," she said with a bow, "then the trip was worth it."

"Indeed! But I thought you'd been exiled after that little intrigue in the garden at Amiens."

"Oh, that! In recognition that I and Her Majesty were both quite innocent – and at the insistence of the queen – the cardinal has deigned to forgive me."

"Unconditionally?"

"Well, I did have to take an oath to forego meddling in intrigue."

"And how are you keeping that oath?"

"Scrupulously, as you see."

"Does your conscience have nothing to say to you?"

"Why should it? I have a papal dispensation."

The count laughed. "And besides," she continued, "is it intrigue to conduct a brother-in-law to meet his sister-in-law?"

"Dear Marie," said the count, taking her hand and kissing it with the passion he had inherited from his royal father, as we already saw with his "cousin" at the Inn of the Painted Beard. "Dear Marie, will you surprise me by revealing that your room is on the way to the queen's chamber?"

"Ah, you truly are the only genuine son of Henry IV! All the others are just ... bastards."

"Even my brother, Louis XIII?" laughed the count.

"Especially your brother, Louis XIII – whom God preserve! How can he have so little of your blood in his veins?"

"We don't have the same mother, Duchess."

"And maybe not the same father, either."

"Ah, Marie!" the Count of Moret cried. "You're too adorable not to be kissed!"

"Are you crazy? Trying to kiss a page on the staircase? It will be the ruin of your reputation – especially for one who just came from Italy."

"We can't have that," said the count. "And that's it – there goes my mood."

He dropped the duchess's hand. "Well!" she said. "The queen sends one of her loveliest women to meet him at the Inn of the Painted Beard, and he complains!"

"My cousin Marina?"

"Your 'cousin Marina,' who else?"

"Ah! By the belly of the Grey Saint! Who's that little enchantress?"

"What! You don't know?"

"No!"

"You don't know Fargis?"

"Fargis, the wife of our ambassador to Spain?"

"Exactly. She was given a position near the queen after that affair in the Amiens garden got the rest of us exiled."

"Well, well!" the Count of Moret laughed. "I see the queen is well guarded, with the Duchess of Chevreuse at the head of her bed and Madam Fargis at the foot. My poor brother Louis! You must admit, Duchess, he has no luck at all."

"You're so delightfully impertinent, my Lord, that it's a good thing we've arrived."

"We're there?"

The duchess took a key from her pouch and opened the door of a dark corridor. "Here is your path, my Lord," she said.

"You're not going to take me all the way?"

"No, you're going by yourself."

"Am I? Well, I swore an oath I'd do this. Now a trap door will open beneath my feet, and it'll be good night to Antoine of Bourbon. Not that I have much to lose, since the women treat me so badly."

"Ingrate. If you knew who waited for you at the other end of this corridor..."

"What! Does another woman await me at the end of the passage?"

"Yes, the third one this evening. Any more complaints?"

"No, no complaints from me! Au revoir, Duchess."

"Watch out for that trap door."

"I'll risk it."

The duchess shut the door, and the count found himself in complete darkness. He hesitated for a moment. He had no idea where he was. He considered turning back but the sound of the key turning in the lock forestalled that idea. Finally, after hesitating a few more seconds, he decided to press on. "By the belly of the Grey Saint!" he said. "After all, the lovely duchess says I'm the true son of Henry IV, and it's no lie."

Arms extended in the dark, he advanced slowly toward the far end of the corridor. In complete darkness, even the bravest man will hesitate. He'd gone scarcely twenty paces when he heard the rustling of a dress and the intake of a breath. He stopped. The rustling and breathing stopped as well. He was trying to decide what to say to the source of this charming sound, when a soft and trembling voice asked, "Is that you, my Lord?"

The voice was no more than two steps away. "Yes," said the count. He stepped forward and an outstretched hand found his own. But she instantly withdrew it, and he heard a faint cry, as melodious as a sylph's sigh or the sound of a wind-brushed harp. The count started at the sound. He felt a new and unknown sensation. It was delicious. "Where are you?" he murmured.

"H-here," the voice stammered.

"I was told I would find a hand to guide me on my way. Are you ... refusing it?"

The timid presence hesitated a moment, then said, "Here it is."

The count took the hand between his own and tried to bring it to his lips but stopped as the voice cried, in alarm and appeal, "My Lord!"

"Your pardon, Miss," the count said as respectfully as if speaking to the queen.

He lowered her hand, already halfway to his lips, and both fell silent. He yet kept her hand in his, and she didn't try to remove it, standing as still as if she'd lost the power, or the will, to move. Her hand, resting in his, was as still as she was. But that didn't keep the count from realising that it – that she – was small, fine, elegant, aristocratic, and virginal above all. He stood, motionless and silent, holding her hand, entirely forgetting what had brought him there. "Are you coming, my Lord?" the sweet voice asked.

"Where do you want me to go?" asked the count, somewhat at random.

"But ... the queen is waiting for you. The queen."

"Oh, yes! I'd forgotten." He sighed. "Let's go."

But Cardinal Richelieu was a man of genius, while Cardinal Bérulle was a fool. Meanwhile, Sir, the king's brother, for whom Richelieu had arranged a marriage, used the immense fortune he'd gained from Miss of Montpensier to conspire against the cardinal. A secret council was organised around Doctor Bouvard, who'd replaced the brave Doctor Héroard as the king's physician. Sir would be successor to Louis XIII should Louis die without an heir, and through Bouvard he had his finger on the pulse of the patient – for Bouvard, a man devoted to the Spanish cause, and who lived for the Church, was the evil genius of the two queens. Everyone knew that this melancholy king, consumed by ennui, wrought by care, who felt loved by none and hated by all, whom the doctors plagued with the lethal medicine of the time, purging relentlessly and bleeding repeatedly, might vanish from one moment to the next, disappearing into the black humours that defined his life. If the king died, Richelieu would be at the mercy of his enemies and, within twenty-four hours of the death of the king, would be hanged. The Count of Chalais was disinclined to wait for this event, however, and offered to kill the cardinal. Marie de Médicis seconded the motion, Madam Conti bought the daggers but sweet Anne of Austria voiced an objection of only three words: "He's a priest."

Thus the king, who since the assassination of Henry IV had hated his mother, since the conspiracy of Chalais had suspected his brother, since the love affair with Buckingham and, especially, since the scandal of the garden of Amiens despised the queen – the king, who abhorred his wife as he loathed all women, lacking the virtues of the Bourbons but with only half the vices of the Valois, became increasingly cold and aloof from his family. He knew that his projected war in Italy, or rather the cardinal's projected war, was anathema to Marie de Médicis, Gaston d'Orléans, and particularly Anne of Austria, because it was really a war against Ferdinand II and Philip IV, and the queen was half-Austrian and half-Spanish. So when, under the pretext of a violent headache, the queen declined to attend the ballet being danced that evening in honour of the capture of La Rochelle – that is, in honour of the victory of her husband over her lover – Louis XIII suddenly suspected her of conspiring. Throughout the evening he'd had his eye not on the dancers but on the queen mother and Gaston d'Orléans, meanwhile sharing in a low voice with the cardinal, who stood beside him in his box, comments that had nothing to do with the choreography. When the ballet ended, instead of returning to his chambers, Louis had the idea of paying a surprise visit to the queen, to see her situation for himself. And that's why we've seen him arrive so unexpectedly, preceded by two pages, accompanied by his two favourites, and followed by Beringhen, appearing in the hall just as the Count of Moret and his guide disappeared into the closet. Five minutes after entering the queen's chambers, Louis XIII left them. Here's what happened during those five minutes. Royal etiquette decreed that, when the king slept under the same roof as the queen, it was forbidden to bar the doors of the queen's chambers. The king thus had no difficulty in passing through the three doors that separated the gallery from the queen's bedroom. Upon entering her bedroom, he took a quick look around, peering into all the darkest shadows and farthest corners. Everything was in perfect order. The queen was sleeping with a calm that spoke only of chastity, breathing smoothly and deeply as Louis XIII, more jealous of his power as king than of his rights as a husband, left the doorway and approached the bed. But queens are light sleepers, and though thick Flanders carpets muffled the footsteps of her august husband, her breathing fluttered and paused, and a hand of wonderful whiteness and elegance drew aside the bed-curtain. A head, hair adorably disarranged, rose from the pillow, and two large astonished eyes fixed for a moment on the unexpected visitor, as a voice, trembling with surprise, exclaimed, "What, is it you, Sire?"

"Myself, Madam," the king coldly replied while taking his hat in his hand, as every gentleman must before a lady.

"And by what happy chance do you favour me with a visit?" continued the queen.

"I heard that you were unwell, Madam. Concerned for your health, I wanted to come myself to say that, unless you take the trouble to visit me, I will probably not have the pleasure of seeing you tomorrow or the day after."

"Your Majesty goes hunting?" asked the queen.

"No, Madam; Bouvard felt that after all these festivals that are fatiguing for me, I should be purged and bled. So tomorrow, and the day after, I shall bleed. Goodnight, Madam, and excuse me for having awakened you. By the way, who is serving you tonight, Madam Fargis or Madam Chevreuse?"

"Neither, sire – it is Miss Isabelle of Lautrec."

"Ah! Very good," said the king, as if the name were reassuring. "But where is she?"

"In the next room, where she sleeps fully clothed on a couch. Does Your Majesty wish me to call her?"

"No, thank you. Au revoir, Madam."

"Au revoir, Sire." And Anne, with a sigh of regret – feigned or real but, under the circumstances, we suspect feigned – released the curtain of the bed and dropped her head to the pillow.

As for Louis XIII, he resumed his hat, gave the room a final look that showed he was still suspicious, and went out, muttering, "It seems this time the cardinal was mistaken."

He entered the antechamber where his retinue awaited him. "The queen's indeed very ill," he said. "Follow me, Gentlemen!" And in the same order they had come, the procession resumed its march toward the chambers of the king.

What Passed in the Bedchamber of Queen Anne of Austria after the Departure of King Louis XIII

No sooner was the sound of footsteps fading down the hall, along with the last reflections of the flickering torches, when the door of the closet in which the Count of Moret had taken refuge was gently opened by his guide, and the head of the young lady peeked from the opening. Then, seeing that all had returned to silence and darkness, she ventured out and looked down the gallery, where the last rays of the pages' torches were disappearing. Finding that the danger passed, she returned to the closet and said to the count, light as a bird, "Come out, my Lord."

Then, remaining always at a distance where the young man could not quite see her face clearly, she opened one after another the three doors which the king had closed behind him. The young man followed her, speechless, breathless, bewildered. In the narrow, dark closet, the girl had had no choice but to squeeze up against him, and, although protected by the powerful hand of chastity, she couldn't prevent the count from becoming drunk on her breath, absorbing through every pore the sensuous scent that emanates from the body of a young woman, the very fragrance of nubile youth. Before opening the last door, hearing his footsteps approaching, she extended her hand toward the count and said, in a voice not entirely steady, "My Lord, be as kind as to wait here. When she wants to receive you, Her Majesty will call."

And she went in to the queen. This time, Anne of Austria was neither sleeping nor pretending to sleep. "Is that you, dear Isabelle?" she asked, drawing aside the curtain more quickly and rising more eagerly than she had for the king.

"Yes, Madam, it's me," the young woman replied, standing so her head was in shadow and the queen couldn't see the flush that lit up her face.

"You know the king just left?"

"I saw him, Madam."

"He doubtless suspects."

"Perhaps but he can't be sure."

"The count is here?"

"In the next chamber."

"Light a taper and give me a hand mirror."

Isabelle obeyed, giving the mirror to the queen, and holding the candle to illuminate it. Anne of Austria was pretty rather than beautiful. Her features were very small, the nose undistinguished but her skin was clear and she had the glorious blond hair of the Flemish dynasty she shared with Charles V and Philip II. A thorough coquette, she was well aware of its effect on men, even her brother-in-law Sir, so she took the trouble to arrange a few locks that had become ruffled, straightened the folds of her long silk robe, and raised herself to pose on one elbow. Returning the mirror to her maid of honour with a smile of thanks, she indicated that she was ready. Isabelle put the mirror and the candle on the vanity, bowed respectfully, and retired through the door where the queen had told the king her maid of honour was asleep on a couch. The bedchamber remained lit by the double glow of the candle and a small lamp, both placed so as to shed their rays on the side of the bed where Anne of Austria had spoken to the king, and now waited to give audience to the Count of Moret. However, left alone, the queen, before calling him, seemed to be awaiting someone or something. Several times she turned toward the rear of the room, gesturing and muttering impatiently. Finally, almost together, two doors opened at the back of the room. From one came a young man of twenty, with a lively face, black hair, and hard eyes that softened into insincerity. He was splendidly attired in white satin, with a red cloak embroidered with gold. He wore the Order of Saint-Esprit at his neck, as shown in contemporary portraits of him, and held a white felt hat decorated with two feathers the colour of his cloak. This young man was Gaston d'Orléans, usually referred to as Sir, and according to the scandal-mongers of the Louvre was the particular favourite of his mother because he was the son of the handsome Concino Concini. And anyone who sees the image of the one next to the other, as we did the other day at the Museum of Blois, where hang the portraits of the Marshall d'Ancre and the second son of Marie de Médicis, would note the extraordinary resemblance between the two that gives credence to that grave accusation. We said that since the Chalais affair, the king had held Sir in contempt. Indeed, Louis XIII did have a kind of conscience – he was sensitive to what was then called the honour of the crown, and is now called the honour of France. His egotism and vanity had, in Richelieu's hands, been moulded from vices into a sort of virtue. But Gaston, both disingenuous and cowardly, had been deeply implicated in the conspiracy of Nantes. He had wanted to enter the King's Council; and to keep the peace, Richelieu had consented; but when Sir wanted to bring with him his adviser, the corrupt Ornano, Richelieu had refused. The young prince had shouted, sworn, stormed, and declared that the Council could either accept Ornano voluntarily or by force. Richelieu, who couldn't arrest Gaston, instead arrested Ornano. At that, Gaston had burst through the door of the Council, and in a haughty voice demanded to know who had dared to arrest his adviser. "It's I," Richelieu calmly responded.

And that would have been the end of it, leaving Gaston seething in quiet shame, if Madam Chevreuse, at the urging of Spain, had not herself urged Chalais on. Chalais went to Sir and offered to rid him of the cardinal. This is what he proposed, or rather whispered, to Gaston: he would go with his followers to dine with Richelieu at his château of Fleury, and there at his table, betray his hospitality by having his men-at-arms assassinate the defenceless priest. For sixty years, Spain had extended its hideous yellow-stained hand in this way to remove anyone great enough to oppose it. In politics, removal means death. Thus she had removed Coligny, William of Nassau, Henry III, Henry IV – and now it was Richelieu's turn. It was a process as crude as it was effective. But this time, it failed. After that incident, Richelieu, like Hercules in the Augean stables, began cleaning the Court of its treacherous princes. The Vendomes, two bastards of Henry IV, were arrested. The Count of Soissons fled, Madam Chevreuse was exiled, and the Duke of Longueville was disgraced. As for Sir, he signed a confession in which he denounced and renounced his friends. He was then married and enriched but dishonoured. Chalais bore the shame of the conspiracy alone, and it cost him his head. And yet Sir, already so deep in dishonour, was then only twenty years old. Entering by the other door, at almost the same time as Sir, was a woman of fifty-five or fifty-six, royally dressed, wearing a small gold crown atop her head, a long ermine-trimmed purple robe, and a dress of white satin with gold embroidery. The ensemble was new but neither beautiful nor distinguished. Her corpulent bulk showed why Henry IV had called her his fat banker. Marie de Médicis, resentful and discontented, delighted in intrigue. Though she was the mental inferior of Catherine of Médicis, she eclipsed her in debauchery. If we are to believe all that was said, only one of her children belonged to Henry IV: Henriette, later Queen of England. But of all her children, she loved none but Gaston. She was willing to advance his interest even if it meant the death of her eldest son, an event she already welcomed as inevitable. As with Catherine of Médicis and her son Henry III, her obsession was to see Gaston on the throne. But Louis XIII hated her as much as she hated him for a more serious charge than that. It was said that she as good as placed the knife in the hands of the assassin Ravailiac, who killed Henry IV. A confession taken from Ravailiac on the wheel had been said to implicate both her and the Duke of Épernon – but a fire at the Palace of Justice had removed all trace of this confession. The day before, mother and son had been summoned by Anne of Austria, who informed them that the Count of Moret who had arrived in Paris a week earlier, had letters for them from the Duke of Savoy. They came to the queen, as we have seen, by two different doors that led to their own apartments. If caught, they planned to plead concern for the indisposition of Her Majesty, learned of only at the ballet, an illness that so worried them that they came directly, without even changing their clothes. As for the Count of Moret, in the event of surprise, he was to hide somewhere. A young man of twenty-two is always easy to hide; Anne of Austria had experience with that sort of conjuring trick. Meanwhile, the Count of Moret waited in the next room where he, to the bottom of his heart, thanked God for the delay. How could he appear before the queen troubled and trembling after parting from his unknown guide? The ten-minute reprieve was barely enough to enable him to calm the beating of his heart and steady his voice. From this agitation he passed into a reverie, more sweet than any he'd known before.

All at once, the voice of Anne of Austria made him start and break out of his reverie. "Count," she asked, "are you there?"

"Yes, Madam," replied the count, "here and awaiting the orders of Your Majesty."

"Come in then, for we're eager to receive you."

Letters Read Aloud & Letters Read Alone

The Count of Moret shook his young and graceful head, as if to dispel his dreams, and, pushing open the door before him, stood on the threshold of Anne of Austria's bedchamber. We must admit that his first glance, despite the high-ranking people present, was to look for his charming guide, who had left him without ever revealing her face. But though his eyes sought the most obscure corners of the room, eventually he had to give up and set his gaze and mind on the group within the light. This group, as we've said, consisted of the queen mother, the reigning queen, and the Duke of Orléans. The queen mother was standing beside the bed; Anne of Austria was upon it; and Gaston was sitting beside his sister-in-law. The count bowed deeply, advanced toward the bed, and fell on one knee before Anne of Austria, who presented her hand to kiss. Then, stooping to the floor, the young prince touched his lips to the hem of Marie de Médicis's robe, and finally, still on one knee, turned to Gaston to kiss his hand – but Sir lifted him up and said, "Come into my arms, my brother!"

The Count of Moret, who as a true son of Henry IV had a frank and honest heart, could not believe all that was said of Gaston. He'd been in England during the Chalais conspiracy, and afterward had known Madam Chevreuse there, who'd been careful in what she'd said about the affair. He'd been in Italy during the siege of La Rochelle, when Gaston had pretended illness to avoid going to the front. And, having avoided the enticements of the Court, he had taken no part in those intrigues which had furthered the jealousies of Marie de Médicis against her husband's other children. He thus went joyfully into Gaston's embrace, honouring his brother with the warmth of his heart. Then, saluting the queen, he said, "Your Majesty should know, given the joy I feel at admission to the royal presence on his behalf, that I am profoundly grateful to the Duke of Savoy."

The queen smiled. "Indeed," she said, "it is for us to be thankful for your kind help to two poor disgraced Princess, one rebuffed from the love of her husband, the other from the affection of her son, beside a brother who's been refused his brother's embrace – because you bear, as you say, letters that must bring us consolation."

The Count of Moret took three sealed envelopes from his doublet. "This, Madam," he said, handing a letter to the queen, "is a letter addressed to you from Don Gonzales of Cordova, Governor of Milan and representative in Italy of His Majesty Philip IV, your august brother. He begs you to use all the influence you have to keep Sir Fargis as ambassador to Madrid."

"My influence!" repeated the queen. "I might have influence over a king who was a man but who could have influence over a king who is a ghost but a necromancer such as the cardinal-duke?"

The count bowed, then turned to the queen mother and presented her with a second letter. "As to this note, Madam, all I know is that it's very important, and in the personal handwriting of the Duke of Savoy. Everything within it is secret, and it was to be given to Your Majesty in person."

The queen mother took the letter eagerly, opened it, and, as she could not read it where she was, approached the candle and the lamp on the vanity. "And finally," continued the Count of Moret, presenting the third letter to Gaston, "here is a note addressed to Your Highness from Madam Christine, your august sister, who is more beautiful and charming than August itself."

As each read the letter addressed to him or her, the count took advantage of the time to sweep his gaze once more into every corner of the room – but it held only the two queens, Gaston, and himself. Marie de Médicis returned to her daughter-in-law's bedside and said, addressing the count, "Sir, when we deal with a man of your rank who makes himself available to a disgraced prince and two such oppressed women, it's best to keep no secrets from him. Better to accept his word of honour that, as an ally or a neutral, he will religiously keep any secret entrusted to him."

"Your Majesty," said the Count of Moret, bowing and pressing his hand to his chest, "you have my word of honour to remain silent, whether as neutral or ally. But my silence should not be regarded as a commitment of devotion."

The two queens exchanged a look. "You have reservations, then?" Marie de Médicis asked with her voice as Anne of Austria and Gaston asked with their eyes.

"I have two, Madam," replied the count in a soft but firm voice. "To my regret, I must remind you that I am the son of King Henry IV. I cannot draw my sword against the Protestants or against the king my brother. Likewise I cannot refuse to draw steel upon any foreign enemy against whom the King of France makes war, if the King of France calls for this honour."

"Neither the king nor the Protestants are our enemies, Prince," said the queen mother, emphasising the word prince. "Our sole, mortal enemy who's sworn our destruction is the cardinal."

"I've no affection for the cardinal, Madam but I have the honour to point out that it's difficult for a gentleman to make war on a priest. However, on the other hand, if it pleases God to send him adversity, I shall regard it as punishment for his improper conduct toward you. Is that enough for Your Majesty to trust me?"

"I believe you already know, Sir, what Don Gonzales of Cordova wrote to my daughter-in-law. Gaston will tell you what his sister Christine wrote to him. Gaston?"

The Duke of Orléans held out his letter to the Count of Moret, inviting him to read it. The count took it and did so. The Princess Christine wrote to her brother reasons why it was best to give her father-in-law, Charles-Emmanuel of Savoy, possession of Mantua and Montferrat rather than allowing the Duke of Nevers the legacy of the Gonzaga, as the duke was no friend to Louis XIII – while the heir to the Duke of Savoy, her husband Victor-Amadeus, was brother-in-law to the King of France. The Count of Moret returned the letter to Gaston with a friendly salute. "What do you think, brother?" asked the latter.

"I am no politician," replied the Count of Moret, smiling; "but as regards the family, it certainly sounds reasonable."

"And now, for my turn," said Marie de Médicis, presenting to the Count of Moret her letter from the Duke of Savoy. "It's only right that you know the contents of what you were carrying."

The count took the sheet and read the following: "Do everything possible to prevent the war in Italy – but if war's declared despite the efforts of our friends, be confident that Susa Pass will be defended vigorously."

That was, ostensibly at least, all the letter contained. The young man bowed before Marie de Médicis with every mark of profound respect. "Now," said the queen mother, "it remains for us to thank our young and able messenger for his skill and dedication, and promise that if we succeed in our projects, his fortune will follow ours."

"A thousand thanks to Your Majesty's good intentions but as soon as devotion sees the hope of reward, it is tainted by calculation and ambition. My own fortune is sufficient to my needs, and I ask little personal glory to justify my birth."

"Then," said Marie de Médicis, while her daughter-in-law presented her hand for the Count of Moret to kiss, "any such obligations are ours alone. Gaston, give your brother your love. But quickly: when midnight strikes, he must be out of the Louvre."

The count sighed and took one last look around. He'd hoped that the same guide who'd brought him here would lead him to the exit. With a sigh of regret, he gave up that hope. He saluted the two queens, and then, somewhat agitated, followed the Duke of Orléans. Gaston led him to his own apartments, where he opened a door to a secret staircase. "Now, my brother," he said, "receive my thanks once more and believe in my sincere gratitude."

The count bowed. "Is there a password?" he asked. "Something I need to say to escape?"

"None. Just knock on the window of the Swiss Guards and say 'Household of the Duke of Orléans, night service,' and they'll let you pass."

The count took one last look behind him, sent his most tender sigh toward his unknown guide, then went down two flights, knocked on the window of the Swiss Guards, spoke the necessary words, and immediately found himself in the courtyard. Then, as one needed a password to enter the Louvre but none to leave it, he crossed the drawbridge and found himself again at the corner of the Rue des Fossés-Saint-Germain and the Rue des Poulies. There waiting for him were his page and his horse, or rather the page and the horse of the Duke of Montmorency. "Ah," he whispered, "I'll wager she's less than eighteen and ravishingly beautiful. By the belly of the Grey Saint! I think I must conspire against the cardinal if that's the only way to see her again."

Meanwhile, Gaston d'Orléans, after making sure the Count of Moret had made it safely into the courtyard, returned to his chambers, locked himself in his bedroom, closed the curtains to ensure that no prying eyes could see him, and, taking the letter from his sister Christine from his pocket, held it with trembling hand over the flame of a candle. Slowly, under the influence of the heat, in between the lines written in black, new lines appeared – written in the same hand but traced in secret ink, now appearing in yellow and red. These newly revealed lines read: "Continue your apparent courtship of Marie de Gonzague but secretly reassure the queen. It is only upon our older brother's death that Anne of Austria can assume the crown – and if she does not, my dear Gaston, then with the support of Madam Fargis and Madam Chevreuse, she must find a way to be, if not queen, then regent."

"Oh," murmured Gaston, "don't worry, my dear little sister, I'll be on guard."

And opening a desk, he locked the letter in a secret drawer. As for the queen mother, as soon as the Duke of Orléans had departed, she took leave of her daughter-in-law and returned to her apartment, where she undressed, donned her night-clothes, and then dismissed her women. Left alone, she pulled a bell-sash hidden by curtains. Within moments, a man of forty-five to fifty, with a yellow face and black hair, eyebrows, and moustache, answered the bell, entering through a door hidden by the tapestry. This man was musician, physician, and astrologer to the queen mother. He was, sad to say, the successor of Henry IV, of Vittorio Orsini, Concino Concini, Bellegarde, Bassompierre, and Cardinal Richelieu: the Provençal Vautier, who had made himself a doctor to manage her body and an astrologer to manage her mind. Richelieu's fall, if you can call it such, had been succeeded by the rise of Cardinal Bérulle, a fool, and of Vautier, a charlatan – and those who knew what influence he had on the queen mother said that, if anything, his exceeded that of the cardinal. Vautier came into the antechamber outside the queen's bedroom. "Quick, quick," she said, "bring here, if you have it, the liquid that reveals the invisible writings!"

"Yes, Madam," Vautier said, drawing a flask from his pouch. "Your Majesty's needs are never forgotten! Here it is. Did Your Majesty finally receive the letter she was expecting?"

"Right here," said the queen mother, taking the letter from her bosom. "Just a few insignificant lines from the Duke of Savoy. But it's obvious he has something more important to tell me, or he wouldn't send such a banal letter in care of one of my husband's bastards."

She handed the letter to Vautier, who unfolded and read it. "Indeed," he said, "there must be more to it than that."

The apparent writing, as previously shown, was five or six lines at the top of the page in the hand of Charles-Emmanuel. But given the axiom that one must always read between the lines, it was clearly time to call on the chemical expertise of Vautier. One thing was certain: if some invisible message was hidden in the letter from the Duke of Savoy, it would be below the last line, on the remaining three-quarters of the page. Vautier dipped a brush in the liquid he'd prepared and carefully washed the bottom part of the letter. As the brush moistened the white surface, lines immediately began to form here and there and after five minutes of such treatment, the following advice was distinctly visible: "Pretend to oppose your son Gaston's fervent courtship of Marie de Gonzague. If an Italian campaign is decided upon despite your opposition, get Gaston command of the army as a pretext for separating him from La Gonzague. The cardinal-duke, whose sole ambition is to be the foremost general of our age, will resign in protest. The king will accept the inevitable!"

Marie de Médicis and her adviser shared a look. "Do you have any better advice to offer me?" asked the queen mother.

"No, Madam," he replied. "I have always found it wise to follow the advice of the Duke of Savoy."

"Then let's follow it," Marie de Médicis said with a sigh. "We can't be in a worse position than we are now. Have you consulted the heavens, Vautier?"

"This evening I spent an hour atop Catherine of Médicis's observatory."

"And what say the stars?"

"They promise Your Majesty complete triumph over your enemies."

"So be it," said Marie de Médicis, and presented the astrologer a hand somewhat distorted by fat but still attractive that he kissed respectfully. And they withdrew into the bedchamber together and closed the door behind them. Alone in her room, Anne of Austria listened to the receding footsteps of Gaston d'Orléans and of her mother-in-law. When the sound had completely faded, she slowly rose, pushed her petite feet into her Spanish slippers of sky-blue satin embroidered with gold, and sat down next to her vanity. From a drawer she took out a small canvas bag containing iris powder, a perfume she preferred for her clothes above all others, and which her mother-in-law had brought her from Florence. This powder she sprinkled on the blank second page of the letter from Gonzales of Cordova – just as, by different means, the same result was obtained from the note from Christine to Gaston, and from that of Charles-Emmanuel to the queen mother. Under the powder, letters soon appeared on the sheet sent from Gonzales of Cordova to the queen. This message was from King Philip IV himself. She read:

Sister, I know from our good friend Sir Fargis of the plan by which, in the event of the death of King Louis XIII, you promise to marry his brother and heir to the throne, Gaston d'Orléans. However, it would be even better if, at the time of Louis's death, you were with child. The Queens of France have a great advantage over their husbands in that they can produce dauphins without them, an ability their husbands lack. Ponder this incontestable truth, and as you do not need my letter to inspire your meditations – burn it.

– Philip

The queen, after reading this letter from her brother the king a second time, no doubt in order to engrave its every word upon her memory, took it by one of its corners, put it to the candle, set it alight, and held it in the air until the fire consumed it, illuminating her beautiful hand and making the tips of her fingernails glow pink. Only then did she drop the letter that dissolved into thousands of sparks before it struck the floor. But, to reinforce her memory, she then transcribed the entire letter on paper, and locked it in a secret drawer in her desk. She then returned slowly to her bed and slipped her satin dressing gown from her shoulders to her hips, emerging like Venus in a wave of silver. She lay down slowly and with a sigh dropped her head on her pillow, murmuring, "Oh, Buckingham! Buckingham!" And thereafter only a few stifled sobs troubled the silence of the royal chamber.

080 The Red Sphinx

In the gallery of the Louvre there hangs a portrait by the Jansenist painter Philippe of Champagne depicting Cardinal Richelieu as he truly was, a figure fine, keen, and vigorous. Unlike the Flemish, his countrymen, or the Spanish, his masters, Philippe of Champagne was spare in his use of colour, avoiding the bright hues seen in the palettes of Rubens and Murillo. In fact, he bathed the sombre minister in a flood of half-light, as if emerging from the twilight of politics, he whose motto was Aquila in Nubibus – an eagle in the clouds. The image could be more flattering but that would elevate a lie above the truth. Study this portrait, all you men of conscience who would, after two and a half centuries, resurrect the illustrious dead and get a sense of this physical and moral genius, a man maligned by his contemporaries, ignored and almost forgotten during the following century, who found the respect he was entitled to by posterity only after two hundred years in the grave. This portrait has the power to stop one short and almost force contemplation. Is it a man or is it a ghost, that creature in the red robe, white cappa magna [big cap], Venetian collar, and red biretta, with the broad forehead, grey hair and moustache, piercing grey eyes, and hands fine, though thin and pale? This figure, burning with eternal fever, seems alive only in the flush of the cheeks. Does it not feel like the more you contemplate this portrait, the less you know if it's a living being or, like Saint Bonaventure, a dead man returned from beyond the grave to write his own memoirs? Does it not seem as if he might suddenly emerge from the canvas, step out of the frame, and walk up to you, causing you to recoil as if from a ghost?

What is clear and undeniable in this painting is that it depicts a man of mind and intelligence, and nothing more. Here is neither heart nor spirit – fortunately for France. In the vacuum of the monarchy between Henry IV and Louis XIV, with a king so weak and diffident and a Court so turbulent and dissolute, among princes so greedy and faithless, to bring order out of chaos required a brain above all. God created this terrible automaton, placed by Providence exactly between Louis XI and Robespierre, in order to crush the great nobles, as Louis XI had crushed his “grand vassals,” and as Robespierre would crush the aristocrats. From time to time, like red-stained comets, there appear these machines of history, these great harvesters that advance of their own accord, cropping the field of state, remorseless, relentless, stopping only when their work of scything is done. So Richelieu would have appeared to you on that evening of 5 December 1628 when aware of the hatred that surrounded him, he was nonetheless intent on the great projects he contemplated: exterminating heresy in France, driving the Spanish from Milan, and expelling Austria from Tuscany. He it is who appears before you in his study, trying to speak without betraying himself, to see without revealing, that impenetrable minister whom the great historian Michelet called the Red Sphinx. He had left the ballet when his intuition told him that the queen's absence had a political cause behind it that could only mean a threat to him. Something poisonous was brewing in the royal chambers, those few narrow rooms that caused him more toil and trouble than the whole rest of the wide world. He went home sad, tired, almost disgusted, murmuring like Luther, “There are times when our Lord seems to tire of the game and just lays His cards on the table.”

He was well aware that what was threatened was not just his power but his life. His hair shirt was made of the points of daggers. He felt that he was in 1628 where Henry IV had been in 1606: everyone wanted his death. Worst of all was that even Louis XIII hated him. The king was Richelieu's sole support but at any moment the cardinal might take the fall for any royal failure. A man of genius, he might have borne this if he'd been healthy and vigorous, like his idiot rival Bérulle; but the ongoing shortage of money, the continual need to invent new resources, the fact that at any given moment there were a dozen Court plots against him, kept him in constant anxiety. That was the source of the fever that reddened his cheeks, while making his forehead and hands as pale as ivory. Add to this endless religious disputes, the rage they inspired in him, and the need to suppress all his bitterness and fury, and he was burning up from within, never more than inches from death. It was a wonder that he wasn't dead twice over. Fortunately, the king somehow sensed that, if Richelieu were gone, his kingdom was lost. On the other hand, Richelieu knew that if the king died, he had less than twenty-four hours to live: hated by Gaston, by Anne of Austria, by the queen mother, by Sir Soissons from exile, by the two jailed Vendomes – hated by the whole nobility – hated, moreover, by all of Paris for having forbidden public duels, he knew the best he could hope for was to die the same day the king did – in the same hour, if possible. Only one person was faithful to him in this endless game of seesaw, when good and bad fortune followed each other so rapidly that the same day brought both storm and sun. This was his niece and adopted daughter, Madam Combalet, whom we've seen at the Hotel of Rambouillet in the Carmelite habit she'd worn since the death of her husband. The first thing the cardinal did upon entering his house in the Place Royale was to knock on a certain panel. Three doors opened simultaneously: from one appeared Guillemot, his confidential valet; from another appeared Charpentier, his secretary; from the third came Rossignol, his decoder of dispatches.

“Has my niece returned?”

“This very moment, my Lord,” replied the valet.

“Tell her I need to spend tonight at work, and ask her if she wants to visit me here or would prefer that I go to her.”

The confidential valet closed his door and went to execute his orders.

The cardinal turned to Charpentier. “Have you seen Father Joseph?” he asked.

“He's been here twice tonight,” said the secretary, “and says he must speak to my Lord this evening.”

“If he comes back a third time, bid him enter. Sir Cavois commands in the guard chamber?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Tell him not to leave. I may need his services tonight.”

The secretary retired. “And you, Rossignol,” asked the cardinal, “did you solve the cipher in the letter I gave you? You know, the one taken from the papers of Senelle, the royal physician on his return from Lorraine.”

“Yes, My Lord,” the code-master replied in a pronounced southern accent. He was a small man of forty-five to fifty whose habit of stooping made him almost hunchbacked. His most salient feature was a long nose that could have supported three or four pairs of glasses, though he made do with only one. “It couldn't have been simpler. The king is called Céphale, the queen Procris, your Eminence the Oracle, and Madam Combalet Venus.”

“Good,” said the cardinal. “Give me the key to the cipher. I'll read the dispatch myself.”

Rossignol bowed and began to withdraw. “By the way,” added the cardinal, “remind me tomorrow to give you a bonus of twenty pistoles.”

“My Lord has no other orders for me?”

“No, return to your office and prepare the cipher key for me. Have it ready when I call for it.”

Rossignol backed away, bowing to the ground. As the door closed behind him, a bell quietly sounded from within the cardinal's desk. He opened a drawer and found the bell still trembling. His immediate response was to press his finger upon a small button that must have communicated with the apartment of Madam Combalet, for less than a minute later she appeared across the room in yet another doorway. A great change had taken place in her attire: gone were her veil and bandeau, her scapular and wimple, and now she was dressed only in a sheer tunic confined at the waist by a leather belt. Her beautiful auburn hair, released from restraint, fell in silken curls to her shoulders above a décolletage considerably more generous than a strict Carmelite would have allowed, displaying the curve of her bosom beneath a bouquet of violets and rosebuds – a bouquet indicating both birth and beauty, and one we've previously remarked upon, though at Madam Rambouillet's it had been on her shoulder. The deep brown of her blouse highlighted the white satin of her elegant neck and her beautiful hands; and, as its fabric was not imprisoned in the iron corset common at that period, its folds were free to drape her shapely form. At the sight of this adorable creature who appeared in a heavenly cloud of perfume and was in the full flower of her beauty at 25 made even lovelier, more graceful by the simplicity of her outfit, the cardinal's furrowed forehead relaxed, his sombre face lit up, and he stretched his arms toward her, saying, “Oh! Come to me, Marie.”

The young woman needed no encouragement and came to him with a charming smile. She detached her bouquet, brushed it against her lips, and presented it to her uncle. “Thank you, my lovely child,” said the cardinal, who, under the pretext of scenting the bouquet, brought it to his own lips. “Thank you, beloved daughter.”

Then, drawing her toward him and kissing her on the forehead as a father would his child, he said, “I love these flowers, as fresh as you, and scented like you...”

“We are yours a hundred times over, dear Uncle. You said you wanted to see me? It would make me happy to know you needed me.”

“I always need you, my dear Marie,” said the cardinal, regarding his niece with delight, “but tonight I need you more than ever.”

“Oh, my good Uncle!” said Madam Combalet, trying to kiss the cardinal's hands, who resisted by drawing her own hands to his lips. “I see you're worried again tonight.” She added, with a sad smile, “By now, I think you'd be accustomed to worries. What do they matter, so long as you succeed?”

“Yes,” said the cardinal, “I know. I shouldn't be simultaneously high and low, happy and unhappy, powerful and helpless – but so I am, as you know better than anyone, Marie. Public success brings no private happiness. You love me with all your heart – don't you?”

“With all my heart! With all my soul!”

“After the death of Chalais, you remember, I seemed to have won a major victory: I had the queen, the two Vendomes, and the Count of Soissons on their knees before me. I pardoned them – and what did they do in return for my pardon? They chose to attack me in my very heart. They know I love nothing in the world so much as you, that your presence is as necessary to me as the air I breathe, as the sun that shines. Yet they condemn you for living with that ‘damned priest,’ that ‘man of blood.’ Live with me? Yes, you live with me, and more than that – I live because of you! Yet this life, so devoted on your side, so pure on mine, so that even seeing you as lovely as you are now, within my arms, no idea of sin has crossed my mind – this life, of which we should be proud, they denounce as a disgrace. You were so frightened of them, you renewed your vow to take the veil and enter a convent. I even had to ask the Pope, with whom I was in conflict, for the favour of a brief delay of your retreat. Worried? How should I not be worried? They can kill me, that's nothing – at the siege of La Rochelle I risked my life twenty times over. But if I'm dismissed, exiled, or imprisoned, how am I to live apart from you?”

“My beloved Uncle,” said the beautiful Carmelite, bestowing on the cardinal a look that seemed to reflect more than the tenderness of a niece for her uncle, and perhaps even more than the love of a daughter for her father. “when I took that vow, though you'd been as good as it's possible to be, I didn't know you as I know you now – didn't love you as I love you today. I made a vow but the Pope has waived it; and today, that vow is no more. Today I swear that no matter what, I'll follow you wherever you go: palaces and prisons are all the same to me. Wherever a heart may be, it lives where it loves. Well, my dear Uncle, my heart is with you, for I love you and will always love you.”

“Yes but when they defeat me, will the victors allow you to continue your devotion to me? Look, Marie, what I fear more than dismissal, more than lost power, more than thwarted ambition, is to be separated from you. Oh! If I had to fight only Spain, Austria, and Savoy, that would be nothing. But to have to fight the very people who surround me, those whom I made rich, happy, and powerful! I dare not raise my foot to crush them, vipers and scorpions though they are. This is what wearies me to despair. My foreign enemies, Spinola, Wallenstein, Olivares – who are they? I can deal with them; they're not my true enemies, my true rivals. My real rival is this Vautier, my real enemy is Bérulle – or else some stranger awaiting me in a shadowy alcove, a man whose name I don't know, of whose existence I'm entirely unaware. Me, I write tragedies – yet I know of no play darker than the drama I enact! Thus, even while battling the English fleet, while tearing down the walls of La Rochelle by sheer force of genius – I say it, though I speak of myself – I had to reach beyond our current army to raise twelve thousand more French troops so the Duke of Nevers, legitimate heir to Mantua and Montferrat, can win his inheritance. It would be enough if I just had to fight Philip IV, Ferdinand II, and Charles-Emmanuel, that is to say, Spain, Austria, and Savoy. But this astrologer Vautier ‘sees in the stars’ that the army will never pass over the mountains, while the pious Bérulle fears that the success of Nevers might imperil the ‘understanding’ between His Catholic Majesty of Spain and His Most Christian Majesty of France. They send word through the queen mother to Créqui, that same Créqui I made a peer of the realm, a Marshal of France, the Governor of Dauphiné – that Créqui who also hopes to become constable, at the expense of Montmorency, that Créqui whom nothing will sate. And suddenly there is hunger in the army that causes desertion, and who benefits but Savoy? And who is it who prepares to roll boulders from the mountains of Savoy upon French troops – who but a Queen of France, Marie de Médicis? She who is the daughter of an assassin, and the niece of a defrocked cardinal who poisoned his own brother and sister-in-law. “But the astrologer Vautier saw it in the stars! Very well, let them try to stop me – or, rather, my army. They hope to undermine me here, to sabotage me and forestall our march. But for the good of France we march to Mantua and Montferrat, small domains perhaps but in strategic positions. The fortress of Casale is the key to the Alps! In the hands of Savoy, that key would be at the disposal of Austria and Spain. “Then there's Mantua, the domain of the Gonzaga family, after Venice the last centre of the arts in Italy. Mantua that at once overlooks Tuscany, Venice, and the Papal States. What use to raise the siege of Casale if one fails to save Mantua? I'm negotiating with Gustavus Adolphus but what use to ally with the Protestants of the north before I have crushed the Protestants of the south? If this southern campaign succeeds, I could concentrate in these hands power both spiritual and temporal, and guide France for the rest of my life. And to think that what stands in my way is a charlatan, Vautier, and an idiot, Bérulle!”

He rose. “And moreover,” he added, “to think that I'm balked by this daughter-in-law and this mother-in-law, when I hold proof of the adultery of one and the complicity in the murder of Henry IV of the other. But though the words are nearly bursting from my mouth, I dare not breathe them – because it would mean a stain upon the glory of the crown of France!”

“Uncle!” cried Madam Combalet, in alarm.

“Oh, I have my witnesses,” the cardinal said. “For Queen Anne of Austria, there's Madam Bellier and Patroclus. For Marie de Médicis there's the Escoman woman. I'll yet find her, maybe in the dungeon of the Daughters of Repentance – and if she's dead, poor martyr, I'll nonetheless have words with her cadaver.” He strode back and forth in agitation.

“My dear Uncle,” said Madam Combalet, placing herself in his path. “Don't talk about this tonight. Leave it for tomorrow.”

“You're right, Marie,” Richelieu said, stopping himself by sheer force of will. “What have you done today? Where have you been?”

“I went to Madam Rambouillet's.”

“What happened there? Anything good? What says the illustrious Arthenice?” asked the cardinal, trying to smile.

“She presented us with a young poet just arrived from Rouen.”

“Do they make poets in Rouen? It's only three months since Rotrou arrived, fresh off the boat.”

“In fact, it was Rotrou who presented him.”

“And what is this poet called?”

“Pierre Corneille.”

The cardinal shrugged, as if to say: an unknown. “And I suppose he arrives with a tragedy in his pocket?”

“With a comedy, in five acts.”

“And the title?”

“Méliste.”

“That’s not a name from history.”

“No, its source is pure fantasy. Rotrou says the work is destined to eclipse all poetry, past, present, and future.”

“Sheer impertinence!”

Madam Combalet delicately changed the subject. “Then Madam Rambouillet presented us with a real surprise: she’d secretly had constructed, beyond the wall facing the Three Hundred, and unknown to anyone but the masons and carpenters, an addition to her hotel – a beautiful new chamber, all hung in blue velour, gold, and silver. I’ve never seen anything decorated in such exquisite taste.”

“Would you like something like it, Marie? Nothing could be easier – I’ll include it in the palace I’m building.”

“Thank you but for me, please remember, all I need is an austere monastic cell – so long as it’s near you.”

“Is that all the news?”

“Not quite all – though I’m not sure if I should tell you the rest.”

“Why is that?”

“Because the rest involves ... a sword.”

“Duels! Always duels!” Richelieu hissed. “What must I do to rid France of this insane obsession with honour?”

“This time it wasn’t a duel, just a simple encounter. The Marquis of Pisany was brought to the Hotel of Rambouillet disabled by a wound.”

“A dangerous wound?”

“No, because he has the luck to be a hunchback: the blade hit the top of his hump and, unable to penetrate, slid down his side. ‘My God,’ the surgeon said, ‘it slid along the side of his chest and went through his left arm.’”

“Do we know the cause of this fight?”

“I think he mentioned the Count of Moret.”

“The Count of Moret,” Richelieu repeated, frowning. “I think I’ve heard that name in these last three days. And he gave this pretty sword wound to the Marquis of Pisany?”

“No, it was one of the marquiss’s friends.”

“His name?”

Madam Combalet hesitated, knowing how much her uncle hated duelling. “My dear Uncle,” she said, “you know what I said: this wasn’t a duel, or a summons of honour, or even a meeting. The opponents just had a disagreement at the door of the hotel.”

“But who was this opponent? His name, Marie.”

“A certain Souscarrières.”

“Souscarrières!” said Richelieu. “I know that name.”

“Perhaps but I can assure you, my dear Uncle, that he’s not to blame.”

“Who?”

“Sir Souscarrières.”

The cardinal drew a notebook from his pocket and consulted it. He seemed to find what he sought. “The Marquis of Pisany,” continued Madam Combalet, “drew first and lunged like a madman, according to Voiture and Brancas, who were witnesses.”

“Here he is – the very man,” murmured the cardinal.

And he knocked on a panel. Charpentier appeared. “Call for Cavois,” said the cardinal.

“Uncle! You’re not planning to arrest this young man and bring him to trial?” exclaimed Madam Combalet, clasping her hands.

“On the contrary,” the cardinal said, laughing: “I just might make his fortune.”

“Oh! Don’t mock, Uncle!”

“With you, Marie, I never mock. This Souscarrières has, at this moment, his fortune in his hands. Even better, it’s the fortune he needs. It’s up to him not to fumble it.”

Cavois came in. “Cavois,” said the cardinal to the captain of his guards, who was still half asleep, “go to the house at Rue Traversière and Rue Sainte-Anne and seek out a certain cavalier who calls himself Pierre of Bellegarde, Marquis of Montbrun, Sieur of Souscarrières.”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“If you find him at home, tell him that despite the late hour, I would like the pleasure of a brief chat with him.”

“And if he refuses to come?”

“Oh, Cavois, I think you can handle a little problem like that. Willing or unwilling, I want to see him. Is that clear?”

“Within the hour he’ll be at Your Eminence’s service,” Cavois said, bowing. At the door, the captain of the guards met a new arrival. He deferred to the newcomer with such respect that he was obviously important. And in fact, it was none other than that famous Capuchin, du Tremblay, known to all as Father Joseph, or His Grey Eminence.

His Grey Eminence

Father Joseph was so well known as the cardinal’s second soul that upon seeing him, the minister’s confidential servants withdrew at once, so that in Richelieu’s chambers the Eminence grise had the privilege of respectful space about him. Madam Combalet, no less than the others, was subject to the unease inspired by this silent apparition. At the sight of Father Joseph, she presented her forehead to the cardinal for a goodbye kiss. “Please, dear Uncle,” she said, “don’t work too late.”

Then she retired, eager to escape through the door opposite the one through which the monk had entered, keeping half the room between herself and the new arrival as he approached the cardinal. By the date of our story, the religious orders – except the Oratory of Jesus, founded by Cardinal Bérulle in 1611 and confirmed, after long opposition, by Pope Paul V in 1613 – had mostly fallen under the influence of the cardinal-minister. He was recognised as the protector of the Benedictines of Cluny, the Cistercians of Saint-Maur, the Premonstratensians, the Dominicans, the Carmelites, and finally the whole hooded family of the monks of St. Francis: the Miners, Minims, Franciscans, Capuchins, and so on. In recognition of this protection, all these orders, whether preaching, begging, teaching, or spreading propaganda, wherever they travelled, acted as a covert source of intelligence, all the more trustworthy since the main source of information was the confessional. Chief over all this religious police, zealous in its duty of surveillance, was the Capuchin Father Joseph, experienced in the ways of diplomacy and intrigue. Like those who came after him, such as Sartine, Lenoir, and Fouché, he had a genius for espionage. Through his influence his brother, Leclerc du Tremblay, had been named Governor of the Bastille, so that a prisoner detected, denounced, and arrested by du Tremblay the Capuchin was shackled, jailed, and guarded by du Tremblay the Governor. And if the unfortunate died in prison as was so often the case, his confession and last rites were administered by du Tremblay the Capuchin – which kept it all in the family. Father Joseph’s ministry was divided into four divisions, each headed by a Capuchin. He had a secretary named Father Ange Sabini who acted as Joseph to Father Joseph. When his business required him to travel, he rode on horseback, followed by Father Ange on a second horse. But one day, Father Joseph rode a mare while Father Ange’s mount was a stallion, and the two animals formed a conjunction in which their riders found themselves in roles so grotesque that Father Joseph felt his dignity required him to abandon that means of mobility. Thereafter, he rode in a litter or carriage. However, in the usual course of his duties when he needed to remain incognito, Father Joseph travelled on foot, pulling his cowl down over his eyes so as not to be recognised – easy enough in the Paris of that time, thronged as it was with monks of every order. That very night, Father Joseph had been out, anonymous and afoot. The cardinal, sitting keen-eyed at his desk, waited until the first door had closed on his captain and the second on his niece, then turned to Father Joseph. “Well,” he said, “so you have something to tell me, my dear du Tremblay?”

The cardinal had retained the habit of calling the monk by his family name. “Yes, My Lord,” he replied, “and this is the second time I’ve had the honour of trying to see you!”

“I’ve heard. It led me to hope you might have learned something about the Count of Moret – of his return to Paris, and of the reasons for that return.”

“I don’t know exactly what Your Eminence wants to know but I think I’ve picked up the trail.”

“Ah-ha! Your white-cloaks have been at work. They’ve found...?”

“Nothing special. They’ve learned only that the Count of Moret was staying at the Hotel of Montmorency with Duke Henry II, and came out at night to visit a lady who lives in the Rue of la Cerisaie opposite the Hotel Lesdiguières.”

“Rue of la Cerisaie, opposite the Hotel Lesdiguières ... but that’s the house of the two sisters of Marion Delorme!”

“Yes, My Lord, of Madam la Montagne and Madam Maugiron but it’s uncertain which of the two is his lover.”

“Well, I’ll soon know,” said the cardinal. And signalling the Capuchin to pause in his report, he began to write on a slip of paper:

Which of your two sisters is the Count of Moret’s lover? And who is the other’s lover? Is there an unhappy rival?

Then he turned to a panel above the desk that opened when he pressed a button. This panel communicated with the neighbouring house, and when opened revealed a gap the thickness of the wall to another panel on the other side. Between the doors were two doorbells, one left, one right, that activated an invention so new that it was unknown to any but the cardinal.

The cardinal placed the paper in between the doors, rang the bell on the right, and then closed his panel. “Go on,” he said to Father Joseph who had watched without any evidence of surprise.

“I was saying, My Lord, that the white-cloaks had done some work for us but that Providence that watches over My Lord’s affairs, had done the most.”

“You’re sure, du Tremblay that Providence watches over me in particular?”

“What better occupation, my Lord?”

The cardinal, who asked nothing better than to believe it, smiled and said, “Let’s hear the report of Providence on Sir Count of Moret.”

“Well, My Lord, I’d learned from the white-cloaks, as I’d had the honour to tell Your Eminence, that the Count of Moret had been in Paris for eight days that he lodged with Sir Montmorency and had a mistress in the Rue of la Cerisaie that was little enough.”

“I think you are unfair to the good fathers. Who does what he can, does all he must – and there is always Providence that can do all. Let’s hear what Providence has done.”

“Only set me face to face with the count himself.”

“You’ve seen him?”

“As certain as I have the honour to see you, my Lord.”

“And he, he saw you?” asked Richelieu anxiously.

“He saw me but didn’t recognise me.”

“Sit down, du Tremblay, and tell me all about it!”

Richelieu was accustomed to offer the Capuchin the false courtesy of a seat, knowing he wouldn’t take it. Joseph nodded and continued: “Here’s how the thing happened, my Lord. I had just left the white-cloaks and was on my way to bring their information to you when I saw people running toward the Rue of l’Homme-Armé.”

“Speaking of the Rue of l’Homme-Armé, isn’t there an inn there which you’ve had under your eye? The Inn of the Painted Beard?”

“That’s where the crowd was running, my Lord.”

“And you joined the crowd?”

“Your Eminence knows well I wouldn’t fail to do so. It seems a kind of assassination had been performed upon a poor devil named Étienne Latil, a former retainer of Sir d’Épemon.”

“Of Sir d’Épemon? Then remember this Étienne Latil, du Tremblay – he may be useful someday.”

“I doubt it, my Lord.”

“Why is that?”

“I think he’s taken a voyage from which no one returns.”

“Ah, yes – you said he’d been murdered.”

"Exactly, My Lord. Believed dead at first, he'd revived and called for a priest ... and there I was."

"Providence indeed, du Tremblay! And you gave him his confession, I presume?"

"In full."

"And there was something of import in it?"

"My Lord shall judge," said the Capuchin, with a laugh, "but only if you absolve me of revealing his confession."

"Very well, very well," said Richelieu, "I absolve you."

"Well, my Lord, Étienne Latil was assassinated for refusing to assassinate ... the Count of Moret."

"And who would have a motive for killing this young man who, at least till now, has joined neither faction nor cabal?"

"A rival in love."

"You're sure?"

"I believe so."

"But you don't know who killed this man?"

"No, my Lord, and neither did he. He knew only that it was a hunchback."

"We have two hunchbacked swordsmen in Paris: the Marquis of Pisany and the Marquis of Fontrailles. It might be Pisany, who himself received a sword-wound last night at nine o'clock, at the gate of the Hotel of Rambouillet, at the hands of his friend, Souscarrières. But Fontrailles should be watched nonetheless."

"I'll have him watched, my Lord but stay a moment – I've something even more extraordinary to tell Your Eminence."

"Speak, speak, du Tremblay. Your story is captivating."

"Well, My Lord, here's what's even more extraordinary: while I was hearing Latil's confession, who should walk into the room but the Count of Moret himself?"

"What, at the Inn of the Painted Beard?"

"Yes, My Lord, at the Inn of the Painted Beard. The Count of Moret himself came in, dressed as a Basque esquire; he stepped up to the wounded man and laid a purse of gold on the table next to him. 'If you recover,' he said, 'take yourself to the hotel of the Duke of Montmorency. If you die, die in the faith of the Lord, certain that there will be prayers at mass for the salvation of your soul.'"

"The intention is good," Richelieu said, "but nonetheless, let's send my doctor Chicot to have a look at this poor devil. Are you sure the Count of Moret didn't recognise you?"

"Yes, My Lord, quite sure."

"What was he doing, disguised, at that inn?"

"We may yet find out. Your Eminence, would you care to guess who I met at the corner of the Rue du Plâtre and the Rue of l'Homme-Armé?"

"Who?"

"Disguised as a peasant of the Pyrenees..."

"Tell me instantly, du Tremblay! It's getting late, and I don't have time to spare."

"Madam Fargis."

"Madam Fargis!" the cardinal exclaimed. "And she was coming from the inn?"

"It seems probable."

"She as a Catalan, he as a Basque. It was a meeting."

"That's what I thought – but there's more than one kind of meeting, my Lord. The lady is a libertine, and the young man is the son of Henry IV."

"It was no love rendezvous, du Tremblay. The count comes from Italy, by way of Piedmont. He had, I'd wager my head, letters to the queen – or even queens. He must take care!" Richelieu said, glowering. "I already have two other sons of Henry IV in prison!"

"In short, my Lord, that was my evening. I thought it important enough to report it."

"With good reason, du Tremblay. And you say this young man is staying with the Duke of Montmorency?"

"Yes, my Lord."

"So he's in it as well? Has Montmorency forgotten that I've already had to behead one of his family? He wants to be constable, like his father and grandfather before him. He already has a rival in Créqui, who thinks he deserves the title because he married a daughter of the Lesdigières. As if it were so easy to bear the sword of du Guesclin! At least Montmorency is a true knight who values honour. Well, he who wants the constable's sword must go look for it before the walls of Casale. It's been a good evening so far, du Tremblay, and I hope to complete it as well."

"Does My Lord have anything else he'd like me to do?"

"Keep an eye, as I've said, on the Inn of the Painted Beard but discreetly. Don't lose sight of that wounded man until he's either healed or buried. I thought the Count of Moret was already busy with another woman than Fargis, who's already juggling Cramail and Marillac. But if Providence points to her, du Tremblay, that changes the entire affair. But Providence, as you know, doesn't do everything for us."

"And on this occasion, we should recall the proverb, or rather the maxim, 'Heaven helps those who help themselves.'"

"You are bursting with insight, my dear du Tremblay, and I would have been sad to have missed you. Let me just help the pope by ridding him of the Spanish, whom he fears, and the Austrians, whom he hates, and we'll arrange so that the first red hat that arrives from Rome fits the measurements of your head."

"If it were not for the size of my head, I would beg my Lord just to give me one of his old hats as a sign that, whatever favours heaven brings me, I will always be his servant and never his equal."

And crossing his hands on his chest, Father Joseph bowed humbly. At the door he met Cavois, who stood aside to let him leave, as the others had withdrawn upon his arrival. His Grey Eminence having left, Cavois said to the cardinal, "He is here, my Lord."

"Souscarrières?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"He was at home, then?"

"No but his servant told me he'd be in a gambling den he frequents on Rue Villedot, and in fact, there he was."

"Have him enter."

Cavois stood immobile, eyes cast down. "Well?" asked the cardinal.

"My Lord, I wish to ask a favour."

"Do so, Cavois. You know I esteem you and will do what I can."

"I only hoped that, once Sir Souscarrières departs, I might be permitted to spend the rest of the night at home. Since our return to Paris, My Lord, it's been eight days, or rather eight nights, and I've yet to spend one in my own bed."

"And you're tired from your duties?"

"No, My Lord. But Madam Cavois is tired of sleeping ... alone."

"Madam Cavois is amorous then?"

"Yes, My Lord. But it's her husband she's amorous for."

"She would be a good example for the ladies of the Court. Cavois, you may spend the night with your wife."

"Oh! Thank you, my Lord!"

"I authorise you to go and find her."

"Find Madam Cavois?"

"Yes – and bring her here."

"Here, My Lord? To what end?"

"I'd like to speak with her."

"Speak? To my wife?" Cavois cried, astonished.

"I have a gift to bestow in recompense for these sleepless nights on my account."

"A gift?" Cavois said, beyond astonished.

"Bring in Sir Souscarrières, Cavois, and while I talk with him, go fetch your wife."

"But, My Lord," said Cavois, "she'll have gone to bed."

"Get her up."

"She won't want to come."

"Take two guards with you."

Cavois laughed. "Very well, I'll do it, my Lord," he said, "but I warn you, Madam Cavois says what she thinks, and plenty of it."

"Good. Candour is all too rare at Court, Cavois."

"So, My Lord's order is ... serious?"

"I've never been more serious, Cavois."

"Then My Lord will be obeyed." Cavois, still sceptical, bowed and withdrew. The cardinal took advantage of his brief solitude to open the panel above his desk. In the same place where he had put his request he found a reply, written with the brevity he required in dispatches:

The Count of Moret is the lover of Madam la Montagne, the Lord of Souscarrières of Madam Maugiron. The unhappy rival: the Marquis of Pisany.

"It's astounding," murmured the cardinal as he closed the panel, "how everything tonight seems to tie together. It's almost enough to make one believe, like that fool du Tremblay, that there really is a Providence."

Just then his secretary, Charpentier, assuming the role of a footman or steward, opened the door and announced, "Lord Pierre of Bellegarde, Count of Montbrun and Lord of Souscarrières."

In Which Madam Cavois Becomes Partner to Sir Michel

As our readers know, the man announced with such a pompous display of titles was none other than our friend Souscarrières, whose portrait we sketched at the beginning of this volume. Souscarrières entered with such an air of nonchalance, giving His Eminence such a casual greeting, that it was tantamount to effrontery. The cardinal cast his gaze about, as if searching for someone who might have entered with Souscarrières. "Pardon, My Lord," Souscarrières said, putting one foot gallantly forward and posing with his hat in his right hand, "but is Your Eminence looking for something?"

"I'm looking for those other people who were announced along with you, Sir Michel."

"Michel?" repeated Souscarrières, astonished. "Who bears that name?"

"Who? I believe you do, my dear Sir."

"Oh! I mustn't let my Lord make such a grave error. I'm the acknowledged son of Lord Roger of Saint-Larry, Duke of Bellegarde and Grand Equerry of France. My illustrious father still lives and would be happy to so inform you. I am Lord of Souscarrières thanks to an estate which I acquired. I was made a marquis by Madam Duchess Nicole of Lorraine upon my marriage with the noble Demoiselle Anne of Rogers."

"My dear Sir Michel," replied Richelieu, "allow me to relate your history. I know it better than you do, and will instruct you."

"I'm aware," Souscarrières said, "that great men such as Your Eminence, after days of hard work, sometimes enjoy an hour of amusement. Blessed are those who can provide such a genius with some amusement, even if it's at their own expense."

And Souscarrières, delighted with the compliment he'd concocted, bowed before the cardinal. "You are wrong from start to finish, Sir Michel," the cardinal continued, stubbornly clinging to that name.

"I'm not tired, am in no need of amusement, and wouldn't take such at your expense. But as I have a proposal for you, I'd like to demonstrate that I do so because of your personal merit, and not because I'm deceived by your purported names and titles."

The cardinal accompanied this last sentence with one of those wry smiles that, in his moments of good humour, were particular to him. "Then let Your Eminence speak without any beating around the bush," said Souscarrières.

"Shall I begin then, Sir Michel?"

Souscarrières, in no position to resist, just bowed. "You know the Rue des Bourdonnais, do you not, Sir Michel?" asked the cardinal.

"One would have to be from Cathay not to know of it, my Lord."

"Well! In your youth there was a notable baker who kept the Inn of the Chimneys there. This worthy man, who was a fine cook and whose fare I sampled many times when I was Bishop of Luçon, was named Michel and had the honour to be your father."

"I thought I'd already mentioned to Your Eminence that I'm the acknowledged son of the Duke of Bellegarde," insisted the Lord of Souscarrières, albeit with less confidence.

"Quite so," replied the cardinal. "And I can tell you how this recognition came about. This worthy baker had a wife, very pretty, to whom all the gentry who came to the Inn of the Chimneys paid court. One happy day she gave birth to a son. This son was you, my dear Sir Michel, and as you were born during a marriage in which your father – or, if you will, your mother's husband – was still living, you must bear the name of your parents. Remember, my dear Sir Michel, that only kings have the right to legitimize the children of adultery."

"The devil!" muttered Souscarrières.

"Let's get to your acknowledgement. A pretty child, you became a handsome young man, excelling at athletics, fleet of foot, playing tennis like d'Alichon, and flashing a sword like Fontenay. Having reached such a degree of perfection, you resolved to turn these talents to making your fortune. To commence your campaign, you crossed over to England, where your success at sports won you five hundred thousand francs. Is that accurate?"

"Yes, My Lord, give or take a few pistoles."

"It was there that you had, one morning, a visit from a certain Lalande, who was Tennis Master to His Majesty the King. Here's what he said, more or less: 'For the love of God, Sir Souscarrières! Ah, pardon me, I forgot – I don't know why you've never liked the name Michel that is a very pleasant name but the first time you came into some money, you spent a thousand pistoles to buy a crumbling hovel in the country near Grosbois that went by the name of Souscarrières. Thereafter you were no longer Michel but Souscarrières, and eventually the Lord of Souscarrières. I apologise for the long digression but I think it's essential to understanding the story.'" Souscarrières bowed. "So this Lalande said to you, 'for the love of God, Sir Souscarrières, you've done well: you have spirit, you have heart, you excel at sports, and you're lucky in love. You lack only the advantage of birth. I know one is unable to choose one's father and mother, or we'd all choose for father a Peer of France and for mother a Duchess of the Queen's Circle. But when one is wealthy, there are ways to correct these small aberrations of chance.' I wasn't there, my dear Sir Michel but I imagine that your eyes widened at this preamble. Lalande continued, 'You have only to choose, you understand, between all the great nobles who made love to madam your mother, and select the least fastidious. Sir Bellegarde, for example: his heavenly reward is approaching. Your mother will be delighted to make you a gentleman; she need only inform Sir Grand that you're not the baker's son but his, and his conscience won't allow such a fine youth to call the wrong man his father. Since his memory is failing, he won't even remember if he was her lover or not; he'll acknowledge you, and that acknowledgement will be worth thirty thousand francs.' Isn't that how it went?"

"More or less, my Lord. But I must say Your Eminence has overlooked one thing."

"What's that? Though my memory may be better than Sir Bellegarde's, if it's at fault, I'm ready to acknowledge my mistake."

"That in addition to the five hundred thousand francs Your Eminence mentioned, I brought back from England the innovation of the sedan chair and for the last three years I've sought the French patent for it."

"You're mistaken, dear Sir Michel. I've forgotten neither that invention nor your application to me for the patent – on the contrary, that's exactly why I've sent for you. But everything in its turn. 'A proper order,' says the philosopher, 'is one-half of genius.' First let's discuss your marriage."

"Couldn't we skip that, my Lord?"

"By no means. Where did you get your title of marquis, if not from the Duchess Nicole of Lorraine on the occasion of your wedding? At the time, there were many rumours linking you and the worthy duchess, rumours you were careful not to deny, and when she died six months ago, you dressed your five-year-old child in mourning. But everyone has the right to dress their children as they will, so I won't admonish you for that."

"My Lord is very good," said Souscarrières.

"Anyway, you returned from Lorraine with a young girl you brought away with you, Miss Anne of Rogers. You claimed she was the daughter of a grand lord but in fact she was simply the daughter of the duchess. It was on the occasion of your marriage with her that you were, you say, made Marquis of Montbrun; but for that elevation to be valid, it would have to have been Sir Michel who was made marquis and not Sir Bellegarde, for an illegitimate son could not be so recognised. Since you don't have the right to use the name Bellegarde, you couldn't become a marquis of that name that is not and cannot be yours."

"My Lord is very hard on me!"

"On the contrary, dear Sir Michel, I'm as sweet as syrup, as you'll see. Madam Michel, who had no idea what circumstance she'd fall into by marrying a man like you – Madam Michel allowed herself to be beguiled by Villaudry. You know Villaudry, the younger son of the man Miossens killed. You caught wind of something going on when you heard she'd given Villaudry a bracelet made from a lock of her hair. You threatened to throw her into the canal of Souscarrières – but you weren't quite sure of her betrayal, and, as you're not a bad man at heart, you waited upon further proof. When you had that proof – a letter written entirely in her hand that left no doubt as to your dishonour – you followed her into the garden, drew your dagger, and told her to pray to God. She could see that this wasn't like when you'd threatened to throw her into the canal, that this time you were serious. You stabbed twice but fortunately only struck her hand, cutting off two of her fingers. Seeing her blood, you pitied her, spared her life, and sent her back to Lorraine. As for Villaudry, because you'd been lenient to your wife, you decided to show him no mercy. You found him at mass at the church of the Minims near the Place Royale and charged in, sword in hand but he refused to commit sacrilege and kept his own blade in the scabbard. Not that he didn't want to fight you; he even said, 'I'd draw on you if I had a reputation to protect but as I don't, there's no reason to fight here.' And indeed, he then formally called you out, as if you really were the son of Sir Bellegarde, and met you in the Place Royale, the same place where Bouteville fought Beuvron. You carried off the affair extremely well, accepting all your opponent's requirements, then giving him six wounds with the point of your sword and any number of blows with the flat of your blade. But Bouteville, too, had carried off his affair extremely well that didn't stop me from having him beheaded. I'd have shortened you as well, Sir Michel, if you'd really been Pierre of Bellegarde, Marquis of Montbrun, and Lord of Souscarrières – because, worse even than Bouteville, you'd drawn your sword in a church that would have meant cutting off your hands as well as your head. Do you hear me, my dear Sir Michel?"

"For the love of God! Yes, my Lord, I hear you," Souscarrières replied. "And I must say that I've heard conversations much more welcome than this one."

"Then it's just as well you didn't meet your end that time, although this evening you returned to your former ways with the poor Marquis of Pisany. He must have been mad with rage to get in a fight with a buffoon like you."

"I didn't pick a fight with him, my Lord; he's the one who attacked me."

"Well, at least this poor marquis wasn't so unlucky as to pick his fight in the Rue of la Cerisaie, where he'd have had to face both you and the Count of Moret."

"My Lord! What do you know...?"

"What I know is that if the point of your sword hadn't struck his hump and slid down, and that if his ribs didn't overlap each other like an iron breastplate, you'd have nailed him like a beetle to the wall. You really have a rotten temper, dear Sir Michel."

"I swear, my Lord, I wasn't looking for a fight. Voiture and Brancas will tell you so. I was just overheated from having followed him from the Rue of l'Homme-Armé almost all the way to the Louvre."

At this mention of the Rue of l'Homme-Armé, Richelieu was suddenly all attention. "He'd had a quarrel in a cabaret," Souscarrières continued, "and was all worked up about it."

"Indeed he had," said Richelieu, following the line the unsuspecting Souscarrières had opened for him, "in the Inn of the Painted Beard."

"My Lord!" cried Souscarrières, astonished.

"Where he went," Richelieu continued, at the risk of overplaying his hand but keen to know everything, "to see if, by means of a certain Étienne Latil, he might be able to rid himself of his rival, the Count of Moret. Fortunately, instead of finding a cutthroat, he found an honest swashbuckler who refused to dip his hands in royal blood. So you see, my dear Sir Michel, that between drawing your sword in a church, duelling with Villaudry, complicity in the murder of Étienne Latil, and having an encounter with the Marquis of Pisany, I could have you beheaded four times over – if only you had two quarters of nobility instead of being a full-blooded commoner."

"Alas, My Lord!" said Souscarrières, badly shaken. "But you heard me declare that I owe my life to your magnanimity!"

"And your wits, my dear Sir Michel."

"Ah! If only my Lord would allow me to use my wits in the service of Your Eminence," Souscarrières cried, throwing himself at the cardinal's feet, "I'd be the happiest of men!"

"God forbid I should refuse – for I have need of men like you."

"Yes, My Lord, men of wit and – dare I say it – devotion!"

"...Whom I will hang on the day their devotion ends."

Souscarrières started. "Oh! But that will be never," he said. "How could I ever forget all I owe to Your Eminence?"

"Hmm. Consider, my dear Sir Michel: you hold your fortune in your hands – but I hold the end of the noose in mine."

"If only Your Eminence would deign to tell me how to employ these wits that he's been as good as to recognise."

"As to that..."

"I listen with full attention!"

"Well, then ... suppose I grant you the patent on this invention from England?"

"The patent on sedan chairs?" cried Souscarrières who was beginning to see, taking shape before him that fortune that the cardinal said he held in his hands but until now had been no more than a dream.

"Half of it," said the cardinal, "only half. I reserve the other half for a boon I wish to grant."

"My Lord wishes to reward another's wits as well?" ventured Souscarrières.

"No, something rarer than brains. Devotion."

"My Lord is the master. If I'm given half the patent, half is what I'll settle for."

"Indeed. So you'll have half the sedan chairs in Paris; two hundred, let's say."

"Yes, as you say, my Lord, two hundred."

"That makes four hundred chair porters. Well Sir Michel, let's suppose that these four hundred porters are intelligent, they note where they take their customers and pay attention to what they say. Suppose further that the head of their company was also intelligent related to me and me alone all that's seen and heard. Finally, suppose this man took in twelve thousand francs a year – though it could easily be twenty-four thousand – and that, instead of being called merely Michel, he wished to be called Lord Pierre of Bellegarde, Marquis of Montbrun and Lord of Souscarrières. I'd say, my dear friend, take as many names as you like – the more, the better! As for the names you've already appropriated, you may have to defend them against those you've claimed them from but, rest assured, I won't give you the slightest trouble about them."

"You're serious about this, my Lord?"

"Quite serious, my dear Sir Michel. I'm granting you the patent for half the sedan chairs in circulation in Paris. Tomorrow your partner, who will already have signed for the other half, will bring you a letter for you to sign in your turn. Does that suit you?"

"And what will this letter state about my obligations to you?" Souscarrières asked hesitantly.

"Nothing at all, dear Sir Michel. That matter, you understand, is between you and me. Complete confidentiality is essential. Plague! If my connection were known, all would be lost. It must not be revealed to Sir or the queen. You must always speak of me as a tyrant who persecutes the queen, and say you can't understand how King Louis XIII can live under a yoke as heavy as mine."

"But I could never say such things!" cried Souscarrières.

"Well, if you try hard enough, you might find that you can. So, we're agreed. Your chairs will become all the rage, stifling the competition, and the entire Court will refuse to travel anywhere except by chair – especially if yours have two seats and very thick curtains."

"Does My Lord have any specific instructions for me?"

"Indeed! I particularly recommend the ladies to you: Madam la Princess first of all, then Miss Marie de Gonzague, Madam Chevreuse, and Madam Fargis. Then the men: the Count of Moret, Sir Montmorency, Sir Chevreuse, and the Count of Cramail. I leave out the Marquis of Pisany; thanks to you, we don't have to worry about him for a few days."

"My Lord shall have nothing to worry about at all. And when should I start this operation?"

"As soon as possible. You should begin within the week, unless you lack the funds to do so."

"No, My Lord. Indeed, this is the kind of affair I'll attend to personally."

"In that case, proceed – but if you need to, you can contact me directly."

"You yourself, my Lord?"

"Yes. Haven't I an interest in the matter? But pardon me, here's Cavois, who seems to have something to say. He's the one who will bring you the little agreement to sign tomorrow, and as he will be aware of all its conditions – even those between us alone – he's the one who will remind you of them, should you forget. Come in, Cavois, come in. You see sir here, do you not?"

"Yes, My Lord," Cavois said, obeying the cardinal's order.

"Good. He's my friend – but only among those who come to see me between ten o'clock at night and two in the morning. To me, and to me alone, he'll be known as Sir Michel; to everyone else he's Lord Pierre of Bellegarde, Marquis of Montbrun, and Lord of Souscarrières. Goodbye, dear Sir Michel."

Souscarrières bowed to the ground and departed, unable to believe his good luck and wondering if the cardinal was serious, or was merely mocking him. But considering the cardinal's many concerns, he eventually realised that the cardinal didn't have time to make fun of him, and in all probability had been quite serious. As for the cardinal, convinced that he'd managed to recruit the efforts of a capable ally, his good humour had returned, and it was in his most pleasant voice that he called out, "Madam Cavois! Come in, Madam Cavois!"

083

In Which the Cardinal Begins to See the Chessboard Clearly

The words were barely out of his mouth before the cardinal saw a petite woman enter, aged twenty-five to twenty-six, nimble, dainty, with her nose in the air, and seemingly not at all intimidated by being in his presence. "You called, my Lord," she said, speaking first, with a strong Languedoc accent. "Here I am!"

"Good! And yet Cavois said you might not want to come."

"I, not come when you do the honour to call for me? What should I fear? Your Eminence didn't ask me to come alone."

"Madam Cavois!" the captain of the guards growled in warning.

"Madam Cavois' all you like. My Lord called me here for a reason, for this or for that. Does he want to talk to me? Let him talk to me. Does he want me to talk to him? Then I'll talk to him."

"For this and for that, Madam Cavois," said the cardinal, signalling his guard captain not to interfere with the conversation.

"No need to silence him, my Lord," said Madam Cavois. "If I tell him to shut up, he'll shut up. Or maybe he wants us to think he's in charge here?"

"My Lord, please excuse her! She doesn't know the Court, and..."

"Let My Lord ask my pardon! Look at you yawning, Cavois. Why, it's my Lord who owes me an apology."

"What!" said the cardinal, laughing, "I'm the one who needs to be pardoned?"

"Certainly! Is it Christian to keep people who love each other eternally separated, as you do?"

"Ah! So you love him, then – your husband?"

"How could I not love him? You know how I first knew it, my Lord?"

"No but please tell me, Madam Cavois. It interests me enormously."

"Mireille, Mireille!" said Cavois, trying to call his wife to order.

"Cavois, Cavois!" laughed the cardinal, imitating his guard captain.

"Well, I'm the daughter of a gentleman of quality from Languedoc, you know. While Cavois is the son of a Picardy squire."

Cavois twitched. "That doesn't mean I look down on you, Louis. My father's name was of Serignan, and in Catalonia he was a brigadier, no less. I was a widow by name of Lacroix, very young, childless, and, I can say without bragging, very pretty."

"You still are, Madam Cavois," said the cardinal.

"Well, I was pretty. I was sixteen then, and I'm twenty-six now, with eight children, my Lord."

"What, eight children? You've had eight children from your wife, you dog, yet you complain to me when I keep you from sleeping with her?"

"Why, you complained, my dear Cavois!" cried Mireille. "Oh, you little love, let me kiss you!"

And, despite the presence of the cardinal, she threw her arms around her husband's neck and kissed him.

"Madam Cavois!" cried the guard captain, trembling, while the cardinal, his good humour completely restored, choked with laughter.

"To go on, my Lord," said Madam Cavois, still carelessly embracing her husband. "He was with Sir Montmorency in those days, so it wasn't surprising that, though he's a Picard, he'd come to Languedoc. Once there, he sees me and falls in love with me but he isn't very rich, and I'm well off, so the idiot won't declare himself. But he picks a quarrel with somebody, and the day before he's to fight, he goes to a notary and makes a will in my favour, leaving me what? Everything he has, no more and no less – to me, who didn't even know he loved me. So I go to the notary's house to visit his wife, who is a friend of mine, and she says, 'Do you know what? If Sir Cavois dies, you inherit all he has.' 'Sir Cavois? Who's that?' 'You know, that handsome lad.' And he was good-looking in those days, My Lord. He's declined a bit since then but no matter: I don't love him any the less for it. Isn't that so, Cavois?"

"My Lord," Cavois said beseechingly, "You'll forgive her, won't you?"

"What do you say, Madam Cavois?" said Richelieu. "Shall we put this whiner out the door?"

"Oh, no, my Lord! I see him little enough as it is. So, my friend tells me he loves me like crazy, that he's fighting a duel the next day, and that if he's killed he leaves me his entire estate. This moves me, you understand, and I tell my father, my brothers, and my friends all about it. The next morning I ride out to try to stop this encounter between Cavois and his opponent. But I arrive too late! Sir, here, who has a deft hand, has already given his opponent two sword wounds. Himself, nothing – he comes through safe and sound. I throw my arms around his neck and say to him, 'If you love me so, you must marry me. You shouldn't suppress such desires.' And he married me."

"His desires weren't long suppressed, it seems," said the cardinal.

"No but now, My Lord, he's no happier than that other rascal. Since he's been in service to Your Eminence, I have to manage all his affairs. On the rare occasions he comes home, he's sluggish and dull. I caress him, call him my little Cavois, my little husband, and make myself as pretty as I can to please him. He never hears any whining, any complaints or reproaches. But I swear, it's as if he's all used up."

"I can see by all this that Master Cavois is more important to you than the rest of the world."

"Oh, yes, my Lord!"

"More than the king?"

"I wish the king every prosperity – but if the king dies, I won't die, whereas if my poor Cavois died, the only thing I'd want would be to go with him."

"More than the queen?"

"I respect Her Majesty. However, I find that, for a Queen of France, she doesn't have enough children. If the king had a misfortune we'd all be in trouble, and for that I blame her."

"More than ... me?"

"I believe even more than you, My Lord. You don't do it to hurt me but he wears himself out for you, and sometimes you take him away with you, even to war, as you did for almost a year at La Rochelle, and that doesn't please me."

"But," said Richelieu, "if the king died, if the queen died, if I died – if everybody died – what would you two do on your own?"

Madam Cavois laughed and gave her husband a sidelong glance. "Well!" she said. "We'd do..."

"Yes, what would you do?"

"We'd do what Adam and Eve did, My Lord, when they were alone together."

The cardinal laughed with them. "So," he said, "you have eight children in the house?"

"Your pardon, My Lord but there are only six. It pleased the Lord to take two of them."

"Oh. You will make up your loss, I'm sure."

"I hope so – isn't that so, Cavois?"

"Well, then; we must provide for these poor children."

"They're not suffering, My Lord, thank the Lord."

"Yes but if I'm taken by death, they will suffer."

"Heaven preserve us from such a misfortune!" the two spouses cried.

"I hope it will preserve you, and me as well. Meanwhile, we must look to the future. Madam Cavois, I am granting you, in share with Sir Michel, called Pierre of Bellegarde, Marquis of Montbrun, and Lord of Souscarrières, one-half of the monopoly on all sedan chairs in Paris."

"Oh! My Lord!"

"And now, Cavois," continued Richelieu, "go off with your wife, if she's still satisfied with you, or I'll put you under arrest and confine you to her bedroom for a week."

"Oh, My Lord!" cried the husband and wife, throwing themselves at his feet and kissing his hands.

The cardinal held his hands out to them. "What the devil are you muttering there, My Lord?" asked Madam Cavois, who didn't know Latin.

"The loveliest phrases of the Gospel that, unfortunately, cardinals are forbidden to preach. Now go!"

And he pushed them out of that study where, in just two hours, so much had happened. Left alone, the cardinal's expression resumed its usual gravity. "Come," he said, "let's summarise and recapitulate the events of the evening." And, drawing a notebook from his pocket, with a pencil he wrote the following:

The Count of Moret arrived eight days ago from Savoy. In love with Madam la Montagne. Rendezvous with La Fargis at the Inn of the Painted Beard. He, disguised as a Basque, she as a Catalan. Charged, in all probability, with letters to the two queens from Charles-Emmanuel. Étienne Latil assassinated for refusing to kill the Count of Moret. Pisany, rejected by Madam Maugiron, wounded by Souscarrières. Saved by his hump. Souscarrières granted patent for sedan chairs and recruited as intelligence chief in secular counterpart to du Tremblay, chief of religious intelligence. The queen absent from the ballet due to a migraine.

"And what else? Let's see." He searched his memory. "Ah!" he suddenly said. "There's that letter taken from the bag of the king's doctor, Senelle, and sold to du Tremblay by his valet. Let's see what it says, now that Rossignol has had time to solve the cipher."

And he called, "Rossignol! Rossignol!"

The little man in spectacles reappeared. "The letter and its code?" asked the cardinal.

"Right here, My Lord."

The cardinal took them. "Very good," he said. "Until tomorrow, then – and if I'm pleased with the translation, it's worth forty pistoles to you instead of the usual twenty."
"Then I hope Your Eminence will be satisfied."

Rossignol withdrew. The cardinal opened the letter and read it. Here, verbatim, is what it said:

If Jupiter is driven from Olympus, he can take refuge in Crete. Minos will offer him hospitality with great pleasure. But Cephalus's health can't be sustained. In the event of his death, why shouldn't his wife marry Jupiter's Procris? The rumour at Court is that Oracle wants to get rid of Procris so as to marry Cephalus to Venus. Meanwhile, if Jupiter continues to woo Hebe in a pretence of passion, Juno must feign disapproval. It's important, even at this late hour, that Oracle be fooled into believing Jupiter is in love with Hebe.

– Minos

“Now,” said the cardinal, after reading this, “let’s see the cipher.” The cipher, as we’ve said, accompanied the letter. We reproduce it here for our readers.

CEPHALUS – THE KING
PROCRIS – THE QUEEN
JUPITER – SIR
JUNO – Marie de Médicis
OLYMPUS – THE LOUVRE
THE ORACLE – THE CARDINAL
VENUS – Madam COMBALET
HEBE – MARIE DE GONZAGUE
MINOS – CHARLES IV, THE DUKE OF LORRAINE
CRETE – LORRAINE

Replacing the real names with their substitutes created the following dispatch that shows that Rossignol had not exaggerated its importance:

If Sir is driven from the Louvre, he can take refuge in Lorraine. The Duke of Lorraine will offer him hospitality with great pleasure. But the king's health can't be sustained. In the event of his death, why shouldn't Sir marry the queen? The rumour at Court is that the cardinal wants to get rid of the queen so as to marry the king to Madam Combalet. Meanwhile, if Sir continues to woo Marie de Gonzague in a pretence of passion, Marie de Médicis must feign disapproval. It's important, even at this late hour, that the cardinal be fooled into believing Sir is in love with Marie de Gonzague.

– Charles IV, Duke of Lorraine

Richelieu read the dispatch one more time and then said, with the smile of a triumphant player, "So! I begin to see the chessboard more clearly."

PART III

084
The State of Europe in 1628

We've arrived at a point where we believe there would be no harm in helping the reader, like Cardinal Richelieu, to see the chessboard more clearly. This clarity will be easier for us, after two hundred and thirty-seven years, than for the cardinal, surrounded as he was by a thousand different schemes, conspiracy upon conspiracy, fending off one plot after another, while smoke and mists veiled the far horizon he needed to perceive in order to see past the parochial interests blocking his overall vision. If this was merely one of those books bought to show off next to a picture album or scrapbook, a book for the coffee table so visitors could admire its engravings, or a book for a little light reading in the dressing room after one has enjoyed sometime in the boudoir, we'd pass over the details that some frivolous minds might find boring. But, as we presume to hope that our books will become, if not during our lifetime then after it, part of society's standard library, we ask our readers for permission to pass before them, at the beginning of this chapter, a review of the situation in Europe. This will clarify the coming chapters and, in retrospect, illuminate the previous ones. During the final years of the reign of Henry IV, and increasing in the early years of Richelieu's ministry, France not only joined the ranks of the great nations, she became the object upon which all eyes were fixed. Already at the head of the other European kingdoms due to her culture and intelligence, she was about to advance to the same rank in material and martial power. Here, in a nutshell, is the state of the rest of Europe. We'll start with that great centre of religion, influencing at once Austria, Spain, and France – we'll start with Rome. Ruling over Rome physically and the rest of the Catholic world spiritually is a morose little old man of sixty, born in Florence and glorying in Florentine greed. An Italian first, a prince always but above all a grasping patriarch, he is forever pondering how to add territory to the Holy See and thus wealth for his many nephews, who include three cardinals – Francis and the two Antonios – as well as a fourth nephew, Thaddeus, general of the Papal troops. Rome has been plundered to feed this nepotism. For Marforio, that Cato, that scourge of the popes, has said, it needed no barbarians to do that, just the Barberini. And indeed, Matteo Barberini, elevated to the papacy as Urban VIII, has reunited the lands of St. Peter under the ducy that bore that saint's name. Under him, Jesuit propaganda, begun by that good nephew of Gregory XV, Monsignor Ludovico, flourishes and spreads. Under the flag of Ignatius Loyola, the Jesuits have become the world's religious police, using propaganda as their weapon of conquest. From Rome marches their army of preachers, as gentle in China as they are severe in Europe. At the moment, the pope is hoping to contain the Spaniards in their duchy of Milan and keep the Austrians from crossing the Alps, so long as it can be done without personal effort or risk. He presses France to secure Mantua and lift the siege of Casale but declines to commit one man or a single Roman baiocco to the effort. In his spare time, he revises Church hymns and composes Anacreontic poetry. In 1624, Richelieu had taken his measure, seeing past its pope into the hollowness of Rome, whose dithering politics had already drained it of religious prestige and who borrowed what little strength it had first from Austria, and then from Spain. Spain: since the death of Philip III, Spain has hidden its decline behind big words and grand airs. She has for a king Philip IV, brother of Anne of Austria, a lazy sort of monarch who reigns through his prime minister, Count-Duke Olivares, as Louis XIII rules through the Cardinal-Duke of Richelieu. However, where the French minister is a man of genius, the Spanish minister is a mere reckless autocrat. The Spanish West Indies, from which a river of gold rolled during the reigns of Charles V and Philip II, produces under Philip IV only five hundred thousand crowns a year. Meanwhile, Admiral Piet Hein of the United Provinces has captured galleons in the Gulf of Mexico loaded with ingots worth, it's estimated, over twelve million. In her last gasp, Spain is so weak that even the Duke of Savoy, the hunchback Charles-Emmanuel, known derisively as the Prince of Marmots, has twice held in his hand the fate of that empire upon which Charles V boasted the sun never set. Spain has nothing left and can no longer even bankroll Ferdinand II, who complains she sends him no money. The holy bonfires of Philip II, the king of flames, had burned the spirit from a people who once abounded with it, and Philip III, in driving out the Moors, had destroyed the fresh stock that could have revived that spirit. She has leagued herself with the bandits who burned Venice; her greatest general, Spinola, is an Italian mercenary; and her most effective ambassador, Rubens, is a Flemish painter. Germany, since the beginning of the Thirty Years War, that is, since 1618, has been a human slaughterhouse, with butchers retailing death in its east, north, west, and centre. Anyone desperate to avoid being killed – or turning monk, the suicide of the middle Ages – has to find a way to buy passage across the Rhine, the Danube, or the Vistula. Europe's eastern marches are held by old Bethlen Gábor, who calls himself King of Hungary and who will die having taken part in forty-two battles, after having invented all those tricks of military costume – the bearskins of the Uhlans, the billowing sleeves of the hussars – which our modern troops use to intimidate each other. His army is the school that teaches all Europe the principles of light cavalry. And what does he promise his recruits? No pay, no food, just whatever they can find to eat and whatever they can take to enrich themselves. He gives them war without law, loot without limits. The northern marches are held by Gustavus Adolphus – good-hearted Gustave who, unlike Bethlen Gábor, catches looters and hangs them. This illustrious captain, student of the Frenchman La Gardie, has through his victories in Poland gained the strongholds of Livonia and Polish Prussia. He is occupied at the moment in making an alliance with the German Protestants against Emperor Ferdinand II, the mortal enemy of the Protestants, who despise his Edict of Restitution – that document which will serve as a model for Louis XIV fifty years later when repealing the Edict of Nantes. Gustavus Adolphus is the master of his epoch and, in the military arts, the creator of modern warfare. His grand spirit will have no part of the gloom of Coligny, the severity of William the Silent, or the bitter anger of Maurice of Nassau. Unflappable and serene, a smile plays on his lips even in the midst of battle. Six feet tall and broad into the bargain, he rides an enormous horse, and though his obesity is sometimes a problem, it can serve him as well: a bullet that would have killed that lean Genoese Spinola only lodged in Gustave's fat that closed over it, never to be seen again. The western marches are held by Holland that is confused and divided against itself. Holland had two heads, Barneveldt and Maurice, and severed them both. Barneveldt, that gentle spirit, was a friend of freedom but placed peace above all; leader of the provinces and supporter of decentralization (and, therefore, weakness), ambassador to Elizabeth, Henry IV, and James I, when travelling through Brille, Flushing, and Ramekan, was seized as a heretic and traitor and slain on the scaffold. It was Maurice of Nassau who'd killed Barneveldt, and though he'd saved Holland ten times over, by this murder he lost his popular support. Prince Maurice wishes to be loved but fears he is hated. One morning, crossing the Gorcum market, he greets the populace with a smile, believing the people will throw their hats in the air and cry happily, "Long live Nassau!"

But the people are silent, and their hats stay on their heads. From that moment on, he suffers the death of unpopularity. The ever-vigilant sentinel, the captain without fear, becomes a sleepwalker caught in a trance, a dreamer who cannot wake. Maurice is succeeded by his younger brother, Frederick Henry, who handles his inheritance as if buying and selling in a market of men: investing in only a few but those few well chosen, well clothed, well fed, and regularly paid. A strategist, he occupies the key roads anchored by the remaining marshes, siting his men scientifically, even if that means placing them in knee-deep water. The brave men put up with it, though the thrifty Dutch government, when it sees its soldiers exposed to guns and musketry, cries, "Careful, there! Each of those men represents a capital expense of three thousand francs!"

But the key battlefield isn't to the east, the north, or the west. It's the centre of Germany, occupied by a man of doubtful race, a leader of robbers and bandits whom Schiller will later make out to be a hero. Is he a Slav? Is he a German? His round head and blue eyes proclaim him Slavic; his red-blond hair says he's a German; his olive complexion declares him Bohemian. In fact, this lean, grim captain, who signs himself Wallenstein, was born in the ruins, fires, and massacres of Prague. He holds to neither faith nor law. But he does have a belief – or, rather, three. He believes his fate is ruled by the stars. He believes in luck. And he believes in money. Wallenstein has established in Europe the reign of the soldier, just as sin established in the world the reign of death. Enriched by warfare, protected by Holy Roman Emperor Ferdinand II (who will eventually have him assassinated), he is a general wearing the mantle of a prince, though he has neither the serenity of Gustavus nor the agility of Spinola. Bereft of emotion, even anger, he is as insensible to the cries, tears, and complaints of women as he is to the curses, threats, and accusations of men. Worse than that: he treats the world as a contest, and life as a lottery. He lets his soldiers play for any stake: the lives of men, the honour of women, and the blood of the people. Now anyone with a whip in his hand may play the prince; anyone with a sword at his side can be a king. Richelieu has long studied this demon. In his eulogy for Wallenstein, he cites not the crimes he committed but the crimes whose commitment he enabled; and to characterise his diabolical amorality, he merely repeated the man's own words: "As for all that, so what?"

But the Thirty Years War is not yet through with Germany – far from it. Its first, or Palatine, period ended in 1623 when the Elector Palatine, Frederick V, attempted to assume the crown of Bohemia and was defeated by the Emperor. Now the Danish period is in full swing, as Christian IV, King of Denmark, contends with Wallenstein and Tilly. Not for long: a year from now the war will enter its final, Swedish period. So much for Germany. Let's move on to England. Though richer than Spain, England is no less sick. The king is simultaneously at odds with his country and his wife, and quarrelling with half of Parliament. Soon he will dissolve his Parliament – though, as with his wife, he'll want it back again. Charles I had married Princess Henriette of France, that daughter of Henry IV who was probably his only true child. Henriette was a lively and witty brunette, seductive rather than agreeable, pretty rather than beautiful, peevish and obstinate, sensual and flirtatious. She'd had a difficult childhood. Brought to England when only seventeen, she'd been escorted there by Bérulle, who'd recommended that she adopt the repentant Mary Magdalene as her model. Compared to France she thought England morose and uncivilized; accustomed to our cheerful and boisterous folk, the English seemed grim and austere. She found her husband lukewarm at best. Danish on his mother's side, Charles I had a bit of the arctic in his veins. Marriage to a king, especially one so cold, haughty, and disparaging, seemed a penance. At least he seemed honest. She tried exerting her power with petty squabbles but the king always won out. Still unafraid, she became even more difficult, and began to scold. The king's marriage had opened the door to a Catholic invasion. Bérulle, who'd escorted Henriette to her husband, and who'd advised her to emulate Magdalene's forbearance, knew how much the English had come to hate the "popish" religion. But his new bishop's hat filled him with zeal and ambition, especially after the weak King James had allowed him to confirm eighteen thousand Catholics in London in one day. Bérulle thought to test his new strength by demanding that, since the children of Catholics were allowed to remain in their mothers' care until the age of thirteen, and as the young queen had a Catholic bishop, the bishop and his clergy should be allowed to appear in the streets of London in full regalia. When the king granted this request, the queen took it as a sign of weakness, and as a result Charles I found in his bed, instead of a loving wife and grateful subject, a severe and scolding Catholic who wouldn't submit to the king in the desires of religion – or of the flesh. It didn't stop there. One beautiful May morning, the young queen, accompanied by her bishop, her almoner, and all her women, crossed the length of London to the gallows at Tyburn where, twenty years earlier during the Gunpowder Conspiracy, Father Garnet and his Jesuits had been hanged. There, before the outraged eyes of London, she prayed for the souls of those notorious assassins who, with thirty-six barrels of powder, had planned to blow up the king, his ministers, and Parliament. The king was stunned by this public insult to the people and religion of the state. He flew into a violent rage at this commemoration of those who ought to have been forgotten. "Let them be driven away like wild beasts," he decreed, "these priests and women who would pray at the gallows of murderers!"

The queen lamented, the queen cried. Her priests cursed the unbelievers and threatened excommunication. Her women wailed like the daughters of Zion being led into slavery, though really they were only being sent back to France. As they were leaving, the queen, wailing in her grief, ran to the window to call out her farewells. Charles I, entering her room at that moment, asked her to refrain from further scandalizing the morals of the English. The queen only cried all the louder. Charles grabbed her around the waist to pull her away from the window but the queen clung to the bars. Charles dragged her away by force. The queen swooned, lifting her bleeding hands toward the sky to call the vengeance of God down upon her husband. God answered on another day when, from another window, this one in Whitehall, King Charles stepped out and walked to the scaffold. This quarrel between wife and husband that prefigured the quarrel between France and England, caused all the queens of Christendom to condemn Charles I as a British Bluebeard. Pope Urban VIII was outraged, and told the Spanish ambassador, "If your master doesn't draw his sword in defence of this persecuted princess, he's neither a Catholic nor a gentleman." Meanwhile the young Queen of Spain, Henriette's sister, wrote to Cardinal Richelieu, appealing to his nobility to ask him to come to the aid of the oppressed Queen of England. The queen mother and the Infanta of Brussels both appealed to King Louis. Bérulle added his own voice. As you may readily believe, Louis XIII, ever petty and mean of spirit, regarded King Charles's expulsion of the French from his court as an insult to the French Crown. Richelieu alone stood firm in opposition. From this act of resolve came the aid the English would send to the Protestants of La Rochelle, the assassination of Buckingham, the broken heart of Anne of Austria, and the universal league of queens and Princess against Richelieu. Now back to Italy, where we will find, in the political situation of Montferrat and Piedmont, and the conflicting interests of the Duke of Mantua and the Duke of Savoy, the explanation of the letters borne by the Count of Moret to the queen, the queen mother, and Gaston d'Orléans. Charles-Emmanuel, the Duke of Savoy, all the more ambitious as his sovereignty was cramped, some years before had violently annexed the Marquisate of Saluzzo. When he couldn't get France under Henry IV to acknowledge the legitimacy of his conquest, he supported Biron's conspiracy with Spain against King Henry – which was not only treason against the king but against the land and country of France that Biron intended to dismember. The southern provinces were to go to Philip III of Spain, Savoy was to have Lyonnais, Provence, and Dauphiné, while Biron was to get Burgundy and Franche-Count, with the hand of a Spanish Infanta into the bargain. The conspiracy was discovered, and Biron was shortened by a head. Henry IV would have left Savoy alone if he hadn't been pushed into war by Austria. The need for money forced him into marriage with Marie de Médicis. Thus funded, he marched on Savoy and defeated the Duke soundly, leaving him the Marquisate of Saluzzo but taking all of Bresse, Bugey, Valromey, the Gex district, both banks of the Rhône from Geneva to Saint-Genix, and finally, Château-Dauphin at the head of the Goito valley. Outside of Château-Dauphin, Charles-Emmanuel retained the rest of Piedmont. However, instead of being astride the Alps, he was now confined to their eastern slopes, though he remained master of the passes leading from France to Italy. It was on this occasion that our witty King Henry had referred to Charles-Emmanuel as the Prince of Marmots – and the nickname had stuck. After that, the Prince of Marmots was an Italian prince, and looked to Italy for further expansion of his state. He made several unsuccessful attempts to do so, until an opportunity presented itself that he regarded as both opportune and predestined. Francis IV of the Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua and Montferrat, died, leaving the young princess Marie de Gonzague as the only child from his marriage to Margaret of Savoy, daughter of Charles-Emmanuel. The Duke of Savoy claimed the right of governorship of Montferrat in the name of his granddaughter Marie. He hoped to marry Marie to his eldest son, Victor-Amadeus, and reunite Mantua and Montferrat with Piedmont. But Cardinal Ferdinand Gonzaga, brother of the late duke, rushed up from Rome, seized the regency of Mantua, and confined his niece to Goito Castle to keep her from falling into the hands of her maternal uncle. Cardinal Ferdinand died in his turn, and Charles-Emmanuel knew a moment of hope but the third brother, Vincenzo Gonzaga, came and, uncontested, assumed the Mantuan regency. Charles-Emmanuel had patience. Riddled with infirmity, the new duke couldn't last long. He fell ill, and the Duke of Savoy felt sure that this time Montferrat and Mantua would fall to him. But he didn't see the storm that was forming against him on the other side of the mountains. There was in France a certain Louis de Gonzague, Duke of Nevers, the eldest of a cadet branch of the Gonzaga family. His son, Charles of Nevers, was the uncle of those last three sovereigns of Montferrat, so his grandson, the Duke of Rethel, was the cousin of Marie de Gonzague, the heir to Mantua and Montferrat. Now, the interest of Cardinal Richelieu – and the interest of Cardinal Richelieu was always that of France – was in having a zealous supporter of the fleurs of lys amid the powers of Lombardy that were always ready to declare for Austria and Spain. The Marquis of Saint-Chamont, the French ambassador to Mantua, was sent his instructions, and he passed his master's wishes on to Vincenzo Gonzaga. And Vincenzo Gonzaga, when dying, named Charles, the Duke of Nevers, as his heir. The Duke of Rethel took possession on behalf of his father, with the title of Vicar General, and Princess Marie was sent to France, where she was placed under the care of Catherine de Gonzague, Dowager Duchess of Longueville. She was the widow of Henry I d'Orléans-Longueville, the daughter of Louis de Gonzague, and thus Marie's aunt. One rival to Charles of Nevers was Caesar Gonzaga, the Duke of Guastalla, whose grandfather had been accused of having poisoned the dauphin, the elder brother of Henry II, and of murdering the infamous Pierre-Louis Farnese, Duke of Parma and son of Pope Paul III. The other rival, as we know, was the Duke of Savoy. The policies of France pushed him closer, moment by moment, to Spain and Austria. On his behalf the Austrians marched into Mantua with an army commanded by Spinola, while Don Gonzales of Cordova undertook to wrest from the French Nice-de-la-Paille, Montcalvo, the Pont of Sture, and Casale. The Spaniards took everything except Casale, and within two months the Duke of Savoy found himself master of the valleys of the Po, Tanaro, and Belbo, and all the land in between. This all occurred while the French were occupied with the siege of La Rochelle. When it was able to do so, France sent a force to aid the Duke of Rethel, sixteen thousand men under the Marquis d'Uxelles. However, due to lack of experience, poor judgement, neglect, and very likely the betrayal of Créquy, they were repulsed by Charles-Emmanuel, much to the aggravation of the cardinal. But there remained, in the centre of Piedmont, a town that continued to hold out under the flag of France: Casale, defended by a brave and loyal commander named the Knight of Gurrón. Despite Richelieu's many statements to the effect that France intended to support the rights of Charles of Nevers, the Duke of Savoy had high hopes that this would be a fight that Louis XIII would eventually give up, as he knew Nevers was hated by Queen Mother Marie de Médicis. In his youth, Nevers had refused to marry her on the grounds that the Médicis weren't noble enough to be allied with the Gonzaga, who had been princes when the Médicis were still lowly gentry. Thus, the cardinal's support of Nevers was another cause of the resentment that surrounded him, and of which we heard him complain bitterly to his niece. The queen mother hated Cardinal Richelieu for many reasons. The first and most bitter is that he was once her lover, and was her lover no more; she had started out obeying him in all things, and eventually came to oppose him in all things. Where Richelieu wanted to enhance the greatness of France at the expense of Austria, she desired the expansion of Austria and the humiliation of France. And if he wanted to support Charles of Nevers as Duke of Mantua, she, driven by her old grudge, must oppose it. Queen Anne of Austria hated Cardinal Richelieu because he'd frustrated her love affair with the Duke of Buckingham, exposed the scandalous episode of the gardens of Amiens, exiled her accomplice Madam Chevreuse, and balked the English to the benefit of France. Worse, she harboured the ugly suspicion, never stated aloud, that the cardinal had somehow induced Felton to bury his knife in Buckingham's chest. And finally, she hated him because he monitored her closely to prevent the advance of any new lovers and knew that nothing she did, no matter how hidden, escaped his knowledge. The Duke of Orléans hated Cardinal Richelieu because he knew the cardinal recognised his true nature: ambitious, cowardly, and vicious. Gaston eagerly anticipated his Brother King Louis's death, and was even willing to hasten the event. He had been denied entry to the King's Council, his mentor Omano had been imprisoned, friend, and accomplice Chalais beheaded for conspiring to kill the king – while Sir's reward for the same crime had been to be dishonoured, though enriched. Furthermore, though he loved no one but himself, he hoped, upon his brother's death, to marry his queen, although she was seven years his elder – most especially if she was pregnant. Finally, the king himself hated the cardinal because he felt that Richelieu embodied genius, patriotism, and a genuine love of France, while he reeked of selfishness, indifference, and mediocrity; because he felt he would never really rule while the cardinal lived, and rule only badly if the cardinal died. But one thing always drew him back to the cardinal, though it, too, was a source of resentment. Was it a potion he'd drunk, some magic talisman he wore around his neck, an enchanted ring that had been placed on his finger? No: the magic charm was an ever-full chest of gold, one that was always open for the king. Concini had kept him in misery, Marie de Médicis in poverty; Louis XIII had never had any money until this wizard had touched his wand to the ground, and under the wondering eyes of the king, the golden River of Pactolus sprang forth. Richelieu was careful to ensure that the king always had money to spend, even when he himself had none. Now, in the hope that everything on the chessboard is as clear to our readers as it was to Richelieu, we will resume our story where we left off.

Marie de Gonzague

8 days have passed since the events last told of. To resume our story where we left off, we ask our readers to be so good as to follow us to the Hotel of Longueville that, backed up against that of the Marquise of Rambouillet, shared with it the block between Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre and the Hospital of the Three Hundred. But the Hotel of Longueville was entered from Rue Saint-Nicaise, opposite the Tuileries, while the marquise's mansion, as we've said, faced Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre. This mansion had belonged to Prince Henry of Condé – the same who'd mistaken Chapelain for a sculptor – and formerly had been occupied by himself and Madam la Princess, his wife, whom we met at Madam Rambouillet's soirée. He abandoned it in 1612, two years after his marriage to Miss of Montmorency, when he bought the great hotel in Rue Neuve-Saint-Lambert and caused the street to be re-baptised as the Rue of Condé, the name it bears to this day. At the time of our story – that is to say, on December 13, 1628 (events are so critical at this point that it's wise to be specific about dates) – this former mansion of the Prince of Condé was occupied by the Dowager Duchess of Longueville and her ward, Her Highness Princess Marie, daughter of François de Gonzague (whose estate was causing such tumult not only in Italy but in Austria and Spain) and Margaret of Savoy, the daughter of Charles-Emmanuel. Marie de Gonzague, born in 1612, had then attained her sixteenth year. All historians of the time agree that she was ravishingly beautiful, and from contemporary chroniclers, whose statements are more trustworthy, we learn that her beauty was the pinnacle of those perfectly shaped, dark-complexioned women born in Mantua – who, like the women of Arles, blossoming in the mists of the surrounding marshes, are blessed with black hair, blue eyes, pearly teeth, eyebrows and eyelashes like velvet, and lips that didn't even need to speak to offer sweet promises. As fiancée of the duke of Rethel, son of Charles of Nevers, who was heir to Duke Vincenzo, it goes without saying that her role would be important in the events to follow. Marie de Gonzague, whose beauty was sufficient, like the pole star, to draw the gaze of all the young cavaliers of the Court, caught the attention as well of those men of any age whose interest or ambition was in politics. It was known that she was under the particular protection of Cardinal Richelieu – which was just one more reason for those who wanted to pay their respects to the cardinal to pay assiduous court to Marie de Gonzague. It is evidently thanks to the sponsorship of the cardinal – of which the presence of Madam Combalet is proof – that we see, arriving at the doors of the Hotel of Longueville about seven in the evening, several of the new sedan chairs, the monopoly of which is shared between Souscarrières and Madam Cavois, and which are suddenly the favoured transport of everyone of importance. The passengers are admitted into the front salon that is hung with tapestries, below a ceiling painted with scenes representing the life of the bastard Dunois, founder of the house of Longueville. Candelabra flicker from mantels and sconces, and an immense chandelier is suspended in the centre of the room, beneath which stands Princess Marie. One of the first to arrive was Sir Prince. As Sir Prince has a certain part to play in our story, and a major role in the time both before and after it, a part both shady and sad, we ask permission to acquaint the reader with that dubious offspring of the royal house of Condé. While the first Condés were brave and jovial, this one was sombre and aloof. He'd been heard to say "I may be a coward but I'm not as bad as my cousin Vendome" – as if that was some consolation, assuming he needed any. How to explain this difference from his forefathers? The first Prince of Condé, though he was small and a little hunchbacked, was every woman's darling. Of him it was sung:

The little prince so fair,
That laughing, singing lad,
With lovers everywhere,
God guard him, though he's bad.

Upon his death, slain at Jarnac by Montesquieu, this charming little Prince of Condé left a son who, along with the young Henry of Navarre, became one of the leaders of the Protestant party. That man, Henry of Condé the first, was a worthy son of his father, leading a charge at the Battle of Jarnac at the head of five hundred gentlemen, despite having one arm in a sling and a broken leg with its bone jutting from his boot. When, on Saint Bartholomew's Day, Charles IX demanded, "Death or the mass."

Condé replied, "Death."

Henry of Navarre, more prudent, replied, "The mass."

He was the last great Condé of the early race of that name. However, he didn't die on the battlefield, gloriously covered with wounds and slain by another Montesquieu – he died from being poisoned by his wife. After an absence of five months, he returned to his Château des Andelys to find his wife, a daughter of the house of La Trémouille, pregnant courtesy of a Gascon page. At the dinner celebrating his return, she served her husband a peach for dessert. Two hours later, he was dead. The page fled to Spain that same evening. There was a public outcry, and the poisoner was arrested. Her son of adultery was born in prison, where his mother languished, no one daring to bring her to trial, as she was sure to be found guilty. After eight years, King Henry IV, who didn't want to see the end of the Condés, that lovely branch of the Bourbon tree, ordered her released from jail without trial. The widow was absolved by royal clemency, though convicted in the eye of the public. Her son was the second Henry, Prince of Condé, the one who mistook Chapelain for a sculptor, and we can relate in just a few words how he came to marry Miss of Montmorency. It's a curious story that deserves its own parenthesis, despite the risk of making this digression overlong. But there's no harm in learning about history from a novelist, especially those details that historians find unworthy to relate, assuming they even know them. In 1609, Queen Marie de Médicis put on a court ballet. During rehearsals, King Henry IV sulked because, though the ballet had all the prettiest women of the Court for its dancers, the queen had refused to admit Henry's mistress Jacqueline of Beuil, mother of the Count of Moret. And since all the dancers on their way to the rehearsal hall in the Louvre were obliged to pass the door of Henry IV, the king, to show his displeasure, had shut that door. One day, he left it ajar – and through the gap beheld Miss Charlotte of Montmorency. "There's nothing under heaven," said Bassompierre in his memoirs, "more beautiful than Miss of Montmorency, nothing more graceful or perfect."

She was a vision so radiant that the king's bad mood immediately took wing and fluttered off like a butterfly. He rose from his chair and followed her, drawn like Aeneas following cloud-wrapped Venus. On that day, for the first time, he attended the ballet. There was one scene in which the ladies dressed as nymphs – and scanty as the costume of a nymph is today, it was scantier in the seventeenth century – and there was a point at which all the nymphs raised their spears, as if to strike at once. At this moment, Miss of Montmorency turned with hers and almost ran the king through. The king, not anticipating any danger, wasn't wearing a cuirass, and could easily have been stabbed to the heart. Which, he later said, is exactly what happened when he saw the beautiful Charlotte's graceful thrust. Madam Rambouillet and Miss Paulet were both at the ballet that day, and immediately befriended Miss of Montmorency, though they were five or six years older than her. From that day on, good King Henry IV completely forgot Jacqueline of Beuil. (He was forgetful that way, as we know.) Thereafter, his only thought was to find a way to possess Miss of Montmorency. His plan was to find the beautiful

Charlotte a complaisant husband who, for a dowry of four or five hundred thousand francs, would look the other way when the king sought to take advantage of his wife's proximity. He'd done the same thing for the Countess of Moret when he'd found her a husband in Sir Césy whom he'd sent overseas as an ambassador on the night of her wedding. The king thought he had just the man close at hand. Because if a son of murder and adultery married the daughter of a Constable of France, with the king as his patron, the stain on his birth would disappear. The man was open to such a negotiation, and all his conditions were agreed to. The constable gave his daughter a dowry of a hundred thousand crowns, and Henry II of Condé, who the day before had an income of ten thousand, found himself on the morning of his wedding with fifty thousand a year. Of course, that evening he would have to depart. Only he didn't. However, he did stick to his agreement insofar as to spend his wedding night in a room separate from that of his wife. Meanwhile Henry IV, the eager fifty-year-old lover, obtained Charlotte's promise that, to prove she was alone and mistress of herself, she would appear on her balcony between two torches with her hair down on her shoulders. When he saw her there, the king nearly died from joy. It would take too long to follow Henry IV through all the turns of his final amour, his mad fury when Condé fled with his wife to the Netherlands, his royal mania cut short by the knife of Ravallac while he was on his way to visit the lovely Miss Paulet, for what consolation the charming Lioness could provide. After the king's death, Sir Condé returned to France with his wife, who was still technically Miss of Montmorency, as the marriage wasn't consummated until during the three years they spent together in the Bastille. It's probable that, given Sir Condé's preference for the schoolboys of Bourges, without those three years in the Bastille neither the Grand Condé nor Madam Longueville would ever have been born. Sir Prince was best known for his greed and parsimony. When going to visit his attorneys, he rode through the streets of Paris on an everyday hackney, accompanied by a single valet. La Martelière, a famous lawyer of the time had those days when he would consult with clients for free like doctors. Condé visited him on those days. Though always badly clothed, on the evening of which we speak he had dressed more carefully than usual, perhaps because he knew his brother-in-law, the duke of Montmorency, would be paying his respects to Princess Marie, and the duke had said that, should he encounter Condé dressed in a manner unworthy of a prince of the blood, he would pretend not to know him. Indeed, Henry II, duke of Montmorency, was the complete opposite of Henry II, Prince of Condé. He was the brother of the beautiful Charlotte, and was as elegant as Sir Condé was coarse, as generous as Sir Condé was stingy. One day, upon hearing that a certain gentleman's fortune would be made if he could find twenty thousand crowns to borrow for two years, he said, "Seek no further: they are found." Taking a piece of paper, he wrote on it, Good for twenty thousand crowns. "Bring this to my steward tomorrow," he said to the gentleman, "and may you prosper." And indeed, two years later the gentleman offered to return Sir Montmorency his twenty thousand crowns. "Go, sir," the duke said. "It's enough that you offer them to me; keep them with my good wishes." He was deeply in love with the queen, as was Roger of Bellegarde, whose throat he almost cut over it. The queen flirted with both, and though Sir Montmorency had thirty years while Sir Bellegarde had sixty, she couldn't decide between them – until Buckingham came to Court and settled the matter. The older gentleman made so much noise about the affair that the younger duke coined a couplet that was soon heard in all the alcoves:

Roger's star shines
No more at the Louvre;
Everyone finds
He's had to move.
The arrival from Dover
Has shoved him over.

Kings, when they marry, are no more tolerant than other husbands, so Louis XIII had exiled Sir Montmorency to Chantilly. Restored to favour through the influence of Marie de Médicis, he had returned to spend a month at Court, then left for his governorship of Languedoc. It was there that he heard the news of the duel and execution of his cousin François of Montmorency, Count of Bouteville. The queen mother's fondness for Montmorency came from the fact that his wife, Maria Felice Orsini, was the daughter of that Virginio Orsini who'd accompanied Marie de Médicis to France. This made Montmorency her nephew-in-law. Maria Orsini, who according to the poet Théophile was as white as heavenly snow, was Italian – which is to say, jealous. She tormented her husband, who, as Tallemant des Réaux tells us, couldn't keep from pursuing every woman with the least bit of coquetry to her. The duke and his wife finally reached a compromise whereby he was allowed to act as gallant whenever he pleased – so long as he told her all about it. One of her friends told her she couldn't understand how she could give her husband such latitude, and then insist on hearing the details. "Well," she replied, "I always wait to ask till we're about to go to bed, and then I get everything I'm owed."

And indeed, it's no surprise that women, especially in this lusty period, would succumb to passion for a handsome prince of thirty-three years of the first family of France: a millionaire, governor of a province, Admiral of France at seventeen, Duke and Peer at eighteen, Knight du Saint-Esprit at twenty-five, who counted among his ancestors four constables and six marshals, and whose entourage was composed of a hundred gentlemen and thirty pages. That evening, the duke of Montmorency was more handsome than ever. Upon his arrival, all eyes turned his way, and there was general amazement when, after greeting Princess Marie, he respectfully kissed the hand of Madam Combalet. Since the death of his cousin Bouteville – a wound felt more deeply in his pride as a Montmorency than in his affection for a relative – this was the first such advance he'd made to the cardinal. But no one was fooled by this demonstration: war with Savoy, Spain, and Austria was imminent, and like Sir Créquy, the duke of Montmorency was ambitious to bear the sword of the Constable of France that had been borne with distinction at the king's knee by both his father and grandfather. He who best understood the duke's ambition, as he'd had similar hopes which had been thoroughly crushed, was Charles of Lorraine, duke of Guise, son of the Guise known as the Scarface who had perpetrated the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew's Day. The younger Guise was born in 1571, the year before the massacre, and was known more for his love affairs than for his deeds of war – though he'd served valiantly at the siege of La Rochelle, where he'd continued to fight even after his ship was completely afire. He ought to have a fair claim to the constabulary, or at least a prominent position in the army. Indeed, even if he were a simple gentleman like Bassompierre, Bellegarde, Cramail, or even Schomberg, he would have had the precedence but against the duke of Montmorency he could never hope for anything better than a secondary position. Given his birth, Montmorency's victory over the Calvinists in destroying the fleet commanded by the duke of Soubise, from whom he'd also retaken the islands of Oléron and Ré, placed him above all other captains of the time. There was another rivalry between them: the conquests of love. Although Sir Guise had a broad, flat nose and was short in stature, he had inherited from his father some of the airs of royalty that made him quite the ladies' man. The women found him guilty of only one great fault, his age – a thing which only Henry IV had briefly made fashionable and converted into an asset. But as we know from the date of his birth, the duke of Guise was now approaching his sixtieth year, a condition he tried to regard as a new adventure. One night he was standing in for a counsellor – not, however, in his role on the council but in his bed. The counsellor, who was travelling, wasn't expected to return before noon but arrived unexpectedly at about five in the morning. He had the key to the house, and made his way to the door of his bedchamber, where his wife, fortunately, had thrown the lock. The counsellor knocked loudly and called her name. His wife, acting without haste, as that might give rise to suspicion, took a few moments to thrust Sir Guise, naked, into the counsellor's wardrobe, picking up the lace collar he'd left on a chair and shoving it into her pocket. Then, rubbing her eyes as if surprised from sleep, she opened the door to the counsellor, thinking he would go right to bed, giving her lover a chance to escape. Upon entering, the counsellor drew the curtains to let in the daylight, and the first thing he saw was the rest of the duke's clothes. "So," he asked, frowning, "what clothes are these, my love?" "Clothes I have on approval from a second-hand merchant, and which I can get for almost nothing if they suit you. But lie down and rest – you must be tired."

"No," the counsellor said, "I have an early appointment at the palace, and must go there directly." Then, taking off his travel-stained garments, he put on those of the duke that were resplendent. "By my faith," he said, "these fit like they were made for me. Pay your second-hand merchant, my dear, and if he has any more like this, tell him to bring them. I'm off to the palace."

And indeed, taking only the time needed to get some papers from his desk, he threw his cloak over his clothes and left for the palace. Behind him, his wife closed the bedroom door and opened the closet. "Dear me, My Lord," she said, "You must be frozen!"

"Faith, no," replied the duke. "While your husband was donning my clothes, I dressed in his. Don't you think I make a good attorney?"

And with these words, he clapped a lawyer's cap on his head and stepped out, dressed in the complete outfit of a counsellor. The counsellor's wife laughed, finding it all very amusing. But for the duke of Guise, the best part of the joke was yet to come. As he had an audience at the Louvre that morning with King Henry IV, he thought it would be funny to go in his counsellor's garb. The king didn't recognise him at first, and when he finally did, he asked, half seriously and half laughing, what was the meaning of his masquerade. Sir Guise recounted his adventure, and as he told it well, and the king laughed heartily, he decided to press the point. "Sire," said the duke, "if you doubt me, send a guard to the palace to escort the counsellor back to the Louvre. You'll see that he's dressed in my clothes."

The king who never passed up an opportunity for amusement, approved of this joke, and summoned the counsellor to appear before him within the hour. The counsellor, dumbfounded with no idea what could have earned him this honour, hastened over to the Louvre. The king who was never at a loss when it came to gouailler (to use the old Gallic word for shenanigans, a term much in vogue at the time that we're sorry to see has almost been lost from the language), drew the counsellor aside, and while chatting with him about a hundred trivialities, began undoing the man's cloak. The counsellor, astonished, didn't dare to protest. Suddenly the king cried, "Hey! By the belly of the Grey Saint! Sir Counsellor, you're wearing the clothes of Sir Guise!"

"Of who? Sir Guise?" asked the counsellor, fearing the king had gone mad. "My wife bought these from a merchant."

"My faith!" said the king. "I didn't think the House of Guise had fallen so low that its head was reduced to selling his old clothes. Thank you, sir Counsellor, for showing me something I didn't know." And he sent the proud counsellor off, glorying in the knowledge that he wore the clothes of a Prince of Lorraine. When he arrived at home, the first thing he said to his wife was, "Do you know, my dear, whose clothes I'm wearing?"

"My faith, no!" she replied anxiously.

"Well! These are the clothes of my Lord the duke of Guise," said the counsellor, preening.

"Who told you that?" asked his wife in alarm.

"The king himself. And if you can find any more at the same price, buy them."

"Very well, my love," said his wife. "Under those conditions, I believe I may be able to get his entire wardrobe."

Sir Guise was absent-minded, and his wool-gathering had once led him into an amorous adventure. One evening he'd lingered over cards at Sir Créquy's until it was too late to send for his carriage. The Hotel of Guise was quite far, so Sir Créquy offered to lend the prince his own horse. Sir Guise mounted the horse but his mind was astray, so instead of guiding the horse he just gave it his head. At this time of night, the horse was used to taking Sir Créquy to visit his mistress, so it bore Sir Guise there and stopped at her door. Guise didn't recognise the door but he was amused and amenable: wearing his hooded cloak, he dismounted and knocked. The door was opened by a pretty maidservant, who slapped the hackney, sending it straight back to the stable where it knew it would find its oats. Then the maid led Sir Guise up a staircase lit just well enough to keep him from breaking his neck, to a room no more well-lit than the stairs. The rider was apparently as expected as his horse, and he fell into a pair of open arms. No one spoke. Everything happened in the dark. Sir Guise, who was a friend of Sir Créquy, must have known him well enough to imitate his performance, as the lady fell asleep without noticing her mistake. But in the morning she was awakened by Sir Guise as he turned in the bed. "By God, my love," she said, "why do you turn so?"

"Because," said Sir Guise, who was as indiscreet as he was absent-minded, "I need to get up so I can go tell all my friends that, instead of spending the night with Sir Créquy, you've spent it with Sir Guise."

Sir Guise offset his faults with the virtue of generosity. One morning the President of Chevry sent him by way of Raphael Corbinelli, father of that Jean Corbinelli famous for his friendship with Madam Sevigne, fifty thousand livres that the duke had won the day before at cards. The sum was divided into five sacks, four large bags each containing ten thousand livres in silver, and a smaller bag containing ten thousand livres in gold. Corbinelli wanted to count it out for him but the duke wouldn't allow it. He just saw that one bag was smaller than the others, and without looking inside it, said, "Here, my friend. Take this for your trouble."

Corbinelli went home, opened the bag, and found ten thousand livres in gold. He immediately returned to Sir Guise. "My Lord," he said, "I think you made a mistake and gave me a bag of gold believing it was a bag of silver."

The duke drew himself up as far as his small stature would allow. "Keep it, keep it, Sir," he said. "The princes of my house don't make a practice of taking back what we once have given." And Corbinelli kept his ten thousand livres. When Sir Montmorency was announced, the duke of Guise immediately sought out Sir Grammont in order to commence a quarrel as only he could. "Well, my friend," he said, "I must say I have a bone to pick with you."

"It can't be about gaming, Duke," Grammont responded. "Every year, good or bad, you win from me around a hundred thousand livres. My wife even offered you ten thousand crowns a year if you'd promise not to play with me."

"Which I refused! No, my faith, there's no question of that."

"What is it, then?"

"What? Why, since I know that after me you're the most talkative of men, last week I told you that I'd won Madam Sable's ultimate favours. I assumed you'd tell all of Paris but you haven't said a word."

Sir Grammont laughed. "I was afraid to get on Sir Montmorency's bad side."

"Oh," said Sir Guise, "I thought it was all over between them."

"You can see by the way they argue that it isn't."

And indeed, the marquise and the duke were arguing. “Find out what it’s about, my dear Count,” said the duke, “and then come and tell me.” The count approached. “Sir,” said the marquise, “it’s intolerable. I’ve heard that at the last ball at the Louvre, you took advantage of the fact that I was sick and danced with all the most beautiful women of the Court.”

“But my dear Marquise,” said the duke, “what would you expect me to do?”

“To dance only with the ugly ones, Sir!”

The Count of Grammont, who’d arrived in time to hear this dialogue, reported it to the duke. “My faith, Count,” replied the duke, “this is the moment, I think, to go to Sir Montmorency and share with him what I confided to you.”

“By my faith, no!” said the count. “I wouldn’t say such a thing to a husband, let alone a lover.”

“So,” said the duke with a sigh, “I’ll go and tell him myself.”

But as he took his first step toward Montmorency, both halves of the double door were thrown open and the usher announced, “His Royal Highness My Lord Gaston d’Orléans.”

All conversation stopped, those who stood remained that way, and everyone sitting arose, including Princess Marie herself. “Well,” said Madam Combalet, the confidante of the cardinal, as she rose in her turn, bowing more respectfully than anyone, “now the comedy begins. I mustn’t miss a word of what’s said in the theatre – and if possible, behind the scenes.”

The Commencement of the Comedy

And indeed, it was the first time, publicly and in the midst of a grand soirée, that the Duke of Orléans had presented himself to Princess Marie de Gonzague. It was easy to see he’d paid particular attention to his appearance. His doublet was white velvet laced with gold, as was his cloak that was lined with scarlet satin. His velvet breeches were the same colour as the lining of his cloak. Below he was clad in silk stockings and white satin slippers. He wore, or rather had in his hand, because, against his usual custom, he’d entered the room uncovered, a white felt hat with diamond braid and scarlet feathers. Ribbons in the two colours he’d adopted flowed and curled from every seam. My Lord Gaston wasn’t much liked, let alone esteemed. We’ve mentioned how much damage had been done to his reputation in this brave, elegant, and chivalrous society by his conduct at the trial of Chalais; his entrance was greeted by a general silence. Hearing the announcement, Princess Marie cast a knowing glance toward the Dowager of Longueville. That day, Madam Longueville had received a letter from His Royal Highness notifying her of his intended visit and requesting, if possible, a few minutes’ conversation with Princess Marie, to whom he had matters of the utmost importance to communicate. He advanced toward Princess Marie, whistling a little hunting tune but as everyone knew he never stopped whistling, even before the queen, no one worried about the impropriety – not even Princess Marie, who gracefully offered him her hand. The prince kissed it, holding it long and firmly against his lips. Then he bowed courteously to the dowager, bowed slightly less to Madam Combalet, and, addressing both lords and ladies, said, “My faith, Mesdames and Gentlemen, I must recommend this new invention of Sir Souscarrières’s. Upon my honour, nothing could be more convenient. Have you tried it, Princess?”

“No, My Lord, I’ve only heard of this vehicle from some who used it to come here tonight.”

“It’s quite comfortable, and although Sir Richelieu and I aren’t great friends, I can only applaud his award of the rights to this invention to Sir Bellegarde. His father, who is Master of the Horse, never in all his life invented anything the like, and I propose to give his son as much income as I can from this service. Imagine, Princess, a sturdy wheelbarrow, lined with velvet, where one sits comfortably, with windows when one wants to see, and curtains when one does not want to be seen. Some carry only one but others can take two. I was carried by some lads from Auvergne who could walk, trot, or gallop as required, without damaging the car. I tried it slowly within the Louvre, then at a trot once we were outside. Their pace was strong but gentle. When the weather is bad, they can come right into a hall at the carriage door, so one can step in without even getting muddy. A marvellous convenience. They put the chair – they call it a chair, you know – right down on the floor, so one needn’t step up. I will make it my business, I swear, to ensure that this invention becomes fashionable. I recommend it, Duke,” he said, addressing Montmorency with a little bow of his head.

“I’ve used it today,” said the duke, bowing, “and I am entirely of the opinion of Your Highness.”

Gaston d’Orléans next turned to the duke of Guise. “Greetings, cousin. What news from the war?”

“It’s you we must ask about that, My Lord. The closer one is to the sun, the more its light reveals.”

“Yes, when it doesn’t blind us. As for me, I find politics quite over-dazzling. If this continues, I may need to ask Princess Marie to lend me a room so I can ask for news from her neighbours the Three Hundred Knights.”

“If Your Highness wishes to hear some news, I can give it to him: I’ve been told that tonight, after she completes her duties to the queen, Miss Isabelle of Lautrec will bring us a letter she received from the Baron of Lautrec, her father, who as you know is in Mantua with the duke of Rethel.”

“But,” asked My Lord Gaston, “is this news that can be made public?”

“The baron believes so, My Lord, and said as much in his letter.”

“In exchange,” Gaston said, “I’ll give you some hallway gossip that is the only kind of news that interests me, since I’ve given up politics.”

“Tell us, My Lord! Tell us!” said the ladies, laughing.

Madam Combalet, as was her habit, covered her face with her fan. “I’ll wager,” said the duke of Guise, “you’re going to talk about my scoundrel of a son.”

“Just so. You know that he now insists on being presented his shirt, like a prince of the blood. Eight or ten people have been foolish enough to do him this honour. But a few days ago he designated the Abbot of Retz, who pretended to be nervous and dropped it into the fire, where it scorched. After that, the Abbot picked up his hat, bowed, and left.”

“Well done, by my faith, well done,” said the duke of Guise, “and I’ll compliment him on it next time I see him.”

“If one dared to speak,” said Madam Combalet, “one might say your son’s done even worse than that.”

“Oh, tell us, tell us, Madam!” said Sir Guise.

“Well, on his last visit to his sister Madam Saint-Pierre, the abbess in Reims, he dined with her in the parlour, and then went right into the convent like a prince. There he was, sixteen years old, and chasing after the nuns. He caught the most beautiful and, willy-nilly, began to kiss her. ‘My brother!’ cried Madam Saint-Pierre, ‘My brother! Don’t joke like this! These are the Brides of Christ!’ ‘Good,’ replied the villain, ‘God is powerful enough to keep me from embracing his brides, if that was His will.’ ‘I’ll complain to the queen!’ cried the nun, who was quite pretty. This frightened the abbess. ‘Embrace that other one, too,’ she said to the prince. ‘But, sister, she’s very ugly!’ he replied. ‘All the more reason – it will look like you were acting childish and didn’t know any better.’ ‘Must I, sister?’ ‘If you don’t, the pretty one will complain.’ ‘Well, then, ugly it is!’ And he kissed the ugly one, who was grateful, and kept the pretty one from complaining.”

“And how, beautiful widow, do you know of this?” the duke asked Madam Combalet.

“Madam Saint-Pierre made her report to my uncle – but my uncle has such a weakness for the House of Guise, he only laughed!”

“When I saw the lad last month,” said Sir Prince, “he had a yellow silk stocking as a feather in his hat. What does that folly mean?”

“It means,” said sir d’Orléans, “that he was in love with La Villiers of the Hotel of Bourgogne, and she was playing a role in which she wore yellow stockings. He sent Tristan l’Hermite to pay her a compliment on her legs. She pulled off one of her stockings and gave it to Tristan, saying, ‘If Sir Joinville wears this as a plume on his hat for three days, he can then come and ask me for whatever he wants.’”

“Well?” asked Madam Sable.

“Well, he wore it for three days, and my cousin of Guise, his father, can tell you that on the fourth, he returned to the Hotel of Guise at eleven in the morning.”

“A fine life for a future archbishop!” said Madam Sable.

“But these days,” His Royal Highness continued, “he’s in love with Miss of Pons, a great big blonde. The other day she went for a purgative. He asked for the address of her apothecary and took the same drug, writing her, ‘No one can say that if you’re being purged, I’m not being purged as well.’”

“Ah!” said the duke. “This amour with an actress explains why, the other day, the great ninny invited every trained-dog buffoon in Paris to the Hotel of Guise. Imagine me coming into the mansion and finding the courtyard full of dogs dressed in all sorts of costumes. There were about three hundred, with about thirty clowns standing around, each with his pack. ‘What are you up to now, Joinville?’ I asked. ‘I’m putting on a show, Father,’ he replied. Guess why he’d invited all these buffoons? He promised each one a crown if, three days hence, three hundred trained dogs of Paris would jump at once for Miss of Pons.”

“By the way,” said Gaston, too impatient to stay with one subject for long, “as his neighbour, dear Dowager, have you heard about poor Pisany? Voiture saw him yesterday and said he’s not doing too badly.”

“I called this morning, and was told that the doctors were still hovering around him.”

“I have fresher news than that,” said the duke of Montmorency. “I left the Count of Moret at the door of the Hotel of Rambouillet, where he’d decided to go in person.”

“What, the Count of Moret?” said Madam Combalet. “The man whom Pisany wanted killed?”

“Quite so,” said the duke. “It seems it was all a misunderstanding.”

At that moment, the door opened and the usher announced, “My Lord Antoine of Bourbon, Count of Moret.”

“Stay a moment,” said the duke, “here he is. He’ll tell you all about it himself, and much better than I would, as I start mumbling every time I have to say more than twenty words.”

The Count of Moret came in, and all eyes turned toward him – especially, we must say, those of the women. Having not yet been presented to Marie de Gonzague, he waited at the door till Sir Montmorency came to lead him to the princess that the duke hastened to do with the same elegant grace he did everything. No less elegant, the young prince bowed to the princess, kissed her hand, gave her the regards of the duke of Rethel whom he’d seen in passing in Mantua, kissed the hand of Madam Longueville, and picked up her bouquet that had fallen from her bodice as she’d stepped aside to make room for Madam Combalet. He returned it with a charming gesture, bowed profoundly before My Lord Gaston, and then took a modest place near the duke of Montmorency. “My dear prince,” Montmorency said when the ceremony was over, “we were talking about you just before you came in.”

“Me? Bah. What could you have to say about me in such celebrated company?”

“You’re right, My Lord,” said a female voice. “A man wants to murder you just because you’re a lover of Marion Delorme’s sister. Why ever would we care about that?”

“Ah!” said the prince. “There’s a voice I know. Is that not my little cousin?”

“Indeed, Master Jacquelino!” replied Madam Fargis, approaching and holding out her hand.

The Count of Moret bent over her hand, whispering, “You know I must see you again, simply must speak with you. I’m in love.”

“With me?”

“A little – but with another, a lot.”

“Impudence! What’s her name?”

“I don’t know her name.”

“Is she pretty, at least?”

“I don’t know what she looks like.”

“Is she young?”

“She must be.”

“And why do you think that?”

“From the voice I heard, the hand I touched, the breath I drank in.”

“Ah, my cousin. How can you say things like that?”

“I’m twenty-one. I say what I feel.”

“Oh, youth! Youth!” said Madam Fargis, “Priceless diamond that tarnishes so quickly!”

“My dear Count,” interrupted the duke, “You’re making all the ladies jealous of your ‘cousin,’ as I believe you called Madam Fargis. They want to know why you were visiting a man who tried to have you assassinated.”

“First,” said the Count of Moret, with a charming air, “because I’m a cousin of Madam Rambouillet.”

“A cousin? How?” asked Sir d’Orléans, who prided himself on his knowledge of noble genealogy. “Please explain, Sir Moret.”

"Through my little cousin Fargis, who married Sir Fargis of Angennes, cousin of Madam Rambouillet."

"And how are you the cousin of Madam Fargis?"

"That," said the Count of Moret, "is our secret – isn't that so, Cousin Marina?"

"Yes, Cousin Jacquellino," laughed Madam Fargis.

"Then, besides being a cousin to Madam Rambouillet, I'm one of her friends."

"But I've seen you at her house only once or twice," said Madam Combalet.

"She asked me to stop paying visits."

"Why's that?" asked Madam Sable.

"Because Sir Chevreuse was jealous of me."

"Had he the right to be?"

"Hmm. How many of us are there in this salon? Thirty or so. I'd tell each one for a thousand. That makes thirty thousand."

"To dogs, we give our words away," said sir.

"Then he had the right – on behalf of his wife."

A roar of laughter greeted the count's admission. "But," said Madam Montbazon who was afraid she might not get the whole tale to pass on to her stepsister Chevreuse, "that still doesn't tell the story of the assassination."

"Ah! By the belly of the Grey Saint! That's simple enough. Who compromised Madam la Montagne by saying I was her lover?"

"None other than Madam Chevreuse," said Madam Sable.

"Well, poor Pisany believed it was Madam Maugiron who was my delight. Certain issues with his shape make him touchy, while certain truths told by his mirror make him positively irascible. Instead of calling me out for a duel that I would've been happy to grant him, he decided to pay a bravo to pick a quarrel. His luck was out: he tried to hire an honest man, who refused. He tried to kill the bravo but failed. He tried to kill Souscarrières, and failed. And that's the story."

"But that's not what we want to hear," insisted Sir. "Why did you go to visit a man who tried to assassinate you?"

"Because he couldn't come to me. I'm a good soul, My Lord. I thought poor Pisany might think I was out to get him, and would have nightmares. So I shook his hand and told him that if, in the future, he believes he has reason to complain of me, he should just call me out for a duel. I'm just a simple gentleman, and have no right to refuse someone who believes his honour offended. Though I'd rather not offend anyone."

As the young man spoke these words so gently and yet, at the same time, so firmly, a murmur of approval answered the frank and honest smile on his lips. He'd hardly finished speaking when the door opened again and the usher announced, "Miss Isabelle of Lautrec."

As she entered, they could see behind her the footman, wearing the livery of her château, who'd accompanied her. At the sight of the young woman, the Count of Moret felt a strange feeling of attraction and took a step toward her. She walked, blushing and graceful, to Princess Marie, and bowed respectfully before her. "Madam," she said, "I come from Her Majesty bearing you a letter from my father, with good news for you, and I beg leave with respect to place this letter at your feet."

At the first words spoken by Miss of Lautrec, the Count of Moret's heart leaped. He seized Madam Fargis's hand and, pressing it, he murmured, "It's she! It's she! The one I love!"

Isabelle & Marina

As the Count of Moret had foreseen without truly knowing anything, even a name but by the wonderful insight of youth that makes a feeling more reliable than the senses, Miss Isabelle de Lautrec was perfectly lovely, albeit with a beauty different from that of Princess Marie. Marie de Gonzague was a brunette with blue eyes, while Isabelle de Lautrec was blond with eyes, eyelashes, and eyebrows of black. Her skin was a dazzling white, fine and transparent, with the delicate shading of a rose petal. Her neck had that long lovely curve seen in women painted by Pérugin and in the early work of his pupil Sanzio. Her hands were long, slim, and white, the very model of the hands of Leonardo da Vinci's La Ferronnière. Her long flowing dress didn't reveal even the shadow of her feet but one could guess that if they were in harmony with her hands, they would be slender and delicate. As Isabelle knelt before the princess, Marie embraced her and kissed her forehead. "God forbid," she said, "I should allow to kneel before me the daughter of one of the best servants of our house. Just give me your good news. Now, daughter of our dear friend, does your father say this is news for me alone, or may I share it with those who love us?"

"As you'll see in the postscript, Madam, His Majesty's Ambassador, Sir de La Saludie, has authorised the news to be spread in Italy – and Your Highness may, in turn, let it be known in France."

Princess Marie turned an inquiring look toward Madam de Combalet who, with a slight nod, confirmed what the beautiful messenger had said. Marie read the letter to herself. While she was reading it, the young woman turned her eyes to the rest of the assembly. Until then, she'd seen only the princess, the other twenty-five or thirty people in the salon appearing as in a mirage. When her look reached the Count of Moret, their eyes met, and along their gaze flashed an electric jolt that went right to both their hearts. Isabelle paled and leaned against the princess's chair. The Count of Moret saw the emotion strike her, and seemed to hear a choir of heavenly angels singing. Glory to God!

The usher had named her as a member of the old and illustrious family of Lautrec, whose noble history almost equalled that of the princes.

And she had never been in love. He knew it: he had hoped as much but now he was sure. Meanwhile, Princess Marie had finished her letter. "Gentlemen," she said, "Here's the news from my dear Isabelle's father. On his way to Mantua he met Sir de La Saludie, His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinaire to the Italian powers. Sir de La Saludie was charged by the cardinal with telling both the Duke of Mantua and the Venetian Senate of our conquest of La Rochelle. He was also responsible for declaring that France was prepared to come to the aid of Casale and to support Charles de Nevers in the possession of his new dominions. Passing through Turin he had seen the Duke of Savoy, Charles-Emmanuel, and had enjoined him, in the name of his son-in-law our king, and on the behalf of the cardinal, to abandon his claim to Montferrat. He was empowered to offer the Duke of Savoy, in return, the city of Trino with a sovereign income of twelve thousand crowns a year. Sir de Bautru has departed for Spain and Sir de Charnace for Austria, Germany, and Sweden, with the same message."

"I hope," said Sir, "this doesn't mean the cardinal plans to ally us with the Protestants."

"As for me," said Sir Prince, "if that was the only way to keep Wallenstein and his bandits in Germany, I wouldn't be against it."

"That's your Huguenot blood talking," replied Gaston d'Orléans.

"I would think," laughed the prince, "that there's more Huguenot blood in Your Highness's veins than in mine. Between our fathers Henry de Navarre and Henry de Condé, the only difference is that one took the mass to gain a kingdom, and the other didn't."

"Just the same, Gentlemen," said the Duke of Montmorency, "this is great news. Do we have any idea who will be given command of the army we send to Italy?"

"Not yet," replied Sir, "but it's likely, Sir Duke, that the cardinal, who paid you a million for the office of Admiral so he could conduct the siege of La Rochelle as he saw fit, will spend another million for the right to direct the Italian campaign in person – even two million, if need be."

"But confess, My Lord," said Madam de Combalet, "that if he ran the campaign as well as he led the siege of La Rochelle, neither the king nor France would have cause for complaint. Some others might demand a million to undertake the task, and yet not fare as well."

Gaston bit his lip. He hadn't appeared for a moment at the siege of La Rochelle, after having received five hundred thousand crowns for his campaign expenses. "I hope, My Lord," said the Duke of Guise, "that you won't let this opportunity to assert your rights escape you."

"If I go," said Sir, "so will you, cousin. I've received quite a bit from the House of Guise through the hands of Miss de Montpensier, and would be glad for a chance to show I'm not ungrateful. And you, my dear Duke," Gaston said, going up to Montmorency, "would be particularly welcome, as it would give me an opportunity to correct some injustices. Among your father's trophies of arms is the Sword of the Constable that I don't think would be too heavy for the son. But remember, my dear Duke, in that event I would be delighted to see at your side, making his debut under such a fine mentor, my dear brother the Count of Moret."

The Count of Moret bowed while the duke, flattered in his supreme ambition by Gaston's speech, said, "Those words are not planted in sand, My Lord. If the opportunity presents itself, Your Highness will see that I'll remember them."

Just then, the usher came in through a side door and said something to the Dowager Duchess de Longueville, who immediately left with him by the same door. The gentlemen all gathered around Sir. The chance of a war – all the more likely as everyone knew Savoy had no intention of raising the siege of Casale, and that the Spanish were determined to deny Mantua to the Duke of Nevers – granted Sir sudden importance. It was impossible that such an expedition could be undertaken without him, and in that case his high position in the army would give him the disposal of some important commands. The usher returned after a moment and spoke quietly to Princess Marie, who followed him through the same door Madam de Longueville had used. Madam de Combalet, who was nearby, heard the name Vautier and shuddered. Vautier, the reader will recall, was the secret confidant of the queen mother. Five minutes later, it was to My Lord Gaston that the usher came to ask him to join Madam de Longueville and the Princess Marie. "Gentlemen," he said, bowing, "remember that I am no one special, that I aspire to nothing in the world other than to be a devoted knight to Princess Marie. And being no one, I can promise nothing to anyone!"

With these words, he put his hat on his head and skipped off, both hands tucked into the top of his breeches, as was his habit. He was hardly gone before the Count of Moret, taking advantage of the general astonishment at the successive disappearances of the Duchess de Longueville, the Princess Marie, and His Royal Highness Sir, went straight across the salon to Isabelle de Lautrec. Bowing before the blushing and tongue-tied young woman, he said, "Miss, please know that there is in the world a man who, the night he met you without even glimpsing you, vowed to be yours through life and death – and tonight, after seeing you, he renews that oath. This man is the Count of Moret."

And, without waiting for an answer from the young lady, more blushing and tongue-tied than ever, he bowed respectfully and left. Passing through a dim-lit corridor leading to an antechamber, itself poorly lit, as was customary at the time, the Count of Moret felt an arm slipped through his, while a black hood lined with rose satin appeared before his face. He felt a breath like flame from beneath the hood, and a voice in tones of mild reproof said, "And thus is poor Marina sacrificed."

He recognised the voice, and even more he recognised the hot breath of Madam de Fargis that had once before touched his face at the Inn of the Painted Beard. "The Count of Moret flees, it's true," he said, leaning toward that breath so avid it seemed to come from the Venus Astarte herself, "but..."

"But what?" demanded his interrogator, lifting herself at his side on tiptoe, so that despite the gloom, the young man could see her eyes glowing within the hood like two black diamonds, above teeth like a string of pearls.

"But," continued the Count of Moret, "Jacquellino is still here, and if that will satisfy her..."

"Then Marina will be content," said the lady magician.

She leaned forward. The young man immediately felt on his lips the sweet taste and the acrid bite of antiquity that had a word for such a thing and a name for such a feeling – and that word and name was Eros. Then, dazed by the voluptuous thrill that coursed through his veins and into his heart, Antoine de Bourbon, eyes closed, head thrown back, leaning against the wall with an anguished sigh, heard the lovely Marina, light as the bird of Venus, release his arm, step into a sedan chair, and say, "To the Louvre."

"My faith," said the Count of Moret, detaching himself from the wall with an effort, "Long live France for love. There's no shortage of them! I returned only a fortnight ago, and am already involved with three – though I really love only one of them. But by the belly of Saint Grey! I'm not the son of Henry IV for nothing! And if I could have six amours instead of three, well, bring on three more fair faces!" Drunk, dazed, and stumbling, he reached the porch, called his porters, climbed into his chair, and dreaming of his three amours, was carried to the Hotel de Montmorency.

In Which Lord Gaston puts on his Little Comedy like King Charles IX

Having seen the Dowager of Longueville, Princess Marie, and My Lord Gaston called by the same usher and leave by the same door, the other guests thought maybe something extraordinary had happened. On the other hand, since eleven o'clock was striking as Sir withdrew, it might simply have been an indication that it was time to retire, so after a few minutes the guests began to leave. Madam de Combalet began to depart with the rest but the usher, who seemed to be waiting for her in the dim passage we already mentioned, drew her aside and whispered, "Madam the Dowager would be obliged if you would wait to leave until you've seen her."

And he opened the door to a little drawing room where she could wait. Madam de Combalet hadn’t been wrong when she thought she’d heard the name Vautier. He had indeed been sent to Madam de Longueville to convey the queen mother’s disapproval, as he had on the two or three previous visits Gaston d’Orléans had made to Marie de Gonzague. Upon his arrival, Madam de Longueville had called her niece to hear the message from the queen mother. Princess Marie, who was honest and forthright, proposed at once to call the prince and ask for an explanation. Vautier was about to retire but the dowager and the princess insisted he remain and repeat his message to the prince. We’ve already seen how the prince left the salon. Guided by the usher, he was led to the room where he was awaited. At the sight of Vautier he appeared, or pretended to appear, surprised. Giving him a hard look, he approached and said, “What are you doing here, Sir, and who sent you?” Vautier was well aware that Gaston’s anger was feigned, as he’d read the letter from the Duke of Savoy – he just hadn’t known until then when the apparent quarrel that would divide mother and son was supposed to begin. “My Lord,” he said, “I’m only a humble servant of your august mother the queen. I’m forced, therefore, to execute her commands. And I come at her command to beg Madam de Longueville and the Princess Marie not to encourage a courtship that is contrary to the wishes of the king and of herself.” “You hear, my Lord,” said Madam de Longueville. “A royal desire so expressed is almost a command. We must wait for Your Highness to inform Her Majesty the Queen as to the purpose of your visits.” “Sir Vautier,” said the Duke of Orléans in the superbly haughty tone which he could assume at need, “you are too well aware of this century’s key events at the Court of France to be ignorant of the day and year of my birth.” “God forbid, my Lord. Your Highness was born on twenty-fifth April sixteen-hundred-and-eight.” “Well, Sir, today is thirteen December sixteen-hundred-and-twenty-eight – that makes my age twenty years, seven months, and nineteen days. I’m no longer of an age to take lessons from women. Moreover, when I was married before, it was against my will. I am wealthy enough now to enrich my wife if she is poor, and of high enough rank to ennoble her if she is common. The State has no say over who a younger son may marry, and this time I intend to marry as I see fit.” “My Lord,” said both Madam de Longueville and her niece, “you need not insist, out of regard for us, that Sir Vautier take such a response to Her Majesty the Queen, your mother.” “If it suits Sir Vautier, he can say I told him nothing. When I return to the Louvre, I’m the one who will reply to Madam my mother.” And he motioned for Vautier to leave. Vautier bowed his head and obeyed. “My Lord…” said Madam de Longueville. But Gaston interrupted. “Madam, for several months now, in fact ever since I first saw her, I’ve loved Princess Marie. The respect I have for her and for you is such that I would probably not have confessed this before my twenty-first birthday, as, being only sixteen, she has time to wait, God willing. But since, on the one hand, I face the ill will of a mother who would keep me from her, while on the other hand is the policy of state that would marry her to a petty Italian prince, I must say to Your Highness: Madam, my rosy-cheeked youth may undermine my attempts at gallantry but if I was older and paler I could love her no less. It’s up to you to consider my offer – because, as you must know, to offer my heart is to offer my hand. So choose, then, between the Duke of Rethel and me, between Mantua and Paris, between a petty Italian prince and the brother of the King of France.” “Oh, My Lord!” said Madam de Longueville. “If you were as free to act as a simple gentleman, if you weren’t accountable to the queen, the cardinal, the king…” “The king, Madam? I am accountable to the king, it’s true. But it’s my business to obtain his permission for this marriage, and I’m determined to do so. As to the cardinal and the queen, well, soon they may well be accountable to me.” “How so, my Lord?” asked the two ladies. “My God, do I have to tell you?” said Gaston, all candour and sincerity. “My brother, Louis XIII, has been married for thirteen years and had no children – and considering his health, he never will. And considering his health further, you know that someday he will leave me the throne of France.” “So,” said Madam de Longueville, “you think the early death of the king, your brother – is inevitable?” The Princess Marie said nothing but her heart’s ambition was in her eyes, and she hung on Sir’s every word. “Doctor Bouvard considers him as good as dead, Madam, and is amazed he still lives. And on this point, the auguries agree with the doctor.” “The auguries?” asked Madam de Longueville. Marie redoubled her attention. “My mother consulted Fabroni, Italy’s premier astrologer, and he said Louis would bid the world goodbye before the sun traversed the sign of Cancer in the year 1630. Fabroni gives him eighteen months to live. And I and my retainers heard the same prophecy from a certain Doctor Duval. Unfortunately, Duval has come to a bad end, for the cardinal, who’d heard he’d cast the king’s horoscope, had him arrested and secretly condemned to the galleys, invoking the old Roman laws that forbid fortune-telling on the lives of princes. Well, madam, my mother is aware of all this. Like the queen and myself, my mother sadly awaits the death of her eldest son. That’s why she wants to preserve me, as she did my brother, for a royal wife who’ll bring me a crown. But that won’t happen. By God, I swear it! I love you, Marie, and unless you absolutely can’t stand me, I’ll make you my wife.” “But,” asked the dowager, “Do you have any idea what Cardinal Richelieu might think about this marriage?” “Don’t worry, we have an answer for the cardinal.” “What’s that?” “This, Madam,” said the Duke of Orléans, “is where you can help us out.” “In what way?” “The Count of Soissons is tired of exile, isn’t he?” “He’s in despair but can’t think how to persuade Sir de Richelieu to allow his return.” “What if he married the cardinal’s niece?” “Madam de Combalet?” Both ladies stared at him. “The cardinal,” said Gaston, “wants to join his family to the royal house, no matter what it takes.” The ladies’ eyes opened even wider. “Is My Lord serious?” asked Madam de Longueville. “I couldn’t be more serious.” “And my daughter, who has such influence over her brother-in-law Soissons – that’s what you want me to tell her?” “That’s it, Madam.” Then, turning to Princess Marie, “But this effort is all in vain, Madam, if your heart isn’t in it.” “Your Highness knows that I’m engaged to the Duke of Rethel,” Marie said. “I can’t personally break such a bond nor speak against it – but the day that bond is broken and I’m free to speak for myself, I believe Your Highness will have nothing to complain about my answer.” The princess curtsied and began to withdraw but Gaston grabbed her hand and kissed it passionately. “Ah, Madam!” he said. “You’ve made me the happiest of men! We’ll succeed in the end, and my happiness is assured.” Then, as Princess Marie left by one door, Gaston rushed out the other, with the haste of a man who needs fresh air to cool his passion. Madam de Longueville, who remembered that she’d asked Madam de Combalet to wait, opened a third door – and almost gasped in astonishment. For the usher had imprudently left the cardinal’s niece in the next room to the one where the interview with Gaston had taken place. “Madam,” the dowager said, “insofar as my Lord le Cardinal is our friend and protector, and we wish to conceal nothing, I arranged for you to overhear that discussion about the Queen Mother’s disapproval of the visits paid us by His Royal Highness Sir.” “Thank you, dear Duchess,” said Madam de Combalet, “and I appreciate your thoughtfulness in allowing me to slightly open the door between the rooms so I wouldn’t lose a word of the conversation. “And,” the dowager asked with some hesitation, “you heard the parts concerning yourself? As for me, after the pleasure of seeing my niece as Duchess d’Orléans, nothing could make me happier than to see you enter our family, Madam. My daughter will use all her powers of persuasion on the Count of Soissons to that end – assuming that’s what’s desired.” “Thank you, Madam,” replied Madam de Combalet, “and I fully appreciate what an honour it would be for me to be the wife of a prince of the blood. But when I donned widow’s weeds, I made two vows: first, never to remarry, and second, to devote myself entirely to my uncle. But believe me, Madam, I would dearly regret it if your connection with Sir didn’t happen because of me.” And bowing respectfully, showing a tiny yet gracious smile, she took her leave of Madam de Longueville, who couldn’t believe that any oath, no matter how proudly taken, could keep a lady from becoming the Countess of Soissons.

Eve & the Serpent

“To the Louvre!” Madam de Fargis had said. And obeying her order, the porters had carried her chair to the foot of the stairs that led to both the king’s and queen’s chambers. The door opened to admit her, though it was after ten o’clock at night, when that grand staircase was officially closed. Madam de Fargis was to serve the queen for the next week, resuming her service that very evening. The queen was very fond of her, and loved her much as she still loved Madam de Chevreuse. But the Duchess de Chevreuse had been involved in a whole host of indiscretions, and the king and the cardinal had their eyes on her. Her eternal laughter irritated Louis XIII who, even as a child, had never laughed ten times in his life. When Madam de Chevreuse was exiled, her place, as we’ve said, was taken by Madam de Fargis, who was pretty, bold, passionate, and even less inhibited than La Chevreuse. Her good luck in being placed so near the queen was due partly to the prominence of her husband, Sir de Fargis d’Angennes, cousin to Madam de Rambouillet and ambassador to Madrid, and even more so to the three years she’d spent at the Carmelite convent of the Rue Saint-Jacques, where she’d become acquainted with Madam de Combalet, who’d recommended her to the cardinal. The queen was waiting impatiently. This romantic princess, while still weeping for her lost Buckingham, was nonetheless ready for new emotions and other loves. Her twenty-six-year-old heart, in which her husband had never been tempted to take the slightest place, needed at least the semblance of love. In the absence of real passion, her heart cried out, like an Aeolian harp from the top of a tower, to every other heart that passed. The future promised no more joy than the past. This morose king, this sad monarch, this husband without desire, was keen to keep her from fulfilling her own desires. What more could she hope for than the happy hour of his death that everyone insisted was imminent? Then she might marry Sir, who though seven years her junior would be eager to wed her, for fear that, out of personal ambition or love for another, she might get herself declared regent, and keep him from the throne forever. If the king did die, she had three possible fates: marry Gaston d’Orléans; assume the regency; or abdicate and return to Spain. So she waited, sad and dreaming, in a small room next to her bedchamber where only her most trusted ladies were admitted, her eyes staring past the book she held, a new tragicomedy by Guilhem de Castro called The Youth of the Cid given her by Señor Mirabel, the Spanish Ambassador. When she heard scratching at the door, she knew from the sound that it was Madam de Fargis. Tossing aside the book that, a few years later, was to have such a great influence on her life, she called out a sharp and happy “Enter!” Encouraged by her call, Madam de Fargis didn’t just enter; she actually burst into the room and fell at Anne of Austria’s feet, seizing both her beautiful hands and kissing them with a passion that drew a smile from the queen. “Do you know,” Anne said, “I sometimes imagine, my beautiful Fargis, that you’re secretly a lover disguised as a woman – and one day, when you’re completely assured of my friendship, you’ll suddenly reveal yourself.” “And if that were so, my beautiful Majesty,” she said, teeth shining and lips parted, her burning eyes fixed on Anne of Austria, “would you be so desperate as to accept me?” “Desperate, yes, because then I’d have to ring the bell and show you to the door – to my great regret, because other than Chevreuse, you’re the only one who can distract me.” “My God, virtue like that is perverse and against nature, since it must result in the separation of loving hearts. Indulgent souls, like mine, are more in the spirit of a loving God – not like those prudish hypocrites who take even the tiniest compliment the wrong way.” “Do you know that I haven’t seen you for a week, Fargis?” “That’s all? Good God, my sweet Queen, it seems more like a century!” “And what have you been doing for the last century?” “Not much good for myself, dear Majesty. I fell in love with an idea.” “With an idea?” “Yes.” “My God, you say such crazy things, we should clap our hand to your mouth at the first word.” “Your Majesty should try it and see how her hand would be received.” Anne put her own hand to her lips, laughing into the palm that Madam de Fargis, still kneeling before her, had kissed so passionately. She dropped it suddenly. “Don’t kiss me so, my sweet, you’ll give me a fever. So, who is it you love?” “A dream.” “A dream? How’s that?” “Yes, it must be a dream, in this age of such men as Vendome, as Condé, as Grammont, as Courtauvaux and Baradas, to find a young man of twenty-two who’s so handsome, noble, and amorous.”

“So that’s your dream?”

“Yes but only a dream. For he loves another.”

“Truly, Fargis, you’re mad, and I don’t understand a word you say.”

“And I believe, Your Majesty, that you must truly be religious.”

“And you’re not? Didn’t you learn anything from the Carmelites?”

“I did, if only from Madam de Combalet.”

“So you say you’re in love with a dream?”

“Yes – and my dream is of someone you know.”

“Me?”

“When I think that I may be damned for this sin, and it will be all for Your Majesty that I’ve lost my soul!”

“Oh, my poor Fargis, don’t carry on so.”

“Didn’t Your Majesty find him charming?”

“Who?”

“Our messenger, the Count of Moret.”

“Indeed, he seemed a worthy gentleman, who gave the impression of being a true knight.”

“Ah, my dear Queen, if another son of Henry IV I know were at all like him, I believe the throne of France wouldn’t lack an heir, as it does now.”

“As to an heir,” the queen said thoughtfully, “I must show you the letter the count brought me. It was from my brother, Philip IV, and I confess I don’t quite understand some of his advice.”

“I’m sure I can explain it. You know there are few such things I don’t understand.”

“Sibyl!” said the queen, who had no doubt her friend was right. She smiled and began to rise.

“Can I save Your Majesty some trouble?” Madam de Fargis asked.

“No, I’m the only one who knows how to open the secret drawer.”

Anne went to a small vanity, pulled open a drawer, removed a tray, and took from its false bottom a copy of the letter brought by the count. The letter, ostensibly from Don Gonzales de Cordova, bore instructions, we recall, that it should be read by the queen alone. With this letter in her hand, she returned to her seat. “Sit here, near me,” she said, patting the divan.

“What, on the same seat as you!”

“Yes, we need to speak privately.”

Madam de Fargis glanced over the paper the queen was holding. “So,” she said, “I’ll listen while you interpret. What do these first three or four lines say?”

“Nothing. They just advise me to keep your husband in Spain as long as possible.”

“Nothing? Your Majesty calls that nothing? I think it’s quite important. Indeed, Sir de Fargis must stay in Spain as long as possible. Ten years – twenty years, even! This is good advice indeed. If the rest is as good as the first, then Your Majesty is advised by King Solomon himself. More, more!”

“Can you never be serious, even in the gravest matters?” The queen shrugged but smiled. “Now, here’s the advice from my brother, Philip IV.”

“And that’s the part Your Majesty doesn’t quite understand?”

“The part I don’t understand at all, Fargis,” said the queen, adopting a perfect air of innocence.

“Let’s hear it.”

“My sister,” the queen read, “I know from our good friend Sir de Fargis of the plan by which, in the event of the death of King Louis XIII, you promise to marry his brother and heir to the throne, Gaston d’Orléans.”

“A vile plan,” interrupted Madam de Fargis, “by which you’d trade bad for worse.”

“Wait, there’s more.” The queen continued: “However, it would be even better if, at the time of Louis’s death, you were with child.”

“Oh, yes,” murmured Madam de Fargis, “that would be better for everyone.”

“The Queens of France,” Anne of Austria continued, seemingly trying to find the meaning in the words, “have a great advantage over their husbands in that they can produce dauphins on their own, an ability their husbands lack.”

“And that’s the part Your Majesty doesn’t understand?”

“Or, at least, I don’t understand how it’s possible.”

“What a pity,” said Madam de Fargis, raising her eyes to heaven, “in matters like these that involve not only the happiness of a great queen but the future of a great people – what a pity on top of everything else to have to deal with an honest woman!”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean that if, in the gardens of Amiens, you’d done what I’d have done in your place, in the arms of a man who loved Your Majesty more than life itself, and who gave that life for you – if, instead of calling for Laporte and Putange, you hadn’t called at all…”

“Well?”

“Well! Perhaps your brother wouldn’t need to give you the advice he does, and a dauphin wouldn’t be so hard to find.”

“But that would have been a double crime!”

“Does Your Majesty really see crime in an act advised not only by a great king but by a king renowned for his piety?”

“I would have wronged first my husband, and second the throne of France by placing on it the son of an Englishman.”

“That first wrong is, in every country of the world, no more than a venial sin, and Your Majesty has only to look around to see that the majority of her subjects share that opinion. Furthermore, to deceive a husband like King Louis XIII, who’s so far from being a husband he’s unworthy of the name, is more virtue than vice.”

“Fargis!”

“You know, Madam, in your heart of hearts, what you lost by that untimely scream, when by your silence you could have won all.”

“Alas!”

“So that addresses the first matter, and your ‘Alas’ tells me you agree. But the second matter, that of a foreigner’s dauphin, remains – and there I must say Your Majesty and I are in agreement.”

“Do you say so?”

“But consider this: suppose, for example, that instead of dealing with an Englishman, who though charming was nonetheless a foreigner – suppose you were dealing with a man no less charming” – Anne gave a sigh – “but a Frenchman, and even better, a Frenchman of royal blood, a true son of Henry IV – unlike King Louis, who seems to me, by his tastes, his habits, and his character, to instead be the son of a certain Virginio Orsini.”

“You, Fargis – you believe these slanders?”

“Slanders, perhaps but they come from Your Majesty’s home country. But suppose, in short, that you’d taken the Count of Moret in place of the Duke of Buckingham. Would the crime be so great? Or, on the contrary, would it be an act of Providence that brought the true blood of Henry IV to the throne of France?”

“But, Fargis, I’m not in love with the Count of Moret!”

“Well, there, Madam, you’d have to sacrifice that would atone for the sin – and in this case, your sacrifice would be more to the glory and future of France than to your own interests.”

“Fargis! I don’t understand how a woman could give herself to a man who isn’t her husband and not die of shame the first time she comes face to face with him.”

“Oh, Madam, Madam!” said Fargis. “If all women thought as Your Majesty, how many husbands would be in mourning for their wives without knowing why they’d died? Perhaps in the past facing a lover was such a problem but since the invention of fans, deaths from shame have become far less frequent.”

“Fargis, Fargis! You must be the most immoral person in the world. I don’t know if even Chevreuse is as perverse as you. And this is the dream lover you speak of?”

“No, not mine. He loves your protégée Isabelle.”

“Isabelle de Lautrec, who brought him to me the other night? But where did he see her?”

“He didn’t see her. This love came over him while playing blind man’s-buff with her in the dark.”

“The poor boy! This isn’t going to go his way – I believe there’s an agreement between her father and a certain Viscount of Pontis. Anyway, Fargis, we’ll talk more of this later. I want to thank you for the service you’ve rendered me.”

“And which the count could still render you.”

“Fargis!”

“Madam?”

Anne spoke as calmly as if they hadn’t been discussing great affairs. “Fargis, my dear, just help me to bed. My God, what foolish dreams I’ll have after listening to your stories.” And the queen, getting up, walked into her bedchamber, more casual and languid than usual, leaning on the shoulder of her confidante Fargis. The queen had many faults but no one could say she didn’t love her friends.

In Which the Cardinal Uses the Invention for on his own behalf that he had granted Souscarrières the Patent

Since he’d been warned by the letter found on Doctor Senelle and deciphered by Rossignol, the cardinal wasn’t surprised by the scene between Sir, the Dowager of Longueville, the Princess Marie, and Vautier (as described to him by Madam de Combalet). It accorded perfectly with the plan agreed between his enemies and Marie de Médicis. Marie de Médicis was, indeed, his most implacable enemy – we’ve gone into the reasons for her hatred elsewhere – and she was also the enemy he feared most because of her influence over her son and through her control of Cardinal Bérulle, who sat on the King’s Council. So it was the fatal influence of the queen mother that Richelieu had to remove, an influence that had grown since her return from exile. Louis XIII needed to be purged of his mother far more than he needed to be purged of the black humours feared by Doctor Bouvard. There was one sure way to do this but the means was terrible. Richelieu had always shrunk from it in the past but it seemed that the time had come for heroic measures. It was time to prove to Louis XIII that his mother had been an accomplice in the death of Henry IV. For Louis XIII respected his father King Henry so much that it almost amounted to worship. When Louis had punished Concini by having him assassinated and then hung from the bridge of the Louvre, it was more for being an accomplice in the king’s murder than for being his mother’s lover and for plundering the French treasury. So the cardinal was sure of one thing: the moment Louis XIII was convinced of his mother’s complicity in Henry’s assassination, that moment would be the beginning of her final exile. When his office clock sounded half past eleven, Richelieu took two documents from his desk, both already signed and sealed, and called his valet Guillemot. He removed his red robe and lace-edged fur cloak, donned a simple Capuchin robe like Father Joseph’s, and sent for a sedan chair. Pulling his hood over his face, he entered the chair and gave orders to be taken to the Inn of the Painted Beard in the Rue de l’Homme-Armé. From the Place Royale to the Rue de l’Homme-Armé wasn’t far. They went by way of Rue Neuve-Sainte-Catherine and the Rue des Francs-Bourgeois, turned left on the Rue du Temple, then right past the convent of the Blancs-Manteaux and onto the Rue de l’Homme-Armé. The cardinal noticed something that, to his mind, spoke well of Master Soleil: though midnight was ringing from the belfry of the Blancs-Manteaux, his inn was still well lit, ready to receive travellers, and a lad was posted at the door to welcome potential customers. The cardinal ordered his porters to wait at the corner of the Rue du Plâtre. He descended from the chair and made his way to the door of the Inn of the Painted Beard, where the lad, taking him for Father Joseph, asked if he wanted to see the penitent Latil. It was for just that purpose that the cardinal had come. Latil was the kind of man who, since he hadn’t been instantly killed, had immediately begun to recover. He’d taken so many previous sword wounds that new ones just followed the tracks of the old. Though still very weak, he could foresee the day when he could be carried to the Hotel de Montmorency, with what was left of the Count of Moret’s gold still jingling in his purse. Father Joseph, to whom he’d confessed all unknowing, hadn’t returned but to his amazement he’d been visited by the cardinal’s own doctor, who’d been ordered by His Eminence’s secretary to take good care of him. Latil had no idea to what he should attribute this good fortune. No longer laid out on a table in the lower hall, Latil had been carried up to the bed in room number eleven that was adjacent to number thirteen, the room the beautiful Marina – or Madam de Fargis, if you will – kept on a monthly retainer. He awoke to the glow of the candle borne before the minister by the lad from the door. The first thing he saw by this candle that the lad set on a table before withdrawing, was a long grey figure in a hooded robe. Latil thought here was yet another Capuchin monk, possibly even the same one – because it must be admitted, even if it offends our more religious readers, that that confession had been his first acquaintance with that ancient and venerable branch of the tree of Saint Francis. It occurred to him that perhaps the worthy friar thought he was worse, and might need to be confessed a second time, or was even dead and ready to be buried. “Hold on, Father,” he said. “No need to rush. By the grace of God, and thanks to your prayers, there’s been a miracle on my behalf. It seems Étienne Latil is going to live on, in his poor honest way, despite marquises and viscounts who, four against one, try to cut his throat.”

“I know of your noble conduct, brother, and I congratulate you on your convalescence.”

“The devil!” Latil said. “Is that why you got me up at such an hour? Couldn’t you wait until daytime to pay me such compliments?”

“No, my brother,” said the seeming Capuchin, “for I needed to speak with you urgently and secretly.”

“On affairs of State, I suppose?” Latil laughed.

“Exactly. On affairs of State.”

“Well,” continued Latil, still laughing, “if you need to speak to me despite my two injuries and four wounds, you must be no less than His Grey Eminence!”

“Oh, better than that,” said the cardinal, laughing in his turn. “I am His Red Eminence.”

And he lowered his hood so Latil could see who he was. “What!” Latil started back in fear. “By my patron saint, stoned before the gates of Jerusalem – it really is you, my Lord.”

“Yes, and that should tell you the importance of my business, since I come to speak to you by night and alone, despite the risk that entails.”

“My Lord will find me his obedient servant, so far as my strength allows.”

“Good. Now take a moment and collect your memory.”

There was a moment of silence during which the cardinal’s eyes were fixed on Latil, as if to penetrate the depths of his mind. “Though young at the time, you must have been devoted to the late king,” the cardinal said, “since you refused to kill his son, despite the enormous sum you were offered.”

“Yes, My Lord – I must say that I’ve remained loyal to his memory. That was one of the reasons why I left the service of Sir d’Épernon.”

“I’m told you were on the running board of the king’s carriage when he was assassinated. Can you tell me what you remember about the murderer at the time, and afterward? And how did the Duke of Épernon take this catastrophe?”

“I was at the Louvre beforehand, waiting, with the Duke of Épernon. The king came down at four o’clock.”

“And did you notice,” asked the cardinal, “whether he was happy or sad?”

“Very sad, My Lord. But is this really the time for me to tell, well, everything?”

“Everything!” said the cardinal. “If you have the strength.”

“The king’s sadness wasn’t just a mood – it was due to all the prophecies. You must know about those, my Lord?”

“I wasn’t in Paris at the time; I didn’t arrive until five years later. So speak to me as if I don’t know anything.”

“All right, then! I’ll tell you everything, my Lord, because I feel like your presence gives me strength, and because the cause in which you ask must please the Lord God – who may have permitted the death of my master, the king but that doesn’t mean his death must go unpunished.”

“Take courage, my friend,” said the cardinal, “for what you do is righteous.”

The wounded man continued, making a visible effort to recall his memories despite his loss of blood. “In 1607, several books of astrology appeared at the Frankfurt fair that said the King of France would die in his fifty-ninth year, that is to say, 1610. That same year, a mysterious series of letters stating that the king would be assassinated was found on his altar by a prior of Montargis. “And one day, the queen mother came to see my duke at his hotel. They locked themselves inside his study but, being a curious page, I sneaked into a closet from which I could listen. I heard the queen say that a doctor of theology named Olive had predicted, in a book dedicated to Philip III that the king would die in 1610. Furthermore, the king would die in a carriage – and the king knew of this prediction.”

“Did you ever hear tell of a man named Lagarde?” asked the cardinal.

“Yes, my Lord,” said Latil, “and that reminds me of a detail I’d forgotten, one that greatly disturbed Sir d’Épemon. This Lagarde, upon returning from the wars against the Turks, settled in Naples, where he lived with a man named Hébert, who’d been secretary to the conspirator Biron. As the latter had been executed only two years before, his accomplices were still in exile. One day Hébert invited Lagarde to dinner, and while they dined a big man dressed in purple entered the room and announced that all refugees would soon be able to return to France, because before the end of 1610, he would kill the king. Lagarde asked his name, was told he was called Ravailiac, and that he served Sir d’Épemon.”

“Yes,” the cardinal said, “I knew about that.”

“My Lord would like me to be more succinct?”

“No, don’t leave out a word. Too much is better than not enough.”

“While Lagarde was in Naples, he was taken to visit a Jesuit named Père Alagon. This Jesuit was committed to the assassination of Henry IV. ‘We’ll choose a hunting day,’ he said. ‘Ravailiac will strike him on foot, and I from horseback.’ On his way to France, he received a letter outlining the same plan. When he reached Paris, he took the letter to the king. Ravailiac and d’Épernon were both named.”

“Did you hear whether the king took this letter seriously?”

“Oh, very seriously! Nobody in the Louvre knew why he was so melancholy. For a week, he kept the fatal secret to himself. Then he left the Court to spend some time alone in Ivry, at a small house of the captain of his guards. Finally, too worried to sleep, he came to the Arsenal and told everything to his minister Sully, begging him to lend him a place to stay, just three or four rooms, where he could rest and change his clothes.”

“To this,” murmured Richelieu, “to this he came, so good a king, the best France has had, obliged like the wretched Tiberius to sleep in a different room every night for fear of being murdered! And yet I complain of my problems!”

“Finally, as the king passed by the Cemetery of the Innocents one day, a sullen man wearing a green coat cried out, ‘In the name of our Lord and the Blessed Virgin, Sire, I must speak. Is it true that you plan to make war on the pope?’ The king wanted to stop and talk with this man but we wouldn’t let him. It was these things that made him as sad as a man marching to his death when, on that unfortunate Friday, fourteen May, I saw him come down the stairs of the Louvre and get into his carriage. It was then that Sir d’Épernon called me and told me to get on the running board.”

“Do you recall,” asked Richelieu, “how many people were in the carriage, and how they were sitting?”

“Three people, My Lord: the king, Sir de Montbazon, and Sir d’Épernon. Sir d’Épernon was on the left, and the king in the middle. I distinctly saw a man leaning against the wall of the Louvre, as if waiting for the king to come out. Seeing the open carriage that enabled him to recognise the king, he left the wall and followed us.”

“This was the assassin?”

“Yes, though I didn’t know it at the time. The king was without guards. He was on his way to see Sir de Sully, who was ill but on the Rue de l’Arbre-Sec he changed his mind and directed them to take him to visit Miss Paulet, saying he wanted to ask her to undertake the education of his son Vendome, who was developing nasty Italian tastes.”

“Continue, continue,” the cardinal insisted. “Don’t leave out a single detail.”

“Oh, My Lord! It’s as if I’m still there. It’s a beautiful day, about four o’clock in the afternoon. Though everyone recognised Henry IV, no one shouted ‘Long live the king!’ The people’re surly and defiant.”

“When you reached the Rue des Bourdonnais, didn’t Sir d’Épernon bring something to the king’s attention?”

“Ah, My Lord,” Latil said, “it seems you know as much as I!”

“On the contrary, as I said, I know nothing. Continue.”

“Yes, My Lord, the duke gave him a letter. The king began to read it, and paid no further attention to what was happening around him.”

“That’s it,” murmured the cardinal.

“About a third of the way up the Rue de la Ferronnerie, a honey cart and a hay wagon had collided. There was quite a commotion. Our driver steered to the left, his wheels almost touching the wall of Saints-Innocents. I leaned against the door for fear of being crushed. The carriage slowed to a halt. Just then, a man stepped up on a borne, thrust me aside, pushed himself in front of Sir d’Épemon, who leaned back, and struck the first blow at the king. ‘To me,’ the king cried, ‘I’m hurt!’

And he raised the arm that held the letter. This gave the assassin the opening for a second blow. He struck. This time the king could utter nothing but a sigh – he was slain. “The king is only wounded!”

Sir d’Épernon cried, and threw his cloak over him. Meanwhile I fought with the assassin and tried to hold him, as he carved my hands with his knife. My life was nothing. I finally let go when I saw they had him. ‘Don’t kill him,’ cried Sir d’Épermon. ‘Take him to the Louvre.’”

Richelieu placed his hand on that of the wounded man, as if to interrupt, and asked, “The duke said that?”

“Yes, My Lord but only after the murderer was already taken and there was no danger they’d kill him. They took him to the Louvre. I followed. I thought of him as my captive. I waved my bloody hands and cried, ‘That’s him, and he’s the one who killed the king!’

‘Who?’ the people cried. ‘Who?’

‘Him, the one dressed in green!’

They wept, they screamed, they threatened the assassin. At times, the king’s carriage couldn’t even move, so great was the press around it. Halfway back, I saw Concini, the Marshall d’Ancre. Someone told him the fatal news and he forced his way to the castle. He went straight to the queen’s chambers, opened her door, and mentioning no names as if she would know who he meant he cried in Italian, ‘E ammazzato.’”

“He is slain!” repeated Richelieu. “This matches the other reports perfectly. Now for the rest.”

“They took the assassin to the Hotel de Retz, next to the Louvre. They put guards at the door but left it open, so anyone could come in. It seemed to me that this man was my captive, so I stationed myself at his door. Among his visitors was Father Coton, the king’s confessor.”

“Coton himself? Are you sure?”

“He came, yes, My Lord.”

“Did he speak with Ravailiac?”

“He spoke with him.”

“Did you hear what they said?”

“Yes, certainly, and I can repeat it word for word.”

“Do so!”

“Coton said, with a paternal air, ‘My friend ...’”

“He called Ravailiac his friend!”

“Yes. He said, ‘My friend, take care not to upset your betters.’”

“And how did the assassin take this?”

“Calmly, like a man who felt he was well protected.”

“Did he stay in the Hotel de Retz?”

“No. Sir d’Épemon took him back to his own mansion, where he was kept from the 14th through the 17th. The duke had plenty of time to talk to him in private. It wasn’t until the 17th that he was taken to the Conciergerie.”

“At what time, exactly, was the king slain?”

“At twenty minutes past four.”

“And by when was his death known throughout Paris?”

“Within nine hours. By half past six the queen had been proclaimed regent.”

“Proclaimed regent, a foreigner who still spoke Italian,” Richelieu said bitterly. “An Austrian, the grand-niece of Charles V, cousin of Philip II – in other words, the Catholic League incarnate. But let’s deal with Ravailiac’s end.”

"No one can tell you better than I how it happened. I was there when he was on the wheel. I had privileges, they said; 'This is Sir d'Épermon's page, who arrested the murderer,' and the women kissed me, while the men shouted 'Long live the king,' though he was dead. The people, who at first had been stunned and oppressed by the news, had gone insane with fury. There were demonstrations outside the Conciergerie, where the people, unable to stone the culprit, stoned the walls in his place."

"Ravaillac never named any accomplices?"

"Not during the interrogations. To me it was evident that, until the very end, he expected some sort of last-minute reprieve. He did say he'd spoken to some priests at Angouleme, confessing that he hoped to kill a heretic king, and instead of dissuading him, they'd given him absolution and a small reliquary that they said contained a piece of the true cross. This reliquary, when opened before the court, was empty. Thank God that at least the priests hadn't dared to make the Lord Jesus an accomplice in such a crime."

"What did he say when he saw he'd been deceived?"

"He only said, 'The guilt of fraud is on the fraudulent.'"

"I've seen myself," the cardinal said, "only a summary of the 'process verbal,' which said, 'What happened when the prisoner was put to the question is the secret of the court.'"

"I wasn't there when the question was put," Latil said, "but I was next to the executioner at the wheel. The sentence was that the prisoner be tortured and quartered but they didn't limit themselves to that. The king's attorney, Sir La Guesle, proposed adding molten lead, pitch, and boiling oil, accompanied by a mixture of wax and sulphur. His proposal was adopted with enthusiasm. "If we'd let the people handle things, Ravaillac would have been torn to pieces in five minutes. When he came out of the prison and marched to the scaffold, there was such a storm of curses, threats, and cries of rage, that only then did he realise the magnitude of his crime. On the scaffold, he turned to the people and begged for mercy, asking, in a doleful voice, for the consolation of a Salve Regina."

"And was he granted this consolation?"

"Oh, yes! With one voice the entire crowd around the scaffold shouted, 'Damnation to Judas!'"

"Continue," Richelieu said. "You were on the scaffold, near the executioner, you say?"

"Yes, I was granted that favour," Latil said, "for having arrested, or at least helped to arrest, the murderer."

"Quite so," the cardinal said. "I've been told he was confessed on the scaffold?"

"Here's what happened, My Lord. Your Eminence understands that, when one has witnessed such a scene, days, months, and years may pass but it will be remembered for a lifetime. "After the first tugs of the horses that failed to pull off any of his limbs, wounds were slashed into his arms, chest, and thighs with a razor, into which they poured, successively, molten lead, boiling oil, and sulphur. By then his body was one great wound, and he cried out to the executioner, 'Stop! Stop! I'll talk!' The executioner paused. The court clerk, who was at the foot of the scaffold, came up and, on a sheet separate from the official process verbal, took down what the prisoner said."

"Well," the cardinal asked eagerly, "in that final moment, what did he confess?"

"I wanted to get closer," Latil said, "but they stopped me. The only words I could clearly hear were the names of d'Épermon and of the queen."

"But the process verbal? And this separate sheet? Did you never hear of them while in the house of the duke?"

"In fact, My Lord, I heard them spoken of often."

"What was said?"

"It was said that the court reporter kept the process verbal hidden in a strongbox in the wall next to his bed. As for the single sheet, it was reputed to be in the possession of the family of Joly de Fleury, who denied having it. However, much to Sir d'Épermon's dismay, he was said to have shown it to some friends, who, due to the clerk's poor handwriting, had found it very difficult to make out the names of the duke and the queen."

"So, after this sheet was written?"

"When the dictation was complete, the execution resumed. The horses provided by the provost were bags of bones, too weak to pull the prisoner apart, so a gentleman offered to lend his own horse to the procedure, and at the first pull it tore off a thigh. As the prisoner was still alive, the executioner moved to finish him but the lackeys of all the lords attending the execution jumped the fence, climbed the scaffold, and cut his body to pieces with their swords. Then the people rushed in and tore it into smaller pieces, and carried off bits of the regicide to burn at the crossroads. On returning to the Louvre, I saw the Swiss Guard roasting a leg right under the queen's windows. So there!"

"And that's all you know?"

"Yes, My Lord, except I've often heard tell how the treasury Sully had gone to such trouble to amass was divided up among the great nobles."

"Indeed. The Prince de Condé alone walked off with four million – but that's not what concerns me. Let's return to the business at hand. Tell me, amid all this, did you ever hear anything about a certain Marquis of Escoman?"

"Yes, I believe I did!" Latil said. "A small woman, with a bent back, whose maiden name had been Jacqueline Le Voyer – and her name wasn't Escoman, it was Coëtman. She was the duke's mistress. And though she was called a marquise, she wasn't really, as her husband's name was just Isaac de Varenne, period. Ravaillac had spent six months at her house. She was accused of being his accomplice in the king's assassination. She told everyone who'd listen that she barely knew Ravaillac, and that it was the queen mother who was behind the plot."

"What happened to this woman?" the cardinal asked.

"She was arrested several days before the king's murder."

"Yes, and she remained in prison until 1619, when she was abducted and taken to some other prison, I don't know which. Do you know?"

"My Lord will recall that in 1613, Parliament called a halt to the investigation, due to the sensitivity of the case. They considered the accusations a threat to the realm. After Concini was killed and Luynes was in the ascendant, the case could have been reopened but Luynes preferred reconciliation with the queen mother to risking an open break that would expose her to Louis XIII's wrath. Luynes, therefore, pushed Parliament into declaring that accusations against the queen were libellous. Marie de Médicis and d'Épermon were cleared, and Madam Coëtman was condemned in their place."

"Indeed, that's when she disappeared. But to what prison was she taken? That's what I asked, and I assume you know the answer, since you evaded the point."

"You're right, My Lord. I can tell you where she is – or at least where she was, for since it's been nine years, only God knows if she's alive or dead."

"God must grant that she lives!" the cardinal exclaimed, with a fervour that showed that his faith was driven by his need. He added, "I've observed that the more the body suffers, the more the soul takes command."

"Well, My Lord," said Latil, "she was confined in a place where the bones can't rest until the flesh is gone."

"And you know where this place is?" the cardinal asked eagerly.

"It was built on purpose to hold her, My Lord, in an angle of the courtyard in the Convent of Repentant Daughters. She was put in a mausoleum whose door was walled shut. She was given food and drink through a window with iron bars."

"You saw this yourself?" demanded the cardinal.

"I saw it myself, My Lord. When we left, children were throwing stones, as if at a wild beast, while she cried, 'They lie! I wasn't the assassin, it was the ones who put me here.'"

The cardinal rose. "There's not a moment to lose," he said. "This is the woman I need." Then, to Latil: "Heal and recover, my friend. And once recovered, have no fears for the future."

"Plague! With a promise like that, I certainly won't, My Lord. To be sure, it's time."

"Time for what?" Richelieu asked.

"Time we finished. I feel weak and ... well ... am I dying?" With a gasp, his head fell back on the pillow. The cardinal looked around until he found a small bottle that seemed to contain a cordial. He poured a few drops of the liquor onto a teaspoon and made the man swallow it. Latil opened his eyes and gasped again but in relief. The cardinal then put his finger to his lips to enjoin the man to silence, pulled up the hood of his cloak, and went out.

091 The In Pace

It was about 1:30AM or so but the advanced hour was just one more reason for the cardinal to continue his investigations. If he presented himself at the door of the infamous convent in the daytime, wherein were collected the most immoral women from the worst places in Paris, he feared he might be recognised, and there might be speculation as to the reason for his visit. He knew the curtain that Concini, the queen mother, and d'Epemon had tried to draw across the terrible tragedy of the assassination of Henry IV. He knew, as we saw in the previous chapter, that all the written evidence had disappeared. He feared that the last living evidence might disappear as well. The attack on Latil demonstrated that he was following a thread that, at any moment, the hand of death could break. Here was this woman whose house, it was said, Ravaillac had shared for six months, and who, having learned a state secret, was now dead or dying in an in pace – for so they called those tombs devised by monks, those expert tormenters, to impose physical and mental suffering to the limit of what's possible for strength to endure. The Rue des Postes, the site of the Convent of Repentant Daughters (later replaced by the Madelonettes), was far from the Rue de l'Homme-Armé – or rather the Rue du Plâtre, where the false friar's sedan chair awaited him. But the cardinal forestalled any objections from his porters by placing a silver crown in each one's hand. They took a moment to discuss which route would be shortest, then decided to take the Rue des Billettes to the Rue de la Coutellerie, cross the Pont Notre-Dame, and take Rue Saint-Jacques and the Rue de l'Estrapade to the Rue des Postes, where they'd find, on the corner of the Rue du Knight, the Convent of Repentant Daughters. When the sedan chair stopped at the gate, two o'clock was sounding from the nearby Church of Saint-Jacques du Haut-Pas. The cardinal stuck his head out the door and ordered one of the porters to ring the gate bell loudly. The larger of the two obeyed. After a few minutes, during which the cardinal, impatient, had had the bell rung twice more, a small barred window opened in the gate and the head of the sister on duty appeared to ask what they wanted. "Ask her to tell the mother superior it's a Capuchin monk sent by Father Joseph to speak to her about an important matter," the cardinal said to one of the porters.

The man repeated the sentence word for word. "Which Father Joseph?" the sister asked.

"It seems to me there's only one who matters," said a commanding voice from within the chair. "The one who's the cardinal's secretary."

This voice had such a tone of authority that the sister asked no further questions, just closed her window and disappeared. The chair was set on the ground and the false monk climbed out. "Is the superior coming down?" he asked the sister when she reappeared at the window.

"This very instant. But if Your Reverence has just come to call on one of our prisoners, there was no need to wake the mother superior: I have the authority to let any worthy servant of God into one of our cells, whether that servant wears a frock or a robe."

The cardinal's eyes flashed like lightning. He knew she spoke the truth: the unlucky women who were locked in the convent in order to repent of their sins were often led, on the contrary, to commit new ones. His first indignant reaction was to refuse but then it occurred to him that this might more easily get him to his goal. "Very well," he said. "Lead me to the cell of the Dame de Coëtman."

The sister stepped back. "God!" she said, crossing herself. "What name did Your Reverence say?"

"That is the name of one of your prisoners, I believe."

The sister said nothing.

"Is the prisoner I wish to see dead?" the cardinal asked anxiously for he feared the answer might be yes. The sister continued to remain silent. "I'm asking if she's alive or dead," the cardinal said in a voice beginning to reveal his impatience.

"She's dead," said a voice from the darkness of the convent beyond the window.

The cardinal thrust his keen gaze into the darkness whence the voice came, and saw a human form he recognised as that of another sister. "Who're you," Richelieu demanded, "who respond so peremptorily to a question not addressed to you?"

"I'm the proper person to answer questions of this nature though I don't recognise you as one with the right to ask them."

"I've that right," the cardinal replied, "and you'll answer my question whether you like it or not." Then turning to the first sister, he said, "Bring a light."

There was no mistaking the tone of the speaker: here was a man who had the right of command. The sister, without waiting for confirmation from her superior, went back inside and came out with a lighted candle. "By Order of the Cardinal," said the false monk, drawing a letter from within his robe. He unfolded it to reveal, beneath a few lines of writing, a large red wax seal that gleamed in the light from the candle. He held up the letter to the superior where she could see it through the bars of the window. Meanwhile, the sister passed the candle through the grill, so the superior could read the following lines:

By order of the Cardinal Minister, all are directed in the name of his spiritual and temporal power on behalf of the Church and the State to answer any questions whatsoever on any subject whatsoever, the bearer chooses to ask, and bring him to any and all prisoners he shall name.

13 December 1628 CE
– Armand, Cardinal Richelieu

“Before commandments like these,” said the superior, “I’ve no choice but to bow.”

“Then please order the sister to return inside and lock up.”

“You heard, Sister Perpetua?” the superior said. “Obey.”

Sister Perpetua placed her candle on top of the stairs leading up to the gate, returned inside, and locked the door behind her. The cardinal meanwhile ordered his porters to pick up the sedan chair, back away from the door, and await his signal. The superior opened the gate, and the cardinal entered. “Why did you say, my sister,” he asked in a stern voice, “that the Dame de Coëtman was dead when she is not?”

“Because,” the superior replied, “I regard as dead anyone whom society has completely rejected.”

“The only ones who are truly denied the company of their fellows are the dead and buried,” said the cardinal.

“The stone of the tomb was closed over the one you named.”

“That stone closed on a living person is not a tombstone, it’s the stone of a prison – and any prison door can be reopened.”

“Even,” said the nun, looking the pretend monk in the face, “when a parliamentary decree has ordered that door shut for all time and eternity?”

“There is no judgement higher than justice – and I am the one the Lord has given the power to judge the judges.”

“There’s only one man in France who has that power.”

“The king?” asked the monk.

“No: one who’s above him in genius though below him in rank. Cardinal Richelieu. Are you the cardinal in person? If you are, I’ll obey but my orders are so precise that I must refuse anyone else.”

“Take that light and lead me to the Dame de Coëtman’s prison that is in the left corner of the courtyard. I’m the cardinal.”

And he removed his hood and uncovered his head, with a result much like that of the revelation of Medusa of antiquity. The superior remained motionless for a moment, paralysed not by resistance but by surprise. Then, with that passive obedience that generally followed a command from Richelieu, she bowed, took the candle and his arm. Leading the way, she said, “Follow me, my Lord.”

Richelieu followed. They crossed the forecourt. The night was calm but cold and dark, the stars shining in a black sky, with the sharp glints that foretoken the arrival of the winter frost. The candle flame rose vertically into the air, bent by no breath of wind. It cast a circle of light around the monk and the nun who moved with them, lighting objects as they approached and leaving them in shadow when they passed. Finally, they began to glimpse a small round building like an Arab hut. In the centre of it, about the height of a man’s chest, a small black square took shape. It was the window, and as they approached they could see that it was closed by a grid of iron bars, so tight one could barely pass a fist between them. “She’s here?” the cardinal asked.

“She’s here,” the superior replied. As they got closer, it seemed to the cardinal that two pale hands grasping the bars suddenly let go, and a dim figure within disappeared back into the dark interior of the tomb. The cardinal approached first and, despite the stench issuing from the tomb, put his face to the bars to try to see inside. But the night was so black, he could see nothing but two greenish lights shining in the darkness like the eyes of a wild beast. He stepped back, took the candle from the superior, and passed it through the bars and into the mausoleum. But the air inside was so noxious, so thick, that inside the tomb the flame grew pale, dwindled, and almost went out. The cardinal drew the candle back out, and the flame returned to life. Then, in order to clear the air and light up the interior, he took his signed order that he no longer needed once it had been acknowledged, set it afire, and threw it into the tomb. Despite the thickness of the atmosphere within, the letter gave off enough light for the cardinal to see, crouched against the wall opposite the window, a figure, elbows on knees, chin on fists, and naked but for a scrap of damp cloth that covered her from waist to knees. This figure, pale, hideous, and shivering, watched the monk from hollow eyes with the night inside them, their gaze fixed, almost insane. A groan came from her with every exhalation, painful as the breath of the dying. She had been in constant pain for so long that this groaning had become a part of her. The cardinal shivered from head to toe at this sight, though not particularly sensitive to others’ pain or even his own. He turned a menacing gaze on the superior who said, “That’s the order.”

“Whose order?” demanded the cardinal.

“The order of judgement.”

“And what did this order of judgement say?”

“That Jacqueline Le Voyer, called the Marquise de Coëtman, is to be enclosed in a structure of stone, sealed behind her so no one can enter, and she shall be fed only bread and water.”

The cardinal passed his hand across his brow. Then, approaching the barred window, within which the night had returned, he said, “Is that you?” He turned his face toward where he’d seen the pale figure. “Are you Jacqueline Le Voyer, Dame de Coëtman?”

“Bread! Heat! Clothing!” gasped the prisoner.

“I asked you,” repeated the cardinal, “if you are Jacqueline Le Voyer, Dame de Coëtman.”

“I’m hungry! I’m cold!” replied the voice, ending in a sob.

“First answer my question,” the cardinal insisted.

“If I say I’m the one you named, you’ll just let me starve. For two days they’ve ignored me despite my cries.”

The cardinal glared again at the superior who murmured, “The order! The order!”

“The order was she’s to live on bread and water, not be starved.”

“Why is she so stubborn as to go on living?” said the superior.

The cardinal very nearly said something close to blasphemy. Instead, he crossed himself, saying “If you tell me that this order gives you the right to let her die, I swear to God, you’ll take her place in that tomb.”

Then, turning back to the wretch who was the object of their discussion, the cardinal said, “If you admit you’re really the Dame de Coëtman and if you answer my questions honestly and faithfully within an hour you’ll have clothing, heat, and bread.”

“Clothing! Heat! Bread!” cried the prisoner. “Do you swear it?”

“On the five wounds of Our Lord.”

“Who are you?”

“I am a priest.”

“In that case, I don’t believe you. It’s priests and nuns who’ve tortured me for nine years. Let me die. I won’t talk.”

“But I was a gentleman before taking orders,” said the cardinal, “and I swear on my honour as a gentleman.”

“And what do you think would happen to you if you betrayed these promises?” said the prisoner.

“Then I would be dishonoured in this world and damned in the next.”

“All right, then, yes!” she cried. “Yes! No matter what happens, I’ll tell everything!”

“And if I’m pleased with what you tell me, then in addition to bread, clothing, and heat, you’ll have freedom.”

“Freedom!” the prisoner cried, rushing to the window and pressing her pale face against the bars. “Yes, I’m Jacqueline Le Voyer, Dame de Coëtman! Yes, I’ll tell everything, everything, everything!”

Then she yelled in a fit of crazy happiness, “Freedom!” Her laugh was mad, sinister, and she shook the bars with a strength that should have been impossible to a body so lean and feeble. “Freedom! Oh, you must be Jesus Christ himself if you can say to the dead ‘Get up and walk from your graves!’”

“My sister,” said the cardinal, turning toward the superior, “I’ll forget everything if within five minutes, you’ve tools brought that’ll enable an opening to be made in this tomb large enough for this woman to get out.”

“Follow me,” the superior said.

The cardinal turned to follow. “Don’t leave me! Don’t leave me!” the prisoner said. “If she takes you with her, you’ll never return, I’ll never see you again. The heavenly light that came into my tomb will go out and I’ll be buried once more.”

The cardinal gave her his hand. “Rest easy, poor creature,” he said. “With God’s help, your martyrdom is almost over.”

But, seizing his hand between two fleshless claws that gripped like a vice, she cried, “A hand! I hold a hand! The first human hand that’s been extended to me for ten years! The others were nothing but tigers’ paws. Be blessed, O be blessed, human hand!”

And she covered his hand with kisses. The cardinal didn’t have the courage to remove it. He called out to his porters, saying, “Follow this woman,” indicating the superior. “She’ll give you the tools necessary to rip open this tomb. There are five pistoles in it for each of you.”

The two men followed the superior who, light in her hand, led them to a sort of shed where they kept the garden tools. In much less than five minutes they reappeared, the larger of the two with a pickaxe on his shoulder, the other with a crowbar. They sounded the wall with the tools, and where it seemed to be thinnest, they began to work. “What should I do now, My Lord?” asked the superior.

“Go heat up your room,” the cardinal ordered, “and prepare some food.”

The superior withdrew. The cardinal’s eyes followed her, glinting from the candle she carried. He watched her enter the convent. Probably it never even occurred to her to resist what was happening. She knew too well what her situation was, and though the power of the cardinal was far from the height it would reach later, she knew she was at his mercy as his ecclesiastical power at this time was even greater than his temporal power. He was within his rights, having temporal authority over a prison, and religious authority over a convent. When the prisoner heard the pickaxe and the crowbar echoing from the stone, only then did she believe what the cardinal had promised. “So it’s true! It’s true!” she cried. “Oh, who are you, that I may bless you in this world and through all eternity?”

Then she heard the first stones crack, tumble into the interior, and her eyes accustomed to darkness like those of night birds, saw light infiltrating her tomb from an opening other than her barred window that for 9 years had been her only source of light and air. She dropped the cardinal’s hand, rushed to the opening, despite the risk of being struck by the pickaxe, she grabbed the stones, and tugged on them, doing whatever she could to hasten her deliverance. Even before the hole was big enough for her to get out, she stuck her head through, then her shoulders, ignoring cuts, bruises, and saying through her tears, “Help me! Oh, help me! Pull me from my grave, blessed saviours, beloved brethren!”

And since she was already halfway out, they took her under the arms, her body as cold as the stone from which she issued, and dragged her out. Once she was out, the poor creature’s first act was to fill her lungs with the clean air. She extended her arms to the stars with a painful cry of joy and fell on her knees to thank God. Then seeing her saviour, she held out her arms and rushed toward him.

But he either out of pity for this half-naked woman or out of shame for her condition, had already taken off his monk’s robe that for convenience opened in front. He cast it over her shoulders, leaving him in the clothes he wore beneath, a cavalier’s outfit in black velvet with purple ribbons. “Cover yourself with this robe, my sister,” he said, “until you receive the clothes you’ve been promised.” Then, as she staggered from either emotion or lack of strength, he called, “Good men, come here.” Giving them twice what he’d promised, he said, “Take this woman who’s too weak to walk and carry her to the superior’s room.” He went up to the room where the superior had laid a fire in the hearth according to his orders while two candles burned on a table. “Now,” the cardinal said, “bring paper, pen, ink, and leave us!” The superior obeyed. Left alone, leaning on the table, the cardinal murmured, “This time, I think the spirit of the Lord’s truly with me.” At that moment, the larger of the two porters came in, carrying the unconscious prisoner as if she were a child. He placed her where the cardinal indicated, still wrapped in the monk’s robe, near but not too close to the fire. Then he went out, bowing as if aware he was in the presence of great rank.

092 Her Tale

The cardinal remained alone with the poor creature, who lay so motionless that one might have thought her dead but for the nervous chills that occasionally agitated the coarse cloth of the robe that covered her. She was so shrouded that no part of her body was showing, and her shape, revealed in relief, seemed more like that of a corpse than a living person. But, little by little, as the warmth of the fire penetrated the robe, the trembling beneath it became more frequent. Two hands that might have been taken for a skeleton’s if they hadn’t had such long nails, emerged from the sleeves, stretching instinctively toward the fire, proving that the body they belonged to had not yet reached its limit of suffering. Then the pale face, eye sockets wide with pain, swarthy cheeks and lips drawn back from the teeth, appeared in its turn, like the head of a turtle protruding from its shell. Legs as well stretched toward the fire, revealing from under the hem of the robe two feet as cold and hard as marble. Then, stiffly, the figure sat up, and a voice came as if from the chest of a corpse: “The fire! Oh, how good’s the fire!”

She crept closer to the flames, like an infant unaware of the danger, too chilled to really feel its heat. “Take care, my sister,” said the cardinal, “lest you burn.”

The Dame de Coëtman shuddered and turned rigidly toward the voice. She hadn't noticed that anyone else was in the room, hadn't seen anything but the fire that to her was as compelling as the dizzying edge of an abyss. She gazed for a moment at the cardinal but didn't recognise him in his cavalier's outfit, having seen him only in a monk's robe. "Who are you?" she asked. "I know your voice but not your look."

"I'm the one who has already given you clothing and heat, and next will give you bread – and freedom."

She made a mental effort to remember, then said, "Oh, yes!" She dragged herself toward him. "Yes, you promised."

But then she looked around and, lowering her voice, said, "But can you keep your promise? I have enemies, terrible and powerful enemies."

"Don't worry – you have a protector more terrible and powerful than they are."

"Who is that?"

"God!"

The Dame de Coëtman shook her head. "He's forgotten me for a very long time," she said.

"Yes but once He remembers, He won't forget again."

"I'm very hungry," she said.

At that moment, as if at her order, the door opened and two nuns came in, bringing bread, honey, a cup of broth, and a plate of cold chicken.

At the sight of them, the Dame de Coëtman screamed with fright. "My tormentors!" she cried. "Protect me!"

And she crouched behind the cardinal's chair, placing her unknown defender between her and the nuns. "Is that enough, My Lord?" the superior asked from the doorway.

"Yes but you see how the sisters are frightening the prisoner. Have them put what they've brought on the table and go."

The nuns placed the broth, chicken, bread, and honey on the table opposite the Dame de Coëtman, with a spoon in the broth, and a fork and knife with the chicken. "Go," said the superior.

The nuns departed. The superior turned to leave but the cardinal raised a finger. The superior saw that the gesture was directed at her and stopped. "Keep in mind," he said, "that I will taste everything this woman will eat and drink."

"There's nothing to fear, My Lord," replied the superior.

And with a curtsy, she withdrew. The prisoner waited until the door was closed before reaching a lean arm toward the table. But she stopped short. The cardinal picked up the cup of broth and took a sip from it, and then turned toward the starving woman, whose arms were stretched toward him. "You say you haven't eaten for two days?"

"Three, My Lord."

"Why do you call me My Lord?"

"I heard the superior call you that – and, indeed, you must be a great noble to dare to defend me like this."

"If you haven't eaten for three days, you must be cautious. Take this cup but drink the soup one spoonful at a time."

"I'll do whatever you tell me, My Lord, in this and in everything."

Eagerly, she took the cup from the cardinal's hand and brought the first spoonful to her mouth. But her throat was so tight, her stomach so shrunken, that the broth went down painfully and with difficulty. Gradually, however, it eased, and by the fifth or sixth spoonful, she was able to drink right from the cup. But by the time she finished it, she was so weak that a cold sweat burst from her forehead, and she was ready to faint. The cardinal tasted the glass of honey, and then passed it to her, telling her to take only a sip. She drank several sips. Her cheeks flushed with sudden fever, and, placing a hand to her chest, she said, "Oh, I'm drinking fire!"

"And now," said the cardinal, "after a moment more, we will talk." And he helped her to get up and sit in a chair near the fireplace.

No one, seeing this man gently nursing this human debris, would recognise in him the terrible prelate, the terror of the French nobility, who had struck off heads that even royalty had been unable to bend. You may say he was a cruel man, and this show of mercy was entirely in his own interest. But to this we answer that a policy of cruelty is only necessary where it serves justice. "I'm still hungry," said the poor woman, looking avidly at the food on the table.

"You'll have plenty of time to eat," said the cardinal. "Meanwhile, I've kept my promise: you're warm, you're fed, you'll have clothes, and you'll be free."

"What do you want to know?"

"How did you know Ravaillac, and where did you first meet him?"

"In Paris, at my home. I was the confidante in all matters of the king's former mistress, Madam Henriette d'Enragues. Ravaillac had been living in Angouleme under the protection of the Duke of Épermon. He'd been involved in two felonies: he'd spent a year in prison on a murder charge and racked up a number of debts. Though he'd been released, he was due to go back inside."

"Have you ever heard about his visions?"

"He told me of them himself. In the first and most important, he lit a fire and, bending over it, saw a vine grow out of it and change shape, becoming the sacred trumpet of the Archangel. It formed itself to his mouth and, without his blowing into it, sounded the fanfare of holy war, while out of it a torrent of the hosts burst right and left."

"Had he studied theology?" asked the cardinal.

"He'd confined his studies to a single question of law: when was it the duty of a Christian to kill an enemy of the pope? When he was released from prison, Sir d'Épermon, knowing he was a religious man who'd been visited by the spirit of the Lord – and knowing the solicitor in charge of his case – had him brought to Paris for the next phase of his trial. As he had to pass through Orléans, Sir d'Épermon arranged for Sir d'Enragues and his daughter, Henriette, to give him a letter of passage allowing him to travel to Paris and lodge in my home."

"What was the first impression he made upon you?" the cardinal asked.

"At first I was scared of him. He was a tall man, powerfully muscled, with brown skin and a dark visage. When I saw him, I thought I beheld Judas. But after I'd opened the letter from Henriette, read that he was very devout, and saw how mildly he behaved, I had no more fear."

"And from your home he went to Naples?"

"Yes, on behalf of the Duke of Épermon. He lodged with a man named Hébert, the traitor Biron's secretary. It was there that he first announced that he planned to kill the king."

"Yes, a certain Latil told me the same thing. Do you know this Latil?"

"Oh, yes! At the time I was arrested, he was Sir d'Épermon's confidential page. He must know quite a lot."

"And what he knows, he's told me. Continue."

"I'm hungry," said the Dame de Coëtman.

The cardinal poured her a glass of honey and allowed her to dip some bread in it. After eating the bread and drinking the honey, she felt more composed. "He sought you out when he returned from Naples?" the cardinal asked.

"Who? Ravaillac? Yes, and twice, on Ascension Day and Corpus Christi, he told me he – that is to say, it had been decided – was to kill the king."

"And why do you think he took you into his confidence?"

"He said he was torn by doubts but he was obliged to do it."

"By what?"

"By the debt he owed Sir d'Épermon, who wanted the king assassinated to get the queen mother out of danger."

"And what danger was the queen mother in?"

"The king wanted to put Concini on trial for extortion and condemn him for treason, and accuse the queen mother of adultery and send her back to Florence."

"And given his revelations, what did you decide to do about it?"

"Ravaillac didn't seem to realise that the queen mother was involved in the plot, so I thought about telling him all. Instead, I wrote to the king, requesting an audience but received no response. And indeed, at that time he was completely preoccupied by his infatuation for the Princess de Condé. So I wrote to the queen, saying that I had something important to tell her, and waited three days for an audience. But the three days passed without a response; and on the fourth, she left for Saint-Cloud."

"Who told you of this?"

"Vautier, who was the queen's apothecary at the time."

"And what conclusion did you draw?"

"That Ravaillac was wrong, and that the queen mother really was involved in the plot."

"So then?"

"I resolved to talk to the king at any cost, so I went to the Jesuits of Rue Saint-Antoine and asked to speak to the king's confessor."

"And how were you received?"

"Poorly."

"But were you able to speak to Father Coton?"

"No, Father Coton was away. I was taken to the father examiner, who told me I was imagining things. 'What, disturb His Majesty's confessor?' he said. 'On what grounds?' 'Because they plan to kill the king!' I cried. 'Bah. Tend to your own affairs,' he said. 'Take care,' I said, 'if any harm comes to the king, I'll go straight to the judges and tell them you refused to listen.' 'Well, then, go tell Father Coton yourself,' he said. 'Where is he?' 'At Fontainebleau. But there's no point in your going there, so I'll go myself.'

"However, I didn't trust the father examiner, so the next day I hired a carriage to take me to Fontainebleau. I was preparing to leave when I was arrested."

"What was the name of this Jesuit examiner?"

"Father Philippe. Then, from prison, I wrote two more letters to the king, and I'm sure one of them got through."

"And the other one?"

"The other letter I sent by way of Sir de Sully."

"Who carried it?"

"Miss de Gournay."

"I know her – an old lady who writes books?"

"Exactly. She took it to Sir de Sully at the Arsenal; but as the letter mentioned the names of d'Épermon and Concini and repeated the warning I gave about the queen, Sir de Sully didn't dare show it to the king. However, he said if there was a real threat, he could send to have me and Miss de Gournay brought to the Louvre. But as the king had received so many such warnings, he just shrugged and dismissed our letter as unreliable."

"What was the date of this letter?"

"That must have been ten or eleven May."

"Do you think Miss de Gournay might have kept it?"

"It's possible but I wouldn't know. I was in prison. One night – it was October 28, 1619, as I know because that was when I could still keep track of time – I was taken from my first prison. A bailiff came into my cell, ordered me to stand, and read me a Parliamentary decree that condemned me to spend the rest of my life bricked up in a tomb, with only a barred window for light and air, and only bread and water for nourishment. I thought it was bad enough to have been imprisoned for trying to save the king but this new sentence almost destroyed me. On hearing it read, I fell unconscious to the floor. I was only twenty-seven years old – how many more years would I have to endure such a sentence? While I was unconscious, they carried me out and put me in a carriage. The breeze blowing across my face from the window brought me around. I sat between two officers, each of whom held a chain gripping one of my wrists. I was dressed in a black frock, the remnants of which I still wear. I knew I was being taken to the Convent of Repentant Daughters but I had no idea where that was located. The carriage went through a gate that opened before it, clattered through a passage into a courtyard, and stopped at the tomb you took me from. They forced me into it through a hole in the wall, and one of the officers came in behind me. I was half-dead, I made no resistance. I leaned against the window. One of my wrist-chains was tied around my neck, and the other was linked to it and passed through the window to the second officer. The first officer went out, and two other men I'd glimpsed in the darkness began to work. They were two masons, and they began walling up the opening. Only then did I really come to myself. I uttered a terrible cry and tried to rush toward them.

I was stopped by the neck chain. For a moment I thought I'd strangle myself and pulled with all my strength. The links of the chain bit into my neck but as the chain had no noose it didn't tighten and I just kept pulling forward. My breath gasped, my vision turned red. The officer yanked back on the chain. I fought toward the opening but by the time I reached it the masons had already gotten it three-quarters closed. I thrust my hands through the gap, trying to pull down the stones while the mortar was still wet. One of the masons covered my hands with mortar and the other pinned them under a heavy rock. I was caught as if in a trap. I cried, I yelled. I foresaw what would happen: since no one would be able to enter my cell, if I was mortared into the wall away from the window, I'd die of hunger, hanging from my hands. I prayed for release. One of the masons, without saying a word, thrust a crowbar under the stone and lifted it. With a violent effort, I tore my half-crushed hands from the wall and collapsed back beneath the window, exhausted by the double effort to try to strangle myself and to stop the masons from walling me in. Meanwhile, they finished their dark and fatal labour. When I came to, I was entombed. The sentence of Parliament had been carried out. For eight days, I was raving mad. The first four, I rolled around the floor of my tomb, howling desperately, and for those four days I ate nothing – I wanted to starve, and thought I'd have the strength to do it. It was the thirst that broke me. On the fifth day, my throat was on fire. I drank a few drops of water, and that was my commitment to continuing to live. Then for a while I thought it was all some kind of error, a mistaken sentence that would soon be overturned. Such a thing had to be impossible in the reign of King Henry's son, under the regency of King Henry's wife. I'd just wanted to save Henry IV; it couldn't be that they'd want to punish me more than they'd punished his murderer, a man whose ordeal had lasted only an hour, while God knows how many hours, how many days, how many years my own ordeal would last. But eventually this hope, too, dwindled and died. Once I'd resolved to live, I asked for straw to make a bed but the superior said I'd been sentenced to bread and water, and if Parliament had wanted me to have straw, they'd have put it in the sentence. So I was refused what we grant to our lowest animals: a mere bundle of straw. I'd hoped that when the harsh winter nights came, I'd die of cold. I'd heard that freezing to death was a gentle way to go. At times during that first winter, chilled to the bone by the freezing temperatures, I drifted into sleep, or rather unconsciousness. But, every time, I awoke – cold, stiff, almost paralysed but alive. I lived till the rebirth of spring. I saw the flowers reappear. I saw the trees grow green. Gentle breezes penetrated to me, and I felt my cheeks dampen with tears. I thought the winter had dried up my tears but with spring, with life, they returned. It's impossible to describe with what sweet melancholy I watched the first ray of spring sunshine slant through my window and into my tomb. I reached my arms into it. I tried to grab it and take it into my heart. Alas! It escaped me, as ephemeral as the hopes of which it seemed a symbol. For the first four years, and part of the fifth, I marked the passing days on the wall with a piece of stone the children had thrown at me during my madness. But when I saw winter return for a fifth time, the heart went out of me. What matter the count of days past? Better to think only of the days I had left. After a year of sleeping on bare stone and leaning against damp walls, my clothes began to wear thin. After two years, they tore like wet paper, and fell to pieces. I waited till my clothing was nearly gone before asking for more but the superior said the sentence spoke of bread and water, and nothing else. Little by little, my clothes tore and fell apart. Winter came again. The terrible nights I'd previously endured wearing a warm woollen dress, I now suffered naked, or nearly so. I picked up the tattered rags that fell from me and tried to reattach them but they fell like leaves in autumn, leaving me bare. Sometimes priests came to peer at me through my window. When I first saw them, those men of God, those angels of humanity, I begged for mercy. They laughed. More of them came after I was naked but I gave up talking to them, and just tried to cover myself with my hands and my hair. I lived the simple, mechanical life of an animal. I drank; I ate; I barely even thought. I slept as much as I could for, while asleep, I couldn't feel the pain of life. Three days ago, they failed to bring me my food at the usual time. I thought it was just some kind of mistake. I waited. Evening came. I was hungry, I called out. There was no answer. That night, though already suffering, I was still able to sleep. The next morning at daybreak, I was waiting at the bars of my window for my food. It didn't come. Nuns passed by; I called to them but they just told their rosaries and said nothing. Night came again, and I saw they planned to starve me. What a sad and weak nature is ours! Once I would have welcomed death but now I was afraid. That second night I slept only an hour or two, and when I did I had terrible dreams. The pain in my stomach and belly was excruciating, and woke me whenever sleep closed my eyes. At daybreak I rose to see if they might bring food, though I knew they wouldn't. That day was one long agony. I cried out, not for bread but because the pain made me scream. Needless to say, no one responded to my cries. I tried to pray, over and over but it was useless. I couldn't find the name of God – that name that comes so easily to me now. Again the day grew dim, the shadows entered my tomb, darkness fell, and it was night. I was in such pain, I thought this night was my last. I could cry no more – I hadn't the strength. I surrendered. Wrapped in agony, I counted each hour of the night, unable to escape a single moment of my pain. Each tolling of the bell seemed to strike in my skull and explode into millions of sparks. Finally, midnight having struck, I heard the sound of the outer gate open and close. It was an unusual noise at that hour, so I dragged myself to my window and peered out, hanging on the bars with both hands and clinging to the sill with my teeth. I saw a light come in the gate, enter the parlour, and then come down into the courtyard and approach. For a moment I dared to hope but when I saw the man with the superior was a monk, it was all over. I let go of the bars, pried my teeth from the sill – they seemed stuck there as if welded to the stone – and then fell back to where you saw me. It was high time. Twenty-four hours later, you would have found nothing but a corpse."

As if she'd been waiting for the Dame de Coëtman's story to end – and, indeed, perhaps she was – upon these last words, the superior appeared in the doorway. "My Lord's orders?" she asked. "First, a question – and, as I've stated, you must reply truthfully." "I hear you, My Lord," the superior replied with a bow. "Who was it who came to you, astonished to find this poor creature still alive, though naked, fed on bread and water, and buried in a tomb?" "Is it My Lord who orders me to talk?" said the superior. "In my dual authority, both spiritual and temporal, I demand to know the name of this woman's executioner – you others being no more than her torturers." "It was Lord Vautier, astrologer and doctor to the queen mother." "He's the one I sent my letters to," said the Dame de Coëtman, "though at the time he was only her apothecary." "Very well," the cardinal said. "The orders of those who've demanded this woman's execution shall be fulfilled." He waved a hand toward the Dame de Coëtman. "For everyone in the world but you and me, this woman has died. That's why you had her tomb opened tonight: to bring out her corpse. And in her grave you will bury a stone, or a log, or an actual corpse you get from a hospital – that's entirely up to you." "As you command, my Lord." "Three of your nuns are in on the secret: the one who opened the gate and the two sisters who brought the food. You will explain to them what happens to those who speak when they should remain silent. After all," and he pointed angrily at the Dame de Coëtman, "they've seen an example with their own eyes." "And is that everything, My Lord?" "Everything! When you go down, have the goodness to tell the taller of my porters that I need, within the quarter of an hour, another sedan chair like the first – only one that can be locked, and has curtains over the windows." "I will relay My Lord's orders."

On the side of his face away from the superior, the cardinal showed the jovial smile we saw the night he gave Souscarrières and Madam Cavois the patent for sedan chairs. It's an expression we'll see again, and more than once, as our story unfolds. "Now," the cardinal said to the Dame de Coëtman, "I think you're well enough to eat a chicken wing or two, and even drink half a glass of honey to the health of our good superior."

3 days later, the chronicler L'Estoile wrote the following in his journal, based on information received from the Convent of Repentant Daughters:
On the night of December 13 to 14, in the little stone cell built in the courtyard of the Convent of Repentant Daughters, where she'd been confined for nine years since Parliament sentenced her to bread and water, died the Demoiselle Jacqueline Le Voyer, known as the Dame de Coëtman, wife of Isaac de Varenne, suspected of complicity with Ravallac in the assassination of good King Henry IV. She was buried that same night in the convent's cemetery.

Maximillian de Bethune, the Baron of Rosny, the Duke of Sully

The entire time the Dame de Coëtman was telling her story, the cardinal had listened with the utmost attention to her long and sorrowful tale. But though every word the poor victim spoke was a moral proof of the complicity of Concini, d'Épemon, and the queen mother in the assassination of Henry IV, no physical evidence – nothing visible, tangible, and irrefutable – had come out of it. But what was clear as day, more clear than crystal, was not only the innocence of the Dame de Coëtman but her dedication to preventing the terrible regicide of 14 May – a dedication that was paid for by nine years imprisoned in the Conciergerie and nine years in a tomb at the Repentant Daughters. And since the process verbal from Ravallac's trial was burned and lost, it remained essential for the cardinal to obtain, at all costs, that sheet of Ravallac's final revelations written when he was on the wheel. This, then, was the difficulty, one might even say the impossibility that the cardinal faced; it seemed that after all his efforts, he was back where he'd started. But Richelieu had known from the first that the difficulties he faced were almost insurmountable. We believe we've said this sheet had been in the hands of Parliament's court reporter, Lord Joly de Fleury. Unfortunately, Lord Joly de Fleury had died two years before, and it was only after his return from Chalais's trial in Nantes that the cardinal had thought to begin collecting evidence against the queen mother – for it wasn't until Chalais's trial that he'd fully appreciated the extent of Marie de Médicis's hatred for him. Lord Joly de Fleury was survived by a son and a daughter. The cardinal had summoned both of them to his office at his house in the Place Royale to interrogate them about the fate of this sheet, so important to him, and, indeed, to history. But Joly de Fleury's children said the sheet was no longer in their hands. The cardinal had been told that eleven years before, in March 1617, a young man of fifteen or sixteen, dressed all in black and with a large hat pulled down over his eyes, had called on Lord Joly de Fleury, accompanied by another man ten or twelve years his senior. The Reporter of Parliament had received them in his office, where he'd spoken to them for nearly an hour. He'd then conducted them, with every mark of respect, out to the street where a carriage – a rarity at the time – awaited the pair. At dinner that evening, the worthy solicitor had told his son and daughter, "My children, if anyone ever comes to you after my death to claim the sheet containing Ravallac's last confession on the wheel, say that it's no longer in your possession – or, better yet, that it never existed."

So the cardinal had been told, five or six months before the start of our story, when he'd interviewed the son and daughter of Lord Joly de Fleury. They'd tried at first to deny even the existence of the sheet but when pressed by the cardinal they'd consulted with each other for a moment, then decided to tell him everything. However, they were entirely ignorant of the identity of the two mysterious visitors who, it appeared, had come to demand that important piece of evidence from their father. It was only six months later that the seriousness of the threats against him had forced the cardinal to reopen his investigation. More than ever, as we've seen, this piece of evidence was essential to completing the case he was building to defend himself against Marie de Médicis. But more than ever, he despaired of finding it. However, as Father Joseph had said, Providence had already carried the cardinal this far, and surely he could hope it wouldn't stop halfway to his goal. Meanwhile, as supporting evidence, he would go after the letter Madam de Coëtman had written to the king, sending it to Sully by way of Miss de Gournay – a letter which Sully might have kept. If so, it should be easy to obtain. The old minister, or rather the old friend of Henry IV, was still alive, dividing his time between his château in Villebon and his winter house on the Rue Saint-Antoine, between the Rue Royale and the Rue de l'Égout-Sainte-Catherine. It was said that, faithful to his lifelong habits, he was always in his office by five in the morning. The cardinal drew an exquisite watch from his pocket: it was four o'clock. At half past five exactly – after stopping at his house in the Place Royale to get a hat, and to leave word for his crony, Father Mulot de Lafollone, that he'd see him for lunch, and to his jester, Bois-Robert, that he needed to speak to him before noon – the cardinal knocked on the door of the Hotel Sully that was opened by a Swiss Guard dressed in the uniform worn during the reign of Henry IV, the monarch people were already beginning to call the Great King.

Let's take advantage of Richelieu's visit to Sully, a minister too often lost in the shadow of the minister who followed him, to present to our readers one of the most interesting personalities of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, a man whose character is often misunderstood – especially by historians who have been content to judge him by the face he presented to the public, without bothering to walk around and observe his other sides. Maximillian de Bethune, Duke of Sully, who was, at the time of our story, sixty-eight years old, had singular pretensions regarding his birth. Instead of simply accepting that his father and grandfather were descended from the Counts de Bethune in Flanders, he had concocted a family tree showing that he was descended from a Scotsman named Bethune that would make him a cousin of the Archbishop of Glasgow. He also tried to show he was related to the great House of Guise through the House of Coucy that was connected to the Emperor of Austria and the King of Spain. Sully, who was called Sir de Rosny because his birthplace was the village of Rosny, near Mantes, was only moderately wellborn, despite his purported connections with the Archbishop of Glasgow and the houses of Austria and Spain. When Gabrielle d'Éstrées, the king's mistress, took offence at some rude remarks by Sir de Sancy, the Surintendant des Finances, she'd had Henry IV replace him with Sully, believing him her devoted servant. Henry IV was oblivious to pettiness and ingratitude in his mistresses – it was one of the great faults of this great king – and due to the selfish wheedling of Gabrielle, he'd forgotten that Sir de Sancy, in order to buy the loyalty of the Swiss, had personally pawned the great diamond that still bears his name and was part of the Crown Jewels. In carrying out these sacrifices for France, the poor Surintendant des Finances had so impoverished himself that, in order to provide funds for his successor, Henry IV was obliged to resort to an expedient called a stop-defence that was basically a delaying tactic deployed against his creditors. In fact, when confronted by the king's creditors, the irreverent Sancy sometimes had himself arrested as a common debtor. When conveyed to the door of the prison, he would show the warders the order for his arrest, and then, bowing to the officers, release himself and go on his way. Sully was his successor. But the first time the upright Sully was called upon to prove his loyalty to his patron, it was in a matter that would have required him to be disloyal to his religion. When Henry IV, hoping to convert his children to legitimate heirs, spoke seriously of marrying Gabrielle, he found in Sully one of the fiercest opponents to the union. King Henry's idea of marrying Gabrielle was more than just a lover's fancy: he wanted to give France a French queen, something it had never had. Henry IV, politically astute and aware of his own weaknesses, didn't pretend that the woman he married would have no influence on the destiny of the State. In the two hours per day that he devoted to the business of rule, he settled even the most difficult questions with the decisiveness of a military commander – but everyone knew that this forceful captain, who wanted to be regarded as an absolute ruler, had at home a wife or mistress who was also, in her bedroom, a ruler quite as absolute. With a king like that, who he married mattered a great deal. It wouldn't matter that the Spanish had been beaten at Arques and Ivry if a queen, Spanish by birth or temperament, ruled the king's bed, and from that bed stretched her hand over the realm. When Henry IV decided to remarry, he was virtually the only sovereign in Europe who'd borne a sword in battle. He was a conqueror on horseback, wearing the white plume of Ivry, the only man of his kind on the continent. But that sword, that French sword, was no threat if it was stolen from his bedside by a queen with foreign loyalties. This is what a great politician, a man of genius like Richelieu, would have understood – but which Sully did not. Sully, whose cold blue eyes and ruddy complexion, even at age sixty, might justify his claim to be of Scottish descent, was more feared than loved, even by Henry IV. As Duplessis-Mornay's secretary Marbault testified, he brought fear with him wherever he went: fear of his deeds, fear of his decisions, and fear even of his gaze. He was a soldier first and foremost, having been at war his entire life; as a minister he was active, energetic, and, rarest of all, an able financier. He exercised general command over all matters military, financial, and nautical – and personal command over his first love, the artillery. He'd come to command the artillery because Gabrielle, who'd wanted higher honours for her sadly mediocre father, had been foolish enough to allow Henry IV to offer the position of Grand-Master of the Artillery to Sully instead – and Sully was wise enough to seize that opportunity without feeling the least bit grateful to Gabrielle. The day Gabrielle decided to insult Sully by offering him his first important office as a throwaway was the day she ensured that she would never become Queen of France. Henry IV had attempted to legitimize his two sons by Gabrielle, granting them the title of prince and having them baptised as such. Afterwards Fresnes, Henry's Secretary of State, had sent Sully the documents recording their baptism as official Children of France. But Sully had said "There are no Children of France," and sent the documents back. And the king hadn't dared to insist otherwise. It was Sully's way of testing his master. Perhaps, if Henry IV had insisted, Sully might have given way. But in the event, it was King Henry who backed down. Sully then realised that the king didn't love Gabrielle quite as much as he respected Sully. Gabrielle was beginning to age – and to sour. So Sully brought in a rival who was still young, still beautiful, and still seductive to oppose her – in short, the complete package. Gabrielle, alas, was a package plundered, opened, and emptied. The new package came straight from the Grand Duke of Tuscany. He'd sent the king a portrait of his niece, a charming miniature of Marie de Médicis in her girlhood, radiating youth and freshness, in which her incipient obesity could be regarded as evidence of health. Gabrielle brushed it off. "It's not her portrait I fear," she said, "it's her coffers of cash."

Indeed, Henry IV was in a position where he had to make a choice between love and money. And he had to decide quickly, before his love's love of money poisoned his own love. In Paris at that time there was a man of Moorish race, an ex-cobbler from Lucca named Zamet who'd made a fortune in France and was now master of over 1.7 million crowns. Zamet had first found success as shoemaker to Henry III, employing his mastery of the tongue (to use a term from the cobbler's trade) in making charming, feminine shoes for the royal foot. Henry III, flattered by this delightful footwear, had made Zamet Preceptor of the Inner Chambers and Director of the Royal Boys' Choir – for this great king was a lover of music. That was the beginning of Zamet's fortune. During the insurgency of the Catholic League, when everyone needed money, Zamet lent money to everyone: the Leaguers, the Spaniards, even the King of Navarre, who hadn't even asked for it. Had Zamet foreseen the greatness of Henry of Navarre, as Croesus had of Caesar?

It seems an apt comparison. Ultimately, Zamet was a tool of Grand Duke Ferdinand of the Empire. But Sully and Zamet understood each other. Sully was just waiting for his opportunity; if it came, and he seized it with a steady hand, he'd win. To Gabrielle, Sully was little more than a servant, as he himself said in his memoirs. One memorable day, Gabrielle had referred to Sully as a mere "valet" – and though Sully might actually be a servant, he certainly didn't want to be called one. He complained about this remark to Henry IV, and the king told Gabrielle, "Better a valet like Sully than ten mistresses like you."

Sully's time had come. Duke Ferdinand was on the move and, though an ex-cardinal, had reached across the Alps to poison his brother Francis and his sister-in-law Bianca. Gabrielle was at Fontainebleau with the king. Easter was nigh. Her confessor demanded that she celebrate Easter in Paris. She had the fatal idea of staying at the home of Zamet the Moor – which sealed her fate. Sully, who had quarrelled with her, nonetheless went to see her there. Why? Perhaps because he couldn't believe she'd be so imprudent. The poor woman thought she was already the queen. She acted as if she was, and told Sully she would always be happy to receive the Duchess de Sully at her levers and couchers, her morning and evening audiences. The duchess was furious at this impertinence. To appease her, Sully said, "Things are not as she believes, and soon you'll see a game well played, so long as the ball keeps moving."

Obviously, he knew everything. What, you say? Sully knew Gabrielle would be poisoned?

No doubt about it. Sully was a statesman, and was careful to leave Paris so the poisoners could operate freely, though he left word that he be kept informed. We say "poisoners" because there were two: the second was named Lavarenne, who died of shock because gossip named him, not a man but a fish. Just as Zamet was an ex-cobbler, Lavarenne was an ex-cook. Ironically, Henry had recommended him to the kitchens of his sister Madam, where he'd earned a reputation as a judge of chickens. She encountered him one day, after he'd made his fortune, and said, "Well done, my dear Lavarenne: you've plucked more chickens than my brother has plucked chicks."

Droll; very droll indeed. But Madam's anecdote highlights the ambitious nature of the former chicken chef. It was to Lavarenne that Sully had said, "Let me be the first to know if by some chance an accident should befall Gabrielle – that is, the Duchess de Beaufort."

Lavarenne took the hint. Thus Sully was one of the first informed; Lavarenne wrote him that Gabrielle had suddenly fallen ill, with a strange malady that had so disfigured her features that he "feared that if King Henry IV came back to Paris, viewing her would repulse him, so he dared to beg him to stay in Fontainebleau, especially since she was dead."

And he added to Sully, "And here I am, holding this poor dead woman in my arms, hardly able to believe that she won't be alive in another hour or so."

Yes, the two were so certain of the quality of their poison that, while Gabrielle was still alive, one of them wrote to tell the other that she was dying and the king that she was dead. Very droll indeed. But she didn't die as quickly as they thought she would. She lingered on, in agony, until Saturday morning. Lavarenne had sent his message to Sully on Friday evening, and it arrived before the night was over. Sully kissed his wife, who was in bed, and told her, "My dear, you will not have to attend the levers and couchers of the Duchess de Beaufort after all. That cord has broken. Now that she's dead, God grant our king a good life and a long one!"

Sully himself spoke of the matter, in more or less these words, in his own memoirs. With Gabrielle dead, Sully had little trouble persuading Henry to settle on Marie de Médicis. But before Sully could proceed with that marriage, he had one more cord to break: that of Henriette d'Entragues. Of all our Kings of France, it was Henry IV who was most susceptible to amours. Gabrielle was barely dead before he fell hard for Henriette d'Entragues, the daughter of Marie Touchet. Before she would give up herself, she asked for a promise of marriage; before he would give up his daughter, her father demanded 500000 francs. The king sent a proposed marriage contract to Sully and ordered him to pay 500000 francs to the father. Sully tore up the marriage contract, then had half a million silver francs poured into the antechamber outside Henry's bedroom. Henry IV, on returning to his room, stepped knee-deep into a pile of coins and looked down into the faces of French kings. There were even some guilders, as some of the money had come from Tuscany. "Yeah!" he said. "What's all this?"

"These are the five hundred thousand francs you intend to pay to Sir d'Entragues for the possibility his daughter will love you."

"By the belly of the Grey Saint! I'd never imagined five hundred thousand francs took up so much room," the king said. "See if you can arrange it for half this much, my good Sully."

Sully arranged the matter for three hundred thousand francs, and it goes without saying that Henry IV, ignoring the risks, had rewritten his promise of marriage. But as Sully had predicted, despite paying the price, Henriette d'Entragues didn't deliver much in the way of love. Sully was hailed as the restorer of the state's fortunes, and, unlike Sir de Sancy, he didn't expend any of his own money in that restoration. We wouldn't call him a thief or embezzler, rather a canny businessman, who never let an opportunity go missed. Henry was aware of this and often joked about it. In crossing the court of the Louvre one day, while saluting the king, who was watching from a balcony, Sully missed his footing and stumbled. "I'm not surprised to see you stumble," called the king. "If my strongest Swiss Guard had as many drinks in his belly as you have payoffs in your pocket, he wouldn't stumble: he'd fall flat on his face."

Despite being Superintendent of Finance, Sully was as stingy on his own behalf as he was on the state's, and rather than buy a carriage, he always rode across Paris on horseback. And as he was a terrible rider, everyone laughed at him, even the children. But there had never been a Superintendent as tight-fisted as he. An Italian, returning to the Arsenal for the fifth or sixth time to try to get the money that was owed him, saw three criminals being hanged at the Place de Grève and cried out, "Look at those lucky devils! At least they don't have to deal with that scoundrel Sully."

However, Sully didn't treat everyone the way he had the worthy Italian who'd envied the hanged men. A certain Pradel, who'd been head butler to the old Marshall de Biron, kept trying to collect his back wages. Sully didn't want to pay these back wages, and one day went so far as to have the man marched out of his chambers. As he was being escorted through Sully's dining room, Pradel took a knife from the table setting and turned back toward Sully, who slammed the door on his aggrieved petitioner. Pradel went directly to an audience with the king, knife in hand, and told him the king was welcome to hang him, so long as he was first allowed to leave the knife in Sully's belly. Sully paid him. The Duke of Sully was the first to plant the famous elms that line France's highways but he was so hated by some that they would chop them down, saying, "This for Rosny, may he be beheaded like Biron."

Speaking of Biron, Sully said in his memoirs that the marshal, with the twelve leading gallants of the Court, once undertook to put on a ballet they couldn't afford to pay for. The king told them, "You can't get anywhere without a Rosny at your side," and funded the ballet himself.

It may be hard to believe it of the man who historians have portrayed as such a grim and austere figure but Sully loved to dance. Every night until the death of Henry IV – and after his death, even more so – a royal valet named Laroche would play the lute for Sully, performing all the latest dance tunes. From the first note, Sully was up on his feet, dancing alone, waving the extraordinary cap he usually wore in his office. He had as spectators only his two closest cronies, and though the party might have been more complete with a few women in attendance, the duke didn't want to endanger his reputation – or so says Tallemant des Réaux, who is rather hard on Sully. We are entitled to be sceptical of this. The two spectators who may or may not have contented themselves with merely watching, were his friends the President de Chevre and the Lord de Chevigny. Since he was unwilling to dance with loose women, one assumes he could have asked the Duchess de Sully but he doesn't seem to have been bothered by his lack of a female partner. When handing out his monthly pay-checks, he used to say to his people, "Some for the market, some for your wife, and some for your lovers. Don't mix them."

One day, tired of meeting people on the stairs who were on their way to see his wife rather than him, he asked to have a separate staircase built that led to the chambers of the duchess. When it was completed, he said, "Madam, I have had a staircase made expressly for you. Please have your callers use these stairs, because if I meet one of them on my own, I'll hurl him down to the bottom."

The day he was appointed Grandmaster of the Artillery, he took as his seal an eagle holding a bolt of lightning, with the motto Quo Jussa Jovis – "I fly at Jupiter's orders."

The seal of Cardinal Richelieu, whom we left ascending Sully's staircase at half past five in the morning, was, we recall, an eagle in the clouds – Aquila in Nubibus. "Whom shall I announce?" a servant inquired of the morning visitor.

"Announce?" he replied, smiling in advance at the effect the news would produce. "Announce Sir Cardinal Richelieu!"

The 2 Eagles

In truth, Sully had never heard an announcement quite so unexpected. When it struck his ear, he turned to see who had come to disturb the beginning of his day. He'd been occupied in writing those voluminous memoirs he left to us but rose from his chair at the valet's announcement. Sully was dressed in the fashion of 1610, 18 or 20 years before, in black velvet with slashed breeches and a purple satin doublet below a starched neck ruff, short hair, and a long beard, curled up out of the way and held in place, in the manner of Coligny, with a long toothpick. On top he wore an old-fashioned house-robe, while around his neck hung the gold chains bearing the diamond-studded symbols of his orders and offices, as if he were about to attend the King's Council of Henri IV. Dressed this way, except for the house-robe, he would often step out of his mansion (if the weather was good) at around one o'clock in the afternoon. Followed by his four Swiss Guards, he would walk from his hotel to the Place Royale, where he would march slowly around the square under the arcades. Everyone stopped to watch as he walked by, slow and grave, like a ghost of the previous century. The two ministers, who stood in each other's presence for the first time, resembled the eagle each had taken as his symbol: Aquila in Nubibus, the eagle in the clouds, who ruled all he surveyed while hidden in the heights, was an apt representation of the minister who was all things to Louis XIII, his king; while on the other side, Quo Jussa Jovis, the eagle casting lightning at the behest of Henri IV, described Sully as that king's strong but obedient right arm. (Readers who already know these historical facts may complain that these are unnecessary details that just get in the way of the picturesque and the novel. Such readers are welcome to pass over these details but we include them for those unfamiliar with history or for those who, attracted by the ambitious title of this historical romance, hope to learn something from it.) Richelieu, who was relatively young compared to Sully – the cardinal was only forty-two, while Sully was sixty-eight – approached the old friend of Henri IV with the respect due to both age and reputation. Sully gestured toward a chair, and Richelieu sat in it. The proud old man, familiar with the etiquette of courts, appreciated this. "Sir Duke," said the cardinal, smiling, "does my visit surprise you?"

"I admit," Sully replied, with his typical bluntness, "that it is unexpected."

"But why, Sir Duke? All ministers who work or have worked for the benefit of posterity – and we are among them – are dedicated to the happiness, glory, and greatness of the kingdom of France which they serve. Why shouldn't I, who humbly serve the son, seek out the support, advice, and knowledge of one who so nobly served the father?"

"Who remembers the services of one who is no longer able to serve?" Sully asked bitterly. "The old, dead tree is no good even for firewood, not worth the trouble to put it out of its misery."

"Ah but wood in decay can shine at night, Sir Duke, when living wood is lost in darkness. But I accept the comparison because you are still an oak, thank God and I hope the birds who sing in your branches are the birds of memory."

"Yes, they told me you wrote poetry, Sir Cardinal," Sully said disdainfully.

"I do, Sir Duke, in my spare time but not for myself. I study poetry, not to be a poet but so I can judge poems fairly and reward poets as they deserve."

"In my time," said Sully, "gentlemen did not bother with such things."

"Your time, sir," replied Richelieu, "was a glorious time, when they fought battles such as Coutras, Arques, Ivry, and Fontaine-Française. It was the time when the old policy of François I and Henri II, that is, opposition to the House of Austria, was taken up once more, a policy of which you were one of the leading supporters."

"Over which I quarrelled with the queen mother."

"That policy established French influence in Italy," the cardinal continued without seeming to notice the interruption, though he took careful note of it. "It brought us Savoy, Bresse, Bugey, and Valromey. It supported the Dutch revolt against Spain and encouraged the Lutherans in Germany against the Catholics. You were the instigator of the latter effort that aimed to create a sort of Christian Republic in which all disputes would be resolved in a congress, a body where all sects would meet on an equal footing, and the estates confiscated by Emperor Mathias might be restored to their rightful heirs."

"Yes, and it was amid these glorious efforts that the assassin struck down the king."

Richelieu noted this second interruption as he had the first, intending to return to both matters but for now he continued: "In such glorious days one has little time for literature, for it wasn't under Caesar that Horace and Virgil were born, or rather it wasn't Julius who was their Caesar but Augustus. I admire your generals and your ministers, Monsieur de Sully but do not disdain my poets. The generals and ministers make empires great but it's the poets who kindle a civilization's lights. The future and the past are both dark as night, and only the poets brighten them. Ask now who were Augustus's generals and ministers, and the only one anyone can name is Agrippa. Ask who were the protégés of Augustus's friend Maecenas, and we remember Virgil, Horace, Varius, Tibullus ... even those exiled by Augustus included the immortal Ovid. I can't be an Agrippa, or even a Sully, so let me be Maecenas."

Sully looked with astonishment at this man who had twenty times the authority Sully had known but had come to remind him of his days of power and glory while sitting at the feet of their former master. He drew his toothpick from his beard and slid it between his teeth that were as sound as those of a much younger man, and said, "Very well, you may have your poets, though I'm not sure their works are quite the marvels you say."

"Monsieur de Sully," said Richelieu, "when was it you planted the elms that today shade our roads?"

"Monsieur le Cardinal," said Sully, "that would have been from 1598 through 1604, so twenty-four years ago."

"Are they as beautiful and strong today as the day you planted them?"

"They were well planted and well grown, my elms."

"I know there were people who mistook your intentions and chopped some down, blind to the provident hand of the great man who was sowing shade for the aid of weary travellers. But the ones that survived, they've grown tall, spread their branches, flourished their leaves?"

"In fact, they have," Sully said proudly; "and when I see them so strong, so healthy, so green, I'm almost consoled for the ones that were struck down."

"That's how it is, Monsieur de Sully, with me and my poets. The critics may tear one down but they exalt another, and those who remain grow ever stronger and more fruitful. Today I planted an elm named Rotrou; tomorrow I will likely plant an oak called Corneille. I water them and wait. I can't say which ones would have flourished under your reign: Desmarests, Bois-Robert, Mairet, Voiture, Chapelain, Gombauld, Baro, Raissiguier, La Morelle, and Grand-champ – I couldn't say. It's not my fault if some grow into briars rather than a forest."

"Yes, yes, yes," said Sully. "The greatest labourers – and they say you do know how to work, Monsieur le Cardinal – need such distractions in their spare time. It's no worse, I suppose, than gardening."

"May God bless my garden, Monsieur de Sully, and make it one for the ages."

"But I don't imagine," said Sully, "that you got up at five in the morning to come pay me compliments and tell me all about your poets."

"First of all, I didn't get up at five in the morning," said the cardinal, smiling, "as I haven't yet been to bed. Perhaps in your time you got to sleep late, Monsieur de Sully, although you did work late. In my time, we don't sleep at all. No, I didn't come to pay you compliments and tell you about my poets. But the opportunity arose, and I was careful not to let it escape. In fact, Monsieur, I came to speak with you about two things you first brought up yourself."

"I brought up two things myself?"

"Yes."

"But I haven't said anything!"

"Begging your pardon but when I mentioned your efforts against Austria and Spain, you said, 'Over which I quarrelled with the queen mother.'"

"That's true. For isn't she Austrian by her mother Jeanne, and Spanish by her uncle Charles V?"

"Exactly – but it was because of you, Monsieur de Sully, that she became Queen of France."

"And I was wrong to advise that course to my august master, King Henri IV. Since then, many times, I have repented it."

"Well, today I fight the same struggle you faced twenty years ago, one to which you succumbed. And I may yet succumb in my turn, for I have two queens opposing me, the young and the old."

"Fortunately," Sully said, grinning and chewing his toothpick, "this time it's not the younger who has the more influence. King Henri IV loved too well but his son doesn't love much at all." "Have you ever thought, Sir Duke, about this difference between the father and the son?"

Sully looked quizzically at Richelieu, as if to say "Are you serious?" Then he said, with a strange accent, "The difference between father and son? Yes, I have thought about it, and often."

"You recall the father: all activity, riding twenty miles on horseback by day and then playing tennis in the evening, consulting with ministers and receiving ambassadors as he walked, busy from morning till night, playing to win, cheating when he lost without the slightest remorse, then generously returning his ill-gotten gains. Hurt by slights but reacting with a smile, though his smile was never far from tears. Never doing anything with half a heart, even if his whims led him to mad caprices. Deceiving women but honouring them. He was born with the heaven-sent gift of loving, that same gift that made Saint Theresa weep for Satan, who could only hate."

"Did you know King Henri IV?" Sully asked in surprise.

"I saw him once or twice in my youth," Richelieu said, "that's all. But I have made him my special study. In contrast to him, behold his son: slow as an old man, dour as the dying, standing rather than walking, gazing out a window, looking without seeing. He moves like an automaton, games without caring if he wins, though hating to lose. Sleeping long, crying little, loving nothing and, worst of all, no one."

"I understand," said Sully. "Over a man like that, you can have little influence."

"If I do, it's because, despite all this, he has two virtues: pride in the monarchy and a jealous sensitivity to the honour of France. These are the two spurs with which I drive him. And they would be enough if it were not for his mother, always defending Spain and promoting Austria, though I, pursuing the policy of the great King Henri and his minister Sully, want only to oppose these two eternal enemies of France. So I come to you, my master, whom I study and admire, especially in financial matters, to ask for your aid against that evil genius who was your enemy then and is mine today."

"And how can I help you," Sully asked, "you, who are more powerful than the king?"

"You said it was amid your glorious campaign that the assassin struck down the king."

"Did I say assassin or assassins?"

"You said assassin."

Sully paused.

"So," Richelieu continued, drawing his chair closer to Sully's, "recall if you can all your memories of that fateful May 14, and tell me what warnings you had in advance."

"We had many warnings but unfortunately we paid little attention to them. When men trust in Providence, they let their wits sleep. However, as I see it King Henri committed two key indiscretions."

"What were those?"

"He promised Pope Paul V he would restore the Jesuits to favour but when the Pope pressed him to comply, he refused, saying, 'If I had two lives, I would gladly give one to satisfy Your Holiness but as I have only one, I must preserve it for your service and for the sake of my subjects.' The second mistake was to insult Concino Concini, the queen's favourite, in open Parliament. When her gallant cavalier, a man who set fashions, won tournaments, and eclipsed even the princes, was insulted before mere men of the robe, she took it as a personal affront and vowed revenge – an Italian vendetta, no less. After that, she closed her heart to the king."

"The warnings that were ignored," Richelieu asked: "were any of them delivered by a woman named the Dame de Coëtman?"

Sully started. "Yes, in fact," he said. "But they weren't the only ones. There was a man named Lagarde in the Hébert household in Naples who warned the king that d'Épermon plotted to assassinate him. There was a certain Labrosse, whom we never found, who warned Monsieur de Vendôme on that May morning that a transition from 13 to 14 would be fatal to the king. I don't know if you've considered the influence of the number 14 on the birth, life, and death of King Henri IV."

"No," replied Richelieu, loosening the reins to let Sully run to his goal.

"Then listen," said that supreme calculator, who had reduced everything to the science of numbers. "First: King Henri IV was born fourteen centuries, fourteen decades, and fourteen years after the nativity of Our Lord Jesus. Second: his first day was December 14 and his last May 14. Third: there were fourteen letters in his name, Henri de Navarre. Fourth: he lived four times fourteen years, four times fourteen days and fourteen weeks. Fifth: he was wounded by Jean Chatel in fifteen-ninety-four, fourteen days after December fourteenth, between which and the time of his death was fourteen years, fourteen months, and fourteen times five days. Sixth: he won the Battle of Ivry on March 14. Seventh: Monsieur le Dauphin, who is now the reigning king, was baptized on August 14. Eighth: the king was killed on May fourteenth, fourteen centuries and fourteen lustrums since the incarnation. Ninth: Ravillac was executed fourteen days after the king's death. Tenth and finally: one hundred fifteen times fourteen is sixteen-ten, the year in which he died."

"Yes," said Richelieu, "that is both curious and strange. But everyone has a magic number. This Dame de Coëtman," he continued, "Did she not also address you directly, Sir Duke?"

Sully looked down. "Even the best and most devoted have their blind spots. I did mention her to the king. But the king just shrugged and said, 'What would you have, Rosny' – he continued to use my birth name though he'd made me Duke de Sully – 'What would you have, Rosny? It's all in God's hands.'"

"This warning came in the form of a letter, did it not, Sir Duke?"

"Yes."

"To whom was this letter addressed?"

"To me, to be passed on to the king."

"Who did it come from?"

"From the Dame de Coëtman."

"Did another copy come from another woman?"

"From Miss de Gournay."

"Then I must ask you, Sir Duke – and I do so in the name and the honour of France..."

Sully nodded, indicating that he was ready to answer. "... This letter, why did you not pass it on to the king?"

"Because it openly accused Queen Marie de Médicis, Épermon, and Concini."

"This letter, Sir Duke – did you keep it?"

"No, I gave it up."

"May I ask to whom?"

"To the one who brought it – to Miss de Gournay."

"Do you have any reluctance, Sir Duke, to write me the following note: 'Miss de Gournay is authorised to deliver to Monsieur le Cardinal de Richelieu the letter sent on May 11, 1610, from the Dame de Coëtman to the Duke de Sully'?"

"No, if Miss de Gournay refuses you. But she won't, as she is poor and in need, so it's unlikely you'll need my authorisation."

"But if I do?"

"Send me a messenger and he'll return with the note."

"Now, one final matter, Monsieur de Sully, and you will have earned my heartfelt gratitude."

Sully bowed.

"In the house of Joly de Fleury, at the corner of Rue Saint-Honoré and Rue des Bons-Enfants, behind a brick in the wall, was hidden the process verbal of Ravallac to Parliament."

"No: that document had been kept in the Palais de Justice, where it was destroyed in a fire. What Joly de Fleury had was the statement Ravallac dictated at the scaffold, in between the tongs and the molten lead."

"That statement is no longer in the Fleury family's hands."

"It was, in fact, given up by Monsieur de Fleury before he died."

"You know that for certain?" asked Richelieu.

"Yes."

"You know it!" he cried, unable to suppress a gesture of joy. "So, then, you can tell me where it is? This sheet, it would be my saving grace. It is nothing less than the glory, the grandeur, and the honour of France – it is everything! In the name of Heaven, tell me I may have it."

"Impossible."

"Impossible? Why?"

"I have sworn a vow."

The cardinal rose. "If the Duke de Sully has sworn a vow, then I must honour the oath of the Duke de Sully. But in truth," he said, "this may be fatal for France." And without attempting to appeal to Sully by so much as a single word, he bowed deeply, receiving from the old minister in return a polite but moderate salute, and withdrew, beginning to doubt in that Providence that Father Joseph had promised would help him.

The Cardinal in his Dressing Gown

At about seven in the morning, the cardinal returned to his house in the Place Royale and discharged his chair porters who found themselves well paid and were therefore satisfied with their night. He slept for two hours and then went down to his study, in his dressing gown and slippers, at about 9:30. This office, where he worked 12 to 14 hours a day, was the centre of Richelieu's world. He broke for lunch with his confessor, along with his cronies, clowns, and hangers-on. Then back to his study, where he would nap on his couch that was as large as a bed, when politics kept him too long at his desk. He usually had dinner with his niece. No one was allowed in his study that was full of state secrets, unless Richelieu was there, the exception being Charpentier, his secretary, whom he trusted as he did himself. Once inside, Charpentier would unlock all the connecting doors, except for the one which led to Marion Delorme's house, of which only Richelieu had the key. Cavois had been indiscreet enough to say that sometimes, instead of going up to sleep in his bedchamber, the cardinal would rest in his clothes on the couch in his office. And once, during the night, Cavois had heard the cardinal conversing with someone else, a voice he'd recognised as a woman's. Word quickly got around, and the gossips all said that the woman had to be Marion Delorme, who was barely eighteen and was then in the flower of her youthful beauty. She was said to pass through the wall like a fairy, or like a sylph through a keyhole, and to talk with the cardinal about matters that had nothing to do with politics. But no one had ever actually seen her within the cardinal's house. However, we who have entered the notorious office and know all its secrets are already aware that it had a private mailbox which the cardinal used to correspond with his beautiful neighbour. Marion Delorme had no need to come to the cardinal, nor the cardinal to go to Marion. That day, he seems to have had something to tell her, for upon entering his study he wrote two lines on a piece of paper, opened the near side of the private mailbox, slipped the sheet within, rang the bell, and closed his door. This sheet, as we can report to our readers, from whom we have nothing to hide, contained the following question: "How many times in the last week has the Count de Moret visited Madam de la Montagne? Is he faithful or unfaithful? In short, what do we know about him?"

It was signed, as usual, "Armand." However, both handwriting and signature were disguised, and had nothing in common with the handwriting and signature of the great minister.

Then he called Charpentier and asked who was waiting in the antechamber. "The Reverend Father Mulot, Monsieur de Lafollone, and Monsieur de Bois-Robert," the secretary replied.

"Very well," said Richelieu, "have them come in."

We've said that the cardinal usually had lunch with his confessor, his cronies, clowns, and hangers-on, and perhaps our readers were surprised to find His Eminence's confessor in such company but Father Mulot wasn't one of these stuffy clerics who burdened his penitents with litanies of pater nosters and ave marias.

No, Father Mulot was, above all else, the cardinal's friend. Eleven years earlier, after the assassination of the Maréchal d'Ancre, Concino Concini, when the queen mother was exiled to Blois and the young Richelieu, who was then Bishop of Luçon, to Avignon, Father Mulot had done something extraordinary. Either out of friendship for Richelieu or from confidence in his genius to come, Mulot had sold everything he owned, raising three or four thousand crowns, then brought all this money and placed it in the hands of the cardinal-to-be. Thereafter, he became one of Richelieu's closest and most outspoken advisers. And he was a good courtier, though on the subject of bad honey he was quite insufferable. One day while dining at the house of Monsieur d'Alaincourt, the Governor of Lyon, he was outraged by the honey that was put before them. He called over the servant who'd brought it, grabbed him by the ear, and said, "My friend, only a scoundrel would serve such honey to his master. Maybe he doesn't know any better but I do, so take away this swill and bring us some decent honey."

As an enthusiast of the vine, the worthy chaplain had earned a nose like that of Bardolph, the jolly companion of England's Henry V, so red it could almost serve as a lantern. One day, when he was still Bishop of Luçon, Richelieu was trying on some beaver hats, and asked Father Mulot what he thought. "Do you think this one suits me?" he asked.

"It would match your robes better, Your Grandeur," Bois-Robert had interrupted, "if it was the same colour as your confessor's nose."

The stalwart Mulot had never forgiven Bois-Robert this little jest. The second guest waiting on the cardinal was a gentleman of Touraine named Lafollone. He was a sort of watchdog the king had given the cardinal to make sure no one bothered him unnecessarily or disturbed him with trivial matters. This Lafollone was as great an eater as Mulot was a drinker, and to watch the one drink and the other eat was one of the cardinal's daily amusements. Indeed, Lafollone thought of nothing but the table. When others said it was a good day for a walk, a nice day for a hunt, or good weather for a swim, he always replied that it was a good day to eat. The cardinal had other guardians but with Lafollone around he never needed a taster. The third guest, or rather the third person waiting on the cardinal, was François Le Métel de Bois-Robert, one of his literary collaborators as well as his jester. Though no one could say why, Bois-Robert was always irritable. He had come from Rouen, where he'd been a lawyer but had left that city after having been accused by a woman of fathering her two children. Upon arriving in Paris, he first attached himself to Cardinal du Perron but then decided he'd rather enter the service of Cardinal Richelieu. But, as we said, he was an irritable man, whose tongue was sharp when he wasn't accorded the respect he thought he deserved. "Eh, Monsieur," he said one day to the cardinal, "you let dogs eat the crumbs from your table. Am I worse than a dog?"

This humility disarmed the cardinal, who took Bois-Robert into his friendship, and soon found he couldn't do without him. When the cardinal was in a good mood, he called him Le Bois for short, repeating a joke made by Monsieur de Châteauneuf about the wood that comes from Normandy. Bois-Robert was the cardinal's morning paper: thanks to him, the cardinal knew everything that was happening in the republic of letters he was nurturing. Bois-Robert, who had a great heart beneath his prickly exterior, guided the cardinal's hand in his efforts as a patron of the arts, sometimes even forcing that hand to open when it was clenched due to hostility or jealousy. Bois-Robert, in his way, helped Richelieu rise above hostility, and convinced him that the powerful should put themselves beyond jealousy. One understands how, given the eternal tension of politics, the continual threat of conspiracy, and his endless struggle against the enemies who surrounded him, the cardinal needed from time to time to escape into levity. It was almost, for him, a matter of mental health: for the bow that is strung too tight can break. It was especially after nights like the one he'd just endured that the cardinal sought the company of these three, who afforded him a few moments of rest from his duties, his cares, and his labours. Moreover, besides the tales he anticipated from the witty and energetic Bois-Robert, he hoped to be able to learn from him where he could find what remained of the former Demoiselle de Gournay. As soon as his letter to Marion Delorme was deposited in their private mailbox, as we've said, he ordered Charpentier to admit his three guests. Charpentier opened the door. Bois-Robert and Lafollone deferred to each other, each desiring the other to enter first but Mulot, who seemed to be in a bad mood, pushed both aside and entered before them. He had a letter in his hand. "Oh, ho!" said the cardinal. "What have you there, my dear abbot?"

"What have I here?" Mulot cried, stamping his foot. "What I have here makes me furious!"

"And why is that?"

"Those who wrote this will never write me another!"

"Who?"

"The ones who write to me on your behalf!"

"Good God! What have they put in this letter?"

"What's in the letter is not the problem. In fact, for a letter from some of your people, it's quite polite for a change."

"What's the problem, then?"

"The way it's addressed! You know perfectly well I'm your confessor, not your almoner, since if I ever consent to be someone's almoner, it'll be for someone more important than you. I'm a Canon of Sainte-Chappelle!"

"So, how was this addressed?"

"They wrote: To Monsieur Mulot, Almoner to His Eminence – the dolts!"

"Well," said the cardinal, laughing, as he'd expected some such response, "what if it was me who addressed the letter?"

"If it was you, then I am astonished. Though it wouldn't be, God knows, the first nonsense you've ever perpetrated."

"It's good to know just what sort of thing irritates you."

"This doesn't irritate me; it infuriates me!"

"All the better!"

"Why all the better?"

"Because you're so amusing when you're angry. And since I love to see you angry, I will address you from now on as Monsieur Mulot, Almoner to His Eminence."

"Just try it, and you'll see."

"I'll see what?"

"You'll see me leave you to eat lunch by yourself."

"I'll just send Cavois to fetch you."

"I'll refuse to eat."

"He'll force you to eat."

"I won't drink, either."

"He'll shove bottles of Romanée, Clos-Vougeot, and Chambertin right up your nose."

"Quiet, you!" Mulot cried, overwhelmed with fury and advancing on the cardinal with clenched fists. "You, why, I'll tell the world you're a – a terrible man!"

"Mulot! Mulot!" The cardinal was overcome with laughter at Mulot, who was beside himself. "Take care, or you'll find yourself hanged!"

"Hanged? On what pretext?"

"On the pretext that you reveal the secrets of the confessional!"

The other guests burst out laughing as Mulot tore the letter in pieces and threw them into the fire. During this incident, the servants had brought in a table already set. "Ah, let's find out what's for lunch," said Lafollone, "and see if there's anything that will tempt a gentleman who's already had an excellent breakfast." Raising the covers of the dishes one after another, he said, "Ah-ha! White capons royale, a sausage of plovers and larks, two roasted woodcocks, mushrooms stuffed with Provençale crayfish à la Bordeaux – one could have lunch with that, in a pinch."

"Eh, for the love of God!" Mulot said. "As to food, there will always be plenty of that. Everyone knows the cardinal indulges in all the mortal sins, especially gluttony but let's see what he has to offer us in the way of honey. Hmm, a Bouzy red, a Bordeaux grand cru – excellent for those who suffer from stomach-ache, like all the honey of Bordeaux. Long live the honey of Burgundy! A Pommard, a windmill ... could be better, I suppose but it will do."

"So, abbot, for lunch we have champagne, Bordeaux, burgundy, and that isn't enough for you?"

"I'm not saying it isn't enough," Mulot said in a conciliatory tone; "I'm just saying the choices could be better."

"Are you lunching with us, Le Bois?" asked the cardinal.

"Your Eminence will excuse me. You asked me to come by this morning but said nothing of lunch, so I've already eaten with Racan, whom I met sitting with his heels up on the corner of Rue Vieille-du-Temple and Rue Saint-Antoine."

"The devil you say! Come to the table, Mulot, take a seat, Lafollone, be quiet and listen, as Monsieur Le Bois is going to regale us with some pretty tale."

"The tale, the tale," Lafollone said. "I'm not the one to interrupt you."

"I raise this glass of Pommard to your tale, Master Le Bois," said Mulot, still a trifle cross. "I hope this one is better than usual."

"I'm not here to amuse you," said Bois-Robert. "I speak only the truth."

"The truth," said the cardinal, "is that it's just like you to be sitting with your heels up on a street corner at half past eight in the morning!"

"My Lord shall judge for himself. Your Eminence knows that Malherbe lives not a hundred paces from here, in the Rue des Tournelles."

"I'm aware of that," said the cardinal who ate very little because of his bad stomach, and thus could talk while eating.

"Well! It seems that last night he was carousing with Ivrande and Racan at his place, and all three ended up sleeping, dead drunk, in Malherbe's bedchamber. Racan is the first to awaken – he had business at an early hour. He gets up and puts on Ivrande's trunk-hose for trousers without noticing the mistake, puts on Ivrande's shoes into the bargain, washes his face, and leaves. Five minutes later Ivrande wakes up and can't find his shoes. 'Mordieu!' he says to Malherbe. 'I'll bet that absent-minded Racan took them!' So Ivrande puts on Malherbe's breeches, despite the poet's protests from his bed, and races off after Racan, whom he can see going down the street in clothes far too large for him. Ivrande catches up to Racan and demands the return of his clothes. 'My faith, you're right!' Racan tells him. And without further ado, as I've had the honour to tell Your Eminence, he sits down on the corner of Rue Saint-Antoine and Rue Vieille-du-Temple, in the view of all the passers-by of Paris, takes off his pants and shoes and trades them with Ivrande. I arrived right about then and offered to buy Racan some lunch. At first he refused, saying he'd risen early because he had a matter of utmost importance to attend to; but when he tried to remember what it was, it slipped his mind entirely. It wasn't until we were almost finished with lunch that he slapped his forehead and said, 'Oh, now I remember what I had to do.'"

"And what was that?" asked the cardinal who took the greatest pleasure in Bois-Robert's stories as usual.

"He'd planned to go inquire about the health of Madam the Marquis of Rambouillet who had come down with a fever since the misfortune that occurred to the Marquis de Pisany."

"Indeed," the cardinal said, "I heard from my niece that she was quite ill – as you probably already know, Le Bois. Please check on her if you pass by her house."

"My Lord."

"No need? Why?"

"Because she has recovered."

"Recovered! Who treated her?"

"Voiture."

"Bah. Since when is he a doctor?"

"Never, My Lord but Your Eminence knows that you don't need a doctor to cure a fever."

"How's that?"

"All you need are two bears."

"What? Two bears?"

"Quite so. Our friend Voiture heard that you could cure a person of fever by giving them a great surprise, so he went out into the streets looking for something Madam de Rambouillet would find surprising. That's where he encountered a travelling animal show. 'For the love of God!' he said. 'That's just the thing.' He hired this Savoyard and his animals and led them to the Hotel de Rambouillet. The marquise was within, sitting by the fire behind a folding screen. Voiture entered quietly, bringing the bears in behind the screen, and sat them up in two chairs behind the marquise. Madam de Rambouillet heard snuffling behind her, turned around, and saw two beastly snouts in her face. She nearly died of fright but the fever was broken."

"A fine story!" said the cardinal. "What do you think, Mulot?"

"I think that in the eyes of God, all means are good," said the chaplain.

Honey tended to bring out the religion in him, as it put him in a state of grace. "God? You backwoods preacher! You'd put God into the low company of Voiture, a Savoyard, and two bears, all in Madam de Rambouillet's parlour?"

"God is everywhere," the chaplain said beatifically, raising his eyes, and his glass, to heaven. "But you, My Lord – you don't believe in God!"

"What?" the cardinal cried. "I, not believe in God?"

"Are you telling me now that you do believe?" the priest said, regarding the cardinal with a pair of small black eyes illuminated by his nose.

"Of course I believe!"

"Come now, in your last confession you admitted you didn't believe."

"Lafollone! Le Bois! Don't believe a word of what Mulot says. He's so drunk he confuses a confession with a test of conscience," the cardinal cried, laughing. "Are you nearly finished, Lafollone?"

"I am done, My Lord."

"Good. Once you're finished, say your goodbyes and leave us alone. I have to charge Le Bois with a secret commission."

"And I, My Lord," said Le Bois, "have a small petition to present to you."

"Yet another protégé?"

"Say, rather, a protégée, My Lord: a lady."

"Le Bois! You go too far, my friend."

"Oh, My Lord! She's seventy years old!"

"And what does this protégée do?"

"She writes verses, My Lord."

"Verses?"

"Yes, and they're quite beautiful! Would you like to hear them?"

"No, they would put Mulot to sleep and give Lafollone indigestion."

"Please? Just four?"

"Oh, well – four should be no problem."

"Here, My Lord," said Bois-Robert, and he presented the cardinal with an engraving of Joan of Arc.

"But this is an engraving," said the cardinal, "and you spoke of verses."

"Read what is below the engraving, My Lord."

"Ah! Very well." The cardinal read the following four lines:

Can you grant me, Virgin adored,
Both your sweet eyes and the shining sword?
My sight is sweetest when I see my kingdom,
And my sword in fury shall give her Freedom!

"Well, well," said the cardinal, and he read the lines again. "They're quite good, these lines. Proud and powerful. Who wrote them?"

"Read the author's name – it's written below, My Lord."

"Marie Le Jars, Demoiselle de Gournay. What!" the cardinal cried. "These lines are by Miss de Gournay?"

"By Miss de Gournay, yes, My Lord."

"The same Miss de Gournay who published a volume titled The Shadow?"

"Yes, the one who published The Shadow."

"But she's the exact person I planned to send you to, Le Bois."

"Really!"

"Take my carriage and bring her to me."

"More down-at-heels wretches!" said Mulot. "If you send him chasing after every luckless poet, it will kill My Lord's horses."

"Monsieur Abbot," said Bois-Robert, "God created lord's horses to be used, just as he did almoners of Sainte-Chapelle."

"Ha! For once you have him, friend," Richelieu laughed, while Mulot sputtered, speechless.

But the chaplain pulled himself together. "I am not the cardinal's almoner!" he cried, exasperated.

"The Demoiselle de Gournay is already here," Bois-Robert said.

"What? The Demoiselle de Gournay is here?" asked the cardinal.

"Yes. I expected, this morning, to solicit a favour for her from Your Eminence. Knowing My Lord's generosity, I was sure you would grant it, so I asked her to come here between ten o'clock and ten-thirty. So she must be waiting."

"Le Bois, you're a gem of a man. Come, Father, one last glass. Lafollone, one more spoonful of the confit and then say grace. I must give an audience to Miss de Gournay, who is a noble lady and the adopted daughter of Montaigne."

Lafollone beatifically crossed his hands on his belly and raised his eyes devoutly to heaven. "Lord God," he said, "please grant us the grace to digest this good lunch upon which we have dined so well." This was what the cardinal called Lafollone's grace. "And now, Gentlemen," said the cardinal, "you may leave."

Lafollone and Mulot both rose at this dismissal, Lafollone beaming, Mulot still surly, and made for the door. Lafollone rolled out, saying, "Decidedly, His Eminence spreads an excellent lunch."

Mulot, staggering like Silenus, raised his hands to heaven and sputtered, "A cardinal who doesn't believe in God! It's an abomination!"

As for Bois-Robert, he had already left His Eminence's office, eager to announce his good news to his protégée. For a moment, the cardinal was alone. But this was enough time for him to arrange his angular features, though his eyes remained thoughtful in his pale, severe face. "Ravaillac's statement still exists," he whispered. "Sully knows who has it. And, oh – I too shall know!" And as Bois-Robert returned, leading the Demoiselle de Gournay by the hand, a smile, an unusual sight on his sombre countenance, appeared momentarily on his lips.

As we have said, the Demoiselle de Gournay was a spinster, born in the mid-sixteenth century. She was of a good family from Picardy. At the age of nineteen she had read, and been amazed by, Montaigne's Essays. She decided she had to meet the author. At that very time, Montaigne came to Paris. She quickly found out his address and sent him a letter of greeting, in which she declared her high esteem for him and his book. Montaigne came to see her the next day and was so taken with her youth and enthusiasm that he offered to regard her as a father does a daughter, an offer she gratefully accepted. From that day forward, she added to her signature, "Adopted Daughter of Montaigne."

She wrote fairly good verse, as we have seen. But she had fallen into a state of misery and starvation by the time Bois-Robert, who was known as the Angel of Afflicted Muses, learned of her distress and decided to present her to Cardinal Richelieu. Bois-Robert had seen the power of the cardinal, and he'd told her "To be blessed in this world by My Lord le Cardinal is nearly as good as to be blessed in the next by Our Lord Jesus Christ."

Bois-Robert didn't hesitate to introduce his protégée to the Place Royale, and by a strange coincidence he'd brought her to the cardinal's waiting room on the very day His Eminence meant to send him to summon her. The needy spinster was punctual, as if having been warned of the habits of the cardinal. So it was, as we've said, that he received her with a smile and, knowing literary Paris as he did, added an à propos compliment about her book, The Shadow. But the lady, unabashed, said, “You laugh at a poor old woman – but I suppose a genius must laugh, and who in all the world would begrudge you entertainment?”

The cardinal, astonished at such humility combined with presence of mind, was moved to apologise. Then, turning to Bois-Robert, he said, “Come, Le Bois, what you would ask of us for Miss de Gournay?”

“It is not for me to set bounds on Your Eminence’s generosity,” said Bois-Robert with a bow.

“Well, then,” said the cardinal, “I shall grant her a pension of two hundred crowns.”

That was a great deal at the time, especially for a poor spinster. Two hundred crowns in that period were twelve hundred livres, equal to four to five thousand francs in our time.

The Demoiselle de Gournay made a gesture of gratitude and began to utter her thanks but Bois-Robert, who was not yet satisfied, interrupted her in mid-sentence. “My Lord said two hundred crowns?”

“Yes,” said the cardinal.

“That’s all very well for her, My Lord, and thank you. But Miss de Gournay has dependents.”

“Ah, she has servants?” said the cardinal.

“Yes, a daughter of the nobility cannot serve herself. My Lord understands that.”

“I do indeed. And how many domestics does Miss de Gournay have?”

The cardinal was determined to meet if not exceed whatever Bois-Robert asked for. “Well, she has Miss Jamyn,” replied Bois-Robert.

“Oh! Monsieur Bois-Robert,” murmured the spinster, “please don’t take liberties with the cardinal’s charity.”

“Trust me, trust me,” said Bois-Robert, “I know His Eminence.”

“And who is this Miss Jamyn?” asked the cardinal.

“The illegitimate child of Amadis Jamyn, and Miss de Gournay thanks you on her behalf,” said the persistent muse. “But there is also darling Piaillon.”

“Darling Piaillon?” asked the cardinal while poor Miss de Gournay desperately gestured at Bois-Robert to stop, signals which Bois-Robert ignored.

“Darling Piaillon. Your Eminence doesn’t know darling Piaillon?”

“I must admit I do not, Le Bois.”

“But that is Miss de Gournay’s cat.”

“My Lord!” cried the poor spinster. “I must apologise!”

The cardinal waved his hand reassuringly. “I grant darling Piaillon an annual pension of twenty pounds, on the condition she be served tripe often.”

“Tripe it shall be, even à la mode de Caen, if Your Eminence demands it.”

“Thank you on behalf of my darling Piaillon,” said Miss de Gournay, “but ...”

“What, Le Bois?” said the cardinal who couldn’t help laughing, “There is a ‘but’?”

“There is, My Lord. For darling Piaillon has just had kittens.”

“Oh!” said the Demoiselle de Gournay, chagrined and rubbing one hand over the other.

“How many kittens?” asked the cardinal.

“Five!” said Bois-Robert.

“My!” said the cardinal. “Darling Piaillon is fruitful. No matter, Le Bois, I add a pistole for each kitten.”

“And now, Miss de Gournay,” said Bois-Robert, delighted, “I permit you to thank His Eminence.”

“Not yet, not yet,” said the cardinal. “It’s too soon for Miss de Gournay to thank me, as I hope to soon be thanking her.”

“What?” said Bois-Robert.

“Leave us alone, Le Bois. I have a favour to ask of Miss.”

Bois-Robert gazed in surprise, first at the cardinal, then at Miss de Gournay. “Oh, I see what’s in your mind, Master Droll,” said the cardinal. “But if I hear any remarks from you about Miss de Gournay’s honour, you’ll have me to deal with. Await Miss in the antechamber.” Bois-Robert bowed and left. He had no idea what this was about. The cardinal waited until the door was closed before approaching Miss de Gournay who had no more idea than Bois-Robert what he had in mind. “Yes, Miss,” he said, “I have a favour to ask of you.”

“What is it, My Lord?” the poor spinster asked.

“I need you to recall some memories. I’m sure it will be easy, for you have a good memory, don’t you?”

“Excellent, My Lord, as long as we don’t go back too far.”

“What I’d like to ask you about is something, or rather two things, that happened between May ninth and eleventh in sixteen-ten.”

Miss started at that date, and looked anxiously at the cardinal. “May ninth to eleventh,” she repeated. “May ninth and eleventh in sixteen-ten – that is to say, the year they assassinated our poor dear King Henri IV, the Beloved.”

“Exactly, Miss. And the question I need to ask you relates to his death.”

Miss de Gournay said nothing but her anxiety increased.

“Don’t be upset, Miss,” said Richelieu. “My investigation doesn’t concern you and yours, only your devotion to the truth. The awards that Bois-Robert has solicited for you are not in question, for what I’ve granted you is far below your merit.”

“You must pardon me, My Lord,” said the poor spinster, “for I don’t understand.”

“Two words will make you understand. You knew a woman named Jacqueline Le Voyer, Dame de Coëtman, did you not?”

Miss de Gournay started and turned pale. “Yes,” she said. “She was from the same province as I. But thirty years my junior, if yet she lives.”

“I believe it was on the 9th or 10th of May, I’m not sure which, that she sent a letter addressed to Monsieur de Sully, to be given to the king.”

“Yes, it was on May tenth, my Lord.”

“You know what was in that letter?”

“It was a warning that the king would be assassinated.”

“The letter named the conspirators?”

“Yes, My Lord,” the Demoiselle de Gournay said, trembling.

“You remember whom the Dame de Coëtman denounced?”

“I remember.”

“Would you tell me their names?”

“This is a very grave matter you ask me about, My Lord.”

“Indeed it is. I’ll name them and be satisfied if you answer, yes or no, by a nod.” He paused. “Those named by the Dame de Coëtman were the queen mother, Concini the Maréchal d’Ancre, and the Duke d’Epernon.” The young lady de Gournay, more dead than alive, nodded her head in the affirmative. “That letter,” continued the cardinal, “you gave to Monsieur de Sully, who to the fatal harm of the king did not show it to him – but you felt you had done all you could.”

“That’s it exactly, My Lord,” said Miss de Gournay.

“This letter – you kept it?”

“Yes, My Lord, for only two people had the right to ask it of me: the Duke de Sully, to whom it was addressed, and the Dame de Coëtman, who had written it.”

“You never heard a word about this from the Duke de Sully?”

“No, My Lord.”

“Nor the Dame de Coëtman?”

“I heard she’d been arrested on the 13th. I haven’t seen her since and have no idea if she’s dead or alive.”

“So you have this letter?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Then I must ask, my dear Demoiselle, for you to give it up to me.”

“Impossible, My Lord,” said the Miss de Gournay with a firmness that, a moment before, would have seemed inconceivable.

“Why is that?”

“Because, as I’ve had the honour to tell Your Eminence a moment ago, only two people have a right to ask it of me: the Dame de Coëtman, who has been accused of complicity in this dark and terrible affair, and for whom it may serve as an exoneration; and Monsieur le Duke de Sully.”

“The Dame de Coëtman no longer needs exoneration, as she died last night between the hours of one and two in the morning, at the Convent of the Repentant Daughters.”

“God rest her soul,” said Miss de Gournay, crossing herself. “She was a martyr!”

“And as for the Duc de Sully,” continued the cardinal, “since he hasn’t cared about this letter for the last eighteen years, it’s unlikely he cares about it today.”

Miss de Gournay shook her head. “I can do nothing without the permission of Monsieur de Sully,” she said, “especially since the Dame de Coëtman is no longer of this world.”

“But suppose,” said Richelieu, “I said that the pensions I’ve granted you are the price of this letter?”

Miss de Gournay rose with supreme dignity. “My Lord,” she said, “I am a daughter of the nobility and therefore a gentlewoman, as you are a gentleman. I will starve to death if I must but I will do nothing to betray my conscience.”

“Daughter of the nobility, you shall not starve to death, nor need you do anything to betray your conscience,” said the cardinal, visibly pleased to see such courage in a poor writer of books. “I guarantee that Monsieur de Sully will give you the permission you require. You may go yourself to the Hotel de Sully, with my Captain of the Guards as your escort, if you wish.”

He called Cavois and Bois-Robert, who each entered through a different door. “Cavois,” he said, “take my carriage and drive Miss de Gournay to the home of Monsieur le Duke de Sully. Announce that you’ve come in my name and you’ll be admitted immediately. Then accompany her, again in the carriage, to her home, where she will give you a letter that you will bring directly to me.”

Then, addressing Bois-Robert, he said, “Le Bois, I hereby double the pensions of Miss de Gournay, of the bastard of Amadis Jamyn, of darling Piaillon, and of her kittens. Is that correct? Did I forget anyone?”

“No, My Lord,” said Bois-Robert, overcome with joy.

“Work it out with my treasurer so they will begin on first January sixteen-twenty-eight.”

“Ah! My Lord!” cried Miss de Gournay, seizing Richelieu’s hand and kissing it.

“It’s I who should kiss your hand, Miss,” said the cardinal.

“My Lord! My Lord!” said Miss de Gournay, clasping his hand in hers. “For an old woman of my age...!”

“A noble hand’s ever youthful,” said the cardinal. And he kissed her hand as earnestly as if she were a maid of 25. Then Miss de Gournay left with Cavois by one door, while Bois-Robert went out another.

Michel, called Souscarrières

"By God," said the cardinal, "he is a cunning rascal. Cavois! Cavois!"

His guard captain entered. "My Lord?"

"The man who brought this report, is he still here?"

"My Lord," Cavois replied, "Unless I'm mistaken, it is Monsieur de Souscarrières himself."

"Bring him in, my dear Cavois, bring him in."

As if the Lord de Souscarrières had anticipated this very invitation, he appeared at the office door, wearing an outfit simple yet elegant, and bowed deeply to the cardinal. "Come in, Monsieur Michel," said His Eminence.

"Here I am, My Lord," said Souscarrières.

"It was no mistake to place my trust in you. You're a clever man."

"If My Lord is pleased with me, I'm also a happy man."

"Quite pleased. But I don't like riddles, as I don't have time to solve them. How can you recount all my personal details so accurately?"

"My Lord," Souscarrières replied with a self-satisfied smile, "I had no doubt Your Eminence would personally avail himself of this new form of transport which you have authorised."

"So?"

"So I tarried in the Rue Royale until I saw His Eminence come out."

"And thereafter?"

"Thereafter, My Lord, the largest porter, who knocked on the convent door, who carried the Dame de Coëtman to the hearth, and so forth – that was me."

"My faith!" said the cardinal. "Is that so?"

PART IV

098

The King [Louis XIII] goes Larding

And now, for the purposes of our story, our readers must allow us to better acquaint them with King Louis XIII, whom we've only glimpsed at night in the queen's bedchamber, where he was driven by Cardinal Richelieu's suspicions that she might be plotting against him. We recall him announcing that, by order of Doctor Bouvard, he would be purged the next day and bled the day after that. He was purged, he was bled, and it made him neither happier nor healthier: on the contrary, his melancholy and his pallor had only increased. No one knew the cause of this melancholy, though it had afflicted the king since he was fourteen or fifteen. The mood drove him to try, one after another, every form of diversion or amusement he'd never tried before. Worse, in the middle of his crowded court he was virtually alone and friendless, accompanied only by his fool l'Angely, who always dressed in black that added to the general air of gloom. Nothing could be sadder than his lonely suite of rooms, where no woman ever entered, with the exception of Queen Anne and the queen mother, who did so only to keep him from coming to their own apartments. If you had an audience scheduled with him, upon arriving at the designated time, often you would be received first by Monsieur de Tréville, or Monsieur de Guitaut, or by Beringhen, who in his capacity as Premier Valet was known as "Monsieur le Premier." One or another of these gentlemen would introduce you into a seemingly empty chamber where you might look about and wonder if the king was there at all. Then you would notice him, standing in an embrasure and staring out the window, possibly with one of his gentlemen, whom he has honoured by saying, "Come, Monsieur So-and-So, let us be weary together." Anyone who heard the tone in which he said this knew he spoke with complete sincerity. More than once, the queen, trying to gain some leverage over this dreary personality and none too sure of being able to do it herself, had, on the advice of the queen mother, brought in a young beauty of whose loyalty she was certain in hopes that the girl might catch his eye, then exert some influence but always in vain. This was the king whom Luynes, after four years of marriage, had been forced to carry into his wife's bedchamber. This was a king whose favourites were always men, never women. The Italians thought they understood his preferences and summed him up with a phrase, La buggera ha passato i monti – that is, "Sodomy has come over the mountains." Even "La Irresistible," the stunning Madam de Chevreuse, had tried to catch his eye; but despite the triple allure of youth, beauty, and wit, she had failed.

"But Sire," she said to him one day, exasperated by his chilly indifference, "wouldn't you like to have a mistress?"

"Yes, Madam, I would," the king said.

"Ah! And how would you like to have her, then?"

"Only above the belt," replied the king.

"Well," said Madam de Chevreuse, "the next time I come to the Louvre I'll dress like the actor Gros-Guillaume, who's so fat he wears a belt above and a belt below: but I'll just wear the belt below, on my thigh."

It was in the hope of engaging the king that the chaste and beautiful damsel we have presented to our readers as Isabelle de Lautrec had been brought to Court. We have seen how devoted she was to the queen, though her father was a retainer of the Duke de Rethel. And indeed, Isabelle was so lovely that even Louis XIII had noticed. He'd chatted with her and found her personality quite charming. She, for her part, quite ignorant that she was part of a scheme, had spoken to the king with modesty and respect. But that was all 6 months before the time of our story, and since then the king had acquired a new page as a personal servant, with whom he was so taken that he had little time for Isabelle, let alone the queen. In fact, with this king, favourite succeeded favourite so rapidly that at any given moment it was hard for the courtiers to know who, as they say at the horse races, had the inside track. First there had been Pierrot, the peasant farmer we mentioned. Then had come Luynes, the chief of his Cabinet of Birds. Then came d'Esplan, his Arbalest Bearer, whom he made Marquis de Grimaud. Then Chalais, who wound up beheaded. Then Baradas, the favourite of the moment. And now, at last, came Saint-Simon, who, hoping to become a permanent favourite, was conspiring at the disgrace of Baradas – a disgrace that was all too predictable, given the fragile moods of King Louis XIII, a man who kept his favourites in that impossible place between friendship and love. Next beyond his favourites was his loyal entourage. This included Monsieur de Tréville, his Captain of Musketeers, who may be familiar to the reader from some other books we won't bother to mention here; the Count de Nogent-Bautru, brother of that Bautru the cardinal had sent to Spain, a man who, the first time he'd been presented at Court, had chanced to meet the king at a path in the Tuileries flooded with water, and had carried the king over it on his shoulders as St. Christopher had carried Jesus Christ, and who had the rare privilege, shared only with the fool l'Angely, of being allowed to say anything in the presence of the king, even attempt to jolly him out of his gloomy moods; Bassompierre, made a marshal in 1622, more for service in the bedchamber of Marie de Médicis than for his exploits in battle, a man, moreover, of wit, charm, and heart who kept an outstanding memoir of his time, from the end of the 16th century through the early part of the 17; Sublet-Desnoyers, the king's secretary, or rather his valet; La Vieuville, Superintendent of Finances; Guitaut, his Captain of the Guards, a man entirely devoted to him and to Queen Anne of Austria, who replied to all offers to join the service of the cardinal with "Impossible, Your Eminence – I'm a man of the king, and the Gospel says no one can serve two masters"; and finally Maréchal de Marillac, brother of the Keeper of the Seals, whose execution was later to be a bloody stain on the reign of Louis XIII – or rather the ministry of Cardinal Richelieu. It so happened that, the day after Souscarrières had delivered his uncannily accurate report to Richelieu about the events of the night before, the king, after lunching with Baradas, had formed an impromptu party with Nogent and called for two of his musicians, Molinier and Justin, to accompany them with lute and viola while he engaged in his latest diversion. He then turned to Bassompierre, Marillac, Desnoyers, and La Vieuville, who had just come in, and said, "Gentlemen, let's go to the kitchens and lard some meat."

"Yes, gentlemen, let's go larding!" said l'Angely in snotty hauteur. "How well they go together: royalty and larding."

And, with this rather mediocre joke, he popped his hat on his head and pulled Nogent's down over his ears. "What are you doing, buffoon?" Nogent said.

"Covering your head and mine," said l'Angely.

"In front of the king? What are you thinking?"

"Bah! Etiquette doesn't apply to buffoons like us."

"Sire, please silence this insolent clown!" Nogent cried, furious.

"What, Nogent?" said Louis XIII, "You think anyone could keep l'Angely quiet?"

"You pay me to speak my mind," l'Angely said. "If I shut up, I'd be as dull as Monsieur de La Vieuville whom you made Superintendent of Finances even though he has no finances and has to pay himself from yours. At least I steal my money honestly."

"Didn't Your Majesty hear what he said?" Nogent persisted.

"I did but I think you should mind how you speak yourself."

"How I speak ... to you, Sire?"

"Indeed. When we were playing tennis and I just missed the ball, you said, 'See that? There's Louis the Just Missed.' You must be a buffoon just like l'Angely, Nogent, if I allow you to say such things to me. Now come, gentlemen, let's go larding." These words, let's go larding, deserve an explanation, as we don't want to leave our readers in the dark. The explanation is as follows. As we've already mentioned, to fight his melancholy the king engaged in all kinds of diversions, though he was rarely diverted by them. As a child he'd made squirt-guns out of leather scraps, as a young man he'd daubed colours on canvas that his courtiers were required to call "paintings," then played what they were obliged to call "music" (though he was quite a good drummer, according to Bassompierre). He had hammered together frames and cages with Monsieur Desnoyers; he had made preserves and jam, and excellent jam at that; he had taken up gardening, managing to grow green peas in February that were sold at market where Sir de Montausson had bought some; and finally, he had learned how to be a barber. One day, in his enthusiasm for this new hobby, he had summoned and shaved all his officers, leaving on each chin only that slim goatee that became known as the royale. A satire about this went briefly around the Louvre:

Alas, my poor beard!
Who trimmed you thusly?
The great King Louis,
Thirteenth of the name,
Chief barber of his manse.
"Monsieur de La Force,
You should do it, too!"
"Alas, Sire, thank you,
I don't dare to try,
Your soldiers won't give me the chance."
Let's all wear the beard
Of Cousin Richelieu.
Yes, that will do.
For only a fool would dare
To out-barber the King of France!

However, King Louis had tired of shaving his men's beards, as he tired of everything. A few weeks before this, he had gone down to the kitchens to test a theory of more economical recipes, so General Coquet could afford his milk soup and Monsieur de La Vrillière could still have his biscuits in the morning. There he saw his chef and cooks larding lams and wagyu fat into cutlets of veal, loins of beef, and whole hares and pheasants, a process he found fascinating. As a result, for the last month His Majesty had been larding meat in his kitchens, and had insisted that his courtiers go larding with him. I don't know if the art of cooking was improved by the involvement of the royal hands but the king certainly improved its presentation. Loins of veal and beef filets that were large enough to be trimmed artistically, started coming up from the kitchens in novel shapes: trees, houses, dogs, wolves, deer, and fleurs-de-lys were seen. Nogent and some of the others went from cutting heraldic shapes to making rather lewd images that earned them severe reprimands from the priggish Louis, who forbade such tasteless viands from being served on the royal tables. And now our readers know enough that we can proceed with our story. When the king said "Gentlemen, let's go larding," his entourage hastened to follow him down the stairs. Bassompierre took advantage of the time it took to get the chamber prepared for the king's latest pursuit, where there were five or six marble-topped tables, each with its loin of veal, its fillet of beef, its hare or its pheasant, and where the squire Georges waited with plates of pre-cut beef bacon and larding needles that he handed to those who wished to humour His Majesty by submitting to his latest whimsy – Bassompierre, we say, took advantage of this moment to place a hand on the shoulder of the Superintendent of Finance and say, in a low voice but loud enough to be heard by everyone, "Monsieur le Surintendant, if it's not being too curious, might I ask when you plan to pay me my quarterly stipend as Colonel-General of the Swiss Guard, an office for which I paid a hundred thousand crowns in cash?"

Instead of answering, Monsieur de La Vieuville, who, like Nogent, was sometimes given to playing the fool, began to spin his arms like the hands on a clock, saying, "I'm late, I'm late, I'm late ... !"

"My faith," said Bassompierre, "in my life I've solved many a riddle but I don't know the answer to this one."

"Monsieur le Maréchal," said La Vieuville, "when one is late, he is not current, no?"

"... Yes."

"Well, I have no currency, so I'm late, I'm late, I'm late!"

Just then the party was joined by the Duke d'Angoulême, the bastard of King Charles IX and Marie Touchet, and the Duke de Guise, whom we last saw at the soirée for Princess Marie and whom the Duke d'Orléans had promised a corps in the army, assuming he would be lieutenant general to the king in the Italian offensive. Both waited to approach until they were recognised by the king. Bassompierre, who was at a loss for a reply to La Vieuville, bravely went up to the Duke d'Angoulême – we say bravely because as Angouleme turned to face him, he brought to bear one of the most formidable noses of the époque. "You're late, you're late, you're late – fine, so is your wife," said Bassompierre. "What's that to me? Ah, by mu troth, if I could only counterfeit money like Monsieur d'Angoulême, here, I'd have no worries."

The Duke d'Angoulême, who had no ready response, turned his nose and looked away, pretending he hadn't heard – but King Louis XIII had heard, and maliciously interjected, "Cousin, did you hear what Monsieur de Bassompierre said?"

"No, Sire, I am deaf in my right ear," replied the duke.

"Like Caesar," said Bassompierre.

"He wonders if you make counterfeit money."

"Pardon, Sire," replied Bassompierre. "I do not wonder if Monsieur d'Angoulême makes counterfeit money, I assert it as a known fact."

The Duke d'Angoulême shrugged. "For twenty years I've been putting up with this nonsense."

"Is there some truth to it, Cousin? Tell us," said the king.

"Ah, my God, very well: here is the truth. In my Château de Grosbois I rented a room to an alchemist called Merlin who claimed the location was perfect for finding the Philosopher's Stone. He gave me four thousand crowns a year on condition I not inquire into what he was doing, and allow him to live in a house of a Son of France where the law couldn't reach him. You understand, Sire, that since I was being paid more for a single room than I could get for the whole mansion, I wasn't about to pry and risk losing such a good tenant."

"You see how you slander him, Bassompierre?" said the king. "What could be more honest than the entrepreneurship of our cousin?"

"Besides," said the Duke d'Angoulême, "what's a little counterfeit money to me, the son of King Charles IX of France, when your father, of glorious memory, son of Antoine de Bourbon and King of Navarre, was such a thief?"

"What – my father, a thief!" cried Louis XIII.

"Aha!" said Bassompierre. "Perhaps that's why he said to me one day, 'It's a good thing I'm the king, or else I'd be hanged!'"

"Sire, with all due respect owed to Your Majesty," continued the Duke d'Angoulême, "the king, your father, was a thief when gaming."

"And I," said Louis XIII, "I'll just point out to you that stealing in a game isn't stealing, it's just cheating. Besides, after the game, he returned the money."

"Not always," said Bassompierre.

"What do you mean, not always?" said the king.

"Upon my word, it's the truth, and your august mother will support me. One day, or rather one night, I had the honour of playing with the king. There were fifty pistoles in the pot but we noticed some half-pistoles were mixed in. 'Sire,' I said to the king, 'is Your Majesty trying to pass off half-pistoles as full pistoles?' 'No, it's you,' replied the king. So I took all the half-pistoles, opened a window, threw them down to the servants waiting in the courtyard, and then returned to the game with all the full pistoles."

"You did that, Bassompierre?" said the king.

"Yes, Sire, and your august mother said, 'Today Bassompierre is the king, and the king is Bassompierre.'"

"Faith of a gentleman, that was well said," cried Louis XIII. "And what did my father say?"

"Sire, no doubt memories of his marital woes with Queen Marguerite led him to speak unfairly, for he said, 'Yes, you'd like it if he was the king, as you'd have a younger husband.'"

"So, who won the game?" asked Louis XIII.

"King Henri IV, Sire. He took the entire pot, and he must have been preoccupied by Her Majesty's remarks, as when he pocketed his winnings he also took some of my spare coins that were still on the table."

"Oh," said the Duke d'Angoulême, "I saw him steal much more than that..."

"My father?" asked Louis XIII.

"I once saw him steal a cloak."

"A cloak ...?"

"Though it's true that, at the time, he was still just King of Navarre."

"Very well," said Louis XIII, "tell us about that, Cousin."

"King Henri III was dying in Saint-Cloud, assassinated in the same house where he and Monsieur de Gondy had plotted the Saint Bartholomew's Day massacre, though he was then still just Duke d'Anjou. Anyway, it was the anniversary of the day of the decision, and the King of Navarre was there; it was in his arms that Henri III died, bequeathing him the throne. Navarre's outfit of purple velvet wasn't appropriate for mourning, and he didn't have enough money to buy a black doublet and breeches, so he rolled up the dark mantle of death that covered the king, put it under his arm, and stole away, thinking no one would be paying attention to him. But His Majesty had an excuse – assuming kings need an excuse to steal – as, without that cloak, he wouldn't have been able to mourn properly!"

"And now you complain, Cousin, that you can't afford to pay your servants," said the king, "When you have a room you could rent for four thousand crowns a year to a counterfeiting alchemist."

"Your pardon, Sire," said the Duke d'Angoulême. "It's possible my servants complain that I can't pay them but I've never complained about it. The last time they came to me to demand their wages, saying they didn't have so much as a silver piece between them, I simply replied, 'This is within your own power to solve, fools that you are. Four dark streets lead to the Hotel d'Angoulême, a perfect setup. Put yourselves to work there.' They took my advice. There have been some complaints lately about robberies in the Rue Pavée, the Rue des Francs-Bourgeois, the Rue Neuve-Sainte-Catherine, and the Rue de la Couture but those clowns no longer bother me for their wages."

"Yes," said Louis XIII, "and one day I'll hang your clowns from the gate of your hotel."

"If you can get the cardinal's permission, Sire!" laughed the Duke d'Angoulême.

"Gentlemen, let's lard," said the king, furious.

And he threw himself on a loin of veal and began to pierce it with no less fury than if his larding needle was a sword and the veal was the cardinal. "My faith, Louis!" said l'Angely. "I think this time it's you who got larded!"

As the King was larding

It was remarks like these – from his own entourage, even, who spared him nothing – that put the king into a rage against his minister and made him take those sudden and unexpected resolutions that were the bane of the cardinal's policy and patience. If the enemies of His Eminence took advantage of Louis XIII in one of those moments of fury, he could be persuaded to adopt the most desperate decisions, or make them the most wonderful promises, even if he couldn't keep them. However, as the bile evoked by the Duke of Angouleme's words rose in his throat, the king, still stabbing his loin of veal, looked around, seeking someone who would give him a plausible excuse to vent his anger. His eyes fell on his two musicians, who stood on a low dais, one scratching at his lute and the other scraping his viola, with the same ill-temper as the king stabbing his veal. He noticed something he'd paid no attention to earlier: each was only half-dressed. Molinier wore a doublet but no hose, while Justin, clad in a jerkin and hose, had no doublet. "Hey!" said Louis XIII. "What is this, a masquerade?"

"Hold on!" said l'Angely. "I've got the answer to that."

"Fool," said the king, "you'd better not disappoint me." Louis XIII gave privileges to l'Angely granted to no one else. Unlike other kings, when he was alone with his fool, instead of being amused, Louis XIII usually talked with him of death. The king was fascinated by the most morbid and fantastic concepts. L'Angely often accompanied him on his thought-journeys beyond the grave. He was the Horatio to this other Prince of Denmark who was seeking – who can say? – Perhaps, like the first, the murderers of his father. Their talks were like Hamlet's conversation with the gravedigger but far more grave. In verbal jousts with l'Angely, it was usually the king who eventually gave up and gave in to the jester. This occasion was no different. "Come," said Louis XIII, "explain yourself, fool!"

"Louis, called Louis the Just because you were born under the sign of Libra, be worthy for once of that name, despite the way my colleague Nogent insulted you earlier. Yesterday, based on who knows what folly, you, King of France and Navarre, pleading poverty, cut the annual salary of these musical wretches in half. However, Sire, people who are paid only half their salaries can only halfway afford to dress. So you see, if you must quarrel with someone about their outfits, quarrel with me, as I was the one who advised them to dress this way."

"The advice of a fool!" said the king.

"Only if it fails them," replied l'Angely.

"Well, then," said the king, "I forgive them."

"Thank His Most Gracious Majesty Louis the Just," said l'Angely.

The two musicians stood up and bowed. "Fine, fine!" said the king. "Enough!"

Then he looked around to see who was properly imitating him in his diversion. Desnoyers prodded a hare, La Vieuville a pheasant, Nogent a beef tenderloin, while Saint-Simon, who wasn't too proud for it, assailed the plate of steak. Bassompierre was talking with the Duke of Guise, Baradas was playing with a cup-and-ball while the Duke of Angouleme lay back in a chair, sleeping or pretending to sleep. "What are you saying to the Duke of Guise, Marshal?" asked the king. "It must be very interesting."

"It is to us, yes," replied Bassompierre. "The Duke of Guise is seeking to quarrel with me."

"About what?"

"It seems Sir de Vendome is bored in his prison."

"Good!" said l'Angely. "Though he always seemed equally bored at the Louvre!"

"And so," continued Bassompierre, "he wrote to me."

"To you?"

"He probably thinks I'm in favour."

"And what does my brother of Vendome want?"

"He wants you to send him one of your pretty pages," said l'Angely.

"Quiet, fool!" said the king.

"He wants to be released from Vincennes to join the Italian campaign."

"Right!" said l'Angely. "Let the Piedmontese watch out if they turn their backs on him."

"And you replied to him?" asked the king.

"Yes, saying it was a waste of time unless he wanted to try asking to join the staff of Sir de Guise."

"Why is that?"

"Because Madam de Conti, the duke's sister, is my mistress."

"And how did you respond to that, de Guise?"

"I told him that meant nothing, as all Vendome's aunts have been my mistresses, and I didn't like him any the better for it."

The king turned. "And you, my cousin of Angouleme, what are you doing?"

"I dream, Sire."

"Of what?"

"Of the war in Piedmont."

"And what do you dream?"

"I dream, Sire, that Your Majesty leads his army on a march into Italy, and on one of the highest rocks in the Alps he finds his name inscribed beside that of Hannibal and Charlemagne. What do you think of my dream, Sire?"

"We approve of this dream," said l'Angely. "See to it that others dream the same way."

"And who commands the troops for me? My brother, or the cardinal?" asked the king.

"Pay attention," said l'Angely. "If it's your brother, he'll command as your subordinate but if it's the cardinal, he'll be your superior."

"Where the king is," said the Duke of Guise, "no one else commands."

"Right!" said l'Angely. "That's exactly how it was with your father, General Scarface, in the time of King Henry III."

"Which didn't turn out very well for him," said Bassompierre.

"Gentlemen," said the king, "the war in Piedmont is no small affair, and despite the disagreement between me and my mother, it has been decided upon in the King's Council. My Cousin of Angouleme and Sir de Guise, I must warn you, the queen mother's party is very much in favour of Sir having the command."

"Sire," replied the Duke of Angouleme, "I say openly and in advance, I believe it should be Sir Cardinal. After his success at La Rochelle, I think it would be doing him a great disservice to deprive him of the command – subordinate to the king, of course."

"That's your opinion?" said the king.

"Yes, Sire."

"Do you know that two years ago, the cardinal wanted to put you in Vincennes, and I was the one who prevented it?"

"Your Majesty was in error."

"How so?"

"If His Eminence wanted to put me in Vincennes, I'm sure I deserved it."

"Profit from the example of your cousin of Angouleme," said l'Angely. "He is a man of experience."

"I presume, Cousin," said the king, "that if I offered you command of the army, your opinion would be different?"

"If my king, whom I respect and must obey, ordered me to take command of the army, I would do so. But if I could, I would take that command and offer it to His Eminence, saying, 'Just give me a subcommand equal to that of Gentlemen de Bassompierre, de Bellegarde, de Guise, and de Créquy, and I will be happy.'"

"Plague!" said Bassompierre. "Sir d'Angouleme, I had no idea you were so modest."

"I am modest in my judgements, Marshal but proud when I compare myself to others."

"And you, Louis, who would you choose?" asked l'Angely. "The cardinal, Sir, or yourself? As for me, as I've told you, I'd pick Sir."

"And why is that, fool?"

"Since he was 'ill' all through the Siege of La Rochelle, he should be well rested in time for Italy. Perhaps hot countries suit your brother better than cold countries."

"Not when they're too hot," said Baradas.

"Oh, so you decide to get a word in, then?" said the king.

"Yes, when I have something to say," Baradas replied. "Otherwise, I am silent."

"And why aren't you larding?"

"Because my hands are clean and I don't want to soil them, and because I'm in a good mood and don't want to be in a bad one."

"Well," said Louis XIII, drawing a flask from his pocket, "this will restore your scented hands."

"What's that?"

"Orange-water."

"You know I detest your orange-water."

The king stepped up to Baradas and splashed orange-water on his face. Scarcely had the drops touched the young man when he leaped up, snatched the bottle from the king's hands, and smashed it on the floor. "See, gentlemen," said the king, turning pale. "What would you do to a page if he was as guilty of such an insult to you as this ruffian has been to me?"

Everyone was quiet. Only Bassompierre was unable to keep his tongue still. "Sire, I would thrash him."

"So, you would thrash me, Sir Marshall?" Baradas cried.

And drawing his sword in the presence of the king, he charged the marshal. The Duke of Guise and the Duke of Angouleme seized him. "Sir Baradas," said Bassompierre, "as it's forbidden under penalty of the loss of the offending hand to draw a sword before the king for the respect that I owe him I'll stand in his place and give you the lesson you've earned. Georges, give me a larding needle."

Taking the small cooking implement from the squire, Bassompierre said, "Release Sir Baradas."

They let Baradas go, and, despite the king's cries, he made a furious attack upon the marshal. But the marshal was an old and experienced fencer who, if he'd rarely drawn sword against an enemy, had often sparred with his friends. With perfect form, and without taking so much as a step back, he parried the favourite's every blow, and at the first opportunity thrust the needle into his opponent's shoulder and left it there. "Take that, little man," he said. "It's better than a thrashing, and you'll remember it longer."

Seeing the blood stain Baradas's sleeve, the king let out a cry. "Sir de Bassompierre," he said, "leave me, and never return!"

The marshal took up his hat. "Sire," he said, "will Your Majesty allow me to appeal this judgement?"

"To whom?" asked the king.

"To the king – once he awakes."

And while the king shouted, "Doctor Bouvard! Get Doctor Bouvard," Bassompierre shrugged and went out, waving goodbye to the Duke of Angouleme and the Duke of Guise, while muttering, "Him, the son of Henry IV? Never!"

The Shop of Ildefonse Lopez

Our readers may recall from Souscarrières's report to the cardinal that Madam de Fargis and Sir de Mirabel, the Spanish Ambassador, had exchanged a letter in Lopez's jewellery store. But what Souscarrières didn't know was that the jeweller Lopez belonged body and soul to the cardinal that was very much in his interest because in his dual capacity as a (Sunni)Muslim and a Jew – he could pass at will for either a Jew or a (Sunni) Muslim – he needed a patron who could defend him in the event of an accusation of heresy, despite the care he took to eat beef every day to prove he was a follower of neither Moosaa ('A) nor Muhammad (S). And yet, one day, he almost fell afoul of the stupidity of a Master of Requests. He was accused of secretly paying agents on Spain's behalf, so the Master of Requests appeared one day, audited his books, and found the following entry incriminating:

Guadamassil for Señor de Bassompierre

Lopez, warned that he could be accused of high treason on the basis of this payment to Marshal Bassompierre, hastened to consult Madam de Rambouillet who was, along with the lovely Julie, one of his best customers. He begged for her protection, protesting that his only crime was the entry in his ledger that read:

Guadamassil for Señor de Bassompierre

Madam de Rambouillet called down her husband and told him about the case. He immediately went to the Master of Requests who was his friend and asserted Lopez's innocence. "And yet, my dear Marquis, one thing is clear," said the Master of Requests. "Guadamassil!"

The marquis paused. "Do you speak Spanish?" he asked the court official.

"No."

"Do you know what Guadamassil means?"

"No – but by the name alone, I deem it must be very significant!"

"Well, my dear sir, it means that Sir de Bassompierre ordered ... a Guadamassil tapestry for his wall."

The Master of Requests refused to believe it. The marquis had to bring him a Spanish dictionary so the Master of Requests could see for himself what the word meant. In fact, Lopez was of Moorish origin; but as the last Moors were expelled from Spain in 1610, Lopez had gone to France to plead for the interests of the fugitives. It was then that he'd become acquainted with the Marquis de Rambouillet, who spoke Spanish. Lopez was sharp. He advised a Parisian merchants' guild on a fabric shipment to Constantinople, and the enterprise was successful. The merchants cut him in on the profits. With this he bought a diamond in the rough and had it cut, polished, and sold so profitably that soon everyone was sending him their raw diamonds. In no time he was the leading jeweller in Paris, and since he employed the most skilled gem-cutters, all the most beautiful jewels of the era passed through his hands. One of his men was so skilled that he was able to split a flawed diamond into two perfect halves with a single blow. During the Siege of La Rochelle, the cardinal had sent Lopez to Holland to commission new ships and buy up everything available that could float. While he was there, he acquired a large collection of items from India and China and brought them back to France for sale, thus creating the French market for Oriental bric-a-brac. By the time he'd finished his sojourn in Holland, he'd made his fortune as an importer, meanwhile covertly completing his mission for the cardinal. Lopez had also taken note of the coincidence of the simultaneous visits to his shop of the Spanish Ambassador and Madam de Fargis, and his diamond cutter had spotted the exchange of the letter. Thus the cardinal had dual confirmation of this intelligence that only gave him a greater regard for the efforts of Souscarrières. The cardinal therefore knew that, when the queen, on the morning of the fourteenth, ordered sedan chairs for guests to be carried to Lopez's shop, it wasn't a sign of a woman who wanted to buy jewellery but rather of one who wanted to sell a kingdom. Thus on December 14, at around eleven in the morning, while Sir de Bassompierre was planting a larding needle in Baradas's shoulder, the queen was stepping out with Madam de Fargis, Isabelle de Lautrec, Madam de Chevreuse, and Patrocle, her first esquire. Madam de Bellier, her premier lady-in-waiting, arrived with a covered parrot cage in one hand and a letter in the other. "Oh, my God, what do you have there?" asked the queen.

"A gift for Your Royal Majesty from Her Highness the Infanta Claire-Eugénie."

"So this comes from Brussels?" the queen asked.

"Yes, Your Majesty – and here is a letter from the princess explaining the gift."

"Let's have a look," said the queen, overcome by feminine curiosity and reaching for the cage's cover.

"Not yet," said Madam de Bellier, drawing back the cage. "Your Majesty must read the letter first."

"And who brought this cage and its letter?"

"Michel Dause, Your Majesty's apothecary. Your Majesty knows that he is our correspondent in Belgium. Here is Her Highness's letter." The queen took the letter, opened it, and read:

My Dear Niece,

I send you a wonderful parrot which, if you do not frighten it, you will discover can complement you in five different languages. It is a good little animal, very sweet and loyal. You will never, I am sure, have reason to complain of it.

Your Devoted Aunt,

Claire-Eugénie

"Ah!" said the queen, "It talks!"

Immediately, a small voice came from under the cloth that said, in French, "Queen Anne of Austria is the most beautiful princess in the world."

"Ah! How wonderful!" cried the queen, "Now I'd like, my dear bird, to hear you speak Spanish."

“Yo quiero Doña Ana hacer por usted todo para que sus deseos lleguen.”

“Now in Italian,” said the queen. “Do you have something to say to me in Italian?”

The bird didn’t delay – immediately they heard the same voice say, in an Italian accent, “Darei la mia vita per la carissima padrona mia.”

The queen clapped her hands with joy. “And what are the other languages my parrot speaks?” she asked.

“English and Dutch, Your Majesty,” replied Madam de Bellier.

“In English, in English!” said Anne of Austria.

And the parrot, without further ado, immediately said, “Give me your hand and I shall give you my heart.”

“Ah!” said the queen. “I didn’t quite understand. Do you know English, my dear Isabelle?”

“Yes, Madam.”

“What did it mean?”

“The parrot said, ‘Give me your hand and I shall give you my heart.’”

“Oh! Bravo!” said the queen. “And now, what was that last language you said it speaks, Bellier?”

“Dutch, Madam.”

“Oh, what bad luck!” cried the queen. “None of us here understands Dutch.”

“Wait, Your Majesty,” said Madam de Fargis. “Beringhen is from Friesland, he knows Dutch.”

“Call Beringhen,” said the queen. “He should be in the king’s antechamber.”

Madam de Fargis went and brought back Beringhen. He was a tall and handsome lad, with blond hair and a red beard, half Dutch and half German, though he’d been raised in France. The king was very fond of him, and he was devoted to the king in return. Madam de Fargis came in tugging him by the sleeve; he didn’t know what he was wanted for and, faithful to his orders, it was only at the express command of the queen that he left his post in the royal antechamber. But the parrot was so smart that the moment Beringhen entered, it knew he could speak Dutch, and without waiting for a request for the fifth compliment, it said, “Och, myne welbeminde koningin, ik bemin u, maar ik u meer in hollandsch, myne liefste geboorte taal.”

“Oh!” Beringhen said, astonished. “This parrot speaks Dutch as if it was from Amsterdam.”

“And what did it say to me if you please, Sir de Beringhen?” the queen asked.

“It told Your Majesty, ‘Oh, my beloved Queen, I love you but I love you most of all in Dutch, my dear native language.’”

“Well done!” said the queen. “And now we shall see it! I have no doubt it’s as beautiful as it is well-educated.”

And so saying, she drew back the cloth to reveal what she already suspected: in the cage, instead of a parrot, was a pretty little dwarf woman, barely two feet tall and wearing a Frisian outfit. She made a nice bow to Her Majesty. She then stepped out of the cage through the door that was tall enough for her to use without stooping, and made a second bow, even more graceful than the first. The queen took the dwarf in her arms and kissed her just as she would a child, and in fact, though she was fifteen years old, she was no bigger than a girl of two. At that moment, someone was heard calling from the corridors, “Sir Premier! Sir Premier!”

According to the custom of the Court, that was the title of the king’s Premier Valet. Beringhen, who had finished his service to the queen, stepped quickly to the door and met the Second Valet, who was looking for him. Through the open door, the queen could hear the following exchange: “What is it?”

“The king is asking for Doctor Bouvard.”

“My God!” said the queen. “Has some misfortune happened to His Majesty?” She went to the door to inquire further but all she saw was the backs of the two valets as they raced off, each in a different direction. “Oh!” she said. “How can I find out what’s happened to the king?”

“Is Your Majesty going to see?” asked Miss de Lautrec.

“I dare not,” said the queen. “The king hasn’t called for me.”

“It’s a strange country,” murmured Isabelle, “where a worried wife dare not ask about her husband.”

“Do you think I should go take a look?” said Madam de Fargis.

“But what if the king is angry?”

“Well, he’s not likely to eat me – not King Louis XIII!” Then, approaching the queen, she whispered, “I’ll just take a couple of peeks and find out what’s happening.”

And just like that, she was gone. Five minutes later, she returned, laughing all the way. The queen breathed a sigh of relief. “So it was nothing serious, then?”

“Oh, quite serious: there was a duel.”

“A duel?” said the queen.

“Yes, in the presence of the king himself.”

“Who dared to do that?”

“Sir Baradas and Sir de Bassompierre. Sir Baradas was wounded.”

“By a sword?”

“No, a larding needle.”

And Madam de Fargis, who had assumed a serious look, broke out again into one of those rippling laughs like a string of pearls, a hallmark of those of joyous nature. “Well, ladies, now that we’ve been informed,” said the queen, “I don’t think we should let this accident interfere with our visit to Señor Lopez.”

Baradas, handsome though he was, didn’t inspire much sympathy in the queen or the ladies of her suite, so nobody had any objection to the queen’s proposal. She set the dwarf in Madam de Bellier’s arms and, asking her name, was told it was Gretchen that means both Daisy and Pearl. The sedan chairs were waiting at the foot of the Louvre’s grand staircase. Each could carry two passengers. The queen went with Madam de Fargis and tiny Gretchen. Ten minutes later, they were at Lopez’s place that was at the corner of Rue du Mouton and the Place de Grève. When the porters set the queen’s chair down in front of Lopez’s door, a young man who stood on the threshold, hat in hand, stepped forward to open the chair and offer his arm to the queen. This young man was the Count of Moret. A note from “Cousin Marina” to “Cousin Jacquolino” had apprised him that the queen would be at Lopez’s shop from eleven to noon, and he had hastened to be there. Had he come to greet the queen and salute Madam de Fargis, or to exchange glances with Isabelle? We cannot say – but what we can say is that as soon as he had bowed to the queen and shaken hands with Madam de Fargis, he ran to the chair that followed and offered his arm to Miss de Lautrec with as much respect as he had paid to the queen. “Pardon me, Miss,” he said to Isabelle, “for not coming to you first, as my heart desired; but in the presence of the queen, respect must come before all, even love.”

And bowing to the young woman, he conducted her to the entourage forming around the queen, and then took a step back before she could answer with anything but a blush. The attentions of the Count of Moret were so different from those of other gentlemen, and on the three occasions in which he’d been face-to-face with Isabelle, he had shown her so much love and respect that it was impossible that these meetings could have failed to leave an impression on the girl’s heart. She spent the entire time in Lopez’s shop standing in a corner, preoccupied, oblivious to the treasures displayed around her. Once inside, the queen looked around until she spotted the Spanish Ambassador, who was chatting with the diamond cutter, apparently asking the value of some of the stones. She, for her part, had brought Lopez a beautiful string of pearls, some of which were damaged and needed to be replaced. But the price of replacing the eight or ten damaged pearls was so high that she was reluctant to give Lopez permission to do it. Madam de Fargis, conversing with the Count of Moret, had been listening to him with one ear and to the queen with the other. She came over and asked, “Begging your pardon, Your Majesty but how much are you short of what you need?”

“Look here, my dear,” said the queen. “I desire this beautiful crucifix but this Jew of a Lopez won’t sell it to me for less than a thousand pistoles.”

“Bah!” said Madam de Fargis. “It’s quite unreasonable of you, Lopez, to sell this imitation cross for a thousand pistoles when your kind paid only thirty silver pieces for the original.”

“First of all,” said Lopez, “I am not a Jew, I’m a Muslim.”

“Jew, Muslim, it’s all one to me,” said Madam de Fargis.

“And then,” continued the queen, “I need a dozen pearls to repair my necklace, and he wants to charge me fifty pistoles apiece.”

“Is that all you need?” asked Madam de Fargis. “I have seven hundred pistoles of yours right here.”

“Where is it, my dear?” asked the queen.

“In the pockets of that big dark fellow there, standing by that tapestry from India.”

“Ah! Isn’t that Particelli?”

“No, Madam, that’s Sir d’Émery.”

“Particelli or d’Émery, does it matter?”

“Only to the king, Madam.”

“I don’t understand.”

“You may not know that when the cardinal appointed Sir d’Émery to be the Keeper of the Cutlery, the king said, ‘Good, let us have this Sir d’Émery in the position as soon as possible.’ ‘Why is that?’ asked the cardinal, astonished. ‘Because I’d heard that a rascal named Particelli wanted the post,’ said the king. ‘Particelli? He was hanged,’ said the cardinal. ‘I’m glad,’ said the king, ‘because it’s said he was a terrible thief.’”

“Yes, well, so...?” said the queen.

“So,” said Madam de Fargis, “you have but to whisper in the ear of Sir d’Émery and he will give you your seven hundred pistoles.”

“But how will I repay him?”

“Simply by not pointing out to the king that d’Émery and Particelli are one and the same.”

Madam de Fargis then ran over to d’Émery who had not noticed the queen, occupied as he was with inspecting some fabrics. But as soon as he saw her, and Madam de Fargis had whispered a few words in his ear, he came over as quickly as his short legs and big belly would allow. “Now, Your Majesty,” said Madam de Fargis, “you remember Sir Particelli!”

“D’Émery,” said the bursar.

“My God, of course,” said the queen.

“As soon as Sir Particelli knew of your embarrassment...”

“D’Émery, d’Émery,” repeated the bursar.

“...He offered to open for Your Majesty a line of credit with Sir Lopez for twenty thousand livres.”

“Twenty thousand livres!” cried the little man. “The devil!”

“Do you feel that isn’t enough for such a great queen, Sir Particelli? Do you think it should be more?”

“D’Émery, d’Émery, d’Émery,” he repeated despairingly. “Only too happy to be of assistance to Her Majesty; but in the name of heaven, call me d’Émery.”

“Oh, that’s right,” said Madam de Fargis. “Particelli was hanged, wasn’t he?”

“Thank you, Sir d’Émery,” said the queen. “In truth, you’re doing me a genuine service.”

“It is I who am obliged to Your Majesty – but I would be very grateful if you were to ask Madam de Fargis, who is quite mistaken, not to call me Particelli.”

“Agreed, Sir d’Émery, agreed,” said Madam de Fargis, “so long as you tell Sir Lopez that you’re covering the queen for up to twenty thousand livres.”

“Yes, yes but there will be no more talk of Sir Particelli, no?”

“No, Sir d’Émery! Of course not, Sir d’Émery!” said Madam de Fargis, steering him over to Lopez.

Meanwhile, the queen and the Spanish ambassador had exchanged a glance, then gradually moved toward each other. The Count of Moret was leaning against a pillar and watching Isabelle de Lautrec, who was pretending to play with the dwarf and talk with Madam de Bellier, though she, feeling the burning gaze of Antoine de Bourbon upon her, was unable to play with the one nor converse with the other. Madam de Fargis was ensuring that Her Majesty would have twenty thousand livres credit, and d’Émery and Lopez were discussing the terms. Everyone was so busy with their own affairs that no one paid any attention to the ambassador and the queen, who drifted together until they were side by side. There was a brief exchange of compliments before they passed on to more interesting matters. “Her Majesty has received a letter from Don Gonzales?” the ambassador asked.

“Yes, by way of the Count of Moret.”

“And Her Majesty read not only the visible lines, written by the Governor of Milan...”

“...But also the invisible lines written by my brother.”

“And the queen has considered the advice she was given?”

The queen blushed and looked down. “Madam,” the ambassador said, “there are necessities of State before which even those of the highest rank must bow. If the king died...”

“God save us from that misfortune, Sir!”

“But – if the king did die ... what would happen to you?”

“God would decide that.”

“We need not leave the decision to God, Madam. Do you trust Gaston’s word?”

“That wretch? No!”

“They would send you back to Spain, you know, or confine you in a French convent.”

“I do not hide from myself that that would be my fate.”

“Could you depend on support from your mother-in-law?”

“Oh, no. She pretends to love me but I know that beneath it all she hates me.”

“Indeed. But if Your Majesty were with child at the time of the king’s death, you would be declared regent, and everyone would fall at your feet.”

“I know that, Sir.”

“Well?”

The queen sighed. “But ... there’s no one I love who...”

“What you mean is that you still love someone who, unfortunately, it’s futile to love.”

Anne of Austria wiped away a tear. “Lopez is looking at us,” said the ambassador. “I don’t much trust this Lopez. We must part but first promise me one thing.”

“What’s that, Sir?”

“I ask only this but I ask it at the behest of your august brother, and on the behalf of both Spain and France.”

“What do you want me to promise, Sir?”

“That, if the grave circumstances we’ve discussed come to pass, you will close your eyes and allow yourself to be led by Madam de Fargis.”

“You have the queen’s promise on that,” said Madam de Fargis, appearing between the queen and the ambassador. “I promise it myself, in the name of Her Majesty.”

Then she added in a whisper, “Lopez is looking at you – and the diamond cutter has been listening.”

“Madam!” said the queen loudly. “It must be two o’clock in the afternoon. We must return to the Louvre for dinner, and to inquire after poor Sir Baradas!”

The Advice from a Jester

As we have seen, King Louis XIII was offended at first by the insolence of his favourite Baradas, when he tore the bottle of orange-water from the king’s hands and threw it at his feet. But as soon as he saw the wound inflicted by Sir de Bassompierre, spilling the precious blood of his precious Baradas, his anger changed to agony. Throwing himself upon the wounded youth, he drew the larding needle from his shoulder and, against all advice, citing his knowledge of medicine, insisted on treating the wound himself. But the gifts and privileges Louis XIII had showered on his favourite, reminiscent of the favours Henry III had granted his mignons, had turned him into a spoiled child. Baradas pushed the king away, pushed everyone away, vowing he would never forget this insult to himself and to the king. He shouted that justice demanded the Marshall de Bassompierre must be sent to the Bastille, unless he agreed to a public duel to settle the matter, like the one under Henry II that had ended in the death of La Châtaigneraie. The king tried to calm him but Baradas, who might have forgiven a wound from a sword, even from the proud Marshal Bassompierre, couldn’t forgive being wounded with a larding needle. He gave the king an ultimatum: nothing would do but either a legal duel in the presence of King and Court, or Bassompierre sent to the Bastille. Baradas then stalked off to his room, like the majestic Achilles retiring to his tent after Agamemnon refused to give up the lovely Briséis. This event threw all the larders into disarray, even those who weren’t larding. The Duke of Guise and the Duke of Angoulême, wanting no part of this domestic quarrel, put on their hats, walked to the door, and went out together. Once the door had closed behind them, the Duke of Guise paused and asked the Duke of Angoulême, “So, what do you think of that?”

Angoulême shrugged his shoulders. “I say that poor old King Henry III, much maligned though he is, was less dismayed by the deaths of his favourites Quélus, Schomberg, and Maugiron than our good King Louis XIII is by a scratch to Sir Baradas.”

“Is it possible for a son to be so unlike his father?” said the Duke of Guise in a low voice, glancing around as if looking for an escape route. “My faith, I must admit I preferred King Henry IV, even if he was still a Huguenot at heart.”

“You say that now that he’s dead; but when he was alive, you detested him.”

“He’d done so much damage to our noble house, it was impossible to be friends.”

“I can accept that,” said the Duke of Angoulême. “but what I can’t accept is this insisting on a similarity between a child and his father. Such a resemblance is not granted to every family. Let’s take you, for example, my dear duke,” said Angoulême, gently prodding de Guise’s arm. “I, who have had the honour of knowing your mother’s husband, and the pleasure of knowing you, I dare say, without the slightest malice intended, that there is no resemblance at all between you and him.”

“My dear Duke!” said Sir de Guise, not quite sure whether Angoulême was mocking him.

“But no!” Angoulême insisted, with that air of bonhomie of which he was a master, so that no one could ever tell whether he was quite serious. “But no! It’s obvious enough, for the love of God. Your late father was large where you are small, had an aquiline nose where yours is snubbed, and had dark eyes where yours are grey.”

“Next you’ll say he had a scar on his cheek, where I do not!”

“Only because you’ve never gone to war as he did.”

“What!” cried de Guise. “I, never gone to war? And what of La Rochelle, then?”

“That’s right, I forgot. You have seen war – from the battlements.”

“Duke,” said Sir de Guise, detaching his arm from Angoulême’s, “I think you’re having a bad day, and it’s time we parted.”

“Me, having a bad day? Is that what you think? If I said anything disagreeable, that was certainly not my intention. If you don’t look like your father, you must understand that that’s just a matter of chance. For example, do I resemble my father, Charles IX, who had red hair and a ruddy complexion? Not a bit. There’s no point in getting upset about it – everyone must look like someone. Our king, for example, looks a lot like Virginio Orsini, that cousin of the queen mother who came to France with her. You remember Orsini, don’t you? While Sir, in turn, looks as much like Concino Concini as one drop of water does to another. You yourself can have no doubt whom you resemble.”

“No, I’ve no idea, and I don’t care to know.”

“Quite so, you couldn’t have known, since six months before your birth he was killed by your uncle Mayenne. Well, you resemble no one so much as the Count of Saint-Mégrin. Or did you know that already?”

“I am sorry, my dear Duke but I must warn you to stop there.”

“I’m afraid that now you’re the one speaking in anger and malice, not I. Did I lose my temper when Sir de Bassompierre said I was passing counterfeit money? I did not. I’m afraid it’s you who’ve fallen into a bad mood, not me, and I who should take my leave.”

“I believe you’re right,” said Sir de Guise who strode off down the Rue de l’Arbre Sec that led to the Rue Saint-Honoré.

In fact, he left his caustic interlocutor so rapidly that Angoulême stood there for a moment wearing the astonished look of one surprised not to have gotten the last word. Eventually he walked on toward the Pont Neuf, hoping to find there another victim upon whom he could resume the petty torment he’d inflicted on the Duke of Guise. Meanwhile, the other courtiers had left one by one, until the king found himself alone with l’Angely. The jester, pleased to find himself in sole possession, planted himself before the king, who was sitting with his head down, melancholy eyes fixed upon the ground.

“Hum!” l’Angely sighed heavily.

Louis raised his head. “Well?” he asked in the tone of a suffering man who expects sympathy.

“Well!” l’Angely repeated in the same tone.

“What have you to say about Sir de Bassompierre?”

“I say,” l’Angely replied, in a tone that betrayed a mocking admiration, “that anyone so adept with a larding needle must have been a cook in his youth.”

A flash briefly lit the dull eyes of Louis XIII. “L’Angely,” he said, “I forbid you to joke about Sir Baradas’s accident.”

L’Angely’s face assumed an expression of deepest pain. “Because the Court cannot bear to lose him?”

“One more word, Fool,” said the king, rising and stamping his foot, “and I’ll thrash you till you bleed.”

He began marching around the room in agitation. “I see,” said l’Angely, hopping up onto the chair the king had just left. “First your pages misbehave, and who do you threaten to thrash? Me. And now here I am, threatened again. Ah! My colleague Nogent was right: they don’t call you Louis the Just for nothing. Plague take it!”

“Oh!” cried Louis XIII, without bothering to reply to his fool’s jests, not that he would have known what to say. “I shall have my revenge upon Sir de Bassompierre!”

“Did you ever hear the story about the snake who bit a steel saw, and found out he wasn’t the only one who had teeth?”

“What do you mean? Are you making excuses for him?”

“I mean, my son that king though you are, you can’t afford to throw away your true friends in order to preserve your false ones. Consider our minister, Richelieu. Though you’re the one who’s called the Just during your lifetime, it may well be that he will be the one called the Just after his death.”

“What?”

“You don’t see it that way, Louis? I certainly do. Remember when the cardinal came and told you, ‘Sire, while I’ve been labouring on your behalf and for the glory of France, your brother has been conspiring against me that is to say against you. He came to my château of Fleury with his entourage in order to dine with me, during which Sir de Chalais was to pass his sword through my body. Here’s the proof. Ask your brother about it.’ So you interrogated your brother. He collapsed in terror, as always, fell at your feet, and confessed to everything. Ah! It was a crime of high treason, and he should have lost his head on the block. And now you will go tell Sir de Richelieu, ‘I went larding but Baradas wouldn’t lard. I tried to make him but he snatched my orange-water, without any respect for my majesty, and smashed the bottle on the floor. I asked what a page who so insulted his king deserved, and Marshal Bassompierre, a sensible man, replied, ‘The whip, Sire.’ Upon which Sir Baradas drew his sword and lunged at Sir de Bassompierre who, in deference to my majesty, declined to draw his own blade, merely taking a larding needle from the hands of Georges and planting it in Sir Baradas’s shoulder. I demand, therefore, that Sir de Bassompierre be sent to the Bastille.’ But your minister – whom I will support against everyone, even you – your minister, who is the personification of justice, will say, ‘But it is Sir de Bassompierre who is in the right. Though I have sent other nobles and even princes to the Bastille, I will not send him. However, I will have your page beaten for having snatched your bottle from your hand, and put in the pillory for drawing his sword in your presence – this, I, your minister, the most important man in France after you – this I will do.’ And how will you reply to him, your loyal minister?”

“All I can say is, I love Baradas and hate Sir de Richelieu.”

“So you can’t just be wrong, you have to be wrong twice over: you hate a great man who does everything he can to make you great as well, and you love a little lout who can’t advise you as well as Luynes, or even betray you as well as Chalais.”

“Didn’t you hear his request for a trial by combat? There’s a precedent for it, the duel of Jarnac and La Châtaigneraie, under Henry II.”

"When I was told to stay behind in France, while my father went to Italy with the Duke of Nevers, My Lord, he argued his case with two points: First that the long journey would fatigue me, and only end at a city that might be besieged and sacked. Second, that he had found for me a place near Her Majesty, a position that ought to satisfy any young woman, even one more ambitious than I."

"Go ahead and tell me of the dangers you perceive in this new position of yours."

"Yes, My Lord. It seemed to me that there was some uncertainty about my youth and the sincerity of my devotion to my royal mistress. The king, either on his own account or pressed by others' advice, seemed to pay me more attention than I deserved. My respect for His Majesty blinded me at first to the meaning of these attentions, though his shyness always kept him within the bounds of gallant courtesy. However, one day I felt as if I needed to account to the queen for the kind of things the king was saying to me. But to my amazement, the queen just laughed and said, 'It would be quite marvellous, dear child, if the king were to fall in love with you.' I thought about her words all night long, and it seemed to me that in my sojourn at Court and my position near the queen, there was more than had appeared at first. The next day, the king redoubled his attentions. That week, he had visited the queen's inner circle three times, something that never happened. This time he approached me directly, and spoke to no one but me. But at the first word he said to me, I bowed and excused myself on the pretext of being indisposed, asking the queen for permission to withdraw. Queen Anne seemed to disapprove of my behaviour. When I asked her why she was so cool to me, she replied, 'I have nothing against you; I only regret that you seem unable to do for us something that would be of genuine service.' The queen mother was even colder to me than the queen."

"And," asked the cardinal, "did you understand what kind of service the queen had hoped for?"

"I had a vague idea, My Lord, and at the realisation I felt myself blush to my brows. However, as the queen continued to favour me, I set my qualms aside and have tried to serve her these past months as best I could. But yesterday, My Lord, to the amazement of myself and of the two queens, His Majesty, who for weeks had not come near the queen's circle of ladies, unexpectedly showed up, and for once he was smiling. He greeted his wife, kissed his mother's hand, and walked straight up to me. The queen has allowed me to sit in her presence but at the sight of the king I stood up. But he made me sit down again and, while playing with Gretchen, the dwarf who'd been sent to the queen by her niece, the Infanta Claire-Eugénie, the king spoke to me. He inquired after my health, and told me that the next time he invited the queens to join him in a hunt, he would like me to accompany them. These attentions from the king to a woman were so extraordinary that I felt all eyes were upon me, and I blushed more fiercely than ever. I don't know what I said to His Majesty – or, rather, I didn't say anything, just stammered disconnected words. I tried to get up. The king held me by the hand. I felt paralysed on my chair. To hide my embarrassment, I took little Gretchen in my arms. But to do that, I had to look up, and when he saw my face, he said, 'Why are you crying?' And I realised that tears were flowing silently from my eyes and rolling down my cheeks. I don't know what meaning the king gave to my tears but he stroked my hand and gave a bonbon to the dwarf, who took it with a wicked laugh, and then she slid from my arms and went to whisper to the queen. I felt I had no one to turn to; I didn't dare to get up and I didn't dare to stay. It was unbearable – I felt the blood roaring in my ears, my temples throbbed, the furniture seemed to tremble and the walls to sway. My senses left me, and I fainted. When I came to myself, I was lying on my bed with Madam de Fargis near at hand."

"Madam de Fargis," repeated the cardinal with a smile.

"Yes, My Lord."

"Go on, my child."

"I ask nothing more. For what she told me was so astounding, her knowing congratulations were so humiliating, her suggestive advice so strange and unforeseen, that I hardly know how to describe them to Your Eminence."

"Yes," said the cardinal. "She told you the king was in love with you, did she not? She congratulated you for accomplishing a miracle that even the queen could not, and encouraged you to return His Majesty's love as best you could, so that once you were within his good graces you could replace his sulky favourites and apply your newfound influence to serve the political interests of my enemies."

"Your name was not mentioned, My Lord."

"No, it wouldn't be, not at first. But otherwise I guessed what she told you, did I not?"

"Almost word for word, My Lord!"

"And how did you reply?"

"I didn't. All the vague premonitions of evil I'd felt when the king was first paying me his attentions were coming true. They wanted to make a political tool out of me. I started to cry and couldn't stop. The queen came in and hugged and kissed me but this embrace, instead of consoling me, froze me to the heart. It seemed to me that such a kiss must hide a secret poison, a kiss given from a queen to encourage a girl to love and desire her own husband! The queen took Madam de Fargis aside and exchanged a few quiet words with her, and then said, 'Good night, dear Isabelle. You can believe everything Fargis says, especially when she assures you of the appreciation we shall have for your devotion.' And she left the room. Madam de Fargis remained. She told me that I was free to do what I wanted – in other words, free to love the king. She spoke for a long time while I remained silent, trying to make me understand that it was a good thing to have won the king's love and would all be for the best. No doubt she thought she'd me convinced for finally she kissed me in her turn and left. But no sooner had she closed the door behind her than my mind was made up: I would come to you, My Lord, to throw myself at your feet and tell you everything."

"What you have told me, my child," said the cardinal, "is no more than the story of your fears. These fears are neither a sin nor a crime but, on the contrary, proof of your innocence and your loyalty, so I don't see why you need to come to me on your knees and tell your story in the form of a confession."

"But I haven't told you everything, My Lord. This antipathy, or rather this fear the king inspires in me, is not something I feel toward all men. My only hesitation in coming to you, Your Eminence, is not that I must tell you 'The king loves me,' but rather that I must say 'My Lord, I fear because I love another.'"

"And this other, is it a crime to love him?"

"No, My Lord – but it is ... dangerous."

"Dangerous? Why? At your age, both society and nature agree that it's the purpose of a woman to love and to be loved."

"But not when she fears that her love is above her in rank and in birth."

"Your birth, my child, is quite good, and your family name, though it doesn't shine with the lustre it did a hundred years ago, is still on par with the finest names in France."

"My Lord, My Lord, don't encourage me in a foolish and dangerous hope!"

"Do you fear the one you love does not love you?"

"On the contrary, My Lord, I believe he does love me ... and that's what frightens me."

"You believe in this love?"

"I have confessed it to you."

"And now that your confession is made, you said you had a plea for me."

"A prayer, rather, My Lord: the king's love has put me in a position where, even if he doesn't pursue it, I will be pressured into returning it. And while I may manage to put them off for a while, at some point they'll see that I'm not going to do what they wish, and then ... My prayer, My Lord, is that you will send me to join my father. However dangerous it is there, it is less dangerous for me than here."

"If I were dealing with a heart less pure and less noble than yours, I would join with those who aren't afraid to tarnish your purity and break your heart – I too would say, let this king, who has never loved anything in the world, fall in love with you, and maybe, in time, you will love him in return. I would say, pretend to be the tool of these women who conspire at the humiliation of France, while working for her greatness as my secret ally. But you are not made for such intrigues. If you want to leave France, you shall go. If you want to join your father, I will give you the means to do so."

"Oh! Thank you!" the girl cried, seizing the cardinal's hand and covering it with kisses before the cardinal could do anything to resist.

"The road you choose will not be without danger."

"For me, My Lord, the real dangers are at this Court, where I feel threatened by mysterious and unknown perils, where I feel as if the ground trembles beneath me as I walk, and where I fear I shall lose the innocence in my heart and the purity of my thoughts. Keep me from these queens who conspire, these princes who pretend love they do not feel, these scheming courtiers who advise women to do impossible things as if they were easy and natural, these regal voices that promise to reward shame with honour. Save me from all this, My Lord, so that I may keep what the Lord has given me honest and pure, and I will be forever grateful."

"I am unable to refuse one who makes me such a plea as that. Rise. Everything will be ready for you within the hour – at least, there will be nothing to prevent you from leaving."

"Am I absolved, My Lord?"

"One who is not at fault needs no absolution."

"Bless me, at least, and your blessing will ease my troubled heart."

"The hands I extend to you, my child, soiled as they are with politics and worldly concerns, are less pure than your heart, troubled though it is. It is up to God to bless you, not to me, and I pray that he will bless you with his supreme goodness rather than my poor reverence."

At this, the clock struck nine. Richelieu went to his desk, rang a bell, and Guillemot stepped in. "Have the people I was expecting arrived yet?" the cardinal asked.

"This very moment. The duke is in the portrait gallery."

"Alone or accompanied?"

"With a young man."

"Miss," said the cardinal, "before answering you fully or at least in more detail, I need to speak with the two people who have just arrived. Guillemot, escort Miss de Lautrec to my niece's house, and return in half an hour to see if I'm free." And bowing respectfully to Miss de Lautrec who followed his footman out, he opened the door to the portrait gallery where he'd kept waiting, albeit briefly, the Duke of Montmorency and the Count of Moret.

In Which Cardinal Richelieu Writes a Comedy without the Help of his Collaborators

The two princes had been waiting only a moment, and as they were aware of the cardinal's many responsibilities and how much his time was in demand, they would have been willing to wait considerably longer before taking offence. Though he hadn't yet reached the heights of power he would command after the famous event that history would call the Day of Dupes, the cardinal was already regarded, in fact if not officially, as the prime minister. This was especially true in matters of peace and war, where his opinion and the weight of his genius were eternally opposed by the hatred of the two queens and their allies on the Council of State, who met at the queen mother's Luxembourg Palace under the leadership of Cardinal Béruille. When the two sides could not agree, the king intervened, approving or disapproving. This approval sometimes favoured Richelieu and sometimes the queen mother, depending on the mood of King Louis XIII. The critical matter to be decided in the next two or three days was not whether to go to war in Italy – that had already been decided on – but who would command the army. It was this important issue as regarded the two princes that the cardinal had in mind when he had written to ask the Duke of Montmorency to visit him, along with the Count of Moret; but his interview with Isabelle de Lautrec had caused him to alter his intentions for the count. This was the first time Montmorency had come face to face with Richelieu since the execution of his cousin, the duellist Bouteville but we have seen that the noble Governor of Languedoc had taken the first step toward a reconciliation at Princess Marie de Gonzague's soirée, where he had approached Madam de Combalet, who hadn't failed to report such an honour to her uncle. The cardinal was too wise a politician not to recognise that this show of respect for the niece was a message to the uncle, and that the prince was making an overture of peace. As for the Count of Moret, that was something else. This young man, so forthright, so French in character though surrounded by Italians and Spaniards, only twenty-two yet already known for his courage, was someone the cardinal wanted to conciliate, protect, and encourage – especially since he was the only son of Henry IV who had never openly conspired against him. The Count of Moret, away from court intrigues, honoured with a command in the army, serving France and the policies of the Duke of Richelieu, would be a counterweight against his half-brothers the Vendomes who were in prison for conspiring against the cardinal. In the cardinal's opinion, it was high time the young prince was taken in hand. Embroiled in the intrigues of Queen Anne and the queen mother, or taken as a lover by Madam de Fargis or Madam de Chevreuse, he would soon be bound too tightly to escape, even if he wished to do so. The cardinal offered his hand to Sir de Montmorency, who accepted it and shook it sincerely but he did not allow himself such familiarity with the Count of Moret who was of royal blood and bowed almost as if he was before sir. After the initial exchange of compliments, the cardinal said, "Duke, when it came to war at La Rochelle, I wanted sole command of the naval campaign, so I purchased the title of Admiral of France from you and paid the price you requested. Today, I'm not here to sell you something but to give you better than I've taken."

"His Eminence believes," said the duke with his most gracious smile, "that when it comes to service and the good of the State, to ensure my dedication it would be best to start with a promise?"

"No, Sir Duke, I know that no one is more generous than you with your energy and blood. And it is because I recognise your courage and loyalty that I speak to you so directly."

Montmorency bowed.

"When your father died, though you were heir to his fortune and his titles, there was one charge you could not inherit because of your extreme youth: that of Constable of France. The fleur de lys sword cannot be borne by a child. Moreover, there was a strong arm already available to take it and wield it faithfully, that of the Lord de Lesdiguières. He was appointed constable, and retired only when he reached the age of eighty-five. Since then his son, Marshal Créquy, has aspired to replace him. But the sword of the constable is no family heirloom. This year, Sir de Créquy had his chance at conquest when he was offered the command of the expedition formerly led by the Duke of Nevers but instead he declared for the queen mother, against me and against France. While I live, he will never be constable!"

The Duke of Montmorency could not contain his gasp of pure joy, an evidence of his satisfaction that did not escape the cardinal's notice. Richelieu continued, "The dedication I failed to find in Marshal Créquy I expect to find in you, Prince. Your relationship with the queen mother must not influence your love for France, because, make no mistake about it, the result of this war in Italy is crucial to the power and standing of France."

The Count of Moret appeared to be listening attentively, so the cardinal turned to him. "You do well to pay heed, my young prince, for no one should love our France more than you, that France for which your august father gave everything, even his life."

And then, as he could see that the Duke of Montmorency eagerly awaited the conclusion of his speech, he said, "To get to the point, with the same frankness and honesty I hope for in return, if I am granted responsibility for the conduct of this war, you, my dear Duke, will have the main command of the army. And if, when the siege of Casale is lifted, you are the first one through the gate, you will find behind that door the sword of the constable that will thus be borne by your family for the third time. If you wish to pass that sword on to someone else, you may but I want you to bear it, and I offer it freely. Reflect on that, Sir Duke."

"Your hand, my Lord," said Montmorency. The cardinal held out his hand. "In the name of France, My Lord, be my liege and accept my service. I swear to obey Your Eminence in every respect, except where it would compromise the honour of my name."

"I am no prince to be a liege, Sir Duke," said Richelieu with supreme dignity, "but I am a gentleman. Rest assured, I would never ask a Montmorency to do anything he would be ashamed of."

"When do we move, my Lord?"

"As soon as we can, Sir Duke. Assuming the direction of the war is entrusted to me, I expect to take the field at the beginning of next month."

"Then there is no time to lose, my Lord. I shall depart for my province this evening, and on the tenth of January I will be in Lyon with a hundred gentlemen and five hundred cavalry."

"But shouldn't you consider that someone else might be put in charge of directing the war?" said the cardinal. "What would you do if that happened?"

"No one but Your Eminence deserves to lead this enterprise, and I will obey no one but you and His Majesty Louis XIII."

"Go, then, Prince. And know that I fully expect you to earn the constable's sword."

"Shall I take my young friend the Count of Moret with me?"

"No, Sir Duke. I have a particular mission in mind to offer Sir Count of Moret. If he turns me down, he will be free to join you. I intend to propose a mission to him that'll require courage, a steady hand, and the dedication of those who accompany him."

The duke and the Count of Moret exchanged a few words in voices too low for the cardinal to hear, and Moret said to the duke, "Lend me Galaor."

Then with joy in his heart, the duke seized the cardinal's hand, gripped it gratefully, and rushed from the study. Left alone with the Count of Moret, the cardinal approached him and said, with respect and warmth, "Count, given my position and my age that is twice yours, I hope you will pardon me when I say that of all King Henry's children, you are the only one who truly resembles him, and I hope to love the son as I loved the father."

The young prince was facing Richelieu for the first time, hearing for the first time that voice against which everyone had warned him, and he was astonished at how that stern face could brighten with warmth, and how that commanding voice could soften. "My Lord," he replied, with a laugh edged with emotion, "Your Eminence is very good to concern himself with a young fool whose only thought is to amuse himself as best he can, and who, if asked how he might do better, wouldn't know what to say."

"A true son of Henry IV is good at everything, Sir," said the cardinal, "because with that blood comes courage and intelligence. And that is why I cannot stand idly by and watch you go wrong, falling prey to the dangers that surround you."

"Me, My Lord?" said the young man, surprised. "What are these dangers, and in what way might I go wrong?"

"Will you grant me a few minutes of your attention, Sir Count? And for those few minutes, will you listen to me seriously?"

"At my age and with my heritage, My Lord, that is my duty, even if you weren't a minister of state and a man of genius. So I will listen to you – perhaps not seriously but definitely with respect."

"You arrived in Paris at the end of November – on the twenty-eighth, I believe."

"The 28th, yes, My Lord."

"You came bearing letters from Milan and Piedmont for Queen Marie de Médicis, for Queen Anne of Austria, and for sir."

The count stared at the cardinal, astonished and uncertain how to answer. But finally, faced by the truth and the brilliant man who spoke it, he said, "Yes, my Lord."

"But as the two queens and Sir had gone to meet the king, you were obliged to wait in Paris for a week. Rather than remain idle, you wooed Madam de la Montagne, the sister of Marion Delorme. Young, handsome, wealthy, and the son of a king, you didn't have too long to wait; within two days you were her lover."

"So is that the wrong track you worry about, and the danger from which you'd protect me?" laughed the Count of Moret, surprised that an important minister would concern himself with such trivia.

"No, Sir – we're getting to it. No, I would hardly call taking a courtesan's sister as a lover a dangerous diversion, though it was not entirely free of peril. That madman Pisany thought you were Madam de Maugiron's lover, and wanted to murder you out of jealousy. Fortunately, his chosen assassin turned out to be more honest than heinous and, faithful to the memory of the great king, refused to lay a hand on his son. In the end he was a victim of his honesty; you saw him yourself, lying on a table and making his dying confession to a Capuchin."

"Did I? And just exactly when was it," said the Count of Moret, hoping to embarrass Richelieu. "that I witnessed this painful spectacle?"

"Fifth December at about six in the evening, in the common room of the Inn of the Painted Beard. Disguised as a Basque gentleman, you had just left Madam de Fargis who, herself disguised as a Catalan, had instructed you to meet with Queen Anne of Austria, Queen Marie de Médicis, and Sir at the Louvre between eleven o'clock and midnight."

"My faith, My Lord! I have to admit the reputation of your police is entirely justified."

"You are kind, Count. Now, do you think I went to the trouble to gather such information because I was worried you might become a threat to me?"

"I don't know. It seems Your Eminence has taken a great deal of interest in me."

"A great deal, Count. I wanted to save the son of Henry IV from becoming a threat to himself."

"How so, My Lord?"

"The fact that Queen Marie de Médicis, who is Italian and Austrian, and Queen Anne, who is Austrian and Spanish, conspire against France is a crime – but family ties often outweigh even the duties of a crown. But to have the Count of Moret, son of a Frenchwoman and of the most French king who ever lived, conspire with those two queens on the behalf of Spain and Austria, that I must prevent – by persuasion and prayer if possible but by force if necessary."

"Who told you I was conspiring, my Lord?"

"So far you have not conspired, Count, possibly thanks to your inborn noble instincts. And what these instincts should be telling you is that, as the son of Henry IV, who dedicated his life to opposing domination of France by Spain and Austria, you should not be serving their cause at the expense of the interests of France. Son of Henry IV, your father was murdered by Austria and Spain – do not sink so low as to ally with his assassins!"

"But why does Your Eminence say this to me instead of to Sir?"

"Sir has nothing to do with it – he is the son of Concini, not of Henry IV."

"Sir Cardinal, consider what you're saying!"

"Yes, I know I risk the wrath of the queen mother, the wrath of Sir, even the wrath of the king, if the Count of Moret leaves here determined to do me ill. But I prefer to think the Count of Moret will be grateful for my concern that has no source other than the great love and admiration I had for the king his father. I think, rather, that the Count of Moret will keep what I say to himself, for his sake and for the sake of France."

"Is Your Eminence asking me to give him my word?"

"We do not ask for such things from the son of Henry IV."

"But Your Eminence didn't invite me here just to give me advice. I believe I heard something about entrusting me with a mission."

"Yes, Count, a mission that will take you far away from the dangers I fear."

"So you wish me to put this danger behind me?" Richelieu nodded. "And therefore I am to leave Paris?"

"I would have you return to Italy."

"Hmph!" said the Count of Moret.

"Is there some reason why you don't wish to return to Italy?"

"No, I would just rather stay in Paris."

"So you refuse, Sir Count?"

"No, not completely – not if the mission can be delayed."

"You must leave tonight; tomorrow, at the latest."

"Impossible, My Lord," said the Count of Moret, shaking his head.

"What?" cried the cardinal, "France goes to war, and you decline to take part?"

"Not at all. But I intend not to leave Paris until the last possible moment."

"This is your firm resolve, Sir Count?"

"It is my firm resolve, My Lord."

"Your reluctance to leave is a sad blow to me. I was counting on your courage, your devotion, and your nobility in acting as escort for a young lady, the daughter of a man for whom I have the highest regard. I'm afraid I'll just have to look elsewhere for someone willing to safeguard the travels of Miss Isabelle de Lautrec."

"Isabelle de Lautrec!" cried the Count of Moret. "It's Isabelle de Lautrec you wish escorted back to her father?"

"Her very self. Why? Does that name surprise you?"

"Oh, pardon, My Lord, pardon!"

"No, don't worry about it, Count. I'm sure I can find her another escort."

"No, no, My Lord, look no further – the escort, the protector, the defender to the death of Miss de Lautrec is here before you! It is me, My Lord! It is me."

"Oh?" said the cardinal. "So you'll do it, then? I have nothing to worry about?"

"Nothing, My Lord!"

"You accept this charge?"

"I accept!"

"Well. In that case, here are my instructions."

"I am listening."

"I place in your charge Miss de Lautrec who, during the course of this journey, you will hold as safe and sacred as if she were your sister..."

"I swear it!"

"...And conduct her to her father, who is in Mantua. Then you will return to join the army and take a command under the orders of Sir de Montmorency."

"Yes, My Lord."

"And if it should happen – for you understand, a man of foresight must take everything into account – if it should happen that you should fall in love..."

The Count of Moret started. “Just supposing, you understand, because such things have been known to happen. Well, if that occurs, understand there is nothing I can do for you, Sir, who are the son of a king – but there’s a lot I can do for Miss de Lautrec and her father.”

“You can make me the happiest of men, My Lord. For I already love Miss de Lautrec.”

“Do you indeed? How are we to account for this? Is it, perhaps, that you came secretly to the Louvre one night, and were conducted up the back stair by Madam de Chevreuse disguised as a page, who admitted you to a dark corridor that led you to the queen’s chambers, where you met a certain someone? Could that be it? Why, what a miraculous coincidence!”

“My Lord,” said the Count of Moret, regarding the cardinal with wonder, “my admiration for you almost matches my gratitude! But…”

The count paused, worried. “But what?” asked the cardinal.

“What’s that?”

“I love Miss de Lautrec but … I don’t know if Miss de Lautrec loves me. I don’t know if, despite my devotion, she’ll accept me as her escort.”

“Well, Sir Count, it seems to me that that part is up to you.”

“But how? I don’t see how I’ll have a chance to make sure, if this departure, as Your Eminence says, must take place tonight, or tomorrow morning at the latest. How is this going to work out?”

“You’re quite right, Sir Count, there must be an interview between the two of you as soon as possible. However, I have other things to attend to. Please wait here for a moment, as I must issue some instructions that cannot wait.” The Count of Moret bowed, his eyes following this man in admiration mingled with astonishment, this man who manipulated all Europe from this study, and who, despite the threats that surrounded him, nonetheless found time to pay attention to the smallest of details. The door closed behind the cardinal. The Count of Moret remained behind, his eyes fixed on the portal until it opened again – and he saw in its frame not just the cardinal but Miss de Lautrec herself. The two lovers, simultaneously struck as if by an electric shock, gasped in astonishment. Then, with the rapidity of thought, the Count of Moret darted to Isabelle, fell to his knees before her, seized her hand, and kissed it with such passion that the young woman knew she had found, not a dangerous heartbreaker but an ardent admirer. Meanwhile the cardinal, who had achieved his goal of prying the son of Henry IV away from the Court and making him an ally, celebrated the victorious conclusion to a heroic comedy written without the help of his usual collaborators, Gentlemen Desmarests, Rotrou, L’Estoile, and Mairet. (Corneille, it will be remembered, had not yet had the honour of being presented to the cardinal.)

104 The Council of the King

The next big event, anxiously awaited by all – especially Richelieu, who was as sure of the king as anyone could be of Louis XIII – was a meeting of the King’s Council. This was to be held at the queen mother’s Luxembourg Palace that had been built during her regency on the model of the palaces of Florence, and which contained the gallery of paintings Rubens had done ten years before, those magnificent works depicting the most important events in the life of Marie de Médicis, and which are now among the principal ornaments of the gallery of the Louvre. This event was to be held that evening. The council was primarily composed of the creatures of Queen Marie de Médicis. It was chaired by Cardinal Bérulle but conducted by Vautier, and included Marshall de Marillac, who had been made a marshal without ever having been in a battle, and who the cardinal, in his memoirs, always referred to as Marillac the Sword, since his duel at the tennis courts with one Caboche, whom he’d killed before he had a chance to defend himself. The other member of the council was the Sword’s elder brother, Michel de Marillac, Minister of Justice and Keeper of the Seals, who was one of Madam de Fargis’s lovers. When meeting on important matters, the King’s Council was augmented by some others our readers already know, namely the Duke of Angouleme, the Duke of Guise, the Duke of Bellegarde, and Marshal Bassompierre. Sir, also, had returned to the council, as it was now some time since his disgrace in the Chalais conspiracy. The king attended whenever there was a decision before the council important enough to require his presence. The council’s decisions had to be ratified by the king who could approve, disapprove, or even completely change whatever it resolved. Cardinal Richelieu, who was prime minister in practice if not yet in name, and who was to gain absolute power in later years, was at this point just one more voice in the council, though he was usually able to persuade the king to adopt his position, supported by the Marillacs, the Duke of Guise, the Duke of Angouleme, and sometimes Marshal Bassompierre. He was consistently opposed by the queen mother, Vautier, Cardinal Bérulle, and two or three others who took their cues from Marie de Médicis. This evening, Sir, on the pretext of his pretended quarrel with the queen mother, had sent word that he would not attend the council, though he knew that despite his absence, his mother would look out for his interests. The King’s Council was scheduled to begin at eight o’clock. By a quarter past eight, everyone summoned was in attendance, standing behind their chairs and waiting for the queen mother to take her seat. At half past eight, the king arrived. He saluted his mother, who rose to greet him, kissed her hand, and then sat beside her on a chair slightly higher than hers. Then he pronounced the traditional words, “You may take your seats, Gentlemen.”

The ministers and the honorary councillors all sat in the chairs provided for them around the table, one for each member. The king slowly looked around at everyone present, then said, in the same flat and melancholy tone in which he said everything, “I do not see my brother Sir. Where is he?”

“He has disobeyed your orders, so doubtless he dares not appear before Your Majesty,” said Vautier. “Is it your pleasure that we proceed without him?”

The king nodded. Then, addressing both the ministers and the honorary members, he said, “Gentlemen, you all know why we are here today. We are considering whether we shall raise the siege of Casale and rescue Mantua in the name of the claims of the Duke of Nevers – claims we have affirmed and supported – and oppose the schemes of the Duke of Savoy in Montferrat. Although the right to declare war and peace is a royal right, we wish to hear your opinions in the hope they will cast some light on the matter before we make our decision, while reserving the right to make that decision regardless of your advice. I call upon our minister, Cardinal Richelieu, to summarise the state of affairs.”

Richelieu rose, bowed to the king and the queen mother, and said, “I will keep this brief. In his dying statement, Vincent de Gonzague, the Duke of Mantua, bequeathed all his rights to the Duchy of Mantua to the Duke of Nevers, who was his closest relative since he had no male heir. The Duke of Savoy had hoped to marry his son to Gonzague’s daughter, who as heiress to Mantua and Montferrat would thus augment his domain and make him a power in Italy. It is that ambition that has so often led him to betray his promises to France. This minister of His Majesty Louis XIII thinks it good policy to support Nevers, as placing a Frenchman on the thrones of Mantua and Montferrat will give us a position of strength in Lombardy. There, in between the Pope and the Venetians, we will be able to offset the power of Spain and Austria and neutralize their influence in northern Italy. “The recent actions of this servant to His Majesty have been in service to this policy. It was to prepare the way for this Italian campaign that we sent a preliminary force south several months ago. That army, under the command of Marshal Créquy, was defeated, not by the Duke of Savoy, as the enemies of France have been quick to declare but by incompetence almost amounting to treason, as our infantry and knights, unfed and unsupplied, deserted in the face of starvation. “However, our policy is unchanged, and we have only been awaiting a favourable opportunity to continue the campaign. This minister of His Majesty believes that that time has come. With La Rochelle taken, our army and fleet are freed up for new commitments. The question before Your Majesty is, do we act now or wait? This minister believes we should proceed with the war immediately and I’m ready to respond to any and all objections.”

And then bowing to the king and to Queen Marie, the cardinal resumed his seat, leaving the floor to his opponents – or rather his only opponent, Cardinal Bérulle. The latter, in his turn, knowing that this was his cue to respond, glanced at the queen mother. She replied with a small gesture, at which he rose, bowed to their Majesties, and said, “This project of pursuing a war in Italy, despite the apparent good reasons put forth by Cardinal Richelieu, seems upon closer inspection not only dangerous but outright impossible. Germany is now nearly subdued that provides the Emperor Ferdinand with far more armies than France can muster. Moreover His Majesty Philip IV, the august brother of the queen, has from the mines of the New World sufficient treasure to raise more armies than even the ancient kings of Persia. Instead of meddling in Italy, the Emperor is certain to devote his efforts to further suppression of the unruly Protestants, to recover the bishoprics, monasteries, and other Church property they have unjustly seized. Why should France, the eldest daughter of the Church, oppose such a noble and Christian pursuit? Wouldn’t it be better for the king to emulate this policy and devote our efforts to eradicating heresy within our own borders, while the Emperor and the King of Spain do the same within the borders of Germany and the Netherlands? And yet, in direct opposition to such pious efforts, Sir de Richelieu proposes peace with England and an alliance with heretical powers, acts which can only tarnish His Majesty’s glory. Instead of making peace with England, should we not, while we have the chance, continue our war against Charles I and stop his persecution of English Catholics? Must France forget how the ladies and servants of Queen Henriette were driven from her, in violation of a solemn treaty? Will not the Lord reward the restoration of the true religion in England, as well as the expungement of heresy in France, Germany, and the Netherlands? In the sincere belief that I speak in the interests of France and throne, I place my humble opinion at their Majesties’ feet.”

And Cardinal Bérulle sat in his turn, after acknowledging the supporting nods of those in Queen Marie’s faction, including that of Keeper of the Seals Marillac, brought into the fold thanks to Madam de Fargis. The king then turned to Cardinal Richelieu. “You hear, Sir Cardinal?” he asked. “If you have a response, respond.”

Richelieu rose. “I think my honourable colleague, Sir Cardinal de Bérulle,” he said, “is misinformed about both the political situation in Germany and the financial condition of Spain. The armies of the Emperor Ferdinand, though formidable, are not yet in command of Germany. And this minister of His Majesty knows that some of these Imperial armies of which Cardinal Bérulle speaks really owe their allegiance to Maximilian, Duke of Bavaria and head of the Catholic League. Rather than siding with the emperor, we should press the lion of the north, the great Gustavus Adolphus, to move against him. A few hundred thousand livres in bright, shining gold are all it will take to persuade him. Between the Protestant forces of Gustavus Adolphus and the Catholic forces of Maximilian, Ferdinand’s armies will have plenty to keep them occupied. As to the imaginary treasures of King Philip IV, allow this minister to clarify their true value. The King of Spain takes in just five hundred thousand crowns per year from the West Indies, and two months ago the Council of Madrid was quite dismayed to learn that Admiral Hein of the Netherlands took and sank the Spanish treasure fleet from South America in the Gulf of Mexico, a loss of twelve million crowns. This was such a disaster that His Majesty the King of Spain found himself unable to send the Emperor Ferdinand the million in gold he had promised. Now, to address the second part of my colleague’s discourse, this minister will humbly observe that His Majesty cannot submit with honour to the eviction of the rightful Duke of Mantua, whom we have not only recognised but who was named heir thanks to the persuasive influence of our ambassador, Sir de Saint-Chamont, upon the late and former duke. His Majesty must not only come to the aid of his allies in Italy but also protect that lovely European country from the schemes of Spain, who intends to subdue it forever, increasing its power where it is already too powerful. If we do not strongly support the Duke of Mantua, he will be unable to resist the power of Spain, and will be forced to become just one more tributary to the Court of Spain. Furthermore, don’t forget that the late Duke Vincent was about to commit Montferrat to us as well, in order to spite Charles-Emmanuel and confound the plots of Savoy. Finally, it is the opinion of this minister of the crown that it is our duty to punish the temerity of the Duke of Savoy, who has opposed our interests for the past thirty years. If he is not called to account for his numberless intrigues against us, including his involvement in the conspiracies of Chalais and Biron, and his alliance with the English in their trespasses at the Island of Ré and at La Rochelle, it will be to France’s eternal shame.”

Then, turning to the king and addressing him directly, the cardinal said, “By taking the rebellious city of La Rochelle, Sire, you not only won glory, you put the State in a most advantageous position for Your Majesty’s next move. Italy, oppressed for years by the troops of the King of Spain and the Duke of Savoy, cries out for the aid of your victorious arms. Will you refuse to take up the cause of your neighbours and allies, who are about to be unjustly stripped of their rightful heritage? As for me, Sire, I, your minister, dare promise you today that if you take up this noble resolution, your success will be no less than at the siege of La Rochelle. I am no prophet” – and Richelieu looked with a smile toward his colleague, Cardinal Bérulle – “nor the son of a prophet but I can assure Your Majesty that, if we lose no time in carrying out this plan, you will deliver Casale and bring peace to northern Italy before the end of May. And then, returning with your army through Languedoc, you will finish by completely reducing the Huguenots in July. Then Your Majesty, victorious everywhere, can take his rest in Fontainebleau, or wherever he desires, during the beautiful days of autumn.”

(Our readers may find this chapter a bit long and dry but our respect for the facts of history leads us to reproduce every detail of this great meeting in the Luxembourg that decided on the war in Italy, including all the speeches of the two cardinals. Our claim is that a historical novel should entertain both those readers who know the history it’s based upon, and those who are learning about it from what we write.) At this, gestures of approval were seen among the auxiliary gentlemen invited to the meeting, especially from the Duke of Angouleme and the Duke of Guise. The king spoke. “His Eminence,” he said, “when he speaks of himself and our policy, refers to himself as ‘the minister of the king,’ because that policy is based upon my direct orders. Indeed, we believe that this war in Italy is necessary, that we must support our allies, and that we must maintain our position by opposing both the power and the influence of Spain. Our honour is at stake.”

Despite the respect owed to the king, the only applause to this came from the friends of the cardinal, while those of the queen mother’s faction could barely restrain their mutterings of disapproval.

Marie de Médicis and Cardinal Bérulle exchanged a few words in a lively undertone. The king’s expression was stern. He cast a sidelong, almost threatening glance toward the mutterers, and continued:

“The issue we must now deal with is not peace or war, as war has been decided upon but rather when we shall take the field. Opinions will be solicited, on the understanding that we reserve the ultimate decision to ourselves. Please speak to this, Sir de Bérulle, recognising the respect we have for your advice, even when we do not follow it.”

Marie de Médicis made a nod of thanks toward Louis XIII, then said to Bérulle, “An invitation from the king is an order. Speak, Your Eminence.”

Bérulle rose. “The minister of the king,” he said, emphasising the title, “proposes an immediate commencement to this war but I am sorry to say that I am diametrically opposed to such haste. If I am not mistaken, His Majesty has expressed a desire to lead this war in person. However, there are at least two reasons to delay. The first is this: the king’s army, fatigued from the long siege of La Rochelle, needs to recuperate in winter quarters. Marching the troops from the shores of the ocean to the foothills of the Alps, without giving them time to rest, risks seeing them desert in droves. It would be cruel to subject these good soldiers to the rigors of winter in the snow-covered mountains, even if led there by the king. Even if we had the necessary funds for this that we do not, as shown by the fact that it’s been barely a week since Your Majesty’s august mother requested a hundred thousand livres and was told by his minister that she could have no more than fifty thousand – to summarise, even if we had the funds, all the mules in the kingdom would not suffice to carry the food the army would need. Not to mention the fact that it’s impossible to move our artillery in the winter, especially along unknown routes our engineers have never studied. Wouldn’t it be wiser to wait until the spring? In the meantime, we can make all the necessary preparations for moving our men and materiel by sea. The Venetians, who have a far greater stake in the affairs of Mantua than we do, have made no move to oppose the invasion of Montferrat by Charles-Emmanuel, and will do nothing to support this enterprise of the king. If the oppression of the Duke of Mantua is such an important issue, why does Venice that is so much closer than France, do nothing? Finally, the matter that should concern His Majesty above all others should be to avoid an open break with that most powerful of all Catholic monarchs, the King of Spain. That would be a far greater injury to the State than the fall of Casale and Mantua. I have spoken!"

Cardinal Bérulle's speech made a definite impression upon the King's Council. Rather than opposing a war which the king supported, he had outlined the probable costs and liabilities of that war. The officers invited to the council – Bellegarde, the Duke of Angouleme, the Duke of Guise, General Marillac – were no longer as young as they had been, and perhaps were less eager for the opportunities of war than to avoid its fatigues and dangers. Cardinal Richelieu rose once more. "I will respond to all the points made by my honourable colleague," he said. "First, though I don't think His Majesty has made a final decision on the matter, I do believe he plans to conduct this war in person. His Majesty, in his wisdom, must make that decision, though I fear he may sacrifice his own interests to those of the State, as a king, in his duty, must do. As to the question of the army's fatigue that Cardinal Bérulle is so anxious about, if the troops are transported by sea and landed at Marseilles, they will still have to march to our headquarters at Lyon. Better for them to march at a measured pace through France, well fed, well housed, and well paid. That addresses the issue of desertion. As to the difficulties of taking the army across the Alps, it is better to fight nature now than to fight through our enemies' defences later, if we give them time to fortify the route we must take. It's true that last week I had to grant the king's august mother only fifty thousand livres when she asked for a hundred thousand but that reduction had been specifically approved by the king due to the imminent expense of the coming war. The proposed campaign is well within our means, especially since, by engaging my honour and my property, I have managed to borrow six million crowns to support it. As to the route we must take, it has in fact been surveyed and mapped. His Majesty has long had this campaign under consideration, and ordered me to send people into Dauphiné, Savoy, and Piedmont on reconnaissance. Sir de Pontis and Sir d'Escures have already made detailed maps of the terrain. Thus all the preparations for war have been made: the money for the campaign is in the coffers, the troops are ready, the maps are made – and a foreign war, as His Majesty points out, adds much more glory to the throne than a civil war such as that of La Rochelle. Spain's efforts to occupy Italy are vulnerable if we act quickly, so I implore His Majesty to undertake this campaign as soon as we can. And so I, in my turn, have spoken."

The cardinal resumed his seat, while looking toward Louis XIII with a gaze that seemed to plead with the king to support the proposal he had made. The king seemed to pay no attention to the cardinal, raising his hand as soon as the latter had finished speaking. "Gentlemen," he said, "it is my will that you pay heed to my minister, Cardinal Richelieu. We have decided upon war against the Duke of Savoy, and it is our desire that we waste no time in taking the field. Those of you who have requests for your preparations should make them to Sir Cardinal. In good time, I will decide if I will lead this war in person, and if so, who shall be my lieutenant general. Having so decided, this council is at an end." The king rose. "Gentlemen, I pray God shall keep you. Goodnight."

And with a bow to the queen mother, Louis XIII took his leave. The cardinal had won both points he'd pressed: the war against the Duke of Savoy and the immediate commencement of the campaign. So he had no doubt that he would win the third – that is, he would be given charge of the war in Italy, as he had for the siege of La Rochelle. Marie de Médicis marched out, gritting her teeth in anger, accompanied only by Bérulle and Vautier. "I fear we must say," said Bérulle, "like François I after Pavia, 'All is lost save honour!'"

"Not so!" said Vautier. "All is not lost, as the king has not yet named Richelieu as his lieutenant general."

"Don't you see," said the queen mother, "that in the king's mind Richelieu's already been appointed to that post?"

"Maybe," said Vautier, "but it's not yet final."

"Do you see any way to prevent this appointment?"

"Perhaps," said Vautier, "but I need to speak to Sir, the Duke of Orléans, right away."

"I'll get him," said Bérulle, "and bring him to you."

"Go," said the queen mother, "and don't waste a moment." Then, turning to Vautier, she said, "What do you have in mind?"

"When we are in a place where we can be sure of not being overheard, I'll tell Your Majesty."

"Come then." The queen and her adviser hurried down a corridor leading to the private apartments of Marie de Médicis.

105 The Plan of Vautier

Though he had rooms in the queen mother's Luxembourg Palace, the king returned to the Louvre to avoid what he felt were the inevitable objections that would come from the two queens. And indeed, after Marie de Médicis returned to her chambers where she heard and approved Vautier's latest plan before resorting to it she decided to make one last attempt to change her son's mind. As for Louis XIII, as soon as he returned home, he called for l'Angely. But only after he'd inquired if there had been any word from Baradas. Baradas had said nothing, and sent no word. It was the stubborn silence of his sulky page that had been the cause of his bad mood at the King's Council. Vautier had guessed that was the reason, and based his new plan upon it. Indeed, Louis XIII, though he'd made a few advances toward Miss de Lautrec, following through on his promise to l'Angely, was still dreaming about Baradas. This was exactly what l'Angely feared, so when he was called, he made haste to come and throw himself at the king's feet. For an unexpected obstacle had arisen in l'Angely's project, a mystery that no one had been able to explain, even to the king. The previous evening, though she was supposed to be attending the queen, Miss de Lautrec had been absent from her circle, and Louis XIII, asking about it, had gotten no answer from the queen's ladies beyond astonishment. Miss de Lautrec had not been seen at the Louvre all day. The queen had inquired at her rooms and around the palace but no one had been able to give her any news. The king, piqued by this absence, had asked l'Angely to make his own inquiries, and that was why he'd called for his fool as soon as he'd returned. But l'Angely, who'd had no more luck than the others, had nothing to report. In fact, Louis XIII was less concerned about the absence of Miss de Lautrec than he was about that of Baradas but he'd come to believe that l'Angely was nearly infallible, and was astounded by his failure. So he was sinking into melancholy, bemoaning the way fate seemed to oppose him at every turn, when Beringhen gently scratched at the door. The king, recognising Beringhen's particular signal, and thinking that here was one more devoted person to share his misery, called out softly, "Enter."

Sir Premier came in. "What do you wish of me, Beringhen?" the king asked. "Don't you know that I hate to be disturbed when l'Angely and I are sunk in ennui?"

"You didn't hear that from me," said l'Angely. "Welcome in, Sir Beringhen."

"Sire," said the Valet, "I never permit myself to disturb Your Majesty when I know you wish to be bored in peace but I couldn't disobey orders from Their Majesties Queen Marie de Médicis and Queen Anne of Austria."

"What!" cried Louis XIII. "The queens, here?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Both of them?"

"Yes, Sire."

"And they want to talk to me?"

"Yes, Sire. Together."

The king looked around, as if he might find some way to escape but at his first move the door opened and in came Marie de Médicis, followed by Queen Anne of Austria. The king turned pale and exhibited the slight tremor he suffered when agitated but he drew himself together, resolving to be impervious to whatever plea was coming. He faced the danger like a sulky and stubborn bull lowering its horns. He turned first toward his mother, his most dangerous antagonist. "Upon my honour as a gentleman, Madam," he said, "I thought that once the King's Council was over, I would be free from further persecutions. What do you want of me? Tell me quickly!"

"My son, I want nothing but you yourself," said Marie de Médicis, while Queen Anne, hands clasped, nodded in support and agreement. "Was it not enough that, weak and suffering though you are, that man forced you to endure six months in the swamps of Aunis? Now he wants to subject you to the cold and snow of the Alps in the dangerous depths of winter!"

"Bah, Madam," said the king. "When God spared me from the fevers of the swamp, was not the Cardinal taking the same risks? And now you say he will expose me and my household further. Well, I won't be braving the snow and ice of the Alps alone. I shall give the soldiers an example of courage and perseverance, and he will be there beside me."

"I don't doubt that, my son – the Cardinal himself made the same point. But how can you compare the importance of his life to that of risking yours? The monarchy can lose ten ministers like Sir Cardinal without suffering but you ...! At your least illness, France trembles with fear, and your mother and your wife pray to God to preserve you."

At this, Queen Anne fell to her knees. "Sire," she said, "we are on our knees not only before the Lord but before you, to beg you as we plead with God not to abandon us. Please consider that what Your Majesty may regard as your duty is to the rest of us a source of profound terror. If Your Majesty suffered a misfortune, what would happen to us, and to France?"

"The Lord God, if he permitted me to die, will have foreseen the consequences and will provide for them, Madam. It is impossible to change what has been resolved."

"Why is that?" asked Marie de Médicis. "If this unfortunate war is so necessary, despite your having decided on it against the advice of all your counsellors–"

"You mean all your counsellors, Madam," interrupted the king.

"If it is necessary," Marie de Médicis continued, ignoring the interruption, "why must you go in person? Can't your beloved minister–"

"You know, Madam," the king interrupted for a second time, "I don't particularly like Sir Cardinal. But I respect him, I admire him, and after God, he is this realm's greatest defender."

"Well, Sire, Providence will watch over the realm, whether or not you are with the cardinal. Charge your minister with conduct of the war and stay safely near to us."

"Oh, yes, and open the way for insubordination among the generals! To enable your de Guise, Bassompierre, and Bellegarde to refuse to obey a priest and jeopardise the fortunes of France! No, Madam! To recognise the genius of Sir Cardinal is not enough, I must support him as well. Ah, if only there was a prince of the house I could trust!"

"Don't you have a brother? Don't you have Sir?"

"Umpf. Permit me to tell you, Madam, you are too indulgent toward one who has been disobedient as a son and rebellious as a brother!"

"But that's just it, my son. To bring peace back to our family, we must embrace the exile, we must love even the son who, admittedly, deserves to be punished rather than rewarded. But it is at supreme moments like this when logic must cease to drive our policy, when to rule well means to love well. God himself shows us by example that sometimes we punish the good and reward the bad. Sire, charge your prime minister with the conduct of this war, and put Sir subordinate to him as lieutenant general. I'm certain that if you give your brother this responsibility, he will give up his insane pursuit of Princess Marie de Gonzague."

"You forget, Madam," said Louis XIII, frowning, "that it is I who am king, and therefore the master – and if my brother wished to take part in this effort, he could long ago have done so, with my consent rather than at my orders. Defying my right to rule is not the way to earn the right to command. I am resolved, Madam. In the future, I will command, and he will obey. This has been my determination for the last two years – that is to say, since the incident in the garden at Amiens." He emphasised the last words, while looking meaningfully at Queen Anne of Austria. "And for the last two years, I have found this policy a good one."

Anne, who was still on her knees before the king, arose at these harsh words and raised her hands to her eyes, as if to hide her tears. The king made a motion toward her but the move was barely visible and was immediately suppressed. Nonetheless, his mother noticed it, and seized his hands. "Louis, my child," she said, "this is not a dispute, this is simply a plea. I'm not a queen speaking to a king, I'm merely a mother talking to her son. Louis, in the name of my love that you sometimes slight though you always do it justice in the end, yield to our entreaties. You are the king – in other words, the source of all power and wisdom. Revoke your decision, as is your right, and believe me, not only your wife and your mother but all of France will thank you."

"Very well, Madam," said the king, who just wanted this discussion to end. "I will sleep on it tonight, and reflect on what you've said."

And to his mother and his wife he gave one of those curt gestures that kings use to indicate that an audience is finished. The two queens withdrew, Anne of Austria taking the arm of the queen mother. But they'd gone no more than twenty paces down the corridor when a door opened, and around the jamb appeared the head of Sir, Gaston d'Orléans. "Well?" he asked.

"Well," said the queen mother, "we did what we could. It's up to you to do the rest."

"Do you know which room is Sir Baradas's?" asked the king's brother.

"I do. It's the fourth door on the left, almost directly across from the king's chamber."

"Good," said Gaston. "I'll get him to do what we want, even if I have to promise him my Duchy of Orléans – not that I'd give it to him."

The 2 queens and the young prince departed, the queens to return to their chambers, while His Royal Highness my Lord Gaston d'Orléans tiptoed in the opposite direction, to the apartment of Sir Baradas. We don't know exactly what passed between Sir and the young page, whether Sir promised him the Duchy of Orléans, or one of his lesser duchies of Dombes or Montpensier; all we know is that half an hour after entering the tent of Achilles, the modern Ulysses made his way, still on tiptoe, to the chambers of the queens. Once there, he opened the door with a cheerful air and said, in a voice full of hope, "Victory! He's returned to the king." And indeed at almost that very moment, surprising His Majesty when he least expected it, Sir Baradas, without bothering to scratch at the door as etiquette demanded, entered the chambers of King Louis XIII, who recognised his page with a cry of joy and welcomed him with open arms.

The Overlooked Wisp of Straw & the Unnoticed Grain of Sand

While these low intrigues were plotted against him, the Cardinal was bent over and peering, by the light of a lamp, at a map of what were then called “the Marches of the Realm.” This map showed, in great detail, the border between France and Savoy, as surveyed by the engineer-geographer Sir de Pontis. The Cardinal also had before him the route the army must follow, the towns and villages where it would stop, and the roads and paths by which the food necessary to feed thirty thousand men would get to them. This map, prepared by Sir d’Escures, accurately showed every valley, mountain, river, and even stream. The Cardinal was delighted: it was the most detailed map he’d ever seen. Just as Bonaparte in March 1800, stretched out across the map of Italy, pointed at the plains of Marengo and said “This is where I will defeat Mélas,” so Cardinal Richelieu, more a man of war than of the church, said “This is where I will defeat Charles-Emmanuel.” Delighted, he turned to Sir de Pontis and said, “Sir Viscount, you are a loyal servant of the king – but more than that, you’re clever, and if this war turns out as well as we hope, you are due for a reward. And as I have no doubt of the outcome, you may ask for your reward in advance.”

Sir de Pontis bowed. “My Lord, every man has ambitions, in the head or in the heart. Mine is in my heart, and since Your Eminence asks, I will open my heart to you.”

“Ah!” said the cardinal. “You are in love, Viscount?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“And you love above your rank?”

“Not my rank but perhaps my fortune.”

“And how can I serve you in such a case?”

“The father of the woman I love is a faithful servant of Your Eminence, who will do nothing without your permission.”

The cardinal thought for a moment, as if plumbing his memory. “Ah!” he said. “You’ve been close to the queen in the last year, haven’t you – and so you’ve seen Miss Isabelle de Lautrec?”

“Yes, My Lord,” said the Viscount of Pontis, blushing.

“But I don’t believe Miss de Lautrec has been presented to His Majesty as your fiancée, no?”

“No, My Lord – not as my fiancée. In fact, when I spoke to Sir de Lautrec of my love for her, at the first words he said, ‘Isabelle is not yet sixteen. In a couple of years, after the affair in Italy is settled, we may discuss this again – and then, if you still love her, and you have the approval of the cardinal, I would be happy to call you my son.’”

“And Miss de Lautrec – what did she think of her father’s promise?”

“When I told Miss de Lautrec of my love, and that her father permitted me to speak of it to her, she promised – or rather, I should say, admitted to me – that her heart was free, and she had too much respect for her father to disobey him.”

“And when did she say that to you?”

“A year ago, My Lord.”

“And have you discussed it with her since?”

“Not ... frequently.”

“When was the last time you spoke to her of your love?”

“Four days ago.”

“How did she respond?”

“She blushed and stammered out a few words that I put down to embarrassment.”

The cardinal smiled and said to himself, “It seems to me she left something out of her confession.”

The Viscount of Pontis looked anxiously at the cardinal. “Does Your Eminence have an objection to my ambition?” he asked.

“Not at all, Viscount, not at all. If you love Miss de Lautrec, there may be obstacles ... but none of them will come from me.”

The viscount appeared relieved. “Thank you, My Lord,” he said, bowing.

At that moment, the clock struck two in the morning. The cardinal dismissed the viscount with some sadness, for, based on Isabelle’s confession, he knew it would be difficult, if not impossible, to grant this loyal servant the reward he desired. He was preparing to retire to his chambers when the door to Madam de Combalet’s chambers opened and she appeared on the threshold, a smile lighting up her face. “My dear Marie,” said the cardinal, “should you be disturbing yourself at this late hour, when you should be taking the opportunity to get some sleep?”

“My dear Uncle,” said Madam de Combalet, “joy can displace sleep as much as sorrow. When you are sad, you let me share your sorrow. When you are victorious, shouldn’t I share in your victory?”

And you won a victory today, did you not?”

“Yes, Marie – a genuine victory,” he said, his heart swelling in his chest.

“Well,” Madam de Combalet said, “when you are victorious, allow me to share your triumph.”

“You have a right to share my joy, dear Marie, because you are entitled to it. You’re part of my life, a part of everything that happens to me, happy or unhappy. However, for once I can breathe freely, for my victory comes untainted. This time I didn’t have to climb by stepping on another, or by sending an enemy to the scaffold. The greatest victories, Marie, are achieved through peaceful means, and are due to persuasion alone. Those who are coerced by force become our enemies but those who succumb to reason become our allies. If God guides me, my dear Marie, within six months there will be a new power in Europe, feared and respected by all other powers – and that power will be France. All I need is for Providence to protect me for six months more from those two treacherous women! In six months, the siege of Casale will be lifted, Mantua will be rescued, and the Protestants of Languedoc, seeing me return from Italy with a victorious army, will sue for peace without the need, I hope, of further warfare. And then the pope will cease to oppose me, the king will favour me as he does now, and I will be able to exercise both temporal and spiritual power in France. Unless His Majesty encounters on the road one of those overlooked wisps of straw or unnoticed grains of sand that can overthrow even the mightiest project, I will be master of France and Italy! So kiss me, Marie, and go sleep the sleep you deserve. As for me, I’m not sure I’ll sleep but at least I’ll try.”

“But tomorrow you’ll be a wreck.”

“No, in lieu of sleep, this joy will carry me through.”

“May I be permitted, my dear Uncle, to check upon you when I awake tomorrow, to see how you passed the night?”

“Come in early to be my sunrise, or late to be my sunset – so long as I get to see your beautiful eyes, I know the day will be fine. May your night be fine as well.”

And, kissing Madam de Combalet on the forehead, he led her to the door of his study and stood in the doorway, watching until she was lost in the darkness of the stairs. Only then did the cardinal close the door. He was about to go to his bedchamber but as he was leaving he heard a small knock on the panel that led to Marion Delorme’s house. He thought he must have been mistaken but, as he stopped and listened, the knock came again, louder and more urgent. He had not been mistaken: someone was at the door that communicated with the neighbouring house. Richelieu went to the main door to his office and turned the key in the lock, then approached the secret panel. “Who knocks?” he asked quietly.

“It’s me,” a woman’s voice said. “Are you alone?”

“Yes.”

“Then let me in. I have something to report that I think is more than a little important.”

The cardinal looked around to make sure he was, in fact, alone, and then pushed a spring that opened the secret panel. A handsome young man waited in the doorway, twirling a fake moustache. It was Marion Delorme. “Ah! Here you are, the pretty page boy,” Richelieu said smiling. “I confess that if I had been expecting someone at this hour, it wouldn’t have been you.”

“Didn’t you say to me, ‘Whatever the hour, if you have something important to tell me, ring the bell, and if that doesn’t work, knock on the door?’”

“I said that, my dear Marion, and thank you for remembering it.”

And taking a seat, the cardinal motioned to Marion to sit beside him. “In this costume?” said Marion, laughing and pirouetting on tiptoe to show it off, displaying her natural elegance even in an outfit unsuited to her sex. “No, that would be disrespectful to Your Eminence. I will remain standing, if you please, My Lord, while I make my little report – unless you’d prefer I speak to you on one knee. But I suppose that would be too much like a confession that would be taking things too far.”

“Speak to me however you like, Marion,” said the cardinal, concern lining his forehead, “and quickly, for if I’m not mistaken, you bring me bad news. And in order to react to it, one can never hear bad news too soon.”

“I’m not sure whether the news is bad – though my feminine instincts tell me it isn’t good. You understand.”

“I’m listening.”

“Your Eminence is aware that the king has quarrelled with his favourite, Sir Baradas?”

“Say, rather, that Sir Baradas has quarrelled with the king.”

“That’s so, since Sir Baradas has been the one who was sulking. Well, tonight, while the king was with his fool, l’Angely, the two queens went in and then, after half an hour, came out again. They seemed upset and paused for a moment to speak with Sir, the Duke of Orléans, after which he went to speak with Sir Baradas. After talking in a window embrasure for nearly a quarter of an hour, the prince and the page reached an agreement, and came out into the hallway. Sir waited until he saw Baradas go into the king’s suite, after which he went down the corridor leading to the chambers of the queens.”

The cardinal brooded for some moments, and then said to Marion, without bothering to conceal his anxiety, “Your report is so detailed, I’m sure I have no need to ask if it is accurate.”

“It is – and in any event, I have no reason to hide anything from Your Eminence.”

“If it’s not indiscreet to ask, my dear friend, I’d like very much to know how you learned this.”

“It’s not indiscreet at all, as I hope to be of service to both you and the friend who gave me this news.”

“Who is this friend?”

“One who hopes to be a devoted servant to Your Eminence.”

“His name?”

“Saint-Simon.”

“The king’s new page? The short one?”

“Exactly.”

“Do you know him?”

“I know him but not well. Tonight he came to my house.”

“Before or after midnight?”

“I’ll tell you what I’m able to say, My Lord, and you’ll have to be satisfied with that. He came to my house tonight from the Louvre, all eager to tell me his story. On the way to visit his comrade Baradas, he saw the two queens come out of His Majesty’s chambers. They were so agitated that they didn’t notice him. He saw them stop in a doorway to speak with Sir, the Duke of Orléans but Saint-Simon continued on his way and went in to visit Baradas. The page was still sulking, and said that on the next day he planned to leave the Louvre. At that moment, Sir entered. He didn’t see Saint-Simon, who is rather small. He stood there silently and, as I have said, watched his comrade talk with the prince in the recess of a window. Then both left, Baradas to go to the king, and Sir, in all probability, to run to the queens to report his success.”

“And this rather small Saint-Simon came to tell you all this so you’d repeat it to me, you say?”

“My faith, I’ll give it to you in his own words: ‘My dear Marion, I think all these comings and goings portend a plot against Cardinal Richelieu. You are said to be one of his good friends – I don’t ask whether this is true or not but if it is, please tell him about it. And say that I am his humble servant.’”

“He’s a clever lad. I won’t overlook this service he’s done me, and you can tell him I said so. As for you, my dear Marion, how may I prove my gratitude?”

“Oh, My Lord.”

“I’ll think about it but in the meantime...” The cardinal drew from his finger a beautiful diamond ring. “Here,” he said, “take this diamond as a remembrance of me.”

But Marion, instead of offering her hand, put it behind her back. The cardinal reached around, took her hand, and put the ring on her finger himself. Then, kissing her hand, he said, “Marion, tell me you’re still my good friend and always will be.”

“My Lord,” Marion said, “I’m sometimes mistaken when it comes to lovers but as to friends, never.”

Then, hand on one hip and hat in the other, with the audacity of youth, beauty, she bowed like a real page, with a wink, and smile returned home, admiring her diamond and singing one of Desportes’s villanelles. The cardinal was alone once more, and passed a hand over his darkened brow. “So this,” he said, “is the overlooked wisp of straw, the unnoticed grain of sand. This,” he said with a contempt impossible to describe, “...Baradas.”

The Resolution of Richelieu

The cardinal spent a very restless night. As the beautiful Marion had thought, based on her previous experience with him on momentous occasions, the news she brought was serious: the king had reconciled with his favourite through the intercession of Sir, the cardinal’s bitter enemy. It opened the door to any number of disastrous possibilities, and the cardinal, restless, considered them all. By the next morning – not to say when he awoke but rather by the time he got up – he had a contingency in mind for each of them. Around nine o’clock in the morning, a messenger from the king was announced. The cardinal was already in his office, and the messenger was ushered in. With a deep bow, he handed His Eminence an envelope with a large red seal; without knowing what the letter contained, the cardinal gave him a purse of twenty pistoles, as he did whenever he received a letter from the king. The cardinal had purses prepared for these occasions in a nearby drawer. A glance told him the letter came directly from the king, as the address was written in His Majesty’s own hand. So he invited the messenger to wait in the office of his secretary, Charpentier, to carry back an immediate reply. He paused for a moment; then, like an athlete preparing for a physical challenge by rubbing oil on his muscles, he passed his handkerchief over his high forehead, damp with sweat, and prepared to break the seal. Meanwhile, without his noticing it, a door opened quietly, and the anxious face of Madam de Combalet appeared in the gap. She knew from Guillemot that her uncle had slept badly, and from Charpentier that a message had arrived from the king. Thus she ventured to intrude into her uncle’s office where, though uninvited, she felt sure of her welcome. But, seeing her uncle seated and holding in his hand a letter he hesitated to open, her unease was redoubled. Though ignorant of Marion Delorme’s visit, she nonetheless guessed that bad news had arrived since she’d last seen him. Richelieu finally opened the letter. As he read, something like a shadow appeared on his brow and grew to darken his visage. She slipped noiselessly into the room and along the wall, stopping a few feet from him and leaning on a chair. The cardinal started slightly but as he remained silent, Madam de Combalet believed she hadn’t been noticed. The cardinal continued reading, wiping his brow every few seconds. He was obviously dismayed. As Madam de Combalet approached, she could hear his ragged breathing. Then his hand seemed to lose the strength to hold it, and he dropped the letter on the desk. His head turned slowly toward his niece, revealing his pale and feverish face, and he held out toward her a trembling hand. Madam de Combalet seized his hand and kissed it. But the cardinal put his arm around her waist and drew her to him, pressing her hand against his heart, while with the other hand he offered her the letter. “Read it,” he said, trying to smile. Madam de Combalet read the letter to herself. “Read it aloud,” said the cardinal. “In order to face this, I need to hear it from another. And the sound of your voice will be reassuring.” Madam de Combalet read:

My good friend Sir Cardinal,

After careful consideration of the issues, both foreign and domestic, both equally serious, I have concluded that of the two, the domestic question is the most important. Considering the troubles plaguing the heart of our realm at the hands of Sir de Rohan and his Huguenots, we have decided, having confidence in the political genius you have so often displayed, to leave you in Paris to conduct affairs of State in our absence. Meanwhile we shall march south, with our beloved brother Sir as lieutenant general, and Gentlemen d’Angouleme, Bassompierre, Bellegarde, and de Guise as our captains, to raise the siege of Casale and thwart the ambitions of Sir the Duke of Savoy. We shall send daily couriers to you to maintain constant communication, and to ask for your advice should we find ourselves embarrassed by circumstance. Please provide, at your earliest convenience, a report of the exact state of the troops composing our army, as well as the artillery available for the campaign and what funds are available for our disposition, while retaining those you feel necessary to administer your responsibilities. I thought long and hard before making the decision of which I inform you, as I remembered the words of that great Italian poet, forced to stay in Florence due to the unrest in the city, yet wishing to go to Venice to complete an important negotiation: “If I stay, what will go on? If I go, what will stay behind me?” I am luckier than him, for I have you, my good friend Sir Cardinal, another self whom I can leave in Paris, to do everything I would do if I stayed. With that, my good friend Sir Cardinal, as I have no further business with you, I pray the good Lord shall protect you and keep you.

Your affectionate,

Louis

As she read this, Madam de Combalet’s voice gradually dwindled until, as she reached the last lines, she could barely be heard. However, though the cardinal had read the letter only once, its contents were already indelibly engraved in his memory, and he had only asked Madam de Combalet to read it in her soft voice to calm his mind that had an effect like that of the harp of David upon the tumult of Saul. When she had finished, she pressed her cheek to the cardinal’s brow. “Oh!” she said. “The scoundrels! They’re out to drive you to your grave!”

“Well, then, Marie – what would you do in my place?”

“Are you seriously asking for my advice, Uncle?”

“Quite seriously.”

“Well – if I were in your place ...!” she hesitated.

“If you were in my place ... what?”

“In your place, I’d abandon the whole lot of them to their fate. We’d soon see how they’d fare without you to manage things.”

“That’s your advice, Marie?”

She drew herself up and said, fiercely, “Yes, that’s my advice! None of these people – kings, queens, princes – are worthy of the efforts you make for them.”

“And what then will we do, if I take my leave of ‘these people,’ as you call them?”

“We’ll go to one of your abbeys whichever one is best, and live on our own. I will love you, and all we’ll care about is nature and poetry, forgetting all about these worms.”

“You are consolation personified, beloved Marie, and you’ve always been a good counsellor to me. And this time, moreover, your advice and my will are aligned. Last night, after you left my office, I was informed, more or less, of the blow that was about to strike. So I had all night to prepare for it and make up my mind as to how to respond.” He reached out his hand, drew a sheet of paper to him, and wrote:

Sire,

I could not be more flattered by this new mark of esteem Your Majesty wishes to bestow but unfortunately I cannot accept it. My health, always fragile, was taxed by the siege of La Rochelle that by the grace of God we concluded with success. But the effort has exhausted me, and my doctor, my family, and my friends all plead with me to avail myself of the absolute rest I can find only in the solitude of the country. Thus I mean to set aside all business, Sire, and withdraw to the house in Chaillot that I purchased for my retirement. I beg you, Sire, to please accept my resignation, while continuing to believe me the most humble, and especially the most devoted, of all your subjects.

– Armand, Cardinal Richelieu

Madam de Combalet had discreetly withdrawn while he was writing. But having signed it, he handed her the letter. As she read it quietly, great tears rolled down her cheeks. “You’re crying!” the cardinal said.

“Yes,” she said, “blessed tears!”

“Why do you call them blessed tears, Marie?”

“Because they spring from joy in my heart, despite the blindness of the king and the misery of his kingdom.”

The cardinal looked up and placed his hand on his niece’s arm. “You’re right,” he said, “but God, who may abandon a king, does not so easily abandon an entire kingdom. Our lives are short and ephemeral but that of a realm lasts for centuries. Believe me, Marie, France has too great a role to play in Europe to think that the Lord would look away from her. What I have begun, another will finish, and one man more or less will not change her destiny.”

“But is it fair,” said Madam de Combalet, “that the man who prepared the path for his country’s destiny should not be the one to accomplish it, that his should be the labour while another reaps the glory?”

“Now there, Marie,” said the cardinal, his brow clearing, “without intending to, you touch upon the great question men have asked the sphinx for three thousand years: why is it that those who create prosperity so often earn only misfortune? The sphinx in our hearts has another name: Doubt. Why should God, the supreme justice, allow such supreme injustice?”

“Dear Uncle, I have nothing to complain of God. I just want to understand.”

“God has the right to be unjust, Marie, for he has all eternity in which to repair injustice. If we could understand His secrets, we would see that what seems unfair to us serves His purposes in the end. The tension between His Majesty and myself, whom God preserve, had to be settled, if not today, then another day. Will the king decide in favour of his family, or in favour of France? Well, I am for France. And God is with France. In the end, who can be against me if God is on my side?”

He rang a bell. At the second ring, his secretary, Charpentier, appeared. “Charpentier,” he said, “compile a list of the troops ready to march to the Italian campaign, with a list of available artillery. I need this within a quarter of an hour.” Charpentier bowed and left. Then the cardinal returned to his desk, picked up his pen, and below the last line of his resignation, he wrote:

P.S.: Your Majesty will find enclosed a detailed list of the troops of the army, as well as their equipment. As for the funds, the remainder of the six million borrowed on my guarantee – the cardinal consulted a small notebook he always carried with him – 3882000 livres can be found in a strongbox, the key of which my secretary will have the honour to deliver directly to Your Majesty. As there may be those in the Louvre who fear there are state documents entrusted to me that may go astray, I give not only my office but my entire house to Your Majesty. As everything I have comes from you, all that I have is yours. My servants will continue their efforts on your behalf, and their daily reports will be sent to you. As of two o’clock on today’s date, Your Majesty may take full possession of my house. I finish these lines as I finished those above, daring to name myself the most obedient but also the most loyal, subject of Your Majesty.

– Armand, Cardinal Richelieu

As he wrote, the cardinal read what he was writing aloud, so his niece didn’t need to read the postscript to know what it said. Just then, Charpentier came in with his report: thirty-five thousand men were ready for the campaign, with seventy guns. The cardinal sealed the letter, put it and the report in an envelope, recalled the courier, and gave it to him, saying, “To His Majesty in person.” He gave him the usual purse, and added a second to the first. His carriage, according to the cardinal’s orders, was harnessed and ready. The cardinal went down to it, taking nothing from his house but the clothes he wore. He got into the carriage with Madam de Combalet and sent his single servant, Guillemot, up onto the box. He told the driver, “To Chaillot!” Then turning to his niece, he added, “If, within three days, the king himself has not come to Chaillot, we leave on the fourth for my bishopric of Luçon.”

108

Birds of Prey

As we have just seen, the advice of the Duke of Savoy had resulted in complete success: “If an Italian campaign is decided upon despite your opposition, get Gaston command of the army as a pretext for separating him from La Gonzague. The cardinal-duke, whose sole ambition is to be the foremost general of our age, will resign in protest. The king will accept the inevitable!”

By ten in the morning, the royalty in the Louvre was awaiting the cardinal’s decision, waiting impatiently but, strange to say, in perfect harmony. These royal personages were the king, the queen mother, Queen Anne, and Sir. Sir pretended to find a reconciliation with the queen mother as insincere as their quarrel had been. However, no matter how he appeared to get along with others, well or ill, Sir despised everyone equally; his cowardly and treacherous heart knew that, despite others’ smiles and praise, he was held in contempt, and he returned their contempt with hatred. The four were gathered in Queen Anne’s boudoir, wherein we last saw Madam de Fargis, with the casual depravity of her corrupt and lascivious nature, giving Her Majesty such good advice. In the chambers of the king, of Marie de Médicis, and of Sir Duke of Orléans, their accomplices stood awaiting their orders: Vieuville, Nogent-Bautru, and Baradas, now ascended to the height of his power, in the king’s suite; Cardinal Bérulle and Vautier in the queen mother’s rooms; while in the Duke of Orleans’s suite waited Doctor Senelle, who had penned the letter in cipher wherein Sir was invited, in the event of disgrace at Court, to take refuge in Lorraine – Senelle, the man whose letter had been sold to Father Joseph. His Grey Eminence, by his valet who, having been well rewarded for his betrayal, stood ready to betray him again. As for Queen Anne, she had her own confederates at hand: Madam de Chevreuse, Madam de Fargis, and the little dwarf Gretchen who, it will be remembered, had been a gift of the Infanta Claire-Eugénie, and who, thanks to her small stature, could be employed to go where those of ordinary size could not. At around half past ten – the time, we recall, when the cardinal was expected – his messenger arrived. As the king ordered he be admitted to the queen’s chambers, and as the cardinal had ordered him to deliver his letter directly to the king, he saw no reason to down to us is that he dined tête-à-tête with his favourite Baradas, and, after an hour and a half, got into his carriage and told his driver, “Place Royale, the house of Sir Cardinal.” He entered the office of his disgraced minister at 2 o’clock, led by the secretary Charpentier and sat in his chair with a sigh of satisfaction. He then said, smiling and without understanding all it meant, “At last! Now I’ll reign.”

109
The King Reigns

After the spending spree of the Regency, when all the funds of France were spent on fairs and festivals in honour of that handsome cavalier who’d gathered all power as queen’s favourite; when France, impoverished by the pillaging of the treasury of Henry IV that Sully had so painstakingly amassed, and then had to watch as the realm’s gold passed into the hands of d’Épermon, of de Guise, de Condé, and the other great nobles; when whatever was necessary was spent to stave off the hatred of a populace that suspected the queen of murdering her king – after all that, Louis XIII had known nothing but poverty, until he appointed Richelieu as his minister. It was due to the cardinal’s wise administration, learned from Sir de Sully but pursued with even greater integrity, that order had returned to the king’s finances and he became familiar with a metal he’d previously believed belonged only to Spain: gold. But what a price this iron minister exacted to reach that point! Nobility and clergy were exempt from taxes until 1795, after the general employee tax of 1789 had failed to stave off state bankruptcy. If the cardinal had proposed taxing the exempt classes, it would have been rejected out of hand. Driven by implacable necessity, he therefore turned to the very body of France: her people, the peasants and the poor. The French people were surrounded by enemies – to the west, the English; to the north and east, the Austrians; to the south, the Spanish – and in order to save the people, the cardinal plundered them. In four years, he’d increased tax revenues by nineteen million, necessary to support the army and create a navy. He’d had to close his eyes to the people’s misery, close his ears to the cries of the poor, ignoring their wretched figures and sullen gaze. He had to obtain the king’s attention and favour; but without a magic potion or enchanted ring, he had to resort to money, so money Richelieu found – and Louis XIII, who’d never had any cash, suddenly found it in his hands. This was the source of King Louis’s admiration for his minister – and of his jealousy. Who could fail to admire a man who could raise six million livres on his word alone when the king by word and even by signature, couldn’t raise fifty thousand? But the king had never quite been able to believe in the promised 3882000 livres – so the first thing he demanded from Charpentier was the key to this famous treasure. Charpentier, without comment, begged the king to get up, and then pushed the desk aside. He lifted the carpet upon which yesterday the cardinal, and today the king, had rested his feet, revealing a trap door. He unlocked it with a key and pulled the door open, revealing a large iron chest. This chest unlocked with a combination that Charpentier shared with the king. It opened with the same ease as the door, and to the dazzled eyes of Louis XIII was revealed the sum he was so eager to see. Then, presumably in response to orders he’d received, Charpentier bowed to the king, gave him the key, and withdrew, leaving the two majesties, monarchy and money, alone with each other. In that era, when banking was in its infancy, before paper money backed by shareholders was widespread, cash money was rare in France. The cardinal’s 3882000 livres was therefore in the form of about 1000000 crowns bearing the images of Charles IX, Henry III, and Henry IV, plus almost a million Spanish doubloons and 700000 or 800000 reales in Mexican gold. The balance was contained in a small bag of diamonds, each twisted like a candy in a paper wrapper, wearing its value on a label. Louis XIII, instead of feeling that joy which the sight of gold was supposed to evoke, was instead overcome with sadness; after seeing this wealth of coinage, recognising the kings stamped upon their faces, plunging his hand into the coffer’s depths to feel the weight of the bullion, and holding up the diamonds to view their clarity, he straightened and, standing, gazed down at those millions that had been garnered through such pain to the donors, and delivered by such devotion from their gatherer. He thought how easily, from this sum, he had already promised nearly three hundred thousand crowns to reward the devotion of his enemies, who hated the man who’d raised those funds. He wondered, in spite of himself, if, in his hands, that money would be spent in a manner as beneficial to France as if he’d left it in the hands of his minister. Then without withdrawing a single coin, he knocked twice on the panel to summon Charpentier. He ordered the secretary to lock the chest and close the trap door, and then gave him the key. “You’ll disburse nothing from this chest,” he said, “except on my written order.” Charpentier bowed. “With whom will I work?” asked the king.

“My Lord the cardinal,” replied the secretary, “always worked alone.”

“Alone? And what was he working on, all alone?”

“All the affairs of the State, Sire.”

“But no one could handle all the affairs of the State by himself!”

“He had agents who reported to him.”

“Who were his chief agents?”

“Father Joseph, Lopez the Spaniard, Sir de Souscarrières, and others I shall have the honour of naming to Your Majesty as matters arise or they come to present their reports. All have been informed that they will now be dealing with Your Majesty.”

“Very well.”

“In addition, Sire,” Charpentier continued, “there are the agents dispatched by the cardinal to the various powers of Europe: Sir de Bautru to Spain, Sir de La Saludie to Italy, and Sir de Chamassé to Germany. Letters have arrived announcing their return today, or tomorrow at the latest.”

“Upon their return, after having given them the instructions from Sir Cardinal, you will introduce them to me. Is there anyone currently waiting to report?”

“Sir Cavois, the Captain of the Cardinal’s Guard, who wishes the honour of being received by Your Majesty.”

“I have heard that Sir Cavois is an honest man and a courageous soldier. I shall be glad to receive him.”

Charpentier stepped to the outer door. “Sir Cavois,” he said. Cavois appeared.

“Come in, Sir Cavois, come in,” said the king. “You wished to speak with me?”

“Yes, Sire. I have a favour to ask of Your Majesty.”

“Say on. If it will help us to keep a good servant, we’ll grant it with pleasure.”

“Sire, I wish Your Majesty to accept my resignation.”

“Your resignation! But why, Sir Cavois?”

“I belonged to Sir Cardinal while he was a minister; but if he is no longer a minister, I belong to no one.”

“I beg your pardon, Sir but you belong to me.”

“I know that if Your Majesty insists, I shall be forced to remain in his service but I must warn him that I’ll be a poor servant.”

“And why would you be a poor servant in my service if you were not for Sir Cardinal?”

“Because my heart was in my service to him, Sire.”

“And it would not be with me?”

“For Your Majesty, Sire, I must confess I feel only duty.”

“And how did you become so tied to Sir Cardinal?”

“Well, it was because of his deeds.”

“And what if I want to do good deeds, even more so than him?”

Cavois shook his head. “It wouldn’t be the same.”

“It wouldn’t be the same?” repeated the king.

“I owe everything I have to Sir Cardinal. He brought me into his household, provided for my children, and most recently endowed me, or rather my wife, with a privilege that will bring in twelve to fifteen thousand a year.”

“What? Sir Cardinal gave his servant’s wives pensions from the State that pay twelve to fifteen thousand a year! That’s good to know.”

“I did not say a pension, Sire; I said a privilege.”

“And what is this privilege that was granted to Madam Cavois?”

“The right, shared with Sir Michel, to the monopoly on all sedan chairs on the streets of Paris.”

The king thought for a moment, his eyes cast down. Cavois stood, motionless, his hat held in his left hand, his right hand stiff at the seam of his breeches. “And what if I offered you, Sir Cavois, the same high position in my guard that you have in the Cardinal’s Guard?”

“You already have Sir de Jussac, Sire, and an exemplary officer to whom I’m sure Your Majesty wishes no harm.”

“I will promote Jussac to marshal.”

“If Sir de Jussac as I have no reason to doubt, loves Your Majesty as I do Sir Cardinal, he will prefer to remain as a captain near to his king rather than to become a marshal and leave him.”

“But, if you leave our service, Sir…”

“Such is my request, Sire.”

“…Will you accept a bonus of fifteen hundred or two thousand pistoles as a reward for your time spent with his Eminence?”

“Sire,” replied Cavois, bowing, “the time I spent with His Eminence has already been rewarded, for its merits and more. We’re going to war, Sire, and war takes money – lots of money. Keep the rewards for those who will fight, not for those who, like me, having devoted their fortunes to a man, will fall with that man.”

“Are all the servants of Sir Cardinal like you, Sir Cavois?”

“I think so, Sire, though some are more worthy.”

“So, you have no more ambitions or desires?”

“Nothing, Sire, other than the honour to follow Sir Cardinal wherever he goes, and continue to be part of his household, no matter how humble.”

“Very well, Sir Cavois,” said the king, piqued at the stubbornness of a captain who refused everything. “You are free.”

Cavois bowed and, backing out, ran into Charpentier as he came in. “And you, Sir Charpentier,” cried the king, “do you, like Sir Cavois, refuse to serve me?”

“No, Sire. I was ordered by Sir Cardinal to stay with Your Majesty until another minister was installed in his place, or His Majesty had a firm grasp of the work involved with the affairs of state.”

“And when I have a grasp of our affairs, or another minister is installed, what will you do then?”

“I will beg leave of Your Majesty to allow me to rejoin Sir Cardinal, who is accustomed to my service.”

“But what if I asked Sir Cardinal to let you stay with me?” asked the king. “When I have a minister who, unlike Sir Cardinal, doesn’t do everything himself, I’ll need an honest and intelligent man as aide, and I’m sure you qualify for the role.”

“I have no doubt, Sire, that Sir Cardinal would instantly grant the king’s request, as I am not worth causing dissension between my master and the king. But then I would have to throw myself at Your Majesty’s feet and say, ‘I have a father of seventy years, and a mother of sixty. Sir Cardinal has provided for them and rescued them from misery. Once I am no longer at the side of Sir Cardinal, my place is with them. Sire, allow a son to tend to his parents, and close their eyes when the time comes.’ And I’m sure Your Majesty would not only grant me my prayer, he would commend it.”

“To honour your mother and father, all their lives,” said the king, piqued even further. “The day a new minister is installed in place of Sir Cardinal, you will be free, Sir Charpentier.”

“Shall I give Your Majesty the key he entrusted me with?”

“No, keep it. If Sir Cardinal, who is so well served that the king must envy his servants, trusted you with it, I’m sure it couldn’t be in more honest hands. Remember, do not dispense any funds except at my written order, in my own handwriting.” Charpentier bowed. “Don’t you have here,” asked the king, “a certain Rossignol, who I’m told is clever at deciphering secret letters?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“I want to see him.”

“If you knock three times on the panel, you can summon him. Would His Majesty like to knock himself, or shall I do it?”

“Knock,” said the king.

Charpentier knocked thrice on the panel and Rossignol came through the door. He had a paper in his hand. “Shall I stay or go, sire?” asked Charpentier.

“Leave us,” said the king. Charpentier left. “You are called Rossignol?” asked the king.

“Yes, Sire,” replied the small man, while continuing to scan the paper.

“They say you are clever at deciphering?”

“In that regard, Sire, I don’t know anyone better.”

“You can decode any code you are given?”

“There is only one that, till now, has resisted me but with God’s help, I hope to master it.”

“What is the most recent letter you deciphered?”

“A letter from the Duke of Lorraine to Sir.”

“To my brother?”

“Yes, Sire, to His Royal Highness.”

“And what did the Duke of Lorraine have to say to my brother?”

“Your Majesty wants the full account?”

“Indeed!”

“I’ll go get it.” Rossignol turned to go, and then asked, “The original, or the translation?”

“Both, Sir.”

Rossignol darted out with the speed of a ferret, albeit one with a furrowed brow, and returned almost immediately with two papers in one hand, while continuing to study the one in his other. “Here they are, Sire,” he said, presenting the original from the Duke of Lorraine and its translation.

The king started with the original, and read, “If Jupiter ...”

“Sir,” said Rossignol, interrupting the king.

“...Is exiled from Olympus ...” continued Louis XIII.

“The Louvre,” said Rossignol.

“And why would Sir be exiled from the Court?” asked the king.

“Because he conspires,” Rossignol said calmly.

“Sir conspires? Against whom?”

“Against Your Majesty and the State.”

“Do you know what you are saying, Sir?”

“I am saying that Your Majesty should continue reading.”

“ ...He could,” read Louis XIII, “take refuge in Crete.”

“In Lorraine.”

“Minos ...”

“Duke Charles IV.”

“ ...Would take great pleasure in offering him hospitality. But the health of Cephalus ...”

“The health of Your Majesty.”

“He calls me Cephalus?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“I know who Minos was but I’ve forgotten Cephalus. Who was Cephalus?”

“A Thessalian prince, Sire, husband of a beautiful Athenian princess, who drove her from him because she had been unfaithful but with whom he was later reconciled.”

Louis XIII frowned. “So,” he said, “this Cephalus, husband of an unfaithful wife with whom he reconciles despite her infidelity – that’s me?”

“Yes, Sire – that is you,” Rossignol calmly replied.

“Are you sure?”

“For the love of God, yes! As Your Majesty will see.”

“Where were we?”

“If Sir’s exiled from the Louvre, he can take refuge in Lorraine. Duke Charles IV would take great pleasure in offering him hospitality. But the health of Cephalus ...’ – that is to say, the king; that’s where you’re, Sire.”

“...Cannot last long.’ What does that mean, cannot last long?”

“It means that Your Majesty is ill, very ill indeed – at least, such is the opinion of the Duke of Lorraine.”

“Ah!” said the king, turning pale. “So I’m ill, very ill indeed!” He searched for and found a mirror, looked at himself, and then patted his pockets for medicinal salts. Finding none, he made an effort to pull himself together and, in an agitated voice, continued to read. “‘Why, in the case of his death, should we not marry Procris ...’ – Procris?”

“That is, the queen,” said Rossignol. “Procris was Cephalus’s unfaithful wife.”

“...Why should we not marry Procris to Jupiter?’ To Sir?” cried the king.

“Yes, Sire. To Sir.”

“To Sir!” Sweat sprang from the king’s forehead, and he wiped it with a handkerchief, then continued, “‘The rumour at Court is that Oracle ...”

“His Eminence.”

“...Wants to replace Procris with a marriage to Venus ...”

The king looked at Rossignol who continued without replying to the king, to study the paper in his hand. “Venus?” repeated the king, impatiently.

“Madam Combalet,” Rossignol hastily replied.

“...To Cephalus,” continued the king. “Marry me to Madam de Combalet? Me? Where do they get these ideas? ‘Meanwhile, Jupiter’ – that is to say, Sir – ‘continues to court Hebe ...”

“Princess Marie de Gonzague.”

“...Feigning passion, as well as a falling-out with Juno.”

“The queen mother.”

“‘It is important that, to this end, Oracle’ – that is, the cardinal – ‘must mistakenly believe that Jupiter loves Hebe. Signed, Minos.’”

“Charles IV.”

“Ah!” murmured the king. “That explains his apparent reluctance to sacrifice his great love in order to become lieutenant general. So, my health cannot last, eh? And when I am dead, you will marry my brother to my widow! But, thanks be to God, though I may be ill, ‘very ill indeed,’ as they say, I’m not dead yet. So, my brother conspires, and if his conspiracy is discovered, he can escape to Lorraine and find refuge with the duke! Does he think France couldn’t swallow a mouthful like Lorraine, duke and all? Isn’t it enough that they gave us the Guises?”

Then, turning quickly to Rossignol, “And how,” the king asked, “did this letter come into the hands of Sir Cardinal?”

“He had it from Sir Senelle.”

“One of my own doctors,” said Louis XIII. “Truly, I am well served!”

“Foreseeing an intrigue between the Court of Lorraine and that of France, Sir Senelle’s valet had been suborned in advance by Father Joseph.”

“This Father Joseph seems to be a clever man,” said the king.

Rossignol winked. “He’s the shadow of His Eminence,” he said.

“So Senelle’s valet...?”

“Stole the letter and sent it to us.”

“Where was Senelle, then?”

“Not far from Nancy; the valet returned and said he’d inadvertently burned the letter with some other papers. The duke suspects nothing, and has sent a second letter to His Royal Highness Sir.”

“And how has my brother Jupiter responded to the wise Minos?” asked the king, laughing nervously, moustache twitching as he awaited the reply.

“I don’t yet know. This is his answer that I’m working on.”

“What! You have his answer there?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Give it to me.”

“Your Majesty won’t understand it, given that I don’t understand it yet myself.”

“Why is that?”

“Because after they lost the first letter, fearing some accident, they invented a new code.”

The king looked at the letter and read these completely unintelligible words: “‘Astra-so be-the-amb in joy as L.M.T. wants to be.’ When will you know what this means?”

“I’ll have it by tomorrow, Sire.”

“This is not my brother’s handwriting.”

“No, this time the valet didn’t dare steal the letter, lest he be suspected, so he copied it.”

“And when was this letter written?”

“Today at noon, Sire.”

“And you already have a copy?”

“Father Joseph handed it to me at two o’clock.”

The king remained thoughtful for a moment, then turned again to the little man, who had taken back the letter and was working to guess its meaning. “You’ll stay on with me, won’t you, Sir Rossignol?” he asked.

“Yes, Sire, until this letter is fully decrypted.”

“What, only until this letter is decrypted? Are you planning to rejoin Sir Cardinal?”

“Yes, in fact but only if he is once more a minister. If he isn’t a minister, he has no need for me.”

“But I have a need for you!”

“Sire,” said Rossignol, shaking his head so that his glasses nearly fell off, “I’m leaving France tomorrow.”

“Why’s that?”

“Because in serving Sir Cardinal, and through him Your Majesty, in deciphering the codes invented for their intrigues, I’ve made terrible enemies of the Great Nobles, enemies against whom only the cardinal could protect me.”

“But what if I protect you?”

“His Majesty may have the intention but...”

“But?”

“But he does not have the power.”

“What?” The king frowned.

“Moreover,” continued Rossignol, “I owe everything to Sir Cardinal. I was a poor boy in Alby when it chanced that the cardinal learned of my talent with ciphers. He took me on and gave me a position paying a thousand crowns, then two thousand, then added twenty pistoles for each letter I decoded. For six years I’ve deciphered one or two letters a week, so I have a tidy sum saved away.”

"Where?"

"In England."

"So you'll probably go to England and enter the service of King Charles?"

"King Charles offered me two thousand pistoles a year and fifty pistoles per letter deciphered if I would leave the service of Sir Cardinal. I refused."

"And if I offered you as much as King Charles has?"

"Sire, the most pressing need of a man on this earth is to stay above it. With Sir Cardinal in disgrace, even with Your Majesty's royal protection – or perhaps because of it – I have less than a week to live. When he left this house, it took all of his authority to make me stay here as long as I have but for Your Majesty, I am willing to risk my life ... for another twenty-four hours."

"So you're not willing to risk your life for me beyond that?"

"We owe our devotion to our parents and beyond that to a benefactor. Seek for devotion, Sire, from your parents or those for whom you've done well. I've no doubt Your Majesty will find it there."

"You have no doubt. Well, I have reason to doubt it!"

"Now that I have told His Majesty why I have stayed, that is, to perform a service – now that he knows the risks I run to remain in France even this long, I beg His Majesty not to oppose my departure, for which everything is prepared."

"I will not oppose it but on the express condition that you vow not to enter the service of any foreign prince who might use your talent against France."

"I give Your Majesty my word."

"Go. Sir Cardinal is very lucky to have servants such as you and your colleagues." The king looked at his watch. "Four o'clock. I will be back here at ten in the morning; make sure the translation of the new letter is ready by then."

"It will be, Sire."

As the king was reaching for his hat, Rossignol asked, "Wouldn't His Majesty like to speak with Father Joseph?"

"Of course, of course," said the king, "and when he comes, ask Charpentier to send him in."

"He's right here, Sire."

"Then have him enter, and I'll speak to him at once."

"Here he is, Sire," said Rossignol, withdrawing to defer to His Grey Eminence.

The monk appeared, and stood humbly waiting on the threshold of the study. "Come, come, Father," said the king.

The monk approached with every appearance of humility, head down and hands crossed on his breast. "Here I am, Sire," said the Capuchin, stopping four paces from the king.

"You were waiting, Father," said the king, looking at the monk with curiosity, because for him a whole new world was opening before his eyes. "Yes, Sire."

"How long?"

"For an hour or so."

"And you waited that long without anyone letting me know you were there?"

"A humble monk has nothing better to do, Sire, than to await orders from his king."

"I'm told you are a man of great ability, Father."

"My enemies may say that, Sire," replied the monk, eyes piously downcast.

"You helped the cardinal to bear the burden of his ministry?"

"As Simon of Cyrene helped Our Lord carry his cross."

"You are a great champion of Christianity, are you not, Father? If it was the eleventh century, you would, like Peter the Hermit, preach the crusade."

"I preach the crusade even in the seventeenth century, Sire, albeit without success."

"Indeed? How so?"

"I wrote an epic poem in Latin entitled the Turciade to inspire the Christian princes to take up arms against the Muslims. But much time has passed, and they show no signs of being inspired."

"You rendered great service to Sir Cardinal?"

"His Eminence was blocked at every turn but I helped as I could, according to my limited abilities."

"How much did His Eminence grant you per year?"

"Nothing, Sire. It is forbidden for our order to receive anything but alms. His Eminence paid only for my carriage."

"You have a carriage?"

"Yes, Sire but not in gratification of pride. I formerly rode an ass."

"The humble mount of Our Lord," said the king.

"But My Lord found that I did not travel fast enough."

"And so he gave you a carriage?"

"At first, Sire, I refused the carriage out of humility, so he gave me a horse. Unfortunately, this horse was a mare, and one day my secretary, who was riding a stallion..."

"Yes, yes, I understand," said the king hastily. "And that's when you accepted the carriage offered by the cardinal?"

"Yes, Sire – I resigned myself to it. For I thought," said the monk, "it would be pleasing to God to see the humble glorified."

"Despite the cardinal's retirement, my Father, I would like to keep you near me," said the king. "Tell me what you require."

"Nothing, Sire. For the sake of my salvation, I may already have been too forward in the acceptance of honours."

"Have you no desires I can satisfy?"

"Only to allow me to return to my monastery that perhaps I never should have left."

"You are too useful in the affairs of state for me to allow that."

"I could see such things only through the eyes of His Eminence, Sire. With that illumination gone, I am blind."

"In every estate, my Father, even the religious, it's possible to see ambition awarded according to its merits. God has not given you your talent in order for it to be wasted. Sir Cardinal is an example of the heights one might achieve."

"And from which, therefore, one can fall."

"But no matter how far you fall, if you fall wearing a cardinal's red hat, the descent is bearable."

A flash of avarice glimmered beneath the Capuchin's lowered lashes. This glimmer did not escape the king's notice. "Have you ever thought about a high-ranking post in the Church?" he asked.

"I might have had such thoughts but only with Sir Cardinal."

"Why only with Sir Cardinal?"

"Because it would have taken all his influence with Rome to achieve such a goal."

"And you think my influence doesn't match his?"

"Your Majesty proposed to give the Archbishop of Tours a cardinal's hat but he was an archbishop – not a poor Capuchin monk."

Louis XIII studied Father Joseph as closely as he could but it was impossible to read anything in those downcast eyes or on those features of marble. Only the lips seemed alive. "Furthermore," continued the monk, "there is the single grave fact that overshadows all others in accepting those tasks placed upon me by Sir Cardinal and God; and that is the danger of committing sins that may jeopardize the salvation of one's soul. But with Sir Cardinal, who wields the power of Rome for both penitence and remission, I need have no fear, for if I sin by day, I confess by night. Sir Cardinal absolves me, and I sleep in tranquillity. However, if I serve a secular master, even a king, well ... a king cannot absolve me. I cannot sin for the state and retain a clear conscience."

The king continued to study the monk as he spoke, and the more he said, the more a certain repugnance grew on the king's face. "And when would you like to return to your monastery?" he asked when Father Joseph had finished.

"As soon as I have Your Majesty's permission."

"You have it, my Father," the king snapped.

"Your Majesty overwhelms me," said the monk, crossing his hands on his breast and bowing to the ground.

And unlike how he'd entered, neither stiff nor humble, he strode out without even turning to say farewell from the doorway. "Ambitious hypocrite! You, at least, I won't miss," murmured Louis XIII.

Then, after a moment surveying the shadows falling in the study, he said, "No matter. But one thing is certain: if I abdicated the throne tonight, as this morning the cardinal did this office, I wouldn't be able to find four men to follow me into exile and disgrace. Not three, not two, maybe not even one."

Then he said, "Well, maybe one – there's still my fool, l'Angely. Though of course, he's a fool!"

110
The Ambassadors

The next morning at ten o'clock, as he'd promised, the king was once again in the cardinal's office. The lessons he was learning, while humiliating, were also fascinating. On his return to the Louvre the day before, he had received no one, closeting himself with his page Baradas, whom he'd sent three thousand pistoles via Charpentier as a reward for his help in bringing down the cardinal. He thought it best to delay paying the others, so he'd given Baradas his reward first. Before giving the queen her thirty thousand, the queen mother her sixty thousand, and Sir his one hundred fifty thousand livres, he wanted to read Sir's response to the Duke of Lorraine that Rossignol had promised him by ten o'clock the next morning. Thus, as we've said, at ten o'clock the king was once more in the cardinal's office, and even before he threw his cape over a chair and put his hat on the table, he knocked three times on the panel. Rossignol appeared with his usual punctuality. "Well?" the king asked eagerly.

"Well, Sire," Rossignol said, blinking behind his glasses, "we have cracked the code."

"Quick," said the king, "let's see it. The key first."

"Here it is, Sire." And he presented the key. The king read:

Je – The King
Astre se – The Queen
Be – The Queen Mother
L'amb – Sir
L.M. – The Cardinal
T. – Death
Pif-paf – The War
Zane – Duke of Lorraine
Gier – Duchess de Chevreuse
Oel – Madam de Fargis
O – Pregnant

"And now?" said the king.

"Apply the key, Sire."

"No," the king said, "you do it, you're used to it. My head would break at such a task."

Rossignol took the paper and read, “The queen, the queen mother, and the Duke of Orléans are in bliss. The cardinal is dead. The king wants to be king: he’s decided on war against the Prince of Marmots but with the Duke of Orléans in charge. The Duke of Orléans is in love with the Duke of Lorraine’s daughter but he’d rather marry the queen, even if she is seven years older than him. His only fear is that, following the advice of Madam de Fargis or the Duchess de Chevreuse, she may be pregnant when the king dies. Signed, Gaston d’Orléans.”

The king had listened without interrupting, though he had wiped his forehead several times and scored the floorboards with the wheel of his spur. “Pregnant,” he murmured, “pregnant. If she becomes pregnant, it certainly won’t be by me.”

Then, turning to Rossignol: “Is this the first letter of this sort that you’ve decoded?”

“Oh, no, Sire! I’ve deciphered ten or twelve like this.”

“What! And Sir Cardinal never showed them to me?”

“Why torment Your Majesty with a misfortune that might never occur?”

“But when he was accused and harried by these people, why didn’t he use these weapons against them?”

“He was afraid that would also make them enemies to the king.”

The king took a few steps back and forth, from one end of the study to the other, his head low and his hat over his eyes. Then returning to Rossignol, he said, “Make me a copy of each letter, with its decoded version, and the key on top.”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Do you think there will be others like this?”

“Most certainly, Sire.”

“Who are the people I’m to receive today?”

“That’s not my concern, Sire. Ciphers are my only business. You should see Sir Charpentier.”

Even before Rossignol was out the door, the king, with a feverish and trembling hand, struck two blows on the panel. These rapid, violent blows indicated his state of mind. Charpentier appeared instantly but stopped on the threshold. The king’s eyes were fixed on the floor, fist clenched on the cardinal’s desk, while he muttered, “Pregnant ... the queen pregnant ... a foreign queen on the throne of France. By an Englishman maybe!”

Then in a lower voice, as if he was afraid himself to hear what he said: “Nothing is impossible. Not in this family, based on what has gone before.”

Absorbed in his thoughts, the king hadn’t noticed Charpentier. Thinking the secretary hadn’t responded to his summons, he looked up impatiently and was about to knock a second time when, seeing the gesture and guessing the intention, Charpentier stepped forward and said, “Here I am, Sire.”

“Good, good,” the king said, trying to regain his composure. “What do we have before us today?”

“Sire, the Count of Bautru has arrived from Spain, and the Count of La Saludie from Venice.”

“What were they doing in those places?”

“I don’t know, Sire. Yesterday I had the honour to tell you that Sir Cardinal had sent for them, as well as for Sir de Charnassé, who will be arriving from Sweden by tomorrow at the latest.”

“You informed them that the cardinal was no longer a minister and that I would receive them in his place?”

“I sent them His Eminence’s orders that were to report on their missions to His Majesty as they would have done to himself.”

“Who is coming first?”

“Sir de Bautru.”

“As soon as he arrives, bring him in.”

“He is here, Sire.”

“Let him come, then.”

Charpentier turned, spoke a few words in a low voice, and then stepped aside to let Bautru enter. The ambassador was still in his travelling clothes, and apologised to appear so before the king but it was thus that he had always met Cardinal Richelieu. Once he’d arrived in the antechamber, he hadn’t wanted to keep His Majesty waiting. “Sir de Bautru,” the king said to him, “the cardinal spoke well of you, saying you were a trustworthy man, and that the honest opinion of a Bautru was worth two of Cardinal Bérulle’s.”

“Sire, I endeavoured to be worthy of the confidence the cardinal placed in me.”

“And you will prove worthy of mine as well, won’t you, Sir, telling me everything you would have told him?”

“Everything, Sire?” Bautru asked, staring at the king.

“Everything. I’m looking for the truth and I want all of it.”

“Well, Sire, you should start by recalling your Ambassador de Fargis who, instead of following the instructions of the cardinal, to the benefit of Your Majesty’s honour and glory, follows those of the queen mother, to the detriment of France.”

“Others have already advised me of this. I will think about it. You’ve spoken with Count-Duke Olivares?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“What were your orders regarding him?”

“To negotiate, if possible, a peaceful settlement on Mantua.”

“And?”

“When I tried to talk business with him, he led me into the henhouse of His Majesty King Philip IV that contains the most curious species in the world, and offered to give me samples to send to Your Majesty.”

“So he was mocking you, then?”

“Both me, Sire, and he whom I represented.”

“Sir!”

“You asked me for the truth, Sire. That’s what I give you. Shall I lie? If the truth is unpleasant, I certainly have wit enough to replace it with pleasant lies.”

“No, give me the truth, whatever it may be. What do people think of our planned Italian campaign?”

“People laugh, Sire.”

“People laugh? Don’t they know what we plan to do?”

“They do, Sire – but they say the queens will make you change your mind, and that Sir, placed in command, will obey the queens rather than you, so the expedition is bound to end up failing to support the Duke of Nevers.”

“Ah! So they think in Madrid?”

“Yes, Sire, they think it and write it – as I know, since I suborned one of the Count-Duke’s secretaries. Olivares wrote to Don Gonzales de Cordova, ‘If the king gives Sir control of the army, have no fear: that army will never cross the Pass of Susa. On the other hand, if the cardinal is in charge of the conduct of the war, with or without the king, the Duke of Savoy will need all the support you can send him.’”

“You’re sure of this?”

“Quite sure, Sire.”

The king resumed pacing back and forth, head down, hat pulled over his eyes, as was his habit when worried. Suddenly he stopped and, fixing Bautru with a penetrating look, asked, “And the queen – have you heard anything about her?”

“Only what’s said at Court.”

“And what do they say at Court?”

“Nothing I can repeat to Your Majesty.”

“Never mind that. I want to know.”

“Slander and calumny, Sire. Don’t disturb yourself with such filth.”

“I tell you, Sir,” said Louis XIII, impatiently stamping his foot, “that slander or truth, I want to hear what is said of the queen!”

Bautru bowed. “Your Majesty orders, and a loyal subject must obey.”

“Obey then.”

“It is said that Your Majesty’s health is failing...”

“My health is failing! So everyone seems to hope. It seems my death is their salvation. Go on.”

“Since your health is failing, the queen will take steps to make sure...” Bautru hesitated.

“Make sure of what?” demanded the king. “Speak! Tell me!”

“To ensure the regency.”

“But there’s only a regency when there’s an heir to the throne!”

“...To ensure the regency,” Bautru repeated.

The king stamped his foot. “So, the same rumour in Spain as in Lorraine – in Lorraine it’s a fear but in Spain, a hope. Indeed, if the queen becomes queen regent, then Paris will be Spanish. So that’s what they’re saying, Bautru?”

Bautru bowed to the king. “You ordered me to speak, Sire. I obeyed.”

“You’ve done well. I told you I was looking for the truth, and you’ve put me on the trail – and now, thank God, I’m hunter enough to follow it to the end.”

“Any further orders, Your Majesty?”

“Go and rest, Sir. You must be exhausted.”

“Your Majesty hasn’t told me whether I’ve had the good fortune to please him, or the misfortune to dissatisfy him.”

“I can’t say I enjoyed hearing what you’d to tell me, Sir Bautru. But you’ve done your duty that’s better. The next time there’s a vacancy among the Councillors of State, I think I may reward you with it.”

And Louis XIII, removing his glove, presented his hand for the Ambassador Extraordinaire to Philip IV to kiss. Bautru, as etiquette required, backed out of the room so as not to turn his back on the king. Left alone, the king murmured, “So – my death is others’ hope; my honour is a joke; and the succession to the throne is a lottery. If my brother assumes the throne, he’ll betray France and auction it to the highest bidder. And my mother, the widow of Henry IV, that great king who was killed because he planned to make France greater still – my mother will help him. Fortunately...” and the king gave a shrill laugh, “...when I die, the queen may be pregnant that will upend everything. Oh, how happy I am in my marriage!”

Then his expression darkened even more, and his voice lowered. “Not so astonishing, then, that they all wanted me to get rid of the cardinal!”

He thought he heard a small sound from the door, and turned. The door opened. “Does Your Majesty wish to receive Sir de La Saludie?” Charpentier asked.

“I believe so,” said the king. “Everything these gentlemen have to tell me is so very interesting.” Then, with another shrill laugh: “They do say that a king never knows what’s happening in his own castle! But though he may be the last to know, he can find out if he wants to.” Then, as Sir de La Saludie appeared at the door, he said, “Come, come, Sir de La Saludie, I’ve been expecting you. You’ve been told, haven’t you, to report to me in place of the cardinal? Speak, and keep no secrets from me that you would share with him.”

“But, Sire,” said La Saludie, “in the situation in which I find myself, I’m not sure if I should repeat...”

“Repeat what?”

“Words of praise from Italy for a man of whom it seems you had complaints.”

“Ah! Do they praise the cardinal in Italy? And what do they say of the cardinal on the far side of the mountains?”

"Sire, they are unaware that the cardinal is no longer your minister, and they congratulate Your Majesty on being served by the leading political and military genius of our century. I was instructed by the cardinal to announce the fall of La Rochelle to the Duke of Mantua, to the Senate of Venice, and to His Holiness Urban VIII. The news was received with joy in Mantua, enthusiasm in Venice, and satisfaction in Rome. Your Majesty's planned expedition into Italy has terrified Charles-Emmanuel of Savoy but reassured all the other princes. Here are letters from the Duke of Mantua, from the Venetian Senate, and from His Holiness, Sire, all of which express the utmost confidence in the plans of the cardinal. And each of these three powers, who wish to support this effort as much as they can, has instructed me to place drafts with their bankers for funds totalling one and a half million crowns."

"And these drafts are in whose name?"

"In the name of Sir Cardinal, Sire. They are payable on demand – he has only to endorse them to collect the money."

The king took the drafts and turned away. "A million and a half," he said, "along with the six million he borrowed – it's with this that we're marching to war. And all the money raised by one man, as if that man was himself the grandeur and glory of France."

Then, at a sudden thought, Louis XIII stepped to the panel and knocked twice. Charpentier appeared. "Do you know," asked the king, "from whom the cardinal borrowed the six million with which he planned to finance the war?"

"Yes, Sire, from Sir de Bullion."

"Did it take much effort to persuade him to make the loan?"

"On the contrary, Sire, it was he who offered the money."

"How's that?"

"Sir Cardinal complained that the army raised by the Marquis d'Uxelles had dispersed, due to their pay having been appropriated by the queen mother, and their food having not been delivered by Marshal Créquui. 'That army is lost,' said His Eminence. 'Well, then!' said Sir de Bullion, 'we must raise another, that's all.' 'And with what?' 'With what? I'll give you enough for an army of fifty thousand men, with a million in gold in reserve.' 'In that case, I'll need six million.' 'When?' 'As soon as possible.' 'Will tonight be too late?' Then the cardinal laughed. 'What, do you have that much in your pocket?' 'No but there's that much in the Treasury. I'll give you a draft to present to Fieubet, the Exchequer.' 'And what guarantees do you require in return, Sir de Bullion?' He rose, bowed to His Eminence, and said, 'Merely your word, My Lord.' The cardinal embraced him. Sir de Bullion wrote a few lines on a piece of paper, the cardinal accepted it, and that was that."

"Very well! Do you know where I'd find Sir de Bullion?"

"At the Treasury, I suppose."

"Wait a moment." The king went to the cardinal's desk and wrote:

Sir de Bullion,

I have a particular need for a sum of fifty thousand livres so I won't have to touch the money that you were kind enough to lend to the cardinal. Please let me know if such a loan would be possible; I give my word to repay it within a month.

Your affectionate,

Louis

Then turning to Charpentier, he asked, "Is Beringhen at hand?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Give him this note, and tell him to take a sedan chair to go see Sir de Bullion. He is to wait for a reply."

Charpentier took the note and left but then returned almost immediately. "Well?" said the king.

"Sir Beringhen is on his way but I wanted to inform Your Majesty that Sir de Chamassé has arrived from West Prussia, with a letter for the cardinal from King Gustavus Adolphus."

Louis nodded. "Sir de La Saludie," he said, "do you have anything else to say?"

"Only, Sire, to assure you of my respect, and that I would like to add my voice to those who regret the departure of Sir de Richelieu; it is my duty as a faithful subject to tell Your Majesty that, as far as Italy is concerned, he was the man we needed. I would be happy if I could be allowed to send the cardinal my regards, even if he is in disgrace."

"I'll do better than that, Sir de La Saludie," said the king. "I'll give you the opportunity to see him personally."

La Saludie bowed. "Here are the drafts from Mantua, Venice, and Rome. Go to Chaillot and present your regards to the cardinal, along with these notes. Ask him to endorse the drafts, then take them to Sir de Bullion and collect the money in the name of His Eminence. To speed you on your way, you may take my carriage that is waiting at the door. The sooner you return, the better I'll recognise your zeal and devotion."

La Saludie bowed again and, without wasting another second on compliments and courtesies, left to execute the king's orders. Charpentier was still at the door. "I will see Sir de Chamassé now," the king said.

Never had the king been obeyed at the Louvre as he was at the house of the cardinal; he had no sooner expressed his desire to see Sir de Chamassé than the man appeared before him. "Well, Baron," said the king, "it seems you had a successful trip."

"Yes, Sire."

"Please make your report without losing a second. Only yesterday did I finally learn the value of time."

"Your Majesty is aware of why I was sent to Germany?"

"His Eminence, whom I trusted to act on his own initiative, thought it sufficient to announce your departure and notify me of your return. Otherwise, I know nothing."

"Would His Majesty like me to give him a detailed account of my instructions?"

"Speak."

"These were my orders that I learned by heart in case the written instructions went astray: 'The frequent efforts of the House of Austria to undermine the allies of the king have forced him to take measures on their behalf; with the fall of La Rochelle, His Majesty has decided to muster his finest troops and personally lead them to the aid of his allies in Italy. Accordingly, the king has dispatched Sir de Chamassé to Germany to assure all his allies there of His Majesty's full support, if they will act in concert with the king in the interest of their mutual defence. The Baron de Chamassé is authorised to discuss the most suitable and appropriate means by which His Majesty might aid his allies.'"

"Those were your general instructions," said the king, "but no doubt you had others that were more specific?"

"Yes, Sire. For Duke Maximilian of Bavaria, whom His Eminence knew was very angry with the Emperor, I was to advise the creation of a Catholic League to oppose Ferdinand in both Germany and Italy, while Gustavus Adolphus was attacking the Emperor at the head of his Protestant troops."

"And what were your instructions regarding King Gustavus Adolphus?"

"I was instructed to promise King Gustave that if he would lead a Protestant League, as the Duke of Bavaria would with the Catholics, he would receive an annual subsidy of half a million livres, as well as the promise that Your Majesty would support him by attacking Lorraine, the neighbouring province of Germany that has played host to so many conspiracies against France."

"Yes," the king said, smiling, "I see it: Crete and King Minos. But what would the cardinal, or rather I myself, gain by attacking Lorraine?"

"It would force the princes of the House of Austria to divert troops to the defence of Alsace that would take their eyes off Italy and give France the freedom to finish her business in Mantua."

Louis took his forehead between his hands. The intricate plans of his minister staggered him with their size and complexity, until his brain seemed ready to burst. "And," he said after a moment, "Did King Gustavus Adolphus accept?"

"Yes, Sire but with certain conditions."

"What?"

"They are contained in this letter, Sire," said Chamassé, drawing from his pouch an envelope embossed with the arms of Sweden. "Would His Majesty prefer to read this letter himself, or shall I, as may be more appropriate, explain its meaning?"

"I want to read everything, Sir," said the king, taking the letter from his hands.

"Remember, Sire, that King Gustavus Adolphus is rather jolly and informal, indifferent to the forms of diplomacy, and speaks his mind as if from one soldier to another."

"If I'd forgotten that, I'll remember it, and if I'd never known it, I'll learn." And, unsealing the letter, he read it in a low voice:

[At Stuhm after the final Swedish conquest of the forts of Livonia and Polish Prussia.]

19 December 1628

My dear Cardinal,

As you know, I'm a bit of a pagan, so don't be surprised by the informality with which I write to a Prince of the Church. You are a great man – more than that, a man of genius – and more than that, an honest man, one with whom one can talk and do business. Let us talk, then, of the affairs of France and of Sweden, and of how they can march together. I am ready to negotiate but only with you. Are you sure of your king? Are you sure he won't turn, at the first cry, to his mother, his wife, his brother, his confessor, or his favourite – Luynes, is it, or Chalais? I can't keep them straight. Meanwhile you, who have more talent in your little finger than all these people, king, queens, princes, favourites, churchmen – don't you fear that someday you'll be brought down by some low intrigue hatched in the harem, as if you were no more than a pasha or vizier? If you are sure of your position, do me the honour to say to me: Friend Gustave, I have at least three years more during which I can dominate these witless lords and ladies who give me so much work and yet make so much trouble. If you can give me your personal assurance that the king will support you, then I will begin my campaign without delay – but not if you tell me it's up to the king. On your word, I'll muster my army and mount my horse, and we will plunder Prague, burn Vienna, and sack Buda and Pest. But solely on the word of the King of France, I will not beat a single drum, load a single musket, or saddle a single horse. If that's the way the wind blows, Eminence, send your reply by way of Sir de Chamassé, and I will sheathe my sword, though it saddens me to do so. But if the Devil allows, we shall campaign together, and drink to each other in the spoils of Hungarian honey! As a man of spirit, I commend you not to the mercy of God but to the care of your own genius. I address you, with joy and pride, as,

Your affectionate,

Gustavus Adolphus

The king read this letter with increasing irritation, and when he was finished, he crumpled it in his hand. Then, turning to the Baron de Chamassé, he asked, "Are you aware of the contents of this letter?"

"I know the gist of it, Sire but not the details."

"Barbarian! Uncouth northern bear!" the king whispered.

"Sire," Chamassé remarked, "this barbarian just defeated both the Russians and the Poles. He learned the arts of war from a Frenchman named La Gardie but has exceeded him: he is the inventor of modern warfare and, in short, the only man who can thwart the ambition of Emperor Ferdinand and beat Tilly and Wallenstein."

"Yes, I know that's what they say," replied the king. "I know that in the opinion of the cardinal, the first man of war in Europe is King Gustavus Adolphus but," he added with a laugh intended to be mocking but in the event only nervous, "I may not share that opinion."

"I sincerely regret that, Sire," said Chamassé, bowing.

"Ah!" said Louis XIII. "So, Baron, you wish to return to the King of Sweden on our behalf?"

"That would be a great honour for me and, I believe, of great benefit to France."

"Unfortunately, that is impossible," said Louis XIII, "as His Swedish Majesty wishes to deal only with Sir Cardinal, and the cardinal is no longer involved in such affairs."

There was a scratching at the door. The king turned and said, "Well, what is it?" Then, recognising the scratching as that of Sir Premier, he said, "Is that you, Beringhen? Come in."

Beringhen entered. "Sire," he said, presenting a large letter with a broad seal, "Sir de Bullion's reply." The king opened it and read:

Sire,

I am in despair but, in service to Sir de Richelieu, I have emptied my coffers down to the last crown, and though I wish to please His Majesty, I cannot say when I could give him the fifty thousand livres he asks for. It is with sincere regret and the most profound respect, Sire, that I have the honour to tell Your Majesty that I am his most humble, faithful, and obedient servant.

– De Bullion

Louis gnawed at his moustache. Gustave's letter told him how much political credit he had, and Bullion's told him how much financial credit. At that moment, La Saludie returned, followed by four men, each bending under the weight of the bag he carried. "What's this?" asked the king.

"Sire," said La Saludie, "it's the one-and-a-half million livres that Sir de Bullion sends to Sir Cardinal."

"Sir de Bullion?" said the king. "He had this much money?"

"By our lady, Sire!" said La Saludie. "So it seems."

"And who did he send you to for the money this time? Fieubet?"

"No, Sire. He was going to at first but then decided that for such a small amount it wasn't worth it, so he just wrote a note to his first clerk, Sir Lambert."

"Insolent dog!" murmured the king. "He has too little cash to give me fifty thousand livres but he has a million and a half to pay Sir de Richelieu for the drafts from Mantua, Venice, and Rome."

He dropped onto a chair, crushed under the weight of the moral whiplash of the last two days. Beginning to glimpse the inevitable truth, he said to Charnassé and La Saludie, "Gentlemen, my thanks. You are good and faithful servants. I'll call you within a few days to tell you my wishes."

He gestured for them to withdraw; they bowed and went out. The four porters had deposited their bags on the floor and were waiting. Louis stretched out his hand to the panel and knocked twice. Charpentier appeared. "Sir," said the king, "put away these one-and-a-half million livres – but first pay these men."

Charpentier gave each porter a silver crown, and they went out. "Sir Charpentier," said the king, "I'm not sure if I will come tomorrow. I'm terribly tired."

"It would be unfortunate if Your Majesty couldn't come tomorrow," said Charpentier. "It is the day for reports."

"What reports?"

"Reports from the cardinal's chief agents."

"Who are these chief agents?"

"Father Joseph, though you have given him permission to return to his monastery, so of course he won't be reporting tomorrow; Sir Lopez the Spaniard; Sir de Souscarrières."

"Are these reports made in writing, or in person?"

"Since the cardinal's agents know that tomorrow they will be reporting to the king, it's likely they will report in person."

"I'll be here, then," said the king, rising with an effort.

"So if the agents come in person...?"

"I'll receive them."

"I must warn Your Majesty about the nature of one of these agents, of whom I've not yet spoken."

"Is there a fourth agent, then?"

"An agent even more secret than the others."

"And who is this agent?"

"A woman, Sire."

"Madam de Combalet?"

"Your pardon, Sire but Madam de Combalet is not an agent of the cardinal – she is his niece."

"Then who is this woman? Is she well known?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Her name?"

"Marion Delorme."

"His Eminence received that notorious courtesan?"

"She was one of his most effective agents. Indeed, it was through her that he was warned in advance that he was about to be disgraced."

"Through her?" said the king, astonished.

"When the cardinal wanted to learn secret news of Court intrigues, he turned to her. Perhaps knowing that Your Majesty is in this office in place of the cardinal, she will have something of particular importance to say to Your Majesty."

"I assume she doesn't come here publicly."

"No, Sire. Her house is adjacent to this one, and the cardinal had a door made in the adjoining wall so that one can pass between the houses."

"Are you sure, Sir Charpentier, that His Eminence wouldn't consider it a betrayal to reveal all these secrets to me?"

"On the contrary, I tell Your Majesty all this at his direct order."

"Where is this secret door?"

"Behind this panel, Sire. During work tomorrow, if the king is alone, hears a gentle knock at this panel, and wishes to honour Miss Delorme by receiving her, he can press this button and the door will open. If he does not wish to see her, he can respond with three equal taps on the button. Ten minutes later he will hear a bell, and between the doors he will find a written report."

Louis XIII thought for a moment. It was obvious that his curiosity was fighting a fierce battle with his repugnance for women – especially those in Marion Delorme's trade. Finally his curiosity got the better of him. "If His Eminence, a holy Prince of the Church, was willing to receive Miss Delorme, it seems to me that I may receive her as well. And if that turns out to be a sin, I'll just confess it. Until tomorrow, Sir Charpentier." And the king took his leave, even more pale, tired, dazed than the day before but with a better idea of how hard it is to be a great minister, and how easy to be a mediocre king.

111
A Royal Intermission

Anxiety permeated the Louvre: during the days the king went to the Place Royale, he didn't see any members of his family – not the queen mother, the queen, nor the Duke of Orléans – and none of them had received the gifts he'd promised that were to come from a treasure he alone could touch. Furthermore, the new King's Council, reorganised with such enthusiasm by Bérulle and General Marillac after the cardinal's resignation, had received no orders to meet and, therefore, had not deliberated about anything. Each day, according to the rumours spread by Beringhen, who dressed the king in the morning and undressed him at night, and saw him leave and return, His Majesty was sad each morning when he left, and even gloomier when he came back in the evening. Only the king's fool, l'Angely, and his favourite, Baradas, had access to his inner chamber. Of all the birds of prey extending their beaks and claws toward the cardinal's treasure, only Baradas had received his three thousand pistoles from Charpentier. It's true he had extended neither beak nor claw, the largesse having come without his asking for it. The page had his faults but he also had the virtues of youth. He was prodigal when he had money but unable to use his influence with the king to extend his extravagance. When money stopped flowing, he waited quietly – for he had fine clothes, beautiful hair, and a graceful form – and eventually the flow would resume, whereupon he would spend it as quickly as before. During the king's absence, Baradas spent his time with his friend Saint-Simon, awaiting the manna that would pour from heaven, and considering with his young comrade what he should do with it. The two youths – for they were barely men: Baradas, the elder, was scarcely twenty – discussed what might best be done with three thousand pistoles. They decided they would spend a whole month living like princes. Only one thing worried them: would the king actually pay up? Many a bill carrying the royal signature had been presented to the royal treasurer without being honoured, and they feared that, despite the majesty of Louis's royal name, they might find themselves as disappointed as any minor merchant from the city. Eventually Baradas had withdrawn to his room, taken up pen, paper, and ink, and undertaken the effort of writing a letter, a colossal undertaking for the average gentleman of his time. After much massaging of his brow and scratching of his head, he was finished; he put the letter in his pocket, waited bravely for the king to return, and then, even more bravely, had asked His Majesty when he might present himself to the treasurer to receive his promised sum of money. The king said he could present himself whenever he liked, as the treasurer was his to command. Baradas had kissed the king's hand, then leaped down the stairs four at a time, jumped into one of the sedan chairs of the firm of Michel and Cavois, and had himself taken immediately to the cardinal, or rather to the cardinal's former hotel. There he found Secretary Charpentier, faithful to his duty, and duly presented himself. Charpentier received his note, read it, and recognising the king's signature, bowed respectfully to Sir Baradas and asked him to wait for a moment. He left with the note and, five minutes later, came back with a bag of gold containing three thousand pistoles. At the sight of this bag, Baradas, unable to believe it, felt his heart leap. Charpentier offered to count out the sum before his eyes but Baradas, who was eager to clutch the blessed bag to his chest, was willing to forego this. However, Charpentier insisted, and Baradas, who still felt weak after his wound, didn't feel that he could wrest the bag away from him. So he waited until Charpentier was done, and then lugged the bag down to his waiting sedan chair. There, Baradas reached into the bag and drew out a handful of gold and silver crowns that he offered to Charpentier. The secretary merely bowed and refused. Baradas was astonished at this, staring at Charpentier as he went back through the door of the hotel. But bit by bit, Baradas got over his amazement. Once recovered, he ordered the chair porters to guard his bag, then went to the next house over, stepped up to the door, and knocked. He drew his laboriously written letter from his pocket and presented it to the elegantly dressed doorman who answered his knock, saying: "For Miss Delorme." He accompanied the letter with two crowns that the doorman refused as scrupulously as Charpentier had. Then Baradas returned to his chair and, with that commanding voice that belongs only to those who have money in their pockets, called out to his porters, "To the Louvre!"

And the porters, who hadn't failed to note the weight and rotundity of Baradas's bag, departed at a rate that would do credit to modern marathon athletes. After a quarter of an hour, Baradas, who had not for a moment stopped stroking the bag that was his travelling companion, was at the door of the Louvre. There he met Madam de Fargis, who was just descending from another sedan chair. The two recognised each other, and a smile curved the sensual lips of the mischievous young woman, as she saw the effort Baradas was making with his injured arm to lift the heavy bag. She asked, with mocking courtesy, "Would you like me to assist you, Sir Baradas?"

"Thank you, Madam," replied the page. "If, on your way, you should happen to see my comrade Saint-Simon, and could ask him to come down here, that would be much appreciated."

"Of course," replied the young coquette. "My pleasure, Sir Baradas."

And she ran nimbly up the stairs, lifting the hem of her dress to reveal the curve of her calf, giving just enough of a look to enable one to guess the shape of the rest. Five minutes later, Saint-Simon came down. Baradas had generously paid off his porters, and now the two men, joining their efforts, managed to lift the heavy bag up the stairs, much as in that painting of Paul Véronese where we see two young men in party dress carrying a large amphora containing enough honey to make twenty men drunk. Meanwhile, Louis XIII had extended his evening dinner for five hours, during which he'd conversed with his fool, who hadn't failed to notice His Majesty's increasing sadness. Louis XIII was sitting on one corner of the broad hearth in his parlour, behind the table, while l'Angely, on the other side, crouched in a high chair like a parrot on its perch, resting his feet on the lowest rung to make a table of his knees, on which he rested his plate with an aplomb in accord with his careful sense of balance. The king lacked an appetite and merely nibbled at a few dried cherries, wetting his lips from a glass that glittered with the gold and blue royal crest. He wore atop his head his black felt hat adorned with black plumes, the broad brim casting a shadow over his features that matched their expression. L'Angely, on the contrary, was ravenous, and had made up for missing his usual second dinner at five or six o'clock by sliding toward himself all the food the king disdained, mainly a huge pheasant paté and a woodcock stuffed with figs. After offering them to the king, who declined, he cut fat slices of both paté and fowl and transferred them to his plate. After attacking first the paté, then the woodcock, and finally the figs, he poured himself a glass of the cardinal's honey that was none other than what we now call Bordeaux. The king and the cardinal, who had the two worst stomachs in the kingdom, always drank this fine honey watered but l'Angely, who could digest anything, drank it straight, enjoying its bouquet and smooth savour. The first bottle of this honey had already been set empty on the hearth, and was soon to be joined by a second – which l'Angely, as a connoisseur, kept at an appropriate distance from the fire. Though it was still standing on the table, it was sufficiently empty to show that it wouldn't be there long, as l'Angely's deep respect for its qualities caused him to give it frequent caresses as he filled his glass. The fool, who like the Greek philosophers was an enemy to redundancy, was almost inclined to set his glass aside and, like a child drinking from a stream, pour the honey directly into his cupped hand. As l'Angely tenderly caressed the bottle once again, he uttered a sigh of satisfaction, just as Louis let out a sigh of sadness. L'Angely paused, the bottle in one hand, a wishbone in the other. "It seems," he said, "that being a king is no fun, especially if you happen to be the king."

"Ah, my poor l'Angely," said the king, "I'm so very unhappy."

"Tell me all about it, my son. It will console you," said l'Angely, placing the now-empty bottle on the hearth and cutting himself a slice of pie.

"Everyone steals from me, everyone lies to me, and everyone betrays me."

"True! Did you only just notice this?"

"No, I've just been confirming it."

"Come, come, my son, do not succumb to pessimism. I confess that, for my part, I'm inclined to think things are not so bad. I've dined well, this pie is good, the honey was excellent, the Earth rotates slowly enough that it does not throw me off, and I feel in my whole body a warmth of pleasant well-being that enables me to view life through a rosy glow."

"L'Angely!" Louis XIII said tartly. "No heresy, or I'll have you whipped."

"What?" replied l'Angely. "Is it heresy to view life through a rosy glow?"

"No but it's heresy to say the Earth rotates."

"Well, my faith, I'm not the first man to say it. I believe Gentlemen Copernicus and Galileo were ahead of me."

"Perhaps but the Bible says otherwise, and you can't pretend that Copernicus and Galileo were wiser than Moses!"

"Hmm," said l'Angely.

"See here," the king insisted, "if the Earth turned and the Sun were immobile, then how was Joshua able to stop the Sun for three days?"

"Are you quite sure that Joshua stopped the Sun for three days?"

"Not Joshua but the Lord."

"And you think the Lord gave him this extra time because he needed it to chase five Canaanite kings into a cave so he could wall them up? By my faith, if I were the Lord, instead of stopping the Sun, I would have brought on the night, to give those poor devils a chance to escape."

"L'Angely, l'Angely," the king said sadly, "you're worse than a Huguenot."

"Careful, Louis – you're closer to a Huguenot than I am, assuming you're the actual son of your father."

"L'Angely!" snapped the king.

"You're right, Louis," said l'Angely, renewing his attack on the figs. "Let's not talk about theology. So you say, my son, that everyone betrays you?"

"Everyone, l'Angely!"

"Even your mother?"

"Especially my mother."

"Bah! What about your brother?"

"My brother, more than anyone!"

"At last. And here I thought you thought it was only the cardinal who was deceiving you."

"On the contrary, l'Angely, I believe Your Eminence was the only one who wasn't deceiving me."

"What? Is the whole world turned upside down, then?"

Louis nodded his head sadly. "And yet I hear that, in your joy to be rid of him, you've promised grand gifts to your whole family!"

"Alas!"

"I hear you gave sixty thousand livres to your mother, thirty thousand to the queen, and one hundred fifty thousand livres to Sir."

"Well, l'Angely, that's what I've promised them."

"So you haven't given it to them yet? Good!"

"L'Angely," said the king, "I've had a sudden inspiration."

"Not to burn me as a heretic or hang me as a thief, I hope!"

"No, not that. Since I have some money..."

"You have money?"

"Yes, my child."

"Word of honour?"

"Faith of a gentleman! And plenty of it."

"In that case, see here," said l'Angely, caressing the bottle once again, "use it to buy more of this honey, my son. Invest it in the 1629 vintage!"

"No, that's not what I'm inspired to do. Besides, you know I drink only water."

"For God's sake! And that's why you're so sad."

"No, it would just be crazy for me to be happy."

"Well, I'm crazy but I'm not happy about it. Come, tell me your inspiration!"

"I have decided to make your fortune, l'Angely."

"My fortune? Me? What do I need with a fortune? I have food and shelter here at the Louvre. When I need money, I probe your pockets and take what I find. Not that I ever found much. But it's enough for me, and I have no complaints."

"I know you never complain, and this saddens me."

"Why must you always grieve? What an awful personality you have."

"You never complain – you, whom I give nothing – but they complain continually, though I give to them constantly."

"Let them complain, my son."

"But if I died, l'Angely..."

"Great, another cheerful thought. At least wait until after Carnaval."

"...If I died, they'd drive you away without a sou."

"Well, then I'd go."

"But what would become of you?"

"I'd become a Trappist monk! Why not? They have a monastery right near the Louvre."

"They all hope I'll die, you know. What do you say to that, l'Angely?"

"I say you should continue to live, just to infuriate them."

"But life is not much fun, l'Angely."

"Do you think it will be better once you're buried at Saint-Denis?"

"It's no fun anywhere, l'Angely," said the king, mournfully.

"Louis, I warn you, you'll be even more bored when you're dead. You're starting to make my bones rattle."

"So you don't want me to make you rich?"

"I want you to let me finish my honey and paté!"

"I could give you three thousand pistoles, like I gave Baradas."

"You gave Baradas three thousand pistoles?"

"Yes."

"Well, you must be proud. There's money well spent."

"You think it's a waste of money?"

"On the contrary! He'll share it out with all the pretty boys and beautiful girls."

"You know, l'Angely, I don't think you believe in anything."

"Not even the virtue of Sir Baradas."

"Just speaking with you is a sin."

"Quite so, if speaking truth is a sin. Shall I give you some advice, my son?"

"What's that?"

"Go to the chapel, pray for my salvation, and leave me to eat my dessert in peace."

"Good advice can come even from the mad," said the king, rising. "I will go and pray."

And the king went off to his chapel. "So you will pray for me," said l'Angely, "and I will eat, drink, and sing for you, and we will see which is of most benefit." And indeed as Louis XIII, sadder than ever, closeted himself in his chapel, l'Angely, who had finished the second bottle, opened the third and began a song:

When I'm weary, I invite
Bacchus in for the night
Then happily I rest
As if I'd gold in my chest
More gold in my coffer
Than Croesus could offer
I couldn't ask for more
Dance around the floor
No laurels I need
No honours, no greed
Kings, queens, nobles, princes
Can't better my prances
So pour me champagne
To distract my brain
Draw out my troubles
With a glass full of bubbles
Better drunk in my room
Than stone dead in a tomb!

112
And you, Baradas?

When Louis came out of his chapel, he found l'Angely slumped over the table, head resting on his arms, asleep or pretending to sleep. He looked on sadly for a moment, and then this weak and selfish half-man, who despite his terrible upbringing was occasionally illuminated by an instinctive flash of truth and decency, was seized by a great compassion for his companion in misery. L'Angely was so devoted – not to cheering him up, as other fools had done for their kings but to simply walking with him down the dark corridors of the monotonous hell of depression. Louis remembered the offer he'd made the fool with his typical recklessness that l'Angely had not refused as much as evaded. He remembered the good humour and patience with which l'Angely suffered his bouts of ill temper, his selfless devotion though surrounded by ambition and greed – and then, picking up pen, ink, and paper, he wrote a draft granting l'Angely the same amount he'd given to Baradas, and slipped it into his pocket quietly, so as not to wake him. Then he returned to his suite, where he listened for an hour as his minstrel played the lute. After that, he called Beringhen to help him into bed, then sent for

Baradas to come talk with him. Baradas arrived, still gleeful from having counted and recounted his three thousand pistoles, stacking and restacking them. The king had him sit on the foot of the bed, and said with an air of reproach, “Why are you so cheerful?”

“I’m cheerful,” Baradas replied, “because I have no reason not to be – in fact, quite the contrary!”

“Why is that?” asked Louis with a sigh.

“Has Your Majesty forgotten that he granted me three thousand pistoles?”

“No, indeed. I remember.”

“Well, then: three thousand pistoles! I must admit to Your Majesty that I wasn’t really expecting it.”

“Why not?”

“Ah, man proposes but God disposes!”

“But if the man is a king?”

“Nonetheless, God is still God!”

“And so?”

“So, Sire, it was paid, every coin, cash on the barrelhead! Plague! Sir Charpentier is in my opinion a much greater man than Sir de La Vieuville, who when I asked for money just waved his arms and whispered, ‘I swim, I swim, I swim ...’”

“So you got your three thousand pistoles.”

“Yes, Sire.”

“And so you’re rich?”

“Yes, haha!”

“What are you going to do now? Are you going to act the bad Christian and spend it all on gambling and women, like the prodigal son?”

“Oh, Sire!” Baradas said, pretending to be hurt. “Your Majesty knows I never gamble.”

“So you say, at least.”

“And as for women, I can’t stand them.”

“Is that really true, Baradas?”

“I am constantly quarrelling with Saint-Simon about this very subject, holding up Your Majesty to him as an example.”

“It’s true, Baradas: women were created for the peril of our souls. It wasn’t woman who was seduced by the serpent – she is the serpent itself!”

“It’s just as you say, Sire! I’m going to commit that maxim to memory and write it down in my prayer book!”

“Speaking of prayer, I had my eyes on you during mass last Sunday, Baradas, and you seemed quite distracted.”

“If so, it was only because my eyes turned the same way as Your Majesty’s, toward Miss de Lautrec.”

The king bit his moustache and changed the subject. “So, what will you do with your money?”

“If it was three or four times as much, I’d use it to fund pious works,” said the page, “like dedicating the foundation of a convent or the erection of a chapel but with such a limited amount...”

“You know I’m not rich, Baradas,” said the king.

“Oh, I’m not complaining, Sire, quite the contrary. But with, as I said, such a limited amount, I’ll first give half of it to my mother and sisters.” Louis nodded. “Then,” Baradas continued, “I’ll divide the remaining fifteen hundred pistoles into two shares. The first seven hundred fifty will go to buy me two good horses to take on Your Majesty’s Italian campaign, along with weapons, and pay and clothing for a lackey.”

The king nodded his approval. “And as for the remaining seven hundred fifty, what will you do with that?”

“I’ll keep it as a reserve with a bit for pocket money. God bless you, sire,” Baradas continued, raising his eyes to heaven, “for such good deeds that enable others to rescue orphans and console widow.”

“Baradas – embrace me!” cried the king, moved to tears. “Use the money as you say, my child, and I will make sure you never want for more.”

“Sire,” said Baradas, “you are magnificent, majestic, and wise as Solomon – plus you have the advantage over him in the eyes of the Lord in not having three hundred wives and eight hundred...”

“The Lord preserve me!” cried the king, terrified by the mere idea, and raising his own hands to heaven. “But this conversation is a sin, Baradas, for it smacks of ideas that contradict morality and religion.”

“Your Majesty is right,” said Baradas. “Shall I go and do some pious reading?”

The page knew that was the quickest way to quell the king. He got up, pulled down Gerson’s Eternal Consolation from a shelf, sat down near but not on the bed, and began to read from it in a voice full of unction. By the third page, the king was asleep. Baradas stood up on tiptoe, replaced the book on the shelf, went quietly to the door to let himself out, and then returned to the dice game with Saint-Simon that the king’s summons had interrupted. The next morning, at ten o’clock, the king went down from the Louvre to his carriage, and was borne to the office where, for the last two days, so many things he’d never suspected had appeared in their true guise. He found Charpentier awaiting him. The king was pale, tired, and depressed. He asked if the daily reports had arrived yet. Charpentier replied that as Father Joseph had retired to his monastery, there would be no report from him, only from Souscarrières and Lopez. “And have these reports arrived?” asked the king.

“As I had the honour to tell His Majesty,” said Charpentier, “knowing that today they would be dealing with His Majesty himself, both Gentlemen Lopez and de Souscarrières said they would bring their reports personally. The king may simply read their reports himself, and call upon them for further clarification.”

“Where are these reports?”

“Sir Lopez is here with his; but in order to leave enough time for His Majesty to speak with him and then open the correspondence of Your Eminence, I have made the appointment with Sir de Souscarrières for noon.”

“Ask Lopez to come in.”

Charpentier went out and, a few seconds later, announced Don Ildefonse Lopez. Lopez came in, hat in hand and bowing to the ground. “Fine, Sir Lopez, fine,” said the king. “I know you of old, as one who’s cost me dear.”

“How so, Sire?”

“Isn’t it at your shop the queen buys her jewellery?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Well, the day before yesterday, the queen asked me for twenty thousand livres for a string of pearls that she wanted to buy from you.”

Lopez laughed and in laughing, revealed a set of teeth that could have passed for pearls. “What are you laughing at?” asked the king.

“Sire, shall I speak with you exactly as I spoke with Your Eminence?”

“Exactly.”

“Well, then, in today’s report to His Eminence is a full paragraph on this string of pearls – or rather, its significance.”

“Read me this paragraph.”

“As the king commands but Your Majesty will understand it better if I explain a few things first.”

“Proceed.”

“On twenty-second December, Her Majesty the Queen appeared at my shop, under the pretext of buying a string of pearls.”

“Under the pretext, you say?”

“Under the pretext, yes, Sire.”

“What was her real purpose?”

“To meet with the Spanish Ambassador, the Marquis de Mirabel, who happened to be there.”

“He ‘happened’ to be there?”

“Of course, Sire. It is always by happenstance that Her Majesty the Queen meets the Marquis de Mirabel, who can only present himself at the Louvre with advance notice on certain days.”

“That was done by my order – upon the advice of the cardinal.”

“So her Majesty the Queen, if she’s something to convey to the ambassador or to her brother the King of Spain, must meet the ambassador somewhere by chance since she can’t see him otherwise.”

“And this ‘happenstance’ occurred at your shop?”

“With the permission of Your Eminence.”

“So the queen met with the Spanish Ambassador?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Did they have a long conference?”

“They had time to exchange only a few words.”

“We desire to know what those words were.”

“I’ve already told Your Eminence.”

“But he didn’t tell me. His Eminence was very discreet.”

“Let me say in advance that I don’t wish to distress Your Majesty.”

“Just tell me what they said.”

“What I shall repeat to Your Majesty was overheard by my diamond cutter.”

“He understands Spanish?”

“He does, since Your Eminence ordered that he should secretly learn it. But as nobody knows this, the speakers were unguarded. They said:

“The ambassador: ‘Her Majesty has received by way of the Governor of Milan and the Count of Moret, a letter from her illustrious brother?’

“The queen: ‘Yes, Sir.’

“‘Has Your Majesty thought about its contents?’

“‘I’ve thought about them but must think some more before I answer him.’

“‘Answer how?’

“‘By means of a box supposed to contain fabrics but which will actually contain this little dwarf you see playing with Madam de Bellier and Miss de Lautrec.’

“‘You think she can be trusted?’

“‘She was a gift to me from my aunt Claire-Eugénie, Infanta of the Netherlands, and acts in the interest of Spain.’”

“In the interest of Spain...” repeated the king. “It seems everything around me is in the interest of Spain – of my enemies, in other words. And this little dwarf?”

“She was sent off yesterday in her box but before that, she told Sir de Mirabel, in very good Spanish, ‘Madam my mistress told me she has considered her brother’s advice, and if the king’s health continues to deteriorate, she will take measures not to be caught off guard.’”

“Not to be caught off guard,” the king repeated.

“We do not understand what that means, Sire,” Lopez said, lowering his head.

“But I understand,” said the king, frowning, “and that’s enough. Did the queen mention that she’d soon be able to pay for this necklace she’s buying from you?”

“I’ve already been paid, Sire,” said Lopez.

“What, you’ve been paid?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“By whom?”

“By Sir Particelli.”

“Particelli? The Italian banker?”

“Yes.”

“But I was told he’d been hanged.”

“Quite so, quite so,” said Lopez, “but before he died, he sold his bank to Sir d’Émery, a good honest man.”

“Everyone,” murmured Louis XIII, “everyone robs me and deceives me! And the queen has not seen Sir de Mirabel since?”

“The reigning queen, no; the queen mother, yes.”

“My mother? When was this?”

“Yesterday.”

“To what end?”

“To announce that the Cardinal was overthrown, that Bérulle had replaced him, and that Sir had been appointed lieutenant general, so the ambassador could write to King Philip IV or the count-duke and tell them the Italian war is as good as off.”

“What, the war in Italy is off?”

“Those were Her Majesty’s very words.”

“Oh, I see. I understand. They will treat this second army like the first, leaving it without pay, without food, without clothes. Oh, the wretches! The wretches!” cried the king, pressing his forehead into his hands. “Do you have anything else to tell me?”

“Some minor matters, Sire. Sir Baradas visited my shop this morning to buy some jewellery.”

“What kind of jewellery?”

“A necklace, a bracelet, and some hairpins.”

“For how much?”

“For three hundred pistoles.”

“Why would he want this necklace, bracelet, and hairpins?”

“Probably for some mistress, Sire.”

“What?” said the king. “Last night he told me he hates all women. Anything else?”

“That’s all, Sire.”

“To summarise: Queen Anne and Sir de Mirabel agreed that, if my condition worsens, she will not be caught off guard. The queen mother told Sir de Mirabel that he can report to His Majesty Philip IV that Sir de Bérulle has replaced Sir de Richelieu and my brother is lieutenant general, so the Italian war is as good as off. Finally, Sir Baradas is using the money I gave him to buy necklaces, bracelets, and hairpins. Well done, Sir Lopez; you’ve told me what I needed to know. Continue to serve me well – or serve Your Eminence that is the same thing – and don’t miss a word of what passes at your shop.”

“I hope Your Majesty will not endanger my business.”

“Come, come, Sir Lopez. I merely hope to have an end to all these treasons. Now, on your way out, if you see Sir de Souscarrières, send him in.”

“I’m here, Sire,” a voice said. Souscarrières appeared in the doorway, hat in hand, bent in an elaborate court bow.

“Ah! You were listening, Sir,” said the king.

“Not at all, Sire! It’s just that my zeal for serving Your Majesty is so great that I guessed Your Majesty wished to see me.”

“Ah-ha! And do you have plenty of interesting things to tell me?”

“Two days’ worth of reports, Sire.”

“Then tell me what happened two days ago.”

“The day before yesterday, Sire, Your Majesty’s august brother hired a chair and was taken to meet the envoy of the Duke of Lorraine and the Spanish Ambassador.”

“No surprise there. Continue.”

“Yesterday, at about eleven o’clock, Her Majesty the queen mother hired a chair to carry her to Lopez’s shop, as did the Ambassador of Spain.”

“I know what they said to each other. Continue.”

“Yesterday, Sir Baradas took a chair from the Louvre to the house of Your Eminence in the Place Royale. He went in and, five minutes later, came out with a heavy sack of money.”

“I’m aware of it.”

“From the cardinal’s door, he went to the door of his neighbour.”

“Which neighbour?” the king asked, agitated.

“Miss Delorme.”

“Miss Delorme! Did he visit Miss Delorme?”

“No, Sire, he just knocked on the door, and when a servant answered, he gave him a letter.”

“A letter!”

“Yes, Sire. Then, the letter delivered, he got back in the chair and was returned to the Louvre. This morning, he went out again…”

“Yes. He was taken to Sir Lopez’s shop, where he bought some jewellery, and then … and then where did he go?”

“He returned to the Louvre, Sire but reserved the use of a chair for the entire night.”

“Do you have anything else to tell me?”

“About what, Sire?”

“About Sir Baradas!”

“No, Sire.”

“Then you may go.”

“But, Sire, I need to report about Madam de Fargis.”

“Go.”

“About Sir de Marillac.”

“Go.”

“About Sir your brother!”

“That’s enough for today. Go!”

“But what about that wounded Étienne Latil, who was taken to see Your Eminence at Chaillot?”

“I don’t care. Go.”

“In that case, Sire, I withdraw.”

“Yes. Withdraw.”

“Can I, in withdrawing, dare to hope that the king is pleased with me?”

“Only too pleased!”

Souscarrières bowed and backed out.

The king didn’t even wait till he was gone before knocking on the panel. Charpentier appeared. “Sir Charpentier,” the king said, “when the cardinal had business with Miss Delorme, how did he call her?”

“It’s quite simple,” Charpentier said. He pressed the spring, opened the secret portal, rang the bell between the two doors, and said to the king, “If Miss Delorme is at home, she will come at once. Does His Majesty wish to receive her alone, or does he wish me to stay?”

“Leave me alone.”

Charpentier left. As for Louis XIII, he waited eagerly in front of the secret passage. After a few seconds, his eager ears heard the sound of a light step. “Ah,” he said, “finally I’ll know the truth.”

He’d hardly finished when the door opened and Marion, wearing a white satin dress with a simple string of pearls at her neck, a forest of dark curls falling on her round white shoulders, appeared in all her eighteen-year-old beauty. Louis XIII, though rarely susceptible to the beauty of women, stepped back, amazed. Marion entered, made an adorable little bow in which respect was cleverly mingled with coquetry, then cast down her eyes, modest as a milkmaid. “My king, to whom I have always hoped to have the honour to appear,” she said, “has sent for me. On my knees I must hear his words; at his feet I must receive his orders.”

The king stammered out a few incoherent words that gave Marion a chance to enjoy the effect of her entrance. “Impossible,” the king said, “impossible. Am I wrong or aren’t you Miss Marie Delorme?”

“But no, Sire! For you, I am just Marion.”

“So, if you are Marion…” Marion bowed, eyes downcast in perfect humility. “…If you are Marion,” continued the king, “you’d have received a letter yesterday.”

“I receive many every day,” said the courtesan, laughing.

“A letter that arrived between five and six o’clock.”

“Between five and six o’clock, Sire, I received fourteen letters.”

“Did you keep them?”

“I burned twelve of them. The thirteenth I keep near my heart. Here is the fourteenth.”

“This is his writing,” the king cried. Hastily he took the letter from Marion’s hands. He turned it over and over, and said, “It’s still unopened.”

“As it came from someone near to the king, and as I was aware that today I might have the supreme honour of meeting Your Majesty, I was careful to keep the letter exactly as I received it.”

The king looked at Marion in amazement, then shook the letter angrily. “Bah!” he said. “I want to know what this letter says.”

“There is a way, Sire, to open it without breaking the seal.”

“If I were a police lieutenant, I might do that,” said Louis XIII, “but I am a king.”

Marion gently took the letter from his hands. “But as it is addressed to me, I may open it.” And she unsealed the envelope and gave the letter to Louis XIII. Louis XIII hesitated a moment but all the dark feelings that advise a jealous heart made that moment a short one. He read it aloud in a low voice, his tone sinking ever lower as he read. We must admit, the contents of the letter were not the sort to bring a cheerful expression to Louis’s face – a place where, if such an expression ever appeared, it didn’t last more than a few minutes. Herewith, the contents of the letter:

Lovely Marion,
I am twenty years of age; some women have not only been good enough to tell me that I'm a pretty lad, they have gone on to do such things that left no doubt but that they believed it. Also, I'm the leading favourite of King Louis XIII, who, though stingy, was just somehow inspired to give me the gift of 3000 pistoles. My friend, Saint-Simon, informs me that you are not only the best-looking girl in the world but moreover the best in every other way as well. Well, I propose we join together to take a month and spend those three thousand pistoles that idiot king gave me. Say, a thousand pistoles on clothes and jewellery, another thousand on horses and carriages, and the last thousand on games and parties. Does this proposition suit you? If you say Yes, I can be there in no time with the money bag. If you say No, I'll tie the bag around my neck and throw myself in the river. But you will say yes, won't you? You wouldn't wish to be responsible for the death of a poor lad who has committed no crime other than to love you madly without ever having seen you. Reply by tomorrow night, and my money bag and I will be at your feet.

Your devoted,
Baradas

Louis read these last lines in a voice so tremulous that it was nearly unintelligible, even if he'd been speaking loud enough to be heard. The letter ended, his arms dropped, nerveless, the hand holding the letter resting on his knee. His face as white as the paper, his eyes rose toward heaven in despair, and, like Caesar, who, barely seeming to feel the stabs of the other conspirators, cried out "Et tu, Brutus!" when struck by the only hand that was dear to him, Louis XIII exclaimed in an agonised voice: "And you, Baradas!" And, without sparing another glance for Marion Delorme, without seeming to even notice she was there, the king threw his cloak over his shoulder, put his hat on his head, pulling it down over his eyes, ran down the stairs, out the door, and into his carriage. A servant closed the door behind him as he cried, "To Chaillot!"

As for Marion, after seeing the king make this curious exit, she ran to the window, drew aside the curtain, and saw him drive off in his carriage. Then with that mischievous yet charming smile that belonged only to her, she said, "No doubt about it: I shall have to become a page."

How Étienne Latil & the Marquis de Pisany happened to encounter each other, each making his 1st Outing

We have reported how the cardinal had retired to his country estate at Chaillot and left his house in the Place Royale – in effect, his ministry – to Louis XIII. The rumour of his disgrace spread rapidly through Paris, and at a rendezvous between Madam de Fargis and Marillac the Minister of Justice at the Inn of the Painted Beard, she gave him the great news. This great news quickly spread from the chamber where it was reported to the ear of Madam Soleil, and from her to Master Soleil. Together they carried it to Étienne Latil, who had just left his bed three days before and was walking around his room, leaning on his sword. Master Soleil had offered to lend him his own cane, a handsome one with an agate set in the handle, like that of Mudarra the Bastard in Lope de Vega's play. But Latil refused, deeming it unworthy for a man of the sword to rely on something other than his sword. At the news of Richelieu's disgrace he stopped short, leaned with both hands on the hilt of his sword and, looking keenly at Master Soleil, asked, "Is what you say the truth?"

"True as the Gospel."

"And where did you get this news?"

"From a lady of the Court."

Étienne Latil knew all too well that the house wherein he'd suffered the injury that had forced him to take up residence also played host to masked and incognito visitors from all walks of society. He took two or three thoughtful steps and then turned again to Master Soleil. "And now that he's a minister no more, what do you think of the personal safety of Your Eminence?"

Master Soleil grimaced and shook his head. "I think that if he hasn't taken his guards with him, he'd better take to wearing that breastplate he wore over his robes at La Rochelle."

"Do you think that's the only risk he runs?" Latil asked.

"Well, there's his food," said Soleil. "I imagine his niece, Madam de Combalet, will take the precaution of finding a reliable taster for him." Then he added, with that broad smile that often brightened his face, "Now, where do you suppose she might find someone like that?"

"He is found, Master Soleil," Latil said. "Call me a sedan chair."

"What, right now?" Master Soleil cried. "You're not recovered! Are you really reckless enough to leave?"

"Yes, I am that reckless, my host. And since I admit I'm reckless, and that such recklessness may cost me my life, we should settle our little account so that, in the event of my death, you've lost nothing. Let's see: three weeks of recuperation; nine pitchers of tea; two mugs of juice; and the devoted care of Madam Soleil that is beyond price – does that come to more than twenty pistoles?"

"Sir Latil, please note that I ask no remuneration! The honour that it's been to house you, to feed you..."

"Ha! Feed me! That's easy enough."

"...And to care for you, is quite sufficient! But of course, if you really insist on giving me twenty pistoles to acknowledge your satisfaction..."

"You won't refuse it?"

"God prevent me from insulting you so!"

"Then call me a chair while I count out your twenty pistoles."

Master Soleil bowed and retired. Upon returning he went straight to the table upon which the twenty pistoles were lined up, counted them at a glance with that knack shared by innkeepers and tax collectors, and said, "Your chair is at hand, Sir."

Latil sheathed his sword, gestured for Soleil to approach, and said, "Lend me your arm."

"I'll give you my arm to help you leave my house, my dear Sir Étienne but it's with great regret that I'll see you go."

"Soleil, my friend," said Latil, "I hate to see the slightest cloud cross your resplendent face, so I promise you that when I return to Paris I will stop here first – especially if you still have some of this lovely Coulange honey. I just made its acquaintance two days ago, and I regret not getting to know it more intimately."

"I've laid in three hundred bottles, Sir Latil. I'll save it for you."

"At three bottles a day, that will last me three months. So I'll stay with you for three months, Master Soleil, unless I run out of credit."

"You will never run out of credit. A man who is friends with Sir de Moret, Sir de Montmorency, and Sir de Richelieu – a prince, a duke, and a cardinal..."

Latil shook his head. "An honest farmer might give you less honour but he'd be a better risk, Master Soleil," he declared as he stepped into his sedan chair.

"Where should I tell the porters to take you, Sir?" asked the innkeeper.

"First to the Hotel de Montmorency, where I have a duty to perform, and then to Chaillot."

"To the hotel of My Lord le Duke of Montmorency," Soleil cried, "by way of the Rue des Blancs-Manteaux and Rue Sainte-Croix-de-la-Bretonnerie!"

The porters didn't need to be told twice, and furthermore they adopted Master Soleil's additional advice to go easy on their client, as he was recovering from a long and painful illness. They stopped at Montmorency's door. The Swiss doorman, in full regalia, baton in hand, stood on the threshold. Latil beckoned to him, and he approached. "My friend," Latil said, "here's half a pistole. Be so kind as to announce me."

The Swiss doffed his hat, and asked whom he should announce. "The wounded gentleman whom the Count of Moret had the honour to visit during his illness, who promised to visit him as soon as he could stand. I am out today for the first time and, as promised, here I am. Please inquire if I may have the honour to be received by Sir Count."

"Sir Count of Moret left the hotel five days ago," said the Swiss, "and no one knows where he went."

"Not even my Lord Duke?"

"My Lord left the previous day for his governorship of Languedoc."

"The dice are against me but at least I've kept my promise to Sir Count. That's all you can ask of a man of honour."

"However," said the Swiss, stepping away from the door, "before departing with the page Galaor, the Count of Moret did have Galaor leave a message with all the doormen and guards, one that may concern Your Lordship."

"What message is that?"

"He left orders that if a certain Étienne Latil presented himself at the hotel, he was to be offered room and board, and be treated as a man of confidence attached to the count's personal house."

Latil tipped his hat to the absent prince, and said, "Sir Count of Moret conducts himself like the worthy son of Henry IV he is. I am indeed that gentleman, and will have the honour, upon his return, to give him my thanks and enter his service. Here, my friend, is another half a pistole for the pleasure of hearing that the Count of Moret thinks kindly of me. Porters, on to Chaillot – to the estate of Your Eminence!"

The porters picked up their poles and resumed their march, taking the Rue Simon-le-Franc, the Rue Maubué, and the Rue Troussevache so that, by the Rue de la Ferronnerie, they finally gained the Rue Saint-Honoré. But as luck would have it, at the very moment that, at the doors of the Hotel de Montmorency, Latil cried, "On to Chaillot!" – as luck would have it, we say, the Marquis de Pisany, whom we temporarily lost sight of given the important events we had to relate, was just then rising for the first time since receiving his near-fatal sword thrust from Souscarrières. Resolving that his first action once back on his feet should be to apologise to the Count of Moret, he summoned a chair and, after cautioning the porters to tread easily as he was recovering from a wound, concluded by crying, "On to the Hotel de Montmorency!"

Leaving the Hotel de Rambouillet, the porters went down the Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre to the Rue Saint-Honoré, then made their way toward the Rue de la Ferronnerie. The result of these reciprocal manoeuvres was that the two chairs met at the head of the Rue de l'Arbre-Sec. The Marquis de Pisany, preoccupied with how to approach the Count of Moret, failed to recognise Étienne Latil – but Latil, whose mind was free of care, instantly recognised the Marquis de Pisany. One can imagine the effect this apparition had upon the irascible swashbuckler. He uttered a cry that stopped his porters in their tracks and, thrusting his head out the window, shouted, "Hey! Sir Hunchback!"

It might have been wiser for the Marquis de Pisany to pretend the insult was addressed to someone else but he was so sensitive about his hump that his first impulse was to stick his head out the door of his chair, in order to see who was addressing him by his deformity rather than his title. "To what do I owe the pleasure?" asked the marquis as his porters settled to a stop.

"It would be my pleasure if you'd stop a moment. I have a score to settle with you," said Latil. Then, to his porters: "Quick! Set my chair down so my door is lined up with his."

The porters picked up their poles and aligned Latil's sedan chair with Pisany's. "How's this, Sir?" they asked.

"Perfect!" Latil said. "Ah!"

This sigh came from his satisfaction at finally confronting his nemesis whose name was yet unknown but whose rank had been revealed by the ring he'd been shown. For his part, Pisany had finally recognised Latil. "Onward!" he shouted to his porters. "I want nothing to do with this man."

"Perhaps but unfortunately, this man has dealings with you, my darling. Don't move, any of you!" he shouted to the porters of the other chair. "Don't you dare budge or by the belly of the Grey Saint, as Henry IV used to say, I'll cut off your ears!"

The porters, who'd been raising Pisany's chair, set it back on the pavement. Meanwhile passers-by, attracted by the fracas, began to gather around the two chairs. "And I say," Pisany cried, "that if you don't carry me on, I'll send my men to beat you!"

The marquis's porters all shook their heads. "Better to be beaten," one said, "than to lose our ears."

"Send your men," said another. "We have sticks of our own."

"Bravo, my friends!" said Latil, who saw that luck was with him. "Here are four pistoles with which to drink my health! Now, I dare to give my name that is Étienne Latil. Do you dare to give yours, Sir Hunchback?"

"You wretch!" cried Pisany. "Wasn't being impaled on two swords enough for you?"

"It was not only enough," replied Latil, "it was too much. But I'll settle for impaling you just once."

"Would you abuse a man who can't even stand on his own two legs?"

"Is that the situation?" asked Latil. "In that case, the playing field is even. We shall fight while seated. On guard, Marquis ... Oh, dear! Without your three accomplices, who will stab me from behind?"

Latil drew his sword and hovered the tip beneath his opponent's eye. There was no way to decline. Witnesses surrounded the two chairs. Moreover, as we've said, the Marquis de Pisany was no coward. He drew his sword. The fighters, whose only doors faced each other, were obscured to all other observers, who could only glimpse two blades flashing between the chairs. They passed, crossed, parried, fainted, thrust, and riposted, while cries of rage came first from one door, then from the other. Finally, after a duel that lasted nearly five minutes, to the great entertainment of the audience, there was a cry – or rather, a blasphemy – from one of the two combatants. Latil had nailed his opponent's arm to the frame of his chair. "There!" said Étienne Latil. "Take that, my good Marquis – and remember that every time we meet, you'll be served the same way."

The common people love a winner, especially when he's good-looking or generous. Latil was reasonably handsome, and what's more, he'd thrown the porters four pistoles. The Marquis de Pisany, on the other hand, was ugly, defeated, and had kept his pistoles to himself. If he called upon the audience for aid and justice, he would certainly be mocked and denied. So he made up his mind: "To the Hotel de Rambouillet," he said.

"To Chaillot!" said Étienne Latil.

The Cardinal at Chaillot

Arriving at Chaillot, the cardinal found himself in much the same situation as Atlas when, after bearing the weight of the world, he was able to place it for a few moments on the shoulders of his friend Hercules. He felt at last he could take a breath. "Ah," he whispered, "I shall have the time to write poetry." Indeed, Chaillot was the retreat the cardinal had bought as an escape from politics, where he could write, if not true poetry, at least a little verse. An office on the ground floor that opened onto a beautiful garden, with an avenue of lime trees dark and cool even in summer, was the sanctuary where he'd taken refuge one or two days a month. Now he'd returned to that repose and renewal. For how long?

He couldn't tell. His first idea, upon setting foot in this poetic oasis, was to call for his usual collaborators, those writers who, in his battles of the mind, were like the generals he sent to war in Spain and Italy. Against such as England's Shakespeare, with Rotrou and Corneille he marshalled his French forces of letters. Then it occurred to him that, though master of his house at Chaillot, he was no longer the powerful minister distributing largesse. Here he was only a private citizen with whom suddenly it was dangerous to associate. He therefore resolved to wait and see which old friends would come to him without being summoned. So he drew forth the outline of his new tragedy, Mirame that was nothing less than a retaliation in words against the reigning queen, and reviewed the scenes he'd already begun. Cardinal Richelieu, poor Catholic though he was, was even worse when it came to the Christian virtue of forgiving one's enemies. He'd been devastated by the pernicious plot that had toppled him from power, and blamed Queen Anne as one of its prime movers. So he consoled himself with the idea of taking what revenge he could. We are sorry to have to reveal this petty weakness in such a great minister but we are his historian, not his apologist. The first show of sympathy for his plight came from an unexpected quarter. Guillemot, his valet, announced that a sedan chair had arrived bearing a man who seemed to be recovering from serious illness or injury. He had gotten as far as a bench in the entry hall where he had sunk down in exhaustion, saying "My place is here."

The porters, paid off, trotted away as quickly as they'd come. This man, who wore a somewhat battered felt hat and a cloak the colour of Spanish tobacco, was dressed in a manner more military than civilian, and bore a rapier like those we see in the sketches of Callot, in the style that was just beginning to become fashionable. When asked what name should be announced to the cardinal, "I am nobody," he replied, "So announce no one."

Asked why he had come, he said simply, "His Eminence is short of guards. I'll help ensure his safety."

This seemed strange enough to Guillemot that he thought he'd better inform Madam de Combalet and Your Eminence. The cardinal ordered this mysterious guardian brought before him. Five minutes later, the door opened and Étienne Latil appeared in the doorway, pale and leaning on the jamb, his hat in his right hand, the left on the pommel of his sword. With his knack for remembering faces, Richelieu recognised him at a glance. "Ah!" he said. "Is that you, my dear Latil?"

"In person, your Eminence."

"Are you doing better?"

"Yes, My Lord, so since I'm recovered I've come to offer my services to your Eminence."

"My thanks, Sir," the cardinal laughed, "but there's no one I need you to rid me of."

"That may be," said Latil, "but aren't there those who'd like to be rid of you?"

"Now that you mention it," said the cardinal, "that seems quite likely."

Just then Madam de Combalet entered through a side door, her worried gaze darting quickly from her uncle to the unknown adventurer.

"Come, Marie," said the cardinal, "and help me welcome this brave lad, the first who's come to help me in my day of adversity."

"Oh, I won't be the last," said Latil, "but I'm not sorry to be counted as the first."

"Uncle," said Madam de Combalet, after regarding Latil with the sympathetic eye of a woman, "sir is pale and stricken with weakness."

"Which speaks all the better for him. I know from my doctor, who's been looking in on him, that he only got up for the first time three days ago. This visit, so early, is entirely to his credit."

"Oh," said Madam de Combalet, "so this is the gentleman who was wounded in the brawl at the Inn of the Painted Beard?"

"You're right, fair lady, and my hat's off to you," said Latil. "They got me in an ambush but I finally caught up with that cursed hunchback and sent him home just now with a sword thrust through the arm."

"The Marquis de Pisany?" said Madam de Combalet. "That poor wretch has no luck. He'd just spent over a week recovering from a wound he'd received the same night you were nearly murdered."

"The Marquis de Pisany, eh?" Latil said. "It's good to finally know his name. That explains why, when I told my porters 'To Chaillot,' he said to his 'To the Hotel de Rambouillet' – an address I took care to remember."

"If you were both recovering from wounds, how did you manage to have a duel?" asked the cardinal.

"We fought from our sedan chairs, My Lord. It was most convenient, just the thing for wounded swordsmen."

"And you're telling me this, after my edicts outlawing duels!" said the cardinal. "Though it is a fact that I'm no longer a minister, so it's not my problem. In fact, given a year..." And the cardinal sighed that proved he wasn't so removed from worldly things as he wanted to believe.

"But didn't you say, dear Uncle that Sir Latil – that is your name, is it not? – had come to offer his services?" asked Madam de Combalet. "What services does he offer?"

Latil raised his sword. "Services both offensive and defensive," he said. "Your Eminence lacks both a Captain of the Guards, and guards for him to captain. I will take their place."

"A new Captain of the Guards?" said a feminine voice from behind Latil. "I don't think so. Not so long as he still has his Cavois! ... Who is, of course, also my Cavois."

"Ah!" said the cardinal. "There's a voice I know. Come in, dear Madam Cavois, come in."

A lithe and pretty woman, though starting, in her thirties, to be more plump than lithe, slipped into the room, brushed past Latil, and presented herself to the cardinal and Madam de Combalet. "At last," she said, rubbing her hands, "you're free from that awful ministry and all the trouble it gave us!"

"Gave us, you say?" said the cardinal. "So my ministry gave you troubles as well, dear Madam?"

"I should say so! I couldn't sleep day or night, I was so afraid some catastrophe would strike Your Eminence, and take my poor Cavois as well. All day I worried, and jumped at the slightest sound. All night I dreamed, and woke up with a start. You have no idea how bad a woman's dreams can be when she sleeps alone."

"But what of Sir Cavois?" asked Madam de Combalet, laughing.

"When he did sleep with me, you mean? Oh, Cavois! At least we never lost the will for it, thank God. Ten children in nine years that shows we couldn't get enough but as time went on, I was more and more troubled. Then Your Eminence took him to the Siege of La Rochelle that lasted eight months! Fortunately I was already expecting when he left, so no time was lost. But this time, Madam, His Eminence was going to take him away to Italy. Can you believe it? And for God knows how long! But I prayed to God for a miracle, and thanks to my prayers Your Eminence has lost his position."

"Why, thank you, Madam Cavois!" laughed the cardinal.

"Yes, thank you," said Madam de Combalet. "It was a big favour, indeed, that God has granted us. It gives you your husband and me my uncle."

"Fah!" said Madam Cavois. "A husband and an uncle are not the same thing at all."

"But, Madam," said the cardinal, "unless Cavois goes with me into disgrace, he must follow the king."

"To where?" asked Madam Cavois.

"To Italy!"

"Him, go to Italy? Certainly not, My Lord. Him, leave me? Leave his little woman? Never!"

"But didn't he leave you to go on campaign with me?"

"Oh, with you, yes. I think you bewitched him somehow. His wits aren't that quick, poor man, and if he hadn't had me to manage our home and raise our children, I don't know what he would have done. But leave me to go with someone other than you? Never! He's as likely to risk God's wrath by sleeping with another woman."

"But what of his duties?"

"What duties?"

"If he's no longer in my service, he must serve the king."

"If he's no longer in your service, My Lord, he must serve me! I imagine that by this time he's already presented his resignation to His Majesty."

"Did he tell you he was going to do that?" asked Madam de Combalet.

"Does he need to tell me everything he's going to do? Don't I always know what he does before he does it? Isn't he as transparent to me as crystal? When I tell you that by now he's probably done it, then he has!"

"But, my dear Madam Cavois," said the cardinal, "as captain of my guards he earned six thousand livres per year. As a private citizen, I can't pay a captain of the guards' six thousand livres. That's a lot to lose from your household budget. Think of your eight children!"

"Yes but haven't you already covered that? Half the sedan-chair monopoly is worth at least twelve thousand livres a year – and isn't that preferable to depending on a position with the king, from which he might be dismissed at the slightest whim? Our children, thanks be to God, are plump and stout, and you shall see they lack nothing. If you have healthy children, you have everything!"

"What, are your children here?"

"All but the one who was born during the Siege of La Rochelle, who is only five months old and still with the wet nurse. But he's as healthy as the rest."

"With a wet nurse? Then, are you expecting again, Madam Cavois?"

"By the grace of God! After all, my husband's been back for nearly a month. Come in! Come in, everyone! By the cardinal's permission!"

"Yes, I will permit it – but at the same time I must permit, or rather command, Latil to take a seat. Take a chair and sit down, Latil."

Latil didn't speak but he quickly obeyed. Another minute on his feet and he would have fainted. Meanwhile, all the Cavois children trooped into the room in order of age, the eldest first, a sweet boy of the age of nine, then a girl, then another boy, then another girl, all the way down to an infant of two years. Arrayed in front of the cardinal, from tallest to shortest, they looked like a set of pan-pipes.

"Now, then," said Madam de Cavois, "here is the man to whom we owe everything – you, me, and Papa. Kneel before him and offer him your thanks."

"Madam Cavois! We do not kneel save before the Lord."

"And before those who represent him. Kneel, you puppies."

The children obeyed. "Now, Armand," said Madam de Cavois to the eldest boy, "repeat to Your Eminence the prayer I taught you to say every morning and night."

"Lord God," said the child, "grant health to my father, my mother, my brothers, and my sisters, and see to it that His Eminence the Cardinal, to whom we owe everything, shall lose his ministry so that Papa can spend his nights at home."

"Amen!" the children replied in unison.

"Well," said the cardinal, laughing, "it's no surprise to me that such a prayer, offered so earnestly by so many voices, was granted."

"There!" said Madam Cavois. "And now that we've said everything to My Lord that we had to say, get up and go on out." The children rose and left the room in the same order they'd come in. "Good!" said Madam Cavois. "Very obedient."

"Madam Cavois," said the cardinal, "If I'm ever restored to my ministry, I shall appoint you as drill instructor to the King's Infantry."

"God forbid, My Lord!"

Madam de Combalet kissed the children and their mother, who loaded them into three waiting sedan chairs, before entering a fourth herself with the two-year-old. The cardinal watched them go with some emotion. "My Lord," said Latil, straightening himself on his chair, "you won't need me as a man of the sword, since Sir Cavois also follows you in your fall from grace but it's not really steel that you have to fear. For your true enemy goes by the name of Médicis."

"I am entirely of the same mind," said Madam de Combalet, coming back into the room. "And I fear the same thing: poison."

"You need someone devoted to you, Your Eminence, who will taste everything you drink and everything you eat before you do. I offer myself for this role."

"I'm so sorry, my dear Sir Latil," smiled Madam de Combalet, "but you're too late. Someone else has already offered to do that."

"And has been accepted?"

"I sincerely hope so," Madam said, gazing tenderly at her uncle.

"To who but the king, My Lord?"
"To the king!"
"That's what made her think the afternoon wouldn't pass without you receiving a visit from His Majesty."
"Ah! Now I understand."

Just then they heard the sound of a carriage arriving at speed. The cardinal, suddenly pale, leaned on a chair. Saint-Simon ran to the window. "The king!" he shouted.
A moment later, the door to the stairs opened and Bois-Robert rushed in, shouting, "The king!"
The door to Madam de Combalet's chambers opened and she whispered, in a voice trembling with emotion, "The king."
"Go, all of you," said the cardinal. "Leave me alone with His Majesty."
Each disappeared through a different door, while the cardinal mopped his brow. Then steps were heard on the stairs, ascending, one at a time, in a measured meter. Guillemot appeared at the door and announced, "The king."
"By my faith," the cardinal murmured, "in Marion Delorme, I've a great diplomat as a neighbour."

Why Louis XIII Always Dressed in Black

Guillemot disappeared. King Louis XIII came face to face with Cardinal Richelieu. "Sire," Richelieu said, bowing respectfully, "I was so surprised to hear that the king was at the door of my humble home that, instead of rushing downstairs as I should have, I stayed here, as if my feet were nailed to the floor, stunned and doubting that it could really be His Majesty himself who deigned to visit me."
The king looked around him. "We are alone, Your Eminence?" he asked.
"Alone, your Majesty."
"Are you sure?"
"Quite certain, Sire."
"So we can speak freely?"
"Entirely freely."
"Then close that door and listen to what I have to say."
The cardinal bowed and obeyed, shutting the door and indicating a chair to the king, who sat, or rather sank, into it. The cardinal stood by and waited. The king slowly raised his eyes to the cardinal, regarding him for a moment, then said, "Your Eminence, I was wrong."
"Wrong, Sire? In what?"
"To do what I did."
It was the cardinal's turn to stare at the king. "Sire," he finally said, "I believe a frank discussion, clear and precise, that leaves not a cloud, a doubt, or a shadow between us, has long been necessary. The words Your Majesty just said lead me to believe that the time for that discussion has come."
"Your Eminence," said Louis XIII, drawing himself up, "I hope you will not go so far as to forget..."
"...That you are King Louis XIII, and I am your humble servant Cardinal Richelieu? No, Sire, rest easy. However, given the deep respect I have for Your Majesty, I beg leave to tell him everything. If I have the misfortune to say something hurtful, I will retire to a place so remote, Your Majesty will never be troubled by me again, or even have the need to say my name. If, on the contrary, he recognises that my reasons are good, my issues are real, he will only have to tell me in the same tone in which he just said 'I was wrong.' There's no need to say 'Cardinal, you were right.' We'll just consign what has passed to the oblivion of the past."
"Speak, Sir," said the king. "I'm listening."
"Sire, allow me to begin by saying that my honesty and integrity have always been beyond question."
"Have I ever attacked them?" asked the king.
"No but Your Majesty has allowed them to be attacked, and it was a great wrong."
"Sir!" the king said.
"Sire, shall I speak, or shall I not? Does Your Majesty command me not to speak?"
"No, by the belly of the Grey Saint, as my father used to say. On the contrary, I command you to talk – but please go easy on the reproaches."
"I am, however, obliged to treat Your Majesty as I think he merits."
The king stood, stamped his foot, marched to the window, from the window to the door, and from the door back to his chair, where he stared silently at Richelieu – and then finally sat down and said, "Speak. I sacrifice my pride on the royal crucifix. I will hear whatever you have to say."
"I said, Sire that I would start with my honesty and integrity, so please consider the words that follow."
Louis XIII gave a formal nod. "I have, from my estate," the cardinal continued, "some twenty-five thousand livres a year in rents. The king gave me six abbeys that generate another one hundred twenty-five thousand livres. So my annuities bring me one hundred and fifty thousand livres."
"I know all that," said the king.
"Your Majesty no doubt also knows that, as your minister, I was surrounded by threats and plots, to the point where I had to have guards and a captain to defend myself."
"I know that as well."
"Then, Sire, I refused sixty thousand livres in pensions that you offered me after taking La Rochelle."
"I remember."
"I turned down the salary that came with the Admiralty, worth forty thousand livres. I refused the grant that came with the Admiralty, one hundred thousand livres – or rather, I donated it to the State. Finally, I refused a million that the bankers offered me to save them from being investigated. But they were investigated, and I forced them to disgorge ten million in fines into the king's coffers."
"No one could dispute any of this, Your Eminence," the king said, raising his hat. "You are the most honest man in my kingdom."
The cardinal bowed, and continued, "But that's not what is said by my enemies in Your Majesty's Court – even by those closest to Your Majesty. Who is it who libels me across France, and slanders me in the eyes of all Europe? Those who should be the first to honour me as you do, Sire: His Royal Highness My Lord Gaston, Her Majesty Queen Anne, and Her Majesty the Queen Mother."
The king sighed. The cardinal had touched the wound. Richelieu continued, "His Royal Highness Sir has always hated me. How have I responded to this hatred? The Chalais affair was nothing less than an attempt to murder me. Confessions from everyone involved, Sir included, made that clear. And what was my revenge? I made him marry Miss de Montpensier, the richest heiress in the kingdom, and persuaded Your Majesty to give him the honours and title of Duke of Orléans. My Lord Gaston has, as a result, an annual income of a million and a half livres."
"In other words, Sir, he's even richer than I am."
"The king doesn't need to be rich, he's the king; if he needs a million, he asks for a million, and it is found."
"That's true," said the king. "The day before yesterday, you gave me four million, followed by another half million yesterday."
"Must I remind Your Majesty also how much resentment Queen Anne of Austria holds against me? And what, in her eyes, is my crime? Respect must silence me on that score."
"No, speak, Your Eminence. I shall, I must, I want to hear everything."
"Sire, the great misfortune of princes, and the calamity of states, is the marriage of a king with a foreign princess. Queens who come from Austria, from Italy, or from Spain, at some point become enemies of the State. How many queens, to the benefit of their father or brothers, have stolen the sword of France from under the king's pillow? And what happens then? Despite such treason, the real culprit goes unprosecuted, and it is always lower heads that fall. After conspiring with England, Queen Anne, who hates me because she sees me as the champion of France, now conspires with Spain and Austria."
"I know it – oh, I know it," said the king in a hushed voice. "But Queen Anne has no power over me."
"That's true. But what about Marie, the queen mother, Sire? Queen Marie, the cruellest of all my enemies, because it was to her I was most devoted – and so from her I've suffered the most."
"Forgive me, Your Eminence."
"No, Sire, I cannot forgive you."
"Even if I beg?"
"Even if you command me. When you sought me out here, I told Your Majesty he shall have the entire truth."
The king sighed, and said, voice trembling, "Do you think I don't know the entire truth?"
"Not all of it. And this time, you shall hear it. Your mother, Sire, is the arch-nemesis of France. Your mother, Sire ... it's terrible to say this to a son but your mother..."
"What about my mother?" said the king, glaring at the cardinal.
This glare from the king that would have silenced a man less determined than the cardinal, instead seemed to loosen his tongue. "Your mother, Sire," he said, "was unfaithful to her husband. Before her marriage, your mother, during her time in Marseilles..."
"Silence, Sir!" said the king. "The walls listen, they say, and sometimes they hear ... what they should not hear. Nobody needs to know, beyond you and me, why I hesitate to give an heir to the crown, when everyone presses me on it, most of all you. And what I say is so true, Sir," the king said, rising and grasping the cardinal's hand, "that if I thought my brother the true son of King Henry IV, in other words, the only blood that has the right to rule France, then as God and you hear me, Sir, I already would have abdicated in his favour and retired to a monastery, to pray for my mother and for France. Now, do you have anything else to tell me? If so, after all that, then tell me now."
"Well, Sire, yes – I do have more to tell you," the cardinal said, surprised in spite of himself, "for I begin to understand that the instinctive respect I hold for Your Majesty has been justified, and my admiration is only deepened by this sharing of secrets. Oh, Sire! What worlds of sadness are revealed by your lifting of this veil! As God is my witness, if I didn't believe that the future of France depends on what else I need to tell you, I'd stop now and seal my lips forever. But, Sire ... have you ever thought about the death of King Henry IV?"
"Alas! I think of it every day, Sir!"
"But, in thinking of his death, have you tried to unravel the terrible mystery of the Fourteenth of May?"
"Yes, and I have done so."
"So, you know who the real assassins are, Sire?"
"The assassination of Concini, le Marshall d'Ancre that I would approve again tomorrow if need be, proves that I know at least one of them – though I do not know the other."
"But I, Sire, I – who didn't have the same reasons as Your Majesty to look away – I've seen to the bottom of this mystery, and I can name all the assassins."
The king groaned.
"You remember, Sire, that there was a religious woman, a holy creature who, knowing that the crime was afoot, swore it would not be completed. Do you know the reward for her loyalty?"
"She was buried alive in a tomb at the Daughters of Repentance, the door walled up to keep her in, where she stayed for years on end, exposed to the scorching rays of the summer and the icy gales of the winter. Her name was Coëtman, and she died there ten or twelve days ago."
"And knowing this, Sire, Your Majesty still suffered such an injustice to occur?"
"The person of a king is sacred, Your Eminence," replied Louis XIII, who believed in the cult of absolute monarchy – that terrible cult that, under Louis XIV, would become idolatry. "Woe to those who learn a king's secrets."
"Well, Sire, this is a secret known by someone other than you and me."
The king was suddenly alert, and fixed a clear eye on the cardinal. "You may have heard," Richelieu continued, "that on the scaffold, Ravallac asked to be confessed."
"Yes," said Louis XIII, turning pale.
"You may even have heard that the clerk there listened while the condemned, already half dead, spoke the names of the culprits?"
"Yes," said Louis XIII, "which were written down on a sheet kept out of the record."

To the cardinal’s eyes, he seemed even more pallid than before. “Then you may have heard that this sheet was kept and guarded very carefully by the clerk, Joly de Fleury?”

“I’ve heard all of this, Your Eminence. What else? What else?”

“Well, I tried to recover this sheet from the children of Sir Joly de Fleury.”

“Why would you want to do that?”

“To give it to Your Majesty, in the event that you wanted it destroyed.”

“Well?”

“Well, Sire, this sheet is no longer in the possession of Sir de Fleury’s children. Two unidentified men, one a young man of sixteen, the other a man of twenty-six, came one day to try to persuade the clerk to give up the sheet. And they were successful.”

“And Your Eminence, who knows everything, doesn’t know the names of these two men?” the king asked.

“No, Sire,” the cardinal replied.

“Then I will tell you!” the king said, grabbing the cardinal by the arm. “The elder of the two men was Sir de Luynes, and the younger – was me.”

“You, Sire!” the cardinal cried, recoiling.

The king reached into his lapel and pulled out of an inside pocket a yellowed and crumpled paper, the process verbal Ravalliac had dictated on the scaffold, the sheet that named the culprits, and said, “Here it is.”

“Oh, Sire! Sire!” Richelieu said, realising what the pale king must have suffered during their talk. “Forgive me for what I’ve said to you. I truly thought you didn’t know.”

“Then how did you account for my sadness, my isolation, my grief? Is it usual for the Kings of France to dress as I do? Among other sovereigns, the death of a father, a mother, a brother, a sister, a parent, or another king, means wearing the purple. But for all men, whether kings or commoners, the death of happiness means wearing black.”

“Sire,” said the cardinal, “there’s no need to keep this paper. Burn it.”

“No, Sir. I may be weak but fortunately I know myself. Despite everything, my mother is my mother, and sometimes she gets the better of me. But when I feel that her domination might push me to do something wrong, something unjust, I look at this paper, and it gives me strength. This paper, Your Eminence,” the king said in a voice gloomy but resolute, “I give to you to keep as a pact between us, for on the day I must finally break with my mother – exile her from Paris, hound her from France – I will do it with this paper in my hand. On that day I will ask you to return it, and you – you may ask me for whatever you want.”

The cardinal hesitated. “Take it,” said the king. “I want you to. Take it.”

The cardinal bowed and took the sheet of yellowed paper. “As Your Majesty wishes,” he said.

“And now, put me no more to the question, Your Eminence. I place France, and myself, in your hands.”

The cardinal fell to his knees, took the king’s hands, kissed them, and said, “Sire, in return for this moment, I hope Your Majesty will accept the entire efforts of the rest of my life.”

“So I intend, Sir,” said the king, with that supreme majesty he could sometimes assume. “And now, my dear Cardinal, let’s forget all that has happened, set aside the wretched intrigues of my mother, my brother, and the queen, and occupy ourselves with the glory of our arms and the greatness of France!”

In Which the Cardinal Audits the Accounts of the King

The next day, at two in the afternoon, King Louis XIII, sitting in a great chair, his cane between his legs, his black hat with its black plumes resting on his cane, his brows somewhat less furrowed, his face less pale than formerly, watched the cardinal as Richelieu worked at his desk. Both were in the cardinal’s office in the Place Royale, the same place we saw the king, during his three-day reign, pass such troubling hours. The cardinal wrote, and the king waited. The cardinal looked up and said, “Sire, I’ve written to Spain, Mantua, Venice, and Rome, letters which Your Majesty has done me the honour to approve. Now I have just written, again at the approval of Your Majesty, to your cousin the King of Sweden. This response was more difficult than the others: His Majesty King Gustavus Adolphus isn’t yet allied to us, and he is a suspicious man, who makes decisions based on actions rather than words, reserving judgement until he’s had time to make up his mind.”

“Read your letter to me, your Eminence,” said Louis XIII. “I already know what was in the letter from my cousin Gustave.” The cardinal bowed and read:

Sire,

The familiarity with which Your Majesty deigns to write to me is a great honour but assuming such familiarity in return would show a lack of respect, and be unbefitting of the humility appropriate to one in my position, even bearing the title Prince of the Church by which Your Majesty has been good enough to address me. Sire, I am not a great man! Sire, I am no genius! But I am, as you were good enough to note, an honest man. And it is this virtue that the king, my master, particularly appreciates, as he need only resort to himself when greatness or genius is required. I will speak candidly to Your Majesty, as requested but as nothing more than a simple minister of the King of France. Yes, Sire, I am sure of my king, more so than ever, as on this day he has confirmed my power over the direct opposition of Marie de Médicis, his mother, against Queen Anne, his wife, and against My Lord Gaston, his brother – he has given me proof that if sometimes his heart yields to filial piety, fraternal friendship, or conjugal affection that are the happiness and glory of common men and which God has placed in every honest and well-born heart, reasons of state outweigh those noble impulses. Kings must sometimes override their feelings when matters call for discipline and rigor in the name of good government. One of the great misfortunes of royalty, Sire, is that God has placed his representatives here on Earth so high that kings cannot really have friends, only favourites. But far from being influenced by his favourites, on the contrary, my master, who is called “the Jus, as I am the one who advised it” is entirely capable of bowing to the demands of criminal justice when a favourite is accused of meddling with state business – as he proved in the affair of Sir de Chalais. My master’s eyes are so vigilant, his grip so firm, that no matter how deep the conspiracy, no matter how powerful the conspirators, they cannot escape the justice of this king, whose heart and soul are devoted to France. If, one day, I do fall from power, it won’t be because I was undermined from below. So I say to you, Sire – as well as to my king, with whom I had the honour to share your letter, and from whom I have no secrets – yes, I am quite sure. If God gives me permission to stay in this world for another three years, and if the king gives me permission to remain as minister – and, in fact, Louis XIII gave Richelieu a nod – I can assure you in the king’s name and mine that we will be able to keep every one of our commitments to you, and I will deal with you as frankly as I do with my master. As to calling Your Majesty “my friend Gustave,” I know of only two men in antiquity – Alexander and Caesar – and three men of our modern monarchy – Charlemagne, Philippe-Auguste, and Henry IV – who would have had the stature for such flattering familiarity. I, who am so unworthy, can only call myself Your Majesty’s most humble and obedient servant.

– Armand, Cardinal de Richelieu

PS. If I please Your Majesty, my king has appointed the Baron de Chamassé to deliver this letter, and to be responsible for negotiating with Your Majesty the great matter of the foundation of the Protestant League. He does so with the full powers of the king and, if you absolutely insist, with mine as well.

While the cardinal was reading this long letter that was in part an apology to the king for the way Gustavus Adolphus had rather freely shown his disregard for Louis XIII, the king, though occasionally gnawing at his moustache, nodded his general approval. But when the letter had been read, he stood for a moment in thought, and then asked the cardinal, “Your Eminence, in your capacity as a theologian, can you assure me that this alliance with a heretic does not imperil the salvation of my soul?”

“As I am the one who advised Your Majesty to do so,” said the cardinal, “if there is any sin in it, I take it upon myself.”

“That reassures me somewhat,” said Louis XIII, “but having taken this path since you became my minister, and assuming I’ll continue to follow your advice in the future, do you really think, my dear Cardinal, that one of us can be damned without the other?”

“The question is too difficult for me to answer. All I can say to Your Majesty is that I pray to God never to let me stray from Him, either in this world or the next.”

“Ah!” said the king, breathing more easily. “Is our work done, my dear Cardinal?”

“Not quite, Sire,” said Richelieu. “I must beg Your Majesty to grant me a few moments to make sure our commitments are maintained and our promises are kept.”

“Are you talking about the sums requested by my brother, my mother, and my wife?”

“Yes, Sire.”

“Traitors and disloyal deceivers! You, who preach about saving money, are you going to advise me to reward infidelity, lies, and betrayal?”

“No, Sire but I will say to Your Majesty that a royal word is sacred, and once given, it must be upheld. Your Majesty promised one hundred and fifty thousand livres to his brother...”

“If he would be lieutenant general but since then he’s asked for more!”

“All the more reason to award him compensation.”

“He’s an impostor who pretended to fall in love with Princess Marie de Gonzague just to cause trouble!”

“Trouble we are out of, I hope, since he himself says he’s given up on that love.”

“While demanding his price to renounce it.”

“If he has his price, Sire, you have to pay the bill at the rate that was set.”

“One hundred and fifty thousand livres?”

“It’s expensive, I know but a king must keep his word.”

“In no time, he’ll take that one hundred and fifty thousand to Crete and bank it with King Minos, as he calls the Duke of Lorraine.”

“Then, Sire, that hundred and fifty thousand will have been well spent: for a hundred and fifty thousand livres will buy us the taking of Lorraine.”

“Do you think the Emperor Ferdinand will let us get away with that?”

“Well, don’t we have Gustavus Adolphus to oppose him?”

The king thought for a moment. “You are a canny chess player, Your Eminence,” he said. “My brother Sir shall have his hundred and fifty thousand. But as for my mother, she’ll never see her sixty thousand livres.”

“Sire, Her Majesty the Queen Mother has been in need of money for quite a while; she asked me for a hundred thousand livres, and at the time I was only able to give her fifty. But at that time we were strapped for cash, whereas now we are flush.”

“Cardinal! Do you forget all you said to me yesterday about my mother?”

“But didn’t I say she was still your mother, Sire?”

“Yes. Unfortunately for me, and for France, she is.”

“Sire, you committed to give Her Majesty the Queen Mother sixty thousand livres.”

“Maybe but I didn’t sign anything.”

“A royal promise is far more sacred than a written contract, Sire.”

“Then have it come from you instead of from me. Maybe then she’ll give you some respect and leave the both of us alone.”

“The queen mother will never leave us alone, Sire. She was born with the meddling spirit of the Médicis, and she’ll spend the rest of her life pursuing the two things she cannot have: her vanished youth and her lost power.”

“All right, I give in on the queen mother. But what about the queen, who wants me to pay Sir d’Éméry for a string of pearls – just one example of her continual demands!”

“That proves to us, Sire, that the queen recognises she has no power without the king. And since the king has the key to a box holding four million livres, we might as well remind her of it. So the queen owes someone twenty thousand? Then I’m sure Her Majesty will appreciate receiving fifty thousand! Send her fifty thousand as a sign of good faith, on condition that twenty thousand of it goes to Sir d’Éméry. The Crown of France is pure gold, Sire, and must shine on both the king and the queen.”

The king rose and held out his hand to the cardinal. “Your Eminence, you are not only a great minister and a good counsellor, you are a generous enemy. I authorise you, Your Eminence, to pay out the various sums we have discussed.”

“It is the king who promised, and the king who will deliver. The king will sign vouchers to present to the treasury, where they’ll be covered – but it seems to me His Majesty is forgetting another reward he promised.”

“Which one?”

“I thought I heard that, in an hour of generosity, he’d promised his fool Sir l’Angely the same amount he’d given his favourite, Sir Baradas: thirty thousand livres.”

The king flushed. “L’Angely turned it down,” he said.

“All the more reason, Sire, to show your generosity. Sir l’Angely turned it down because that was the crazy thing to do, and a fool has to act crazy to deserve a place with Your Majesty. But the king has two real friends he can depend on: his prime minister, and his fool. He shouldn’t appear ungrateful to the one while rewarding the other.”

“That’s so. You’re right, Your Eminence; the little clown has suffered so from my bad moods the last three months…”

“Three months, Sire, that can be recompensed at a rate of ten thousand a month. Show him that the King of France remembers his friends, as well as his favourites.”

“A favourite, who abandons me for Marion Delorme, a girl who … is…”

“Who is very useful, Sire, as she gave me the warning that I was about to be disgraced, and thus I was able to prepare a way to recoup my fortunes. Without her, Sire, I would have been caught unaware, and been unprepared to engage Your Majesty’s wisdom while absent. Put Sir Baradas in command of a company of troops, Sire, and give him the opportunity to prove to Your Majesty that the student can give faithful service to his teacher.”

The king thought for a moment. “Your Eminence,” he asked, “what do you think of this friend of his, Saint-Simon?”

“I think I should recommend him, Sire, as a person of goodwill and propriety who could fill the place left vacant by the ingratitude of Sir Baradas.”

“And besides,” the king added, “he really plays the horn quite beautifully. I’m glad you recommend him, Cardinal. I’ll see what I can do for him. By the way, what shall we tell the King’s Council?”

“Will Your Majesty be at the Louvre tomorrow at noon? By then, I’ll be prepared to explain my plan of campaign, so we can propose something more practical than crossing rivers upon Sir’s finger.”

The king stared at the cardinal, astounded that he should be so well informed even when away from Court. “My dear Cardinal,” he said with a laugh, “you must have actual demons in your service! Unless – as I’ve thought more than once – you’re the Devil himself.”

PART V

119
The Avalanche

Just as the King’s Council, convened this time by Richelieu, came to order in Paris, at around eleven in the morning a small caravan that had left the French town of Oulx at dawn, and then passed through Exilles, now approached the outlying houses of the small town of Chaumont, just short of the Piedmont border. This caravan was composed of four people, two men and two women, mounted on mules. Both men wore Basque outfits but rode with their faces uncovered, and it was easy to see that they were young, the eldest about twenty-three, the youngest only eighteen. As for the two women, determining their ages was harder, as over their dresses they wore capes with hoods that completely hid their faces, something that might just as easily be attributed to the cold as to a desire to go unrecognised. Then as now, the Alps were crossed by magnificent roads from Simplon, from Mont-Cenis, and from Saint-Gothard but one could also reach Italy by way of trails so narrow, it was sometimes necessary for travellers to march single-file, leading their mules. These animals were perfectly comfortable with the dramatic terrain, both well trained and amenable. At the moment, the elder of the two cavaliers led the way on foot, holding the bridle of the mule ridden by the younger of the women. Seeing no one on the road but a kind of travelling merchant who preceded the caravan by five hundred paces, whipping along a little mule loaded with bales, she drew back her hood to reveal a head of soft blond hair and a face with a complexion so wonderfully fresh, it could belong to no one over the age of eighteen. The other woman followed, her face completely covered by her hood. Head bowed, whether in thought or by fatigue, she seemed completely oblivious of the way her mount picked its way along the trail, the snow-covered mountain on one side, sheer cliff on the other. But the mule seemed to know its business, choosing its way carefully, occasionally turning its head and eyeing the abyss, as if it understood quite clearly the dangers of a misstep. This danger was quite real; so, as a distraction, or to stave off the beckoning demon of vertigo, the fourth traveller, a young man with blond hair, a compact well-made figure, and the bright flashing eyes of youth, sat his mule side-saddle like a woman, his back to the abyss. A mandolin hung from his neck by a sky-blue ribbon, and as he rode he played it and sang, apparently to the fourth mule which, freed of its rider, followed contentedly along at the rear. And here is his song:

Venus has a thousand names
And a hundred thousand nicknames
Poor outraged lovers cry
These iron-heart ladies
Are creatures of Hades
Who make them want to die
Love for one is worry and tears
For another it’s all pain and fears
For a third it’s agony and defeat
But me, when I think of
The woman that I love
She’s nothing to me but sweet!

As for the elder of the two young men, he neither played the viola nor sang – he was too busy for that. All his attention was concentrated on the young woman he was leading and the dangers that threatened her and her mount on the narrow and winding path. All the while, she gazed at him with that sweet and charming regard with which a woman looks at a man who not only loves her but is devoted to her, body and soul – and for whom devotion to the second outweighs even devotion to the first. After a moment, at one of the kinks in the path, the small caravan halted. There was a serious issue to be resolved. As we said, having passed Exilles two hours earlier, they were approaching the town of Chaumont, the last town in France that meant they were only half a league from the checkpoint that separated the French province of Dauphiné from the Italian province of Piedmont. Beyond that point, they would be in enemy territory, not only because Charles-Emmanuel, the Duke of Savoy and Piedmont, knew of the cardinal’s preparations for war but also because he’d been officially notified by the French government that if he didn’t allow their troops to march through his domain to raise the siege of Casale, it would be regarded as an act of war. So the serious issue was this: should they try to ride openly through Susa Pass, risking recognition and arrest by Charles-Emmanuel, or should they find a guide who could take them, by some other circuitous route that might avoid Susa, even Turin, and get them across into Lombardy? The young woman, with the charming confidence of a woman who loves a man who loves her in return, abandoned all these concerns to her lover; she looked at him with her lovely dark eyes and sweet smile and said, “You know better than I what to do – I leave it in your hands.”

The young man, anxious about the safety of the woman he loved, turned to question the woman whose face was hidden by her hood. “And you, Madam?” he asked. “What do you think?”

At these words the hood was raised, and one could see the face of a woman of forty-five or fifty, aged, emaciated, and ravaged by long suffering. The only part of her face that seemed alive was her eyes that shone with a piercing force as if trying to see beyond the world and into the unknown. “What’s that?” she asked. She hadn’t been listening, and had only looked up because they’d stopped. The young man raised his voice, for the noise of the cascading Doire tumbling through the canyon made normal speech impossible. He repeated his question. “As long as you’re asking,” she said, “what I think is we should stop at the next town because, since it’s on the border, we should be able to find out what you want to know. If there’s a back way across the mountains, someone in the village will know about it, and if we’re looking for a guide, that’s where we’ll find him. A few hours spent in discreet inquiry won’t make any difference; what’s important is that we, or rather you, aren’t recognised.”

“My dear Madam,” the young man replied, “you’re wisdom incarnate and we’ll do exactly as you say.”

“So?” asked the young woman.

“So now we go on. But what are you looking at?”

“Something amazing on the mountain. That is amazing, isn’t it?”

The young man looked to where she was pointing. “What is?” he asked.

“That there should be flowers blooming at this time of year!”

And indeed, just below the snow line, bright red flowers danced in the breeze. “Up here, dear Isabelle, there’re no seasons,” the young man said. “It’s always winter here but life can’t be quenched. Even in winter this flower grows in the snow that is why we call it the Alpine Rose.”

“It’s beautiful,” Isabelle said.

“Would you like one?” the young man said. And before the young woman could answer, he leaped up the slope, clambering over the rocks toward where the flowers grew.

“Count, Count!” cried the young woman. “In heaven’s name! Don’t be so foolish! I can’t bear even to look!”

But he who was honoured with the title of count and who we have no reason not to recognise as the Count of Moret, had already reached the ledge, picked the flower, and like a true Montagnard slid back down the slope – though he, a man who prepared for every contingency, had, like his companion, a rope coiled around his waist, in order to help with ascents and descents. He presented the Alpine Rose to the girl who, blushing with pleasure, raised it to her lips, then slipped it inside her bodice. At that moment, a sound like thunder rolled down from the peak of the mountain above. A cloud of snow billowed into the air, and a mass of white began racing like lightning down the slope, increasing in speed and force as it came. “Look out! Avalanche!” cried the younger of the two cavaliers, leaping from his mule. His companion wrapped Isabelle in his arms and leaned back against the overhanging rock face. The pale older woman drew back her hood so she could see what was happening. And suddenly, she screamed. The avalanche swept across the path about five hundred paces ahead of the small caravan, and though it was a minor one, the travellers felt the earth shake under their feet as the wind of death blew past. But the pale woman’s scream hadn’t been a cry of personal terror, as Galaor, the younger man, and the Count of Moret, worried about Isabelle, had both thought; it was because she’d seen the devastating tempest sweep the merchant and mule ahead of them down into the abyss. The Count of Moret and Galaor thought they’d escaped all danger, and weren’t sure why she’d screamed, so they turned to look. But they saw only the pale woman pointing and crying, over and over, “There! There! There!”

Then their eyes focused on the narrow path ahead. The peddler and his mule were gone, and the road was empty. Suddenly Moret understood everything. “Follow us slowly and carefully,” he told Isabelle, “and you, my dear Madam de Coëtman, follow Isabelle. Galaor and I will run ahead – maybe there’s something we can do to save the poor fellow.” And, leaping ahead with the agility of a mountain goat, the Count of Moret, followed by Galaor, rushed to the place indicated by Madam de Coëtman – whom Cardinal Richelieu, confident though he was that Moret would respect Isabelle’s chastity, had sent along as a chaperone as a concession to worldly propriety.

Guillaume Coutet

Arriving at the spot indicated, the two young men gripped each other and peered down into the terrible abyss. They saw nothing at first, for they were looking too far out. Then they heard, from directly below them, words spoken as clearly as possible, given the profound terror of he who was speaking. “If you are Christian men, for the love of God, save me!”

Turning their eyes toward the voice, they saw, ten feet below them, on a precipice over a drop of more than a thousand feet, a man hanging from a tree, half uprooted and bending under his weight. His feet rested on a shifting rock but it was clear that it wouldn’t support him once the tree came loose that could happen at any moment. The Count of Moret grasped the situation at a glance. “Quick! Cut a staff eighteen inches long,” he cried, “thick enough to support a man’s weight.” Galaor, a mountaineer like Moret, understood what the count wanted. He drew a broad poniard from his sleeve and attacked a broken oak, and in a few moments hacked off a limb that could serve as a rope-ladder rung. Meanwhile, the count had unwrapped the rope from around his waist, to a length twice that of the distance to the man they hoped to rescue, and attached the rung to the loose end. Looping the rope around a protruding rock, he immediately began to let himself down toward the man suspended between life and death, meanwhile calling out encouragement. Moret passed the man the wooden rung on the other end of the rope, and he grasped it just as the tree’s roots pulled from the earth and it tumbled into the abyss. They weren’t safe yet: the rock supporting them was sharp, and was fraying the rope as they climbed. Fortunately, the two women arrived, bringing the mules with them. One mule was willing to approach near enough to the edge that they were able to pass the rope over its saddle. While Isabelle prayed, Madam de Coëtman, with indomitable determination, hauled the mule by the bridle until, with its help, Moret made it back over the edge. Then, drawing the rope over the saddle like a pulley, after a few seconds appeared the pale face of the peddler who’d so miraculously escaped death. A cry of joy greeted his appearance, to which Isabelle added, “Courage! Courage! You are saved!”

The man got to his feet, stumbled forward, dropped the rope, and draped his arms over the mule. The mule shied away, and the man, at the end of his strength, threw his arms up with a wordless cry and fainted into the arms of the Count of Moret. Moret opened a bottle of one of those invigorating liquors they distil in the Alps, held it to the man’s lips, and made him drink a few drops. It was apparent that the strength that had sustained him while he was in danger had abandoned him once he’d realised he was saved. The Count of Moret set him down, leaning him against the rock, while Isabelle held a bottle of smelling salts under his nose. The count untied the rung from the rope and threw it away with a man’s disdain for something useful whose use was over, and re-coiled the rope around his waist. Galaor, for his part, slapped his poniard back into its sheath with the recklessness of youth. In a few moments, after two or three convulsive twitches, the man opened his eyes. The expression on his face showed no recollection of what had happened to him but gradually the memory returned. He realised he owed his life to those around him, and his first words were of thanksgiving and gratitude. The Count of Moret, whom the man took for a simple Montagnard, asked him about himself. “My name is Guillaume Coutet,” the man replied. “I have a wife who was almost a widow, and three children who were nearly orphaned. If there’s anything I can do for you, by my life or my death, you have only to ask.”

Then he got to his feet with the help of the count, and, subject to the retroactive terror that accompanies, or sometimes precedes, such an accident, he approached the precipice and gazed shuddering down at the broken tree roots below. Then he looked beyond at the shapeless chaos of snow, ice, boulders, and broken trees piled at the bottom of the valley, where the tumbling Doire backed up against this sudden unexpected obstacle to its course. He sighed, thinking of the mule and its lost load that was, in all probability, all the wealth he had. Then, recovering, he murmured, “Life is the greatest gift you give us, my God. I offer my thanks to you, and to those who helped me, for keeping me safe.”

He turned back toward the path but, whether from shock or the concussion of the fall, he was too weak to take another step. “I’ve delayed you long enough,” he said to the Count of Moret and Isabelle. “Since I can’t do anything for you in exchange for saving my life, I won’t hold you up any longer. Only, please tell the innkeeper of the Golden Juniper of the accident that befell his cousin, Guillaume Coutet, who remains on the road and could use some help.”

The Count of Moret whispered a few words to Isabelle, who nodded her approval. Then, addressing the wounded man, “My dear friend,” he said, “since God gave us the opportunity to save your life, we’re not about to abandon you. We’re no more than half an hour from the village; you can ride my mule, while I lead my lady by her bridle, as I was doing before the accident.”

Guillaume Coutet started to protest but Moret silenced him, saying, “I have need of you, my friend, and you may be able, within twenty-four hours, to repay the service I rendered you by doing me a greater one.”

“Really?” asked Guillaume Coutet.

“Faith of a gentleman!” replied the count, forgetting that he was betraying his cover with those words.

“In that case,” the peddler said, bowing, “I obey, as is my duty twice over; first, because you saved my life, and second, because you have the right by rank to command a poor farmer like me.”

Then, with the help of the count and Galaor, Guillaume Coutet mounted the mule. The count resumed his place leading the mule that carried Isabelle, who was happy that the man she loved had had a chance to prove his skill, courage, and generosity. After a quarter of an hour or so, the little caravan entered the village of Chaumont, and stopped at the door of the Golden Juniper. At the first words Guillaume Coutet said to the host of the Golden Juniper, not about the rank of the man who’d saved his life but rather the service he’d rendered him, Master Germain put the inn entirely at the count’s service. But the Count of Moret didn’t need the entire inn, just one large room with two beds for Isabelle and the Dame de Coëtman, and another room for him and Galaor. So he had the double satisfaction of getting what he wanted without disturbing anyone else. As to Guillaume Coutet, he was put up in his cousin’s own bedroom. A doctor was sent for, who examined him from head to toe, and declared that none of his two hundred and six bones were broken. He was told to bathe in water infused with aromatic herbs and a few handfuls of salt, and then rub his body with camphor. With this treatment, and a few glasses of mulled honey, the doctor was hopeful that within a day or two, the patient would be able to continue his journey. The Count of Moret, after taking care of the two lady travellers, made sure that the doctor’s instructions were followed exactly. Once the patient felt a bit better, the count sat down at his bedside. Guillaume Coutet repeated his protestations of gratitude and loyalty. Moret let him talk and, when he had finished, said, “It’s God to whom you owe your thanks, my friend, for it was He who led me to your aid. However, perhaps God had a dual purpose: to save you, and to provide me with your help.”

“If that were true,” said the patient, “I would be the happiest man alive.”

“I’ve been directed by Cardinal Richelieu – you see I’m keeping no secrets from you, and trust entirely in your discretion – I’ve been instructed by Cardinal Richelieu to escort to her father in Mantua the young lady you met, and to whom I am devoted.”

“May God guide and watch over you on your journey.”

“Amen – but we learned at Exilles that Susa Pass is blocked by barricades and heavily guarded fortifications. If we’re recognised there, we’ll be captured and held as hostages by the Duke of Savoy.”

“Then you’d better avoid Susa Pass.”

“Is there a way around?”

“Yes, if you trust me to lead you.”

“Are you from this area?”

“I’m from Gravière.”

“So you know the side roads?”

“In order to avoid the border tax, I’ve learned all the mountain paths.”

“Will you act as our guide?”

“We’re not afraid of danger.”

“All right, then, I’ll do it.”

The Count of Moret nodded, indicating that the man’s word was enough. “However,” he said, “there’s more.”

“What else do you need?” asked Guillaume Coutet.

“I need information on the fortifications being built at Susa Pass.”

“That’s easy to get, since my brother is helping to build them.”

“And where does your brother live?”

“In Gravière, like me.”

“Can I seek out your brother, carrying a word from you?”

“Why not have he come here instead?”

“Could we do that?”

“It’s easy. Gravière is only half an hour away; my cousin is going there on his horse, and can bring my brother back with him.”

“How old is your brother?”

“Two or three years older than Your Excellency.”

“And how big is he?”

“About the same size as Your Excellency.”

“Are there a lot of people from Gravière working at Susa?”

“He’s the only one.”

“Do you think your brother might be willing to do me a favour?”

“Considering what you’ve done for me, he’d be willing to walk through fire for you.”

“Well, then, send for him. Needless to say, he’ll be well rewarded.”

“No need for that; Your Excellency has already rewarded us both.”

“Then I’ll go speak to our host about bringing him.”

“Please call him and let me speak to him alone, so he has no doubt but that I’m the one who’s asking him.”

“I’ll send him in.” The Count of Moret went out and, a quarter of an hour later, Master Germain mounted his horse and took the road to Gravière. One hour later, he returned to the Golden Juniper, bringing with him Guillaume’s brother, Marie Coutet.

121 Marie Coutet

Marie Coutet was a young man of twenty-six that as his brother had said made him three or four years older than the Count of Moret. He had the rugged good looks of the Montagnard: his honest face indicated a warm heart, and he was compact but strong, with broad shoulders and sturdy limbs. On the way back, he’d been brought up to date on the situation. He knew that his brother, swept away by an avalanche, had had the good fortune to catch hold of a tree, and had been rescued by a passing traveller. But why had his brother sent for him once he was out of danger?

That’s what he didn’t understand. But he didn’t hesitate for a moment that showed how devoted he was to his brother. As soon as he arrived, he went to the room where Guillaume Coutet was resting, and spent ten minutes with him, after which he asked Master Germain if he could speak to the gentleman. The Count of Moret was quick to respond to this invitation. “Your Excellency,” Guillaume said to him, “this is Marie, my brother. He knows I owe you my life, and, like me, he is at your disposal.”

The Count of Moret looked over the young mountaineer, and at first glance thought he saw in him both courage and honesty. “Your name,” he said, “is French.”

“Indeed, Your Excellency,” Marie Coutet replied, “both my brother and I are French in origin. My father and mother were from Phénioux; they moved to Gravière, where both of us were born.”

“So you still think of yourself as French?”

“In my heart as well as my name.”

“But you’re working on the fortifications at Susa.”

“They pay me twelve sous a day to shovel dirt, so all day I shovel dirt, without worrying about why or whose dirt it is.”

“But then, aren’t you working against your country?”

The young man shrugged. “Why doesn’t my country pay me to serve it?” he said.

“If I ask you to give me the details of the work you’re doing, will you share them with me?”

“Nobody asked me to keep it secret.”

“Do you know anything about the language of fortifications?”

“I’ve heard the engineers talk about redoubts, demi-lunes, and counterscarps but I have no idea what those words mean.”

“Could you draw me a diagram of the fortifications of Susa Pass, particularly those defending the heights of Montabon and Montmoron?”

“I don’t know how to read or write. I’ve never even held a pencil.”

“Are foreigners able to approach the works?”

“No. There’s a line of sentries a mile in front.”

“Could I go with you as a new worker? I was told they were looking for more men.”

“For how many days?”

“Just one.”

“If you don’t come back the next day, they’ll be suspicious.”

“What if you were sick for a day?”

“That might work.”

“Could I fill in for you?”

“I think so. My brother could write a note for the overseer, Jean Miroux. The next day, I’ll recover and return to work with no one the wiser.”

“Could you do that, Guillaume?”

“Yes, Your Excellency.”

“When do you start work?”

“Seven in the morning.”

“So there’s no time to lose. Get the note from your brother, return to Gravière, and at seven in the morning I’ll be there in your place.”

lifelong smuggler and poacher, he appeared to be in his element. With his elbows and shoulders he opened a path to the huge fireplace around which, smoking and drinking, a dozen men were gathered. Their mismatched outfits didn't seem to indicate any particular occupation but rather all occupations at once. Guillaume went up to the fireplace and spoke a few words into the ears of two men who were sitting there. They got up at once, without seeming bothered about it, and gave up their seats on a pair of hay bales. The Count of Moret and Galaor set their luggage on the bales, and set themselves on their luggage. Then they finally had a chance to take a good look at the company that surrounded them – a look that fully justified Miss de Lautrec's fears. Most of the men, like Guillaume, were apparently members of the honourable fraternity of smugglers but the others were a mixed lot: poachers on the lookout for any kind of game, highwaymen, condottieri, mercenaries from all over – Spaniards, Italians, Germans – it was a strange mixture. They spoke loudly in every language at once, and in terms so outlandish and lurid, even a skilled linguist would have had trouble sorting it out. These rougher types, instead of joining comfortably with the pack, seemed determined to keep their status as lone wolves, each trying to look more dangerous than the next. Only those few who were related to each other hung together. Spaniards predominated. Most had come from the siege of Casale, where the besieged were dying of starvation; they were deserters fleeing Italy in the guise of irregular soldiers who, once they reached the mountains, turned to one of those nocturnal pursuits for which, in every country, the mountains are the theatre. There these men flowed together, mingling to form a river that ran toward the edge of the abyss. Around their heads swirled the vapours of tobacco, mulled drinks, and alcoholic breath. A few smoking candles on the walls or tables added their fetid fumes to the atmosphere that they lit no better than the moon in a stormy sky. From time to time, voices rose in shrill disagreement, as shadowy figures raised menacing arms in the gloom; if the argument turned into a fight between, say, a Spaniard and a German, all those who spoke Spanish or German rallied to the one who spoke their language. If both parties were of equal strength, the mélée became general but if one side was weaker than the other, the original opponents were left to settle the quarrel on their own, with either a handshake or a knife. The two young cavaliers had just sat down and started to warm their hands when one of these quarrels that were always ready to break out anew, flared up in a corner of the room. German and Spanish insults were exchanged, denoting the nationalities of the opponents. Immediately, a dozen men charged through the smoke toward the conflict but as nine were Spaniards and only three Germans, the Germans quickly retreated to their benches, saying "It's nothing" – at which the Spaniards stood down, saying "Let them be."

Left on their own, the two disputants soon became combatants. Violent words turned to violent actions, and knife blades flashed in the candle light; curses bespoke wounds, their level of obscenity indicating the seriousness of the injuries. Finally a cry of pain rang out, stools and chairs were overturned as someone ran for the door, and a death rattle came from under the corner table. As soon as he saw the knives flashing, the Count of Moret had moved as if to intervene but an iron hand gripped his arm and held him down on his luggage. It was Guillaume who was doing him this favour. "By Christ," he said, "sit still!"

"But ... it's murder!" said the count.

"What business is that of yours?" Guillaume said quietly. "Let them be."

And, as we've seen, he did let them be. As the one who'd dealt the death wound escaped out the door, the one who'd received it slid down the wall until he fell beneath a table, where he gasped out his life. Once the fight was over and the killer gone, there was no objection to providing some relief to a dying man. As it was the German who was dying, two or three of his compatriots lifted him up from under the table and laid him on the top. The fatal wound was an upward stab, inflicted by one of those Catalan blades with a needle point that widens toward the hilt. It had gone in between the seventh and eighth ribs, right into the heart, and after the wounded man was set on the table, he gave a final spasm and quickly expired. In the absence of friends and relatives, his compatriots acted as his heirs and, nobody objecting, his effects were claimed by his three fellow Germans. After searching the body, they divided his money, his arms, and his clothes, as if this were the most routine matter in the world. That accomplished, the three Germans dragged the corpse outside, in its shirt and breeches, to a place where the road overlooked a thousand-foot cliff. There the body was slid over the edge, just like the body of a dead sailor cast overboard from a ship sailing the high seas. Except that in this case, a few seconds later they heard the thud of the body striking the rocks below. The dead man's father, mother, family, and friends were all unknown, and no one gave them a single thought. What was his name? Where was he from? Who was he, really?

It no longer mattered. He was one less atom in the infinite, and only the eye of God counted him among the countless atoms of humanity. His death left no more mark on Creation than the swallow who, at the approach of winter, departs for the south, leaving only a whisper in the air, or the ant that a passing traveller unknowingly crushes beneath his tread. However, the Count of Moret was appalled by the thought that Isabelle was separated from this terrible event by nothing more than a thin wall. He rose stiffly and made his way to the door of the kitchen where she was hiding, and found the hostess sitting on the threshold. "Never fear, my handsome young man," she said. "I'm on watch."

At that moment, as if Isabelle had sensed right through the wall that her lover had come looking for her, the door opened, and she graced him with that sweet, angelic smile that brought Paradise to wherever it shone. "Welcome, my dear," she said. "We're ready, and waiting on your signal."

"Then close the door, dear Isabelle. Don't open it except to my voice. I'll tell Guillaume and Galaor."

The door was closed. Turning around, the count found himself face to face with Guillaume. "The ladies are ready to go," he said. "We'd leave as soon as we can – this place makes my blood run cold."

"Good. But we'll make a gradual exit, and not go off all at once. You and the lad go first; in a couple of minutes, I'll follow with the luggage."

"Do you think there might be trouble?"

"There are all sorts here tonight – and you've seen the low value they place on a man's life."

"Why did you bring us in here, if you knew we'd find bandits like this?"

"I haven't passed this way for two months. Two months ago they weren't fighting in Italy yet. Where there's war, there are deserters, and deserters become dangerous bandits. If I'd known what awaited us, we would have kept going."

"All right. Send me Galaor. We'll prepare the mules and get ready to put this place behind us."

"I'm on my way." 5 minutes later, the 4 travellers, their guide left the smugglers' lodge as covertly, most of all as quietly as they could, and resumed their interrupted journey.

Souls & Stars

Upon leaving the stable yard, Guillaume showed the count the long trail of blood that reddened the snow up to the edge of the precipice where the body had been thrown over. No words were necessary; the count looked around warily and instinctively placed his hand on his pistol. Isabelle, who had heard nothing inside, saw nothing outside. The count had asked her to stay quiet, and so she was. The moon cast its cold light on the snow-covered terrain and disappeared, from time to time, behind dark clouds that rolled across the sky like great waves. The road was smooth enough that Isabelle was able to leave the mule in charge of following the path, and turn her eyes up to the celestial infinity. In winter in the mountains, when the air is crisp and cold, and the viewer is above the mists of the lowlands, the stars shine down with a pure and sparkling light. In a dreamy and melancholic mood, Isabelle was soon lost in contemplation. Worried about her silence – because lovers worry about everything – the Count of Moret hopped down from his mule. He took her mule by the bridle with one hand, while offering her the other. "What are you thinking about, beloved?" he asked her.

"What'd I think about, my dear, when I gaze into the starry firmament but the infinite power of God and the tiny place we occupy in this universe that our pride leads us to believe was made just for us?"

"What would you think, my dear dreamer, if you knew the actual size of those worlds rolling through the heavens, compared to the reality of our own globe?"

"You think you know, do you?"

The count smiled. "At Padua," he said, "I studied astronomy under a great Italian master, a professor who took me into his confidence. He told me a secret he hasn't yet dared to reveal, fearing it would be dangerous for him to do so."

"Can a scientific secret be dangerous?"

"It can be, if it contradicts the holy books!"

"One must have faith first and foremost! In the heart of the religious, faith takes precedence over science."

"But remember, dear Isabelle, you're talking to a son of Henry IV, whose father converted to the church under the duress of politics. His last words about me before he died – alas, he died so quickly he'd spare me no more thought than this – his final words were 'Let him study, let him learn, and let him make up his own mind.'"

"You mean you're not a Catholic?" Isabelle asked with some anxiety.

"No, I am – don't worry about that," said the count. "But my tutor, who was an old Calvinist, taught me to consider every belief in the light of reason, and to reject religious dogma if it required suppressing the mind in favour of faith. So I study, and learn, and am reluctant to accept any teaching that requires blind belief. But that doesn't stop me from glorying in the greatness of God, in whose mercy I would seek shelter if disaster ever struck me."

"That's a relief," Isabelle said, smiling. "I was afraid I'd fallen for a pagan."

"You may have fallen for worse than that, Isabelle. A pagan might agree to be converted but a thinker seeks enlightenment. And enlightenment, as it approaches universal truth, moves farther from dogma. Had I lived in Spain in the time of Philip II, dear Isabelle, I'd probably have been burned as a heretic."

"My God! But what about the stars I was gazing at, and what the Italian sage told you?"

"He told me something you're going to deny, though I think it's the absolute truth."

"I would never deny anything you tell me, my love."

"Have you ever lived by the side of the sea?"

"I've been to Marseilles twice."

"And what did you think was the most beautiful time of day?"

"Sunset."

"Wouldn't you have sworn that it was the Sun who moved across the sky, and then rushed down beyond the edge of the sea?"

"I would, and I still swear it."

"I'm afraid you're wrong, Isabelle: it's not the Sun that moves, it's the Earth."

"Impossible!"

"I told you you'd deny it."

"But if the Earth was moving, I'd feel it."

"No, for everything moves with it, including the atmosphere around us."

"But even if we're the world that's moving, we would still see the Sun."

"You're right, Isabelle, and your quick wit is almost the equal of science. But the Earth not only moves, it rotates; at this moment, for example, the Sun illuminates the Earth on the side away from us."

"If that's the case, why aren't we upside-down with our feet in the air?"

"In a relative sense, we are! But the atmosphere I mentioned surrounds us and sustains us."

"I don't understand a word of this, Antoine, and would prefer to talk about something else."

"What shall we talk about?"

"The thing I was thinking about when you asked me what I was thinking about."

"And what was that?"

"I was wondering if all these worlds scattered across the sky had been created as homes for our souls after death."

"Dear Isabelle, I never would have believed you were so ambitious."

"Ambitious? Why?"

"Only two or three of those worlds are smaller than ours: Venus, Mercury, and the Moon – three in all. Others are eighty times, seven hundred times, even fourteen hundred times bigger than the Earth."

"If you mean the Sun, then certainly – it's the principal star of all the stars. From it we have everything that gives us existence: warmth, power, and the glory of the world around us. The Sun is not just in the beat of our hearts, it's the heartbeat of the Earth."

"Dear Isabelle, you just said more with your imagination and poetry than my Italian sage with all his knowledge."

"But," Isabelle demanded, "How can these points of light in the sky be bigger than the Earth?"

"Leaving out those we can barely see because they're so far from us, like Uranus and Saturn – do you see that golden star, there?"

"I see it."

"That's Jupiter; it is four hundred and fourteen thousand times larger than the Earth, and it has four moons that bathe it in eternal light."

"But how does it seem so small when the Sun seems so big?"

"Partly because the Sun is five times the size of Jupiter, and partly because we are only thirty-eight million leagues from the Sun but we are one hundred and seventy million leagues from Jupiter."

"But who told you all this, Antoine?"

"My Italian sage."

"What's his name?"

"Galileo."

"And you believe what he told you?"

"Firmly."

"Well, my dear Count, you frighten me with your vast distances. I don't think my soul could ever make such a journey!"

"Assuming we have souls, Isabelle."

"Can you doubt it?"

"I've not seen it demonstrated."

"We'll not talk about that; Italian sage or no, I much prefer to believe I have a soul!"

"If you believe in your soul, I'll try to believe in mine."

"Well, suppose you have one, and after death you were free to choose between a temporary stay here: or eternity on another world. Which would you choose?"

"But you, my dear Isabelle: where would you go?"

"I admit that I lean toward the Moon, for it's the star of unhappy lovers."

"That would be a good choice insofar as it's the closest, Isabelle, being a mere ninety-six thousand leagues away but it's the planet where your soul would fare the worst."

"Why?"

"Because it's uninhabitable, even for a soul!"

"Oh, how unlucky! Are you sure?"

"Judge for yourself. Currently, the best telescopes in the world are in Padua. When trained on your favourite planet, they see nothing but absolute sterility and solitude, at least on its visible hemisphere; no atmosphere, and thus no river, lake, or ocean; no vegetation; no life. It's true that the side we can't see may have everything that the near side lacks. But I doubt it, so I advise you not to send your soul there, because mine has to follow wherever yours goes."

"You seem to know all these worlds as if you'd lived there, my dear Count! In all these stars and constellations, these planets and these moons where'd I go, if your soul is determined to follow mine?"

"As to that," said the count, "I wouldn't hesitate for a moment: to Venus!"

"From a man who claims not to be a pagan, that's a bit compromising. So why is Venus the planet of your choice?"

"See there, dear Isabelle? That blue flame in the sky is Venus; it's the forerunner of the night, and the harbinger of the dawn, the most radiant planet in our system. It's only twenty-eight million leagues or so from the Sun, and receives twice as much heat and light as the Earth; it has an atmosphere much like ours, and though barely half the size of our planet, it has mountains reaching an altitude of a hundred and twenty thousand feet. Now Venus, unlike Mercury, is almost entirely enveloped in clouds, so it must be home to the streams and rivers that are missing from the Moon. Souls that walk along those banks would hear the water murmur with a lovely freshness."

"Very well: we go to Venus," said Isabelle.

This pact had just been concluded when they heard a sound rapidly approaching. The travellers instinctively stopped and turned to see where the sound came from. A man was running toward them at full speed but he didn't cry out, just waved his hat wildly. They could see him clearly, as the Moon was sailing through a gap in the clouds, like a boat on a deep blue sea. It was apparent that this man had something important to convey to the travellers. When he got close enough, he gasped out Guillaume's name. Guillaume got down from his mule and ran to meet the man, who was one of the two smugglers who had given up his place by the fire to the Count of Moret and Galaor. The two men met at about fifty paces away, exchanged a few words in an undertone, and then came toward the caravan. "Bad news, friend Jacquolino," said Guillaume, affecting an air of familiarity with the count that was meant to deceive his smuggler friend as to Moret's rank, a rank which the man seemed to guess nonetheless. "They're coming after us. We need to find a place to hide so we can let them go past."

The Giacon Bridge

Here, in fact, is what happened in the smugglers' lodge after the Count of Moret, Galaor, and Guillaume Coutet left the common room. The front door reopened, and the face of the Spaniard who had fled after slaying the German reappeared there. The room was so quiet, it was as if nothing unusual had happened. "Hey!" he called. "You Spaniards!" All the Spaniards got up at the summons of their compatriot and went toward him. A local smuggler, the friend of Guillaume Coutet, suspecting the Spaniards were up to no good, went out the back door and circled around the lodge until he could get close to the conspirators. He heard the murderer tell his compatriots that, through the window of the kitchen, he'd seen two women, one of whom looked like an aristocrat. These ladies, he said, seemed to be part of Guillaume's caravan. And that was an opportunity too good to pass up. The murderer had little difficulty in persuading his comrades to seize the chance. There were ten Spaniards; they ought to be able to overwhelm three men without too much trouble, especially since one was a guide who probably wouldn't stick his neck out for people he didn't know. The gang went to gather their weapons. The smuggler, meanwhile, took to his heels and raced up the road, hoping to reach the caravan before the Spaniards could come upon them. And indeed, he arrived ahead of them but not by much. Guillaume and the smuggler talked it over quickly. They were both intimately familiar with the local terrain; but where there's no foliage, it's not easy to hide five travellers and their mules. The two smugglers grimaced and then both said, "The Giacon Bridge."

The Giacon Bridge was a high stone arch across a mountain canyon that carried the road over a tumbling tributary of the Po. Beyond, the road forked, one path climbing toward Venaux, the other bending back toward Susa, approaching it from behind. When they arrived at that point, the Spaniards would just have to guess which way their prey had gone, and if they picked the wrong direction, the travellers might escape – especially since the Spaniards had no idea the little caravan had been warned of the pursuit. They would probably just pick one fork or the other and continue on. Ten minutes' ride brought them to the Giacon Bridge. Guillaume took Isabelle's mule by its bridle, his comrade led the mule of Madam de Coëtman, and so they crossed the narrow span. Providence was on their side, for a sea of dark clouds that eclipsed the constellations which the count and Isabelle had admired, were also about to swallow the Moon and its light. In five more minutes, it would be dark as pitch. The smuggler let go of the bridle of the Lady Coëtman's mule, walked fifty paces away, dropped, and pressed his ear against the ground. The little caravan held still. After listening for a few seconds, the smuggler jumped up and ran back. "I heard them," he said, "but they're still six hundred yards behind us. In a minute, the Moon will disappear behind the clouds. There's not a moment to lose."

They resumed their ride. The clouds swept across the sky and the Moon disappeared; looking back, the travellers saw their pursuers arrive at the bridge just as darkness fell. Guillaume, who led the first mule, turned abruptly to the left, leading them onto a path cut into the rock that led down toward the tumbling torrent below. This path, such as it was, must have been cut so that, in the heat of summer, mules could be led down to cool water. It was a steep descent but they managed it without accident. At the bottom, the smuggler again pressed his ear against the stone. "They're coming," he said. "If one of our mules neighs and they spot us, leave it to me – I'll take that mule and lead them away."

Guillaume led the travellers under the arch of the stone bridge, where they bound kerchiefs around the mouths of the mules. Meanwhile his comrade went ahead to scout along the road to Venaux. Soon all the travellers could hear the Spanish bandits as they crossed the bridge. But as the travellers were doubly concealed by the darkness and the bridge, they were completely invisible, unless some unforeseen accident revealed their hiding place. After crossing the bridge, the Spaniards fell to arguing about whether they should take the fork that went on toward Venaux, or back toward Susa. The discussion became heated, and those among the fugitives who understood Spanish could clearly hear the whole debate. Suddenly, they heard a male voice rise in song from beyond the bridge. Guillaume placed a finger against the Count of Moret's lips – he had recognised the voice of his comrade. The song interrupted the debate at the fork in the road. Four of the Spaniards stepped forward to meet the singer. "Hey, you!" they called out in broken Italian. "Did you see any mounted travellers go by?"

"I saw two men and two women led by Guillaume Coutet, a merchant from Gravière," he said. "Is that who you mean?"

"Exactly!"

"Well, they're only about five hundred yards ahead along the road to Venaux," the smuggler said. This settled the argument, and the bandits rushed off down the road to Venaux. The travellers peered warily out from the shadows beneath the bridge. As for the smuggler, he took the road toward Susa, gesturing to the travellers to follow him. The sound of the bandits receded into the distance, and after five minutes' wait, the caravan, led by Guillaume, went back up the steep path to the bridge. Five hundred yards down the Susa road, they caught up with the smuggler, who, unwilling to return to the lodge after misleading the bandits, asked if he could join the travellers' party. Permission was instantly granted, and the Count of Moret promised him that, once they were over the border and into Piedmont, he would be well rewarded. They continued on their way, pressing the mules for speed that was easier as they approached Susa, where the road was better. As they got closer, the two guides advised caution but the path they were following was so little known and even less frequented that the Savoyards had set no sentries on it, though it approached the northern ramparts. The ramparts, when they reached them, were deserted, as the entire defence of the town of Susa was concentrated in the pass, a mile further ahead. Eventually, by following the rampart around to the east, they came down off the mountain and onto the road to the town of Malavet, where they spent the night. The next morning, they took counsel. They could descend into the plain and go down to Lake Maggiore by way of Rivarolo and Joui but that would be risking a danger of capture even worse than falling into the hands of Spanish bandits. It was true that the Count of Moret had been charged upon his departure from France to carry a letter from Queen Anne to Don Gonzales de Cordova, the Governor of Milan, and thus could pretend to be on a mission for the two queens to Rome or Venice. But that ruse would have galled him, as he was a true son of Henry IV and hated to lie. Besides, that would have shortened the journey that Antoine de Bourbon wished to prolong as much as possible. And since his advice carried the most weight, his will prevailed. So they decided to go the long way around, through Aosta, Domodossola, and Sonovre, and by bypassing the Lombard basin make their way to Verona, where they'd be safe. After a couple of days of rest in Verona, the party would separate, the women continuing on horseback to their destination, Mantua. At Ivrea, the smuggler who had joined their caravan went on his way, after being rewarded for his devotion with a money pouch that persuaded Guillaume Coutet all the more that he was guiding a nobleman who was travelling incognito. And to be fair we must say that it was to confirm this suspicion that he was determined to accompany the travellers to the end of their journey. As it happened, that confirmation wasn't hard to come by: if Guillaume Coutet had sworn to serve the count because the latter had saved Coutet's life, Antoine de Bourbon felt the strong sympathy and connection of the saviour for the saved. After 27 days of travel and a series of unimportant incidents we will spare the reader by omitting as they lacked the drama of previous events, the party arrived in Mantua by way of Tordi, Nogaro, and Castellarez.

126
The Oath

No letter, word, or message had forewarned the Baron de Lautrec of the arrival of his daughter. As a result, though he wasn't always the most attentive of fathers, the first moments of their reunion were an outpouring of paternal and filial love. It was several moments before the baron could acknowledge his daughter's travelling companions, and read the letter sent to him by Cardinal Richelieu. From this letter, he learned the name of the young man charged with the care of his daughter, and from that just how much the cardinal cared for his Isabelle. Altogether he had more than enough reason to immediately notify Charles de Gonzague, the new Duke of Mantua, of the arrival of his daughter, and of the illustrious escort who'd brought her to his door. So he sent a servant to the Château de Té to tell the duke the news that was bound to pique his interest, since the Count of Moret, as the natural brother of Louis XIII, must be privy to the intentions of the cardinal and the king. When he heard that the count requested an audience, the Duke of Mantua responded by mounting a horse and coming himself, accompanied only by one of his most faithful servants. He found that the Count of Moret, despite being the son of Henry IV, refused to cover his head and take a seat before the duke did. As it happened, the duke already knew, from an envoy, the news from Paris as of January 4, 1629 – that is to say, several days after the departure of the Count of Moret and Isabelle. The cardinal, on the strength of the king's promise to him, had conveyed France's full support to the Duke of Mantua that had gone a long way to relieve him of his fears. And now here came not a mere courier but an emissary from Richelieu himself, to assure him that the cardinal – and the king – were on their way. History tells us that on Thursday, January 15, the king dined at Moulins and spent the night at Varenne. We don't know his exact whereabouts between January 15 and February 5 – but we do know that in that time the plague that had broken out in Italy, had crossed the Alps and reached Lyon. Would the king have enough courage in the face of bitter cold and this deadly scourge, to carry him through Lyon and up into the frigid mountains? For anyone who knew how changeable the king was, this was a real concern. But for those who knew the steadfast character of the cardinal, there was hope. The Count of Moret could only repeat to the Duke of Mantua what he'd been told by the cardinal: that the French intended to raise the siege of Casale and bring immediate relief to Mantua.

There was no time to lose. Charles, the Duke of Nevers, knew from a reliable source that Prince Gaston, in a moment of anger, had sent a message reaching out to Wallenstein in Germany. Thus Sir unwittingly drew toward France those new Huns under their new Attila. For the last three months, two generals of these barbarians, Aldringen and Gallas, past masters of destruction and pillage, had been sacking their way through Worms, Frankfurt, and Swabia. To the poor Duke of Mantua, it was as if they were already looming across the Alps, more terrible than the savage tribes of the Cimbri and Teutons, who had sledged down mountains and across frozen rivers on their shields. The Count of Moret knew he shouldn't stay long in Mantua. He had promised the cardinal he would return to take part in the campaign – but against this, the duke urged him to lend his name to the defence of Mantua until it could be relieved by the king's forces. The situation in Mantua was so grave, the Baron de Lautrec almost regretted that he'd summoned his daughter into it. The day after their arrival, her father summoned Isabelle for a private talk. He told Isabelle the commitments he'd made regarding her to the Viscount of Pontis – and in return, Isabelle told him quite openly of the vow made to her by the Count of Moret. Despite the excellence of the Sir de Pontis's birth and family, they were no match for that of Antoine de Bourbon, who outranked anyone of less than royal birth. The baron contented himself with bringing the Count of Moret into his office to ask him about his intentions. Moret replied with his usual frankness, confessing that the cardinal had already forced his hand, and endorsed his commitment – so long as first he discharged his duty to the cardinal. The Baron de Lautrec accepted this commitment, with the proviso that if the count was killed, or contracted to another, he would resume his authority to bestow his daughter's hand where he would. Barring that, he had no reason to resist the young count's suit for Isabelle. The evening after this double discussion, the young couple, walking along the banks of the river Virgil, related to each other the talks they'd had with the baron. Isabelle made her lover promise not to get killed, he promised never to take another for his wife, and both were satisfied. We must emphasise this promise "never to take another for his wife," because with every son of Henry IV other than Antoine de Bourbon, this would certainly have been a Jesuitical promise, adhered to in fact but not in spirit. There was certainly no ulterior motive in the promise not to get killed but this promise to take no other wife but Isabelle de Lautrec – did it extend to mistresses, or those moments when the Devil might otherwise tempt him? The most faithful of lovers have such moments, even those who aren't sons of a freethinker like Henry IV. Could the young Basque Jacquolino resist the sultry attractions of his beautiful cousin Marina, whose hot eyes shot him flaming glances that set his heart afire? What if another evening came like that after Marie de Gonzague's soirée, when La Fargis, her kiss still burning on his lips, was stepping into her chair – what if Satan tapped him on the shoulder and urged him to join her? Was he strong enough to send Satan back to Hell? We can't say that, for Antoine de Bourbon, the words he'd spoken to Isabelle de Lautrec outweighed the attractions of Madam de Fargis, that Venus Astarte who whispered burning words of forbidden love into the ears of her lovers. What we can say is that the Count of Moret felt the need of a witness other than the river the pagans called the Mincio, and other lights than those of Venus, Jupiter, Saturn, and Cassiopeia. And so he asked Isabelle to join him in a Christian church and, in the presence of God, reaffirm the solemnity of his oath. Isabelle, like her compatriot Juliet, promised everything her lover asked, repeating to him the words of the English poet:

"My bounty is as boundless as the sea,
My love as deep; the more I give to thee,
The more I have, for both are infinite."
